Estranged from his father, Varèse moved to Paris and, in 1904, was accepted at the « Schola Cantorum », studying composition and conducting with Vincent d'Indy, counterpoint and fugue with Albert Roussel, and medieval and Renaissance music with Charles Bordes. However, he became disenchanted with d'Indy's teaching and, in 1905, was accepted as a student in Charles-Marie Widor's class at the « Conservatoire National de Musique et de Déclamation ». During this period, he composed a number of works for orchestra and for piano, all of which were subsequently destroyed in a fire or by Varèse's own hand. In 1906, Varèse founded the Choral Society of the People's University, conducting the group in various concerts. In 1907, he met actress Suzanne Bing at the « Conservatoire ». They were married the same year and had one child.

After his marriage, Varèse became dissatisfied with musical life in Paris and moved to Berlin. There, he sought-out composer Ferruccio Busoni, whose « Sketch for the Æsthetic of a New Music » (1907) Varèse greatly admired for its daring predictions of future musical styles that would abandon the traditional tonal system and rely on music-making « machines » .

In 1909, Varèse completed his most ambitious work to date, a large symphony titled « Bourgogne », and began work on a Symphonic poem, both compositions drawing from the works of Richard Strauß and Gustav Mahler. The work was performed in 1910 ; but it provoked a hostile reaction, and Varèse later destroyed the manuscript.

Although Varèse continued to develop his interest in non-traditional modes of creating music, he reacted harshly to the « Futurist Manifesto » of 1913, arguing that the futurists' use of noise in musical composition remained trivial. Varèse claimed that noise could be useful in music only insofar as it became transformed into new sounds and timbres, thereby, revealing its « spirit » . These ideas, influenced by both Busoni and Hoene Wronsky, a physicist-musicologist with whom he had earlier become enamored, were published in Francis Picabia's Dadaist magazine « 391 » .

In 1913, Varèse returned to Paris, and he and his wife divorced. He later (probably 1921) married Louise Norton, a poet and translator. They had no children. In Paris, Varèse became interested in the « dynaphone », an electric instrument invented by Jean Bertrand. Meanwhile, Varèse's career as an orchestral conductor began to gain momentum in 1914 with a successful appearance in Prague. But the First World War made it impossible for Varèse to successfully pursue conducting opportunities in Europe, so, in 1915 he moved to New York City.

Despite his output of only slightly more than a dozen compositions, Edgard Varèse is regarded as one of the most influential musicians of the 20th Century. His concept of « organized sound » led to many experiments in form and texture. He was constantly on the look-out for new sound sources (working throughout his life with engineers, scientists and instrument builders) , and was one of the 1st to extensively explore percussion, electronics, and taped sounds. He was, as Henry Miller called him :

« The stratospheric Colossus of Sound. »

Varèse spent his early childhood in Paris and Burgundy. His father wanted him to study math and engineering in preparation for a career in business. However, Varèse pursued music, studying at the « Schola Cantorum » with Albert Roussel and Vincent d'Indy and at the Paris Conservatoire with Charles Marie Widor. Varèse moved to Berlin, in 1907, in part to meet Ferruccio Busoni ; Varèse had been impressed with Busoni's « Sketch for a New Æsthetic in Music » (1907) , which anticipated many of Varèse's own later explorations. Unfortunately, of the music Varèse wrote during that time, only one song survives. The other manuscripts were destroyed in a warehouse fire.

Edgard Varèse was born in Paris of a Corsican family, but his youth was spent in Italy, where he received an engineer's training and degree. He was equally interested in music, and after preliminary study at the Turin Conservatory, he continued at the « Schola Cantorum » in Paris under Vincent d'Indy and Albert Roussel ; followed by the Conservatory under Charles Marie Widor. He was a brilliant student and won a composition prize sponsored by the city.

In 1907, Varèse moved to Berlin, where he came under the influence of Richard Strauß and Ferruccio Busoni. He conducted a chorus and wrote an Opera, « Œdipus und die Sphinx » , on a libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Varèse also wrote a Symphony which was performed, but all of these early compositions were destroyed in a fire. With the outbreak of World War I, Varèse left for the United States.

Mai 1909 : The 24 year old Alban Berg writes the last of the songs which he will include in his « Sieben Frühe Lieder » (7 Early Songs) for voice and piano (orchestrated in 1928) .

Mai 1909 : Arnold Schönberg composes the 1st of his « Funf Orchesterstücke » (5 Pieces for Orchestra) , Opus 16.

23 mai 1909 : Arnold Schönberg finishes the draft of the 1st piece of his « Funf Orchesterstücke » , Opus 16.

9 juin 1909 : Arnold Schönberg finishes a fair-copy of the 1st piece of his « Funf Orchesterstücke » , Opus 16.

Juin 1909 : Arnold Schönberg works on the 2nd and 3rd pieces of his « Funf Orchesterstücke » , Opus 16.

15 juin 1909 : Arnold Schönberg finishes a fair-copy of the 2nd piece of his « Funf Orchesterstücke » , Opus 16.

Mi-juin 1909 : The 25 year old Anton Webern completes 5 Movements for his String Quartet, Opus 5, which are even more radical-sounding than Arnold Schönberg's pieces, so far. The pieces still exhibit the technique of « developing variation » , but some of them are extremely short, and will influence both Schönberg and Berg.

26 juin 1909 : Spending the summer in Toblach, in what is now the Italian Alps, Gustav Mahler signs his 1st contract with Universal-Edition, for the publication of his 8th Symphony.

Fin-juin 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg goes with his family and friends to spend the summer at Steinakirchen-am-Forst, and full of confidence and enthusiasm over his attainment of a long-sought « new mode of musical expression », he spends the month of July working on the last 2 of the Orchestral Pieces of Opus 16.

Hugo von Hofmannsthal begins working on an original libretto, loosely adapted from Louvet de Couvrai's novel, « Les amours du chevalier de Faublas » and Molière's comedy, « Monsieur de Pourceaugnac », for Richard Strauß's 5th Opera, « Der Rosenkavalier », which they want to be in a light-hearted comic style. After seeing Schœnberg's latest work, Strauß has turned his back on the musical progressivism that he, himself, helped to initiate.

Été 1909 : Sometime during the summer, Alban Berg composes the 1st of his 4 Songs, Opus 2, for medium voice and piano.

Été 1909 : The 12 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold assembles his « “ Don Quixote ” : 6 Characteristic Pieces for piano », adapting his earlier Cantata, « Der Tod », as the opening piece of this work.

1er juillet 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg finishes a fair-copy of the 3rd piece of his « Funf Orchesterstücke », Opus 16. It is an experiment in « Klangfarbenmelodie » (tone-colour melody) : very little harmonic movement with overlapping entrances of the instruments.

Juillet et août 1909 : Gustav Mahler works feverishly to compose his entire 9th Symphony. Its 1st movement makes a deep impression on all those to whom he plays it, especially Alban Berg.

Mi-juillet 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg writes to Richard Strauß about his Orchestral Pieces :

« There is absolutely nothing Symphonic about them, quite the opposite - no architecture, no construction. Purely a diverse, uninterrupted alternation of colours, rhythms, and moods. »

17 juillet 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg completes the 4th of his « Funf Orchesterstücke » (5 Pieces for Orchestra) , Opus 16.

28 juillet 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg sends the score of the 1st 4 of the 5 Pieces to Richard Strauß asking for a performance, but Strauß replies that his audience is far too conservative to accept these « daring experiments », and adding that it is unlikely that Schœnberg will find any conductor willing to perform them (a severe blow to the confidence Schœnberg had expressed about his hoped) for reception of these pieces.

Now ready to tackle an Opera project, Arnold Schœnberg asks Marie Pappenheim to furnish him with a libretto.

Fin-juillet 1909 : Ferruccio Busoni sends Arnold Schœnberg a copy of his « Sketch of a New Æsthetic of Music » .

7 août 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg completes the 3rd (and last) of the 3 Piano Pieces, Opus 11. A few days later, he completes the last of the 5 Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 16.

Août - septembre 1909 : Cycles Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner donnés par l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich.

24 août 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg writes a letter to Ferruccio Busoni commenting on both the latter's description of « 3rd-tones » , and a notation Schœnberg had previously devised for « quarter-tones » using the mathematical signs « < » and « > » as accidentals. He tells Busoni that he ultimately rejects the use of micro-tones. (He will explain why, 1 year later, in « Harmonielehre » .)

27 août au 12 septembre 1909 : Immediately after writing the letter to Ferruccio Busoni follow 2 incredible weeks during which Arnold Schœnberg composes his amazing « mono-drama » « Erwartung » (Expectation) , Opus 17, on Marie Pappenheim's libretto, with a morbid story-line and a solo female character who is psychotic. The piece has been called « athematic » (as well as atonal) , since there are no recognizable repetitions of any motifs, and it marks the sharpest break with tradition in the history of European music. Schœnberg's letter to Busoni speaks about his desire to free his music from all formal bounds, and to express « pure feeling » - this is exactly what he achieved in « Erwartung » . He will later write in 1929 :

« The aim is to represent in slow-motion everything that occurs during a single second of maximum spiritual excitement, stretching it out to half an hour. »

Septembre 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg also signs a publishing contract with Universal-Edition. The success of Universal does a lot towards disseminating the work of both he (and, ultimately, also Berg and Webern) and Mahler.

Septembre 1909 : Anton Webern, brooding over his mother's death, 3 years before, composes his 6 Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 6. The original version uses a huge orchestra, which will be toned-down in the revised 1928 version.

Octobre 1909 : The 12 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold completes his 1st Piano Sonata (in D minor) .

2 septembre 1909 : Gustav Mahler completes the draft of the orchestral score of his 9th Symphony.

17 septembre 1909 : Gustav Mahler returns to Vienna.

26 septembre 1909 : Gustav Mahler travels to Holland.

2 octobre 1909 : Gustav Mahler conducts his 7th Symphony in The Hague.

3 et 7 octobre 1909 : Gustav Mahler conducts his 7th Symphony twice in Amsterdam, with Oskar Fried present on the composer's invitation.

8 octobre 1909 : Gustav Mahler travels to Paris to join Alma and daughter, Anna.

12 octobre 1909 : Gustav, Alma and Anna sail from Cherbourg to America for Mahler's 3rd season there.

19 octobre 1909 : The Mahlers arrive in New York, living again at the Hotel Savoy in Manhattan. Having given-up his position at the « Metropolitan » Opera, he directs a season of concerts leading the re-organized New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

3 novembre 1909 : Arnold Schœnberg attends the Vienna premiere of Gustav Mahler's 7th Symphony conducted by Ferdinand Löwe, and is greatly impressed by Mahler's music, even despite his reservations about Löwe's abilities as an interpreter of Mahler. Schœnberg sends a glowing letter to Mahler telling him what a powerful impression the work left on him, writing to Mahler that :

« I am now wholly yours. »

After this confession, and considering the prevalence which Schœnberg gave to « 4th-chords » in his « Kammer-symphonie », composed just after Mahler did the same in his 7th, it is hard to believe Schœnberg when he will write the following summer in his « Harmonielehre » :

« It is possible, it is indeed probable, that others besides me have written these chords (4th-chords) . Perhaps, Mahler, Strauß, or Pfitzner. But I do not know. They have never come to my attention. Maybe, I simply have not noticed them. It is, by no means, my intention to secure here a priority for myself. To do so is of too little importance to me, for I know too well that is not what matters.

Décembre 1909 : Gustav Mahler's 7th Symphony is published by Bote & Bock.

Paul Landau edits a new version of the play « Wozzeck » in Georg Büchner's « Collected Works » . Landau uses Franzos' reading of the words of the play (the only one available to him) , but revises the ordering of the scenes. Alban Berg will later use this version for his Opera, although he apparently believes that it is the version by Franzos.

The 12 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold begins composing his Piano Trio in D major, Opus I. Julius Korngold, because of his position as the leading Viennese music-critic, is apprehensive about revealing his young son Erich's amazing talent as a composer to the public.

Décembre 1909 : Julius Korngold decides to issue 3 of Erich Wolfgang's compositions (Piano Sonata No. 1 ; « “ Don Quixote ” : 6 Characteristic Pieces » ; and « Der Schneemann ») in a privately-printed and numbered edition, to musician friends and associates, with a preface stating explicitly that the pieces are not to be brought to the attention of the public. The responses are all extremely enthusiastic, including an often-quoted one by Richard Strauß in which Strauß encourages Julius to get Erich away from composing and to take him skiing and sledding "lest his young brain becomes prematurely tired and worn out before it reaches its full productivity".

Circa 1910 : An ostensibly later issue of the Ferdinand Löwe and Josef Schalk arrangement of the 3rd Symphony by Anton Bruckner which has a plate-number signifying that it is actually a re-issue of the Gustav Mahler - Rudolf Krzyżanowski arrangement. In the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft Mitteilungsblatt » No. 27, of June 1986, Nigel Simeone explains that :

« Löwe's and Schalk's arrangement was widely circulated and often re-printed. It is probable that, on this occasion, the publisher (Rättig/Lienau) or more likely the printer (Josef Eberle) selected the " correct " (i.e. : Löwe and Schalk) title-page but the " wrong " (older) plates with the same plate number (165) but with different letters preceding the number. The result is a well-disguised " Titelaufgabe " (edition with new title-page) of Mahler's earliest publication, the most significant of all Bruckner 4 hand arrangements. »

Janvier 1910 : Oskar Fried conducts the 2 « Nachtmusiken » (Nocturnes : the 2nd and 4th movements) from Gustav Mahler's 7th Symphony, in Berlin.

Autour de janvier et février 1910 : Alban Berg composes the 4th song of his 4 Songs for medium voice and piano, Opus 2, and begins drafting the 1st movement of his String Quartet.

Fin-janvier 1910 : Gustav Mahler responds from New York to Arnold Schönberg. Mahler also tells him that he possesses his score of the privately-published 2nd String Quartet (Opus 10) with him, and that he studies it, from time to time. But he confesses that « it is difficult » for him to follow.

7 février 1910 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

Février 1910 : Arnold Schönberg composes 2 very short pieces for chamber orchestra, and a fragment of a 3rd piece shortly after (published in 1962 as : 3 Pieces for Chamber Orchestra) , which embody, more than anything else he ever wrote, the ideals propounded in his 1909 letters to Ferruccio Busoni : an expression of pure feeling, without logical musical development or architecture. Schönberg was apparently influenced in part by Anton Webern's 5 Movements for String Quartet, Opus 5, but Webern's pieces are not as radical as Schönberg's.

Arnold Schönberg had gone confidently into bold new areas of musical expression during 1909, with his 3 Piano Pieces, Opus 11, « Fünf Orchesterstücke » (5 Pieces for Orchestra) , Opus 16, and the « mono-drama » « Erwartung » , but the lack of understanding for these pieces from composers who were close friends (Richard Strauß, Max Reger, Ferruccio Busoni, and Gustav Mahler) now causes a period of intense self-doubt. After abandoning the 3 Pieces for Chamber Orchestra, he spends the rest of 1910 working intensively on his « Harmonielehre » text-book and composes nothing significant for a whole year, all the while being drawn more closely into his small circle of supporters, who were mainly his students. He, meanwhile, continues to work on the text of his Opera project, « Die glückliche Hand » .

3 mars 1910 : Le chef Carl Muck dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 20e concert de la saison.

17 mars 1910 : Béla Bartók's 1st String Quartet is premiered in Budapest.

30 mars 1910 : Gustav Mahler dirige « sa version révisée » de la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner à la tête du Philharmonique de New York.

Mahler's marked score that he used at that performance became a part of the Philharmonic's Orchestra library.

Originally published on highly-acidic paper, the score had become so fragile that it was impossible for anyone to handle. In 2013, through the generosity of Jan and Mark Schapper, the score was preserved so that it could be photographed and studied.

Clark University music professor Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, the 1st scholar to extensively study this score, observed that :

« Mahler's treatment of the Finale removes more than one 3rd of the music. He radically altered the nature of this movement, effectively transforming it from an epic statement into a shorter and lighter piece by systematically deleting each appearance of the stormy 3rd theme group, adjusting some dynamics, and a bit of the orchestration, and re-working a key-modulation. The result clearly goes against Bruckner's intentions, but does have a certain logic of its own. »

Obviously, the score was used in subsequent performances, and a few of the marks were made by individuals other than Mahler.

As for the orchestra parts used at the 1st Philharmonic performance, the Library catalog indicates that Mahler took the parts with him when he went to Europe and did not return them. Then, needing to explain why the parts were irrevocably lost to the Philharmonic, the librarian wrote : « He died » .

The parts do exist in Vienna marked with the official New York Philharmonic stamp at the « Musiksammlung » of the « Wienbibliothek » . Doctor Korstvedt, who has studied the parts in Vienna, reports that the markings on the parts line-up with the marks in the score and that some contain performance timings written by the Philharmonic musicians. For instance, the tuba part is signed in pencil :

« Fred Geib March 30 1910/ Philharmonic Orch./ Gustav Mahler Conductor. »

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT

LAST ONE OF THE HISTORICAL SERIES IT WAS.

A Work Not Heard Here Before Is No Historical - Anton Bruckner's Symphony in E-Flat Admirably Played - Some More Music by Richard Strauß.

The final historical concert of the Philharmonic Society took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted entirely of orchestral numbers which were Pfitzner's Overture to « Das Christ-Elflein », Anton Bruckner's « Romantic » Symphony in E-flat, the Prelude to Acts I and 2 of Richard Strauß's Opera « Guntram » and, of the same composer, « Till Eulenspiegel ». Gustav Mahler conducted and the audience was very small.

That we live in an automobile-age he already been noted by no less an authority than the President of these United States, but even he would marvel at the rapid making of musical history. So swiftly is it manufactured that a hitherto unheard composition finds its way into historical programme. Thus, does the voice of musical record speak with the laconic comprehensiveness of Friar Bacon's celebrated brazen head, which uttered but one sentence :

« Time is, time was, time's past. »

But stop. Pfitzner's magic name may be unknown to darkest New York, but his Overture was performed in Boston, in 1907, the very year in which it was accorded the honour of performance at Munich. It was written as the introduction to a fairy-play by Ilse von Stach, which was a failure in 1908. All that is left of it is this Overture.

It is a pleasing composition and could be heard again. It does not belong to the class of musical profundities, but has a blood relationship to such delightful fancies as Humperdinck's « Hänsel und Gretel ». Many of its musical incidents seem to belong to the obvious, and it is frankly tuneful in a good old fashioned way now out of favour in Germany. Considering that the composer is classed among the revolutionists, this is something for which we should give thanks. The work was excellently performed last night and the chosen few appeared to enjoy it.

The Bruckner Symphony, again, gave music-lovers an opportunity to study the methods and mannerisms of a deeply serious mind, perhaps too absorbed in its own operations. The 1st movement of this Symphony is crowned with consummate Mastership in development and orchestral treatment. Its thematic material is fecund and is ingratiating in itself. The most callous listener could hardly fail to discern some of its beauty. Yet here, as too often in other places, Bruckner did not know when he was through, and his over-worked repetitions and long drawn Coda detract from the excellence of the movement.

There is less of the open-air in the slow-movement than in the 1st, yet here again, one is drawn under the spell of the composer's intellectual concentration. This is thoughtful music, and the thinking listener can find fertile matter in it. But it does not touch the emotion quite so quickly as some other slow-movements. It is the romance of the midnight oil rather than of the field and meadow.

The Scherzo echoes the ardour of the chase. It is a delightful Scherzo albeit some of its phrases are a trifle abrupt. The Finale is the least interesting of the 4 movements. It seems laboured and without clearness of purpose. The Symphony was superbly played and the reading was what might have been expected from Mr. Mahler, whose own music betokens him a sympathizer with the ways of Bruckner.

PHILHARMONIC GIVES WORK OF COMPOSER NEW TO CITY

Music by Hans Pfitzner Proves an Interesting Novelty.

NEW STRAUSS PIECES ALSO

Programme of Last Historical Concert Filled with Surprises by Gustav Mahler.

For the 5th and last historical concert of the Philharmonic Society, which took place last night in Carnegie Hall, Gustav Mahler provided the most interesting programme he has offered New Yorkers this season. He brought forward, as an introductory number, the work of a composer absolutely unknown in New York, the Symphony of a man who has been sadly neglected here, and 2 pieces of music by no less a man than Richard Strauß which were practically new to local music-lovers, strange as that may seem in a city so flavoured with performances of works by Germany's most famous musician. Here was enough material surely to furnish the flavour of novelty for several of the regular subscription concerts ; yet, Mahler preferred to burn this musical ammunition at a single concert of a series that has drawn comparatively small audiences throughout the season.

The biggest, if not the most exhilarating work of the evening was Anton Bruckner's 4th Symphony, known generally as the « Romantic » . Boston heard this Symphony on February 11, 1899, but records do not show a performance as recent here, though New York had the honour of the 1st American production, on March 16, 1888, under Anton Seidl. Bruckner's 7th, 8th and 9th Symphonies have been produced in Carnegie Hall within a few years, though not often enough to make the general public familiar with their « grandeur » and beauty. Owing to the opposition of a few persons, who made light not only of the music, but aimed shafts at those responsible for its production, there was little to encourage repetitions. Doctor Muck, for instance, instead of receiving thanks for presenting the 8th and 9th Symphonies, had to put-up with abuse instead.

Last night's novelty, announced earlier in the season but dropped suddenly without explanation only to be taken-up once more at the 11th hour, was Pfitzner's « Das Christ-Elflein » , music written to Ilse von Stach's Christmas fairy story by that name. It was high-time to introduce to New Yorkers a work of Hans Pfitzner, who is considered by some persons, notably by Rudolf Louis, one of Bruckner's critical champions, « the only pure and authentic genius among composers of the present time » . He was born on May 5, 1869, in Moscow, from parents of German origin. His father was a violinist, who played in various orchestras, including that of the Moscow Opera House, and in the Municipal Theatre in Frankfort-on-the-Main ; his mother, a pianist, pupil of Villoing, teacher of Rubinstein.

In 1886, Pfitzner entered the Hoch Conservatory of Music in Frankfort, where he continued his musical studies for 4 years under Iwan Knorr and James Kwast. His 1st work to attract attention was the Opera, « Der Arme Heinrich » , which had its premiere in Mayence, on April 2, 1895. Another Opera, « Die Rose vom Liebesgarten » , was produced for the 1st time in the year 1901, in Elberfeld. Other compositions are incidental-music to Ibsen's « Des Fest auf Solhaug » ; an Overture and 3 pieces for orchestra written for Kleist's « Kätchen von Hellbron » ; « Columbus » for 8 part chorus « a capella » ; several songs with orchestra and piano accompaniments ; a Sonata, Opus 1, for piano and cello ; a Piano Trio, Opus 8, and a String Quartet.

The unfamiliar Strauß music Mahler chose to present last night consisted of the Preludes to the 1st and 2nd Acts of that composer's 1st Opera, « Guntram » , which quite easily adapts themselves to concert performances. Strauß's tone-poem, « Till Eulenspiegel » , following closely after the Preludes as the final offering of the evening, showed clearly and interestingly the contrast between Strauß's early and later styles. For « Guntram » , which proved to be an absolute failure, and has not been thought worth reviving, marked a crisis, a dividing line, in Strauß's artistic career, his subsequent works revealing less of the serious idealism which is expressed in this work.

Persons who shunned last night's concert for fear at the length of Bruckner's Symphony need not have been scared away, for it did not occupy more than 3 quarters of an hour. Gustav Mahler had made liberal cuts in the score - a big one in the Andante, an ample one in the Scherzo and several extensive slashes in the last movement - and that reduced the work to dimensions more agreeable to New Yorkers.

It must be said, however, that the Symphony in E-flat major is, as a whole, somewhat disappointing even to Bruckner enthusiasts, and does not compare in nobility, inspiration, freedom of expression and sublimity of utterance to the other compositions of Bruckner heard here, in New York. There are moments, it is true, particularly when the composer calls on the unrestrained powers of the brass choir, in which the good organist of the Vienna « Hofkapelle » obtains heaven-storming effects, but these pinnacles are separated by gulfs in which Bruckner seems to be fumbling for something that he cannot say intelligibly.

There is less polyphony in the « Romantic » than in the composer's later efforts, hence the music is clearer to the ear at 1st hearing. It has, too, a simpler, more naive melodic character and, even in the Andante, with its funeral rhythm, the pathos, which Bruckner expresses so poignantly in his great Adagios, does not run nearly as deep as one might expect. The Scherzo, which the composer has labelled « The Hunt » , is more descriptive in character, with its fanfare and its « Ländler » dance movement, than Bruckner is wont to be.

The last movement, which presents a difficult problem for the musical analyst, hardly provides as much musical marrow as Bruckner devotees lead one to expect, though there are moments in this, as in the other sections, when the composer shows the hand of the Master in his harmonic combinations, contrapuntal workmanship and ear-filling instrumentation. On the whole, the 1st movement must be set-down as the most effective and the most inspired, even though the melodic material in itself conveys no important message.

It is impossible to do justice, at this time, to all of the music provided last night and one hearing of Pfitzner's « Christ-Elflein » is hardly sufficient to give a comprehensive idea of this work, not to mention the composer's powers. At 1st hearing, there is little or nothing which stands-out strikingly as a new and original contribution to musical expression. But the sympathetic listener, who realizes that Pfitzner has no ambition to puzzle and confound, but writes in order to give vent to what is in his heart, will observe exceedingly individual but refined harmonic traits in this charming composition and a melodic idiom that is spontaneous and characteristic. Let us hear more music of Pfitzner by all means.

Strauß's « Guntram » music can also bear repetition well. Though there is little of the cacophony of the creator of « Elektra » and « Salome » in these Prelude, their thematic content bears the unmistakable mark of the great composer's singular genius and represents more than an interesting document in the composer's brilliant career.

Throughout the evening, the Orchestra under Mahler's virtuosic guidance played like a band of virtuosi.

MUSIC AND DRAMA

The Philharmonic Historic Cycle.

The Philharmonic Society's series of historic concerts was brought to a close last night, at Carnegie Hall. The programme comprised Pfitzner's Overture, « Christ-Elflein », Bruckner's « Romantic » Symphony, and 3 Strauß pieces : 2 « Guntram » Preludes and « Till Eulenspiegel » .

To most of those in the audience, Pfitzner was an unknown quantity. In Germany, he occupies a place of some prominence, as may be inferred from the fact that the « Neue Musik-Zeitung » of March 17 is a Pfitzner number, with articles on his career, his Operas, his songs and chamber compositions, and his literary essays and criticisms. Rudolf Louis tries to explain why Pfitzner's fame has been slow in growing. He has not been helped by sensational subjects, like Strauß, nor by an amazing fertility, like Reger, nor by his commanding position, like Mahler. After hearing the Overture referred to, one is inclined to add to this, that if his other pieces are like it, there may be another reason why Hans Pfitzner has not made more of an impression, and that is that he has nothing new to tell us. His Overture seems to be mere « Kapellmeister » music, without a trace of originality.

Bruckner also suffered for similar reasons. There are traces of individuality in his Symphonies, but there is not enough of melodic novelty to ensure legitimate success, and Bruckner was too sincere, and not sufficiently clever, to secure illegitimate success by sensational means. He had the extraordinary good fortune of numbering several of the greatest conductors among his pupils ; yet, they have not been able to help him. Mr. Mahler and his admirable musicians gave a glowingly eloquent exposition of the « Romantic » Symphony, and if they made no converts, it was not their fault.

Pfitzner, Bruckner, and Strauß are not a trio to draw a multitude, and yesterday's audience was the smallest of the season. It would have been a relief if the last number had been Dvořák's « Scherzo capriccioso » in place of the « Till Eulenspiegel » , which has been played about half a dozen times this season, and the Dvořák piece only once, although it is quite as clever as Strauß's piece, and has, besides what Strauß's lacks, the advantage of spontaneous and original melody. It is to be hoped that Mr. Mahler will, next season, give us less of Strauß and more of his own works, which he has unduly neglected this year.

A great treat is in store for music-lovers tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening when Mr. Mahler will preside over performances of the greatest of all Symphonies, Beethoven's 9th, with which the Philharmonic season comes to a close. It will be preceded by the Choral Fantasia. The soloists are to be Corinne Rider-Kelsey, Viola Waterhouse, Janet Spencer, Dan Beddoe, Paul Duffault, and Herbert Watrous - an exceptionally good sextet, while the excellent Bach Choir of Montclair will sing the choral music.

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT

Music by Pfitzner, Bruckner, and Strauß at Last of Historical Series.

The Philharmonic Society gave last evening the last concert of its historical series, which, like several of the recent ones in this series, have been concerned with modern composers a little out of chronological sequence. Thus, Bruckner was the central-point of this concert, and with his name were joined those of Hans Pfitzner and Richard Strauß. Pfitzner is known only by name to the New York musical public. The composition played last evening was the Overture to a Christmas fairy-play called : « Das Christ-Elflein » - the « Little Christ Elf » . It would go far to confirm what the composer has declared about himself, that he is an « old-fashioned melodist » . Its themes are largely old-fashioned melodies, though there is a modern spirit in some of Pfitzner's harmonic treatment and some modern refinements of orchestration. And there is furthermore the suggestion or a legend, a dramatic narrative in the music, which is agreeable and interesting without being profound or eloquent.

Bruckner's 4th Symphony, called the « Romantic » Symphony, had not been heard in New York for many years. Anton Seidl 1st played it here, in 1888. Yet, last night's performance showed it to be considerably more worth rehearing than the Symphonies of Bruckner that have been played here, in recent years. It is more interesting in its substance, more spontaneous, more concise, than those others. It has a more truly Symphonic structure, and its themes are more significant and truly musical. There is less of the laborious and arduous work in development, dry elaboration in counterpoint, and other technical devices in which the composer so often loses himself. It is, in fact, a work that can be listened to with true pleasure, without weariness to the flesh.

Some of this impression, no doubt, was due to the truly superb interpretation which the Symphony received at the hands of Mr. Mahler - a performance that proclaimed even more unmistakably than they have been proclaimed before the Mastery and authority of the conductor. It showed his insight and entire sympathy with Bruckner's music, of which he is a chief-exponent, and, as well, the fine skill of the Orchestra, which is steadily gaining for itself the right to be called a virtuoso organization. The freedom, breadth, and brilliancy of last night's performance, its many sided eloquence, did much to carry conviction for the music. The exposition of the 1st movement is superb, with its themes of real beauty and expressiveness. The Andante, like a solemn march, is also an interesting and, in certain passages, a noble and deeply touching movement, with a beautiful solo for the viola.

The Scherzo is filled with the music, and the rhythms or hunting horns ; and there are delightful effects of rhythm and of orchestral colour. The Finale is more common-place, and shows Bruckner's weakest side, the lack of organic structure and logical development : a fondness for repeating in different keys and intervals the same phrase leading nowhere of belabouring his material with fruitless toil. The instrumentation in this Symphony is singularly fine, with effects that are new and striking. And yet, it might easily be that this work, which seemed so interesting and that really touched and thrilled, as it was played last evening, might lose much of its effect in a performance less masterly than Mr. Mahler's.

The music of Strauß that was played, consisted of the Preludes to the 1st and 2nd Acts of the Opera « Guntram » . Strauß is far from at his best in them, and they doubtless lose something, besides, by being cut-off from their dramatic connection. At the end came a dazzlingly brilliant performance at the « Till Eulenspiegel » tone-poem. The audience at the ...

14 avril 1910 : The 12 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold's « Der Schneemann » is premiered in its 4 hand piano version, in Vienna, at a « soirée » held by the wife of the Prime minister, and causes a sensation. The success is so great that another performance is prepared for an expensive benefit concert on April 26, which sells-out. Prince Montenuovo (the Court Chamberlain) brings the work to the attention of the Emperor Franz-Josef, and a production is planned for the Vienna Court Opera, later in the year, which requires that it be performed by the Orchestra - thus, Alexander von Zemlinsky, then, teaches Korngold orchestration by having Erich observe as Zemlinsky scores « Der Schneemann » .

The history of the manuscripts and the printed score of Charles Ives 3rd Symphony, after 1904, is highly interesting :

The manuscript score was finished in 1904.

In 1909, Ives made a revised score (lost) .

In 1911, an ink copy was made from the 1909 score (lost) .

Avril 1910 : While having the score of his 9th Symphony copied by Tams, in New York, Gustav Mahler sees the score of Charles Ives' 3rd Symphony at Tams's office and asks Emil Hanke to have a copy of it. Musicians who played under Mahler will much later tell anecdotes of having heard or performed it in Munich, but none of their stories have ever been substantiated. Nevertheless, Mahler had a genuine interest in discovering new music by American composers for his New York concerts, and it is understandable that he would be interested in Ives, because of the strong links between their compositional techniques.

Although there is no conclusive evidence that Charles Ives and Gustav Mahler ever met, Mahler had seen the manuscript and talked of premiering the 3rd Symphony with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. There is also a story, which Ives put about, that Mahler took the score back to Europe, planning to conduct it there. Mahler's death, in 1911, prevented any such performances, and the alleged score has never been located.

...

It is supposed that copyist Emil Hanke's full-score manuscript of Charles Ives' 3rd Symphony was given to Gustav Mahler who was the conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

...

There is the legend that Gustav Mahler may have seen part of Charles Ives' 3rd Symphony through their mutual New York copyist Emil Hanke and it is also possible that Mahler may have been the missing link in Arnold Schönberg's early knowledge of Ives.

...

Elliott Carter remarks that Gustav Mahler's attitude towards polyphony, towards simultaneity of different materials, is curiously like that of Charles Ives and quotes in support of this view the now well-known passage on polyphony from Natalie Bauer-Lechner. The New York copyist Emil Hanke's score (the so-called « Tams' » score) of Ives's 3rd Symphony was, it seems, taken by Mahler to Europe in 1911 (with an eventual performance in view) , shortly before he died. Ives, himself, gives an account of how this happened :

« When the 3rd Symphony was being copied in, I think, Tams' office, Gustav Mahler saw it and asked to have a copy - he was quite interested in it. »

Ives may have heard Mahler conduct the New York Philharmonic (in 1910 or 1911) but, apparently, recalled no details of the programme.

Charles Ives makes an interesting aside about the 3rd Symphony in his « Memos » :

« When the 3rd was being copied in, I think, Tam's Copying office, Gustav Mahler saw it and asked to have a copy - he was quite interested in it. »

Mahler « apparently » took the score on his return to Vienna, then, performed the Symphony in Munich, in the summer of 1910. The manuscript disappeared after his death, in 1911.

It's a fascinating scenario to consider. Sadly, no corroborating evidence now exists, and some now dispute the veracity of Ives' story.

5 avril 1910 : The Mahlers leave New York and sail-back to Europe.

12 avril 1910 : The Mahlers arrive in Paris, visit with their close friends there (the « Dreyfus Quartet ») .

17 avril 1910 : Gustav Mahler conducts his 2nd Symphony in Paris.

Then, the Mahlers travel to Rome, where Mahler is to conduct 3 concerts, but with most of the players already on summer vacation, it is a disaster and Mahler cancels the last concert.

29 avril 1910 : Le chef Ernst von Schuch dirige la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

3 mai 1910 : The Mahlers return to Vienna. Mahler already begins rehearsing singers and choruses for the fall premiere of his 8th Symphony.

Mai 1910 : The 25 year old Alban Berg completes the 1st movement of his String Quartet, Opus 3, and begins overseeing rehearsals of it, which probably also teaches him a lot about string technique. He also embarks on composing the 2nd (and final) movement of the Quartet.

Alexander von Zemlinsky is working on his Opera, « Kleider machen Leute » (Clothes make the man) .

Alma Mahler has not been feeling well, so, Mahler decides that she and Anna should spend 6 weeks at the spa in Tobelbad. He takes them there on June 1st, then, he returns alone to Vienna. Shortly after her arrival at the spa, the 30 year old Alma meets the handsome and brilliant 27 year old architect Walter Gropius, and they fall in love with each other and have a passionate affair during the whole month of June.

21 mai 1910 : Gustav Mahler negotiates a contract with Universal-Edition for the publication of « Das Lied von der Erde » and his 9th Symphony. He also buys land in Semmering for the country-home he plans to build soon for his retirement.

Vers le 29 mai 1910 : Around his 13th birthday, Erich Wolfgang Korngold completes his Piano Trio in D major, Opus 1, which he rightly sees as his 1st fully-mature work.

Juin 1910 : Gustav Mahler begins traveling to coordinate the rehearsals for the monumental premiere of his 8th Symphony coming in Munich, in September.

10 juin 1910 : Gustav Mahler goes to Leipzig for choir rehearsals.

14 juin 1910 : Gustav Mahler goes to Munich for rehearsals of choirs and the orchestra.

Du 15 au 23 juin 1910 : The 26 year old Anton Webern composes in Klagenfurt his 4 Pieces for violin and piano, Opus 7.

À partir du 21 juin 1910 : Gustav Mahler is sensing from Alma's letters that something is not quite right.

26 juin 1910 : Gustav Mahler leaves Munich bound for Toblach, but he decides to take a detour to Vienna and, then, to Tobelbad to see Alma and Anna.

Vers la fin-juin 1910 : The 35 year old Arnold Schœnberg completes the text for his Opera project, « Die glückliche Hand » .

Été 1910 à 1911 : Arnold Schœnberg is absorbed in writing his « Harmonielehre » (Treatise on harmony) text-book. Mostly a review of traditional Austro-German harmonic theory, it ends with such wild new ideas as chords built on 4ths, unresolved passing-tones, and « Klangfarbenmelodie » (tone-colour melody) , and includes speculations on micro-tonality and unrestricted use of the chromatic scale. He gives as main reasons for rejecting micro-tones :

The lack of instruments so tuned, and the increased harmonic resources available with his particular use of the regular 12-edo chromatic scale. Schœnberg's influence will go a long way towards entrenching 12-ET ever deeper into Western musical practice for the rest of the 20th Century.

After spending the week-end visiting Alma and Anna, in Tobelbad, Gustav Mahler leaves on July 3rd.

4 juillet 1910 : Gustav Mahler stops in Graz to visit friends, then, continues to Toblach on the 5th. He receives many greetings for his 50th birthday, which he must answer, and, then, is engaged in difficult negotiations with New York about his fee for the extra-concerts he must conduct in the up-coming season ; the final agreement is for $ 23,000 (equivalent to about $ 500,000 in 2009 dollars) . Then, he hopes to begin composing his 10th Symphony (unfinished) .

There is a section near the very end of Mahler's 10th Symphony which uses typical « ragtime » chord progressions and voice-leading, which leads to believe that Mahler may have become familiar with some « ragtime » (probably, Scott Joplin's) while living in New York. As an habitual reader of the reviews in the newspaper music-sections, Mahler, in New York, would not have failed to see mention in the local papers of Joplin's ambition to produce his « ragtime » Opera, « Treemonisha » .

Gustav Mahler once said to writer, journalist and music-critic William Ritter :

The 2nd movement of the 10th Symphony features almost constantly changing meters, probably the 1st piece of music to do so (a few years before Igor Stravinsky's famous use of this in « le Sacre du Printemps » , which may also reflect Mahler's familiarity with the syncopated rhythms of Scott Joplin's « ragtimes » .

Juillet 1910 : Alban Berg completes the 2nd (and final) movement of his String Quartet, Opus 3.

Vers la mi-juillet 1910 : Alma finally leaves Tobelbad and joins Mahler in Toblach, but continues corresponding with Walter Gropius every few days.

Fin-juillet 1910 : Walter Gropius writes a love-letter to Alma which he « accidentally » addresses directly to Mahler, and, thus, Mahler discovers that they have been having an affair, and is shattered. Alma, sensing that the time is right to seize power over their relationship, bitterly blames his lack of interest in her life and work for causing her to flee to Gropius. A week of conflict and argument ensue.

2 août 1910 : Arnold Schönberg, now in a desperate financial situation, writes to Gustav Mahler begging for a loan of money for 2 months rent. Mahler immediately sends a bank transfer, and never asks to be repaid.

Gustav Mahler's 10th Symphony manuscript : last page of Scherzo II (4th movement) , with Mahler's messages to Alma about the drum-stroke ending the movement :

(You alone know what it means. Oh ! Oh ! God ! Farewell my lyre ! farewell farewell farewell - Oh well. Oh oh.)

Vers le 4 août 1910 : Alma Mahler has been pleading with Walter Gropius to make no attempt to come and see her, but ignoring her, Gropius shows-up in Toblach. Mahler tells Alma :

« Whatever you do will be right. Make your decision. »

He demands that she choose between them. Having convinced her that abandoning him would quite literally cause his death, Alma sends Gropius away. But she secretly still continues a regular correspondence with Gropius, expressing her love for him, looking forward to having a life and child with him after Mahler is dead, and even signing her letters to Gropius as « your wife » .

août 1910 : Gustav Mahler suffers a nervous breakdown over the feeling of betrayal. Mahler's manuscript of the unfinished 10th Symphony is littered with anguished messages to Alma which express Mahler's torment over the Gropius affair.

Alma's cruel reproaches also force Mahler to awaken to the realization of how little attention he has been giving to her, and also what a mistake it was to force her to stop composing ; he reconciles with her in this respect, delighting in playing and singing her songs (and, even according to Alma, overestimating their value) and now encourages her to compose and publish her work. Mahler is so delighted that Alma chose to stay with him that his love for her reaches an intensity it never had before. At the same time, he realizes that Alma loves Gropius, and that he must indulge her intention to continue to see him discreetly.

août 1910 : Anton Webern composes in Klagenfurt 2 Songs, Opus 8, on poems by Rainer Maria Rilke.

26 août 1910 : In a famous meeting, Gustav Mahler travels all the way to Leiden, in the Netherlands, to consult the psychologist Sigmund Freud, who is about to end his holiday on the Dutch coast.

Freud identifies a mother-fixation in Mahler, and Mahler also reveals his childhood experience of witnessing an argument between his parents, at which he ran-out into the street and encountered an organ-grinder playing « Ach, du lieber Augustine » , forever associating the vulgarity of popular music with tragedy in his compositions.

The discussion with Freud does help Mahler to restore his emotional equilibrium but, from this point on, he will continue to consider himself a slave to Alma's love, so much so that she even complains about his obsession to it in a letter to Gropius, written on the day of Mahler's meeting with Freud, and fearing for Mahler's sanity.

On the train coming home from Leiden, Mahler writes a poem to Alma which includes the lines :

« Together flowed into a single chord / My trembling thoughts and my roaring feelings. »

After returning to Toblach, with only 6 days available to work on the 10th Symphony before traveling to Munich to begin final rehearsals for the 8th Symphony, Mahler adds an outburst based on this idea to the last and 1st movements of the 10th. The 1st movement contains a climax culminating in this 9 note dissonant chord :

Because of the long-held « A » and the dissonance of the chord, this sonic inspiration for this passage seems to me to be the tuning-up of the Orchestra before a rehearsal or performance. This chord is also almost identical to those at the climax of the 1st movement of Mahler's 2nd Symphony. The emotional inspiration is clearly the trauma Mahler has just experienced over Alma's affair with Walter Gropius.

Fin d'été 1910 : Alexander von Zemlinsky leaves Vienna to begin his conducting post, in Prague.

With Zemlinsky gone from Vienna, the 13 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold's apprenticeship is over, and his compositions already sound like the work of a fully mature man. Over the 2nd half of 1910, he composes his 2nd Piano Sonata, Opus 2, in E major ; and 7 « Märchenbilder » (Fairy-tale pictures) for piano, Opus 3. Korngold refers to the orchestration of the « Märchenbilder » as the end of his studies under Zemlinsky, but Korngold had only composed a few of these before Zemlinsky moved to Prague. (The orchestrated version was never published.)

Le 8 septembre 1910, Wilhelm Furtwängler quittait Munich pour Strasbourg où il séjourna jusqu'au 1 avril 1911, logeant sur le « Nikolaus Ring 11/II » chez une certaine Madame Beike. L'activité musicale de la Ville (alors allemande) était sous la coupe de Hans Pfitzner et de ses assistants Richard Fried et Hermann Büchel. Furtwängler deviendra son 3e assistant et dirigera 16 représentations de 6 Opéras qu'il ne dirigera plus par la suite. La presse fut très mitigée : un journal parla de son interprétation des « P'tites Michu » comme ayant « la légèreté d'un éléphant » , un autre écrivit que celle de « Martha » « laissa beaucoup à désirer » .

Elisabeth Furtwängler écrivit dans ses souvenirs :

« Il fut alors appelé à Strasbourg où Pfitzner tenait les rênes. Néanmoins, il put diriger quelques Opéras. Dans “ la Chauve-Souris ”, il dut se déguiser en gitan, portant une barbe noire et jouer la partie de piano durant la fête en l'honneur du Prince Orłowski. »

Ceci est confirmé par le programme des 27 et 28 février 1911.

Furtwängler ne reviendra que 2 fois à Strasbourg : le 6 décembre 1911 pour diriger son « Te Deum » et, le 29 avril 1932, à l'occasion du Festival de Musique lors d'une tournée de la Philharmonie de Berlin.

9 septembre 1910 : Arnold Schönberg begins to compose the draft score for his Opera, « Die glückliche Hand » , but composes only a few short disconnected sketches while he is preoccupied with the writing of the « Harmonielehre » (Theory of Harmony) text-book, begun in 1909.

12 septembre 1910 : Gustav Mahler premieres his great 8th Symphony (nicknamed : « Symphony of a thousand ») in Munich, a musical event the size and spectacle of which has never been seen before - even the hall was specially built for the event. Mahler becomes dismayed with the circus-like atmosphere created by the advertising, but with the addition of the awe-inspired music (flawlessly executed by its massive body of performers, thanks to a whole summer of rehearsals for which Mahler traveled feverishly all over central Europe) , it is, by far, the crowning achievement of Mahler's life as both conductor and composer, and an event that will be remembered for decades afterward by all who were present. Among those attending are Arnold Schönberg, Anton Webern, Richard Strauß, the Korngolds, Otto Klemperer, Oskar Fried, Bruno Walter, Arnold Rosé, Alfredo Casella, Leopold Stokowski, Stefan Zweig, and Thomas Mann. The occasion also provides the 1st meeting between Korngold and Strauß.

Fin-septembre 1910 : The 46 year old Richard Strauß finishes his Opera, « Der Rosenkavalier » , marking an abrupt regression in style, back to a more Romantic-era idiom.

Arnold Schönberg's 3 Pieces for Piano, Opus 11, are the 1st of his compositions to be published by Universal-Edition (with whom he will have a long association) , and also the 1st of his atonal compositions to appear in print.

Hugo Heller, who had been brought to Vienna by Ignaz Brandt, owner of the Press of the Viennese People's Bookshop, in 1894, opened his own shop in September 1905, at Number 3 « Bauernmarkt » , where once the 1st printer of Karl Kraus' « Die Fackel » had its offices and where we find the birthplace of Franz Grillparzer, at Number 10.

Im Haus Bauernmarkt Nr. 3 (auf der Abbildung vorne links) wurde die erste Ausgabe der Fackel gedruckt. Hier firmierte vom ersten Heft an bis zur Nr. 81 von Ende Juni 1901 auch die Geschäftsstelle der « Fackel » (vergleiche das Impressum des ersten Heftes in Katalog Marbach, 38) . Der Verleger und Drucker Moriz Frisch gründete im Oktober 1901 (Kraus befand sich nach dem Tod Annie Kalmars auf einer dreimonatigen Skandinavienreise) die « Neue Fackel » und weitere Nachfolgezeitschriften (« Im Feuerschein » , « Im Fackelschein ») . Erst nach 15 Prozessen erlangte Karl Kraus seine Rechte am Titel der Zeitschrift wieder. Die Fackel erschien seitdem im Selbstverlag, der Druck ging an Jahoda & Siegel (vergleiche « Der “ Fackel ”-Lauf » , 49) . Das Haus wurde 1903 abgerissen. Eine biographische Anekdote über den Verleger Moriz Frisch teilt Friedrich Torberg in seiner « Tante Jolesch » mit (Torberg, Seite 80 f.) .

The business soon developed into the « Kunstkabinett Hugo Heller » , a kind of cultural center in itself with its own press concert series, theatrical agency and antiquarian book-shop. The likes of Karl Kraus, Arthur Schnitzler, Sigmund Freud and Egon Friedell numbered among Heller's customers. The parody that Friedell wrote on Alexander Roda-Roda's « Commander in Chief's Knoll » , entitled « A Soldier's Life in Peacetime » , was published here. Friedell, himself, often spoke on the premises. Heller was also a benefactor to the young Arnold Schönberg, who expressed his gratitude in the form of a portrait. Indeed, one of the 1st exhibitions of Schönberg's paintings took place in Heller's Art-Gallery, in October 1910, where « In the lecture by Wassermann (on love) at Heller's » reads an entry in Schnitzler's Notebooks for the 28th of February 1908.

After the turn of the 20th Century, Arnold Schönberg began to paint. He started in 1906, with guidance from Richard Gerstl, who was his only teacher. After the friendship with Gerstl ended, he continued on his own, turning-out literally hundreds of paintings and drawings within a few years. This doesn't mean that he abandoned composing or teaching or writing about music, or that he conducted less or fought less vehemently to get his works performed. He simply wanted to paint as well, and incredibly he somehow found the time to do so ; I would almost say that he « invented » the time to paint.

Among his works were portraits of family members, friends, and admirers, as well as caricatures, set designs, and still lifes. But above all, as we have seen, there were self-portraits, so many that he probably holds the all-time record for the number of them that he executed. There is no doubt that he was a talented painter, especially when it came to colour, but a Rembrandt he was not, nor even a Kokoschka. Let's face it, today, his pictures are of interest primarily because they were painted by him, the controversial composer whom many believe to have been among the musical greats.

It so happens that, during the period when he was painting, he was in serious financial difficulties. He had to provide for his children, Trudi and Görgi, who were then only 8 and 4 and, of course, for his wife Mathilde. Very little cash was coming-in from his students, to many of whom he gave lessons for free because they could not pay for them. Certainly, he received next to nothing for his musical compositions.

The situation worsened from day to day with debts beginning to pile-up, until finally one day in 1910, he realized that some drastic measures had to be taken and sounded-out various friends. Someone suggested that he should try selling his paintings, and with the help of some admirers, he managed to put together a one-man show at the Heller Art-Gallery, one of Vienna's leading exhibitors. It was made clear to one and all that this was a move born of utter desperation - Schœnberg needed money desperately not only to support his family but also to continue his work. Out of consideration, Hugo Heller, owner of the gallery, had agreed to accept a commission of only 20 % .

8 octobre 1910 : Arnold Schœnberg has the 1st exhibition of his paintings, at « Hugo Heller & Cie » Book-store and Art-Gallery, addressed « Bauermarkt Nr. 3 » . Pictures by Oskar Kokoschka, Egon Schiele and Gustav Klimt could also be seen. Gustav Mahler anonymously buys 3 of Schœnberg's paintings to give him much-needed financial support. (The String Quartets Nos. 1 and 2 are played for the inaugural viewing.)

The Exhibition included quite a few self-portraits ; portraits of Mathilde and the children, Gustav Mahler, Alexander von Zemlinsky, Alban Berg, and « Erwartung » librettist, Marie Pappenheim ; « The Critic » ; and so on, about 50 paintings in all. The event was enlivened by the performance of several of Schœnberg's compositions.

Amazingly, most of the paintings were sold almost at once, and the proceeds turned-out to be enough to keep the proverbial wolf from the door for quite some time to come ; in fact, the sum exceeded Schœnberg's wildest expectations. Who had purchased them was anybody's guess, but it really didn't much matter.

1 year or so, later, Schœnberg received a letter from his friend Anton von Webern. There were some special circumstances connected with the sale of the paintings that Webern was aware of and wanted to unburden himself of at this time. Webern had initially promised that he wouldn't tell a soul about it and had kept his word until now. However, the person concerned had recently died and, now, Webern was free to speak ; indeed, he felt obliged to do so. And what was the secret ? All of the paintings had been purchased by a single individual, none other than Gustav Mahler.

Wassily Kandinsky will later write an homage to Schönberg's paintings, named « The Pictures » (1912) . By that year, Schönberg, realizing his amateurism, stopped exhibiting with the « Blaue Reiter » group of artists.

The Bohemian-Austrian poet and novelist Rainer Maria Rilke had lectured at Hugo Heller's Book-Shop as early as 1907, when the Austrian painter Egon Schiele was already in Vienna. As one of the central gathering places for modernist artists, writers, and critics, Schiele must certainly have been aware of the book-shop and may well have attended these talks or heard of them from acquaintances who frequented the events staged at Heller's.

When the paintings of Arnold Schönberg were exhibited, beginning on October 8th, 1910, at the book-store and art-gallery of Hugo Heller, they had, naturally, created a sensation. This was not altogether to the good, for, as Egon Wellesz puts it :

« Even people who had nothing to do with music, on the strength of the impression they gained from the exhibition, now believed they had the right to express an opinion on Schönberg, the composer. »

But, on the other hand :

« A chosen few felt the inner necessity that urged the solitary artist to express himself visually, and were, thus, able to penetrate more deeply into his music. »

Wassily Kandinsky, the revolutionary Russian « non-objectivist » , became a staunch admirer of Schönberg, and defended him, not only in his general writings about art but also in a special study written for the 1912 volume. Kandinsky defined the aim of painting as the presentation of an internal impression in an external, visible form. He felt that few contemporary pictures satisfy this definition, for too much art is cluttered-up with unnecessary details which contribute nothing to the achievement of this essential aim.

Schönberg, on the contrary, paints :

« Not in order to paint a “ pretty ” or “ charming ” picture, but in an effort to set down his subjective “ emotions ” alone in permanent form. Scarcely thinking about the picture itself while he paints, and dispensing with objective results, he uses only those means which, at the moment, appear to him to be indispensable. Not every professional painter can boast that he creates in this way ! Or, in other words, infinitely few professional painters possess the power, the heroism, the strength of renunciation which would enable them to leave alone all the diamonds and pearls of the painter's art or to reject them even when they force themselves of their own volition into the artist's hand.

Schœnberg goes directly towards his goal, or through his goal proceeds only to that result which is necessary in this specific instance. »

Or, as Kandinsky put it more concisely a little later on, Schœnberg's painting may best be termed « only-painting » , that is, art without frills, furbelows, non-essentials, or « social significance » .

« Art » was a serious business for Arnold Schœnberg. His interest in painting led him to Wassily Kandinsky, the Russian abstract expressionist who was living in Munich, and Schœnberg became a member of the « Blaue Reiter » movement. His paintings were exhibited in 1910 at the Book-Store and Art-Gallery of Hugo Heller, in Vienna.

Kandinsky commented on his work :

« Schœnberg's pictures fall into 2 categories : on the one hand, the portraits and landscapes painted directly from nature ; on the other hand, heads imagined intuitively, which he calls “ visions ”. The former Schœnberg designates as finger exercises, which he feels he needs, but which he does not particularly value, and which he does not like to exhibit. The others he paints (just as rarely as the 1st sort) to express emotions that find no musical form. These 2 categories are extremely different. Internally, they stem from one and the same soul, caused to vibrate in one case by external nature and, in the other, by nature within. »

Arnold Schœnberg took painting lessons, beginning around 1906, from Richard Gerstl who, long after his death, was recognized as one of the leading exponents of Austrian Expressionism. For personal reasons involving Gerstl's love-affair with his 1st wife, Schœnberg later, in general, denied Gerstl's influence which, in any case, was not lasting ; Schœnberg remained an amateur and his painting was secondary to his life's work as a composer and teacher. He executed approximately 60 paintings and 200 drawings : only 12 of the extant paintings are dated ; 11 from 1910 and 1 from 1912 ; most of this output dates from before the end of 1912, during a period of personal and professional difficulty. Schœnberg's paintings are generally small in size and fall into 2 groups : a series of technically inept portraits and occasional landscapes, on the one hand ; and highly-expressive visionary works, on the other. Schœnberg's most impressive pictures are the « Blicke » , « gazes » in the form of faces, which emphasize the act of looking. Although technically weak, some of these pictures, in exorcizing « Angst » and giving form to extreme states of mind, have an expressive power found elsewhere in contemporary Viennese painting only in the work of Oskar Kokoschka and Egon Schiele. The painting « Red Gaze » , along with works such as « Tears » , belong to early Viennese Expressionism, with its densely claustrophobic atmosphere. Schœnberg also shared with the other representatives of Viennese Expressionism an interest in producing self-portraits, in his case as much for self-assurance as for the constant questioning of his own identity. Schœnberg's paintings, like his music, were derided by the Viennese critical establishment. In 1910, the book-seller Hugo Heller put on an exhibition showing 40 of Schœnberg's paintings, which received almost universally sceptical and sarcastic reviews. On the other hand, Vasily Kandinsky praised Schœnberg's painting, which he showed in a

Arnold Schönberg se consacra à la peinture entre 1908 et 1911, après le suicide de Richard Gerstl, et exposa ses œuvres, à partir du 8 octobre 1910, à la galerie viennoise de Hugo Heller. À cette occasion, le musicien Gustav Mahler lui acheta 3 œuvres tandis que le peintre russe révolutionnaire Wassily Kandinsky, grandement influencé par ses compositions musicales, manifesta son admiration pour son œuvre. Ce dernier l'invita d'ailleurs à participer à la Ire exposition des peintres du mouvement « Blaue Reiter » tenue en 1911-1912, à Munich, et échangea avec lui ses idées sur la création jusqu'au début de la Première Guerre mondiale. Schönberg peignit en tout 65 peintures à l'huile, dont une titrée « L'Enterrement de Gustav Mahler » (1911) , ainsi que des aquarelles et des dessins. On a émis l'hypothèse qu'il se mit à peindre pour vaincre son obsession née de la liaison adultère entre Richard Gerstl et sa femme Mathilde. On a avancé également une autre explication, à savoir qu'il chercha à dresser un parallèle entre la musique et la peinture. En dehors de quelques paysages, il peignit surtout des portraits de ses amis proches et des auto-portraits.

8-10 octobre 1910 : Arnold Schönberg puts on a one-man show of his artworks, exhibiting 47 water-colours and oils at Hugo Heller's Art-Gallery and Book-Shop, in Vienna. Thus, at the very same time that he was jumping from one compositional project to the next, he was also opening-up a whole new region of artistic expression, one that he clearly took very seriously, and one that has to have taken a significant amount of his time.

12 octobre 1910 : Gustav Mahler hears rehearsals of Arnold Schönberg's 2nd String Quartet, which is performed at Hugo Heller's book-store and art-gallery since the opening of the exhibition (along with the 1st String Quartet) . Schönberg is also appointed teacher of composition at the Imperial Academy for Music.

Hugo Heller

L'éditeur viennois Hugo Heller est né le 8 mai 1870, à Alba, en Hongrie ; et est mort le 29 novembre 1923 à Vienne. Propriétaire d'une librairie - galerie d'art, il a publié, dès 1906, les Iers écrits du mouvement psychanalytique.

À l'automne de 1902, sur l'initiative de Wilhelm Stekel, Sigmund Freud réunit autour de lui un groupe d'intéressés, qui prend le nom de « Psychologische Mittwoch Gesellschaft » (Société psychologique du mercredi) et qui, chaque mercredi, discute de psychanalyse. La « Société psychologique du mercredi » est la Ire Société psychanalytique au monde, elle réunit notamment : Rudolf Reitler (1865-1917) ; Max Kahane (1866-1923) ; Ludwig Jekels (1861-1954) ; Wilhelm Stekel (1868-1940) ; Hugo Heller (1870-1923) ; Alfred Adler (1870-1937) ; Paul Federn (1871-1950) ; Eduard Hitschmann

En 1906, Hugo Heller mène une enquête sur la lecture et les livres appréciés par les personnalités en vue. Il publie son étude en décembre, dans le 1er fascicule des « Neue Blätter für Literatur und Kunst » , qui comprend 32 réponses et une introduction écrite par Hugo von Hofmannsthal. Dans son étude, Heller a recueilli les avis de Sigmund Freud, de Peter Altenberg, de Hermann Bahr, d'August Forel, de Hermann Hesse, d'Ernst Mach, de Thomas Masaryk, de Peter Rosegger, d'Arthur Schnitzler et de Jakob Wassermann. Ce texte a été ré-édité sous forme de brochure, en 1907 et en 1931.

The Viennese book-seller, art-gallery owner and concert agent, Hugo Heller, was born on 8 May 1870, in Alba, Hungary ; and died on 29 November 1923 in Vienna. He was the 2nd Viennese publisher of Sigmund Freud's works.

Heller founded his own book-shop in 1905, in Vienna, comprising a book-store, an art-gallery at which, in 1909, he organized an exhibition of 40 paintings by Arnold Schœnberg, and a reception hall, as well as being the proprietor of a concert agency. He was an early publisher of Sigmund Freud's works.

Personal contact allowed Jewish women artists to be admitted to the hermetic art associations. The most important at the Secession were Hermine Ostersetzer (1874-1909) , the wife of the publisher and art-dealer Hugo Heller (1870-1923) , and Ilse Twardowski-Conrat, the sister of Erika Tietze-Conrat (1883-1958) , a well-known art historian.

When Hugo Heller finished his secondary education, he trained as a book-seller and contributed to founding the « 1st populist book-shop in Vienna » . In 1905, he founded his own book-shop (Hugo Heller & Cie.) comprising a publishing-house, an art-gallery, and a reception-hall. Many exhibitions and conferences were organized in this richly endowed book-shop by contemporary poets and artists such as Arnold Schœnberg, Rainer Maria Rilke, Hugo von Hofmannsthal, Jakob Wassermann, and Thomas and Heinrich Mann. In response to the cultural orientation of this book-shop, its clients came from the intellectual elite of Vienna.

Sigmund Freud was one of the regular customers and, in 1907, he gave a conference, « Der Dichter und das Phantasieren » (Creative Writers and Day-Dreaming, 1908) , to Heller's literary-minded public. Relations between Hugo Heller and Freud were not based solely on Freud's interest in literature ; they were also consolidated by Heller's interest in psychoanalysis. He was of the small circle of the founding members of the « Wednesday Society » , where he delivered his 1st paper : « Zur Geschichte des Teufels » (On the History of the Devil) . Even before Lou Andréas Salomé was invited to attend the « Wednesday Society » , Heller had already given them an account of the work of this author who was already enshrined in the mists of legend. His daughter, Maggie Heller, was one of the pioneers of psychoanalytic teaching. In 1906, she organized a survey of writers and scientists, asking them to list « 10 good books » . Arthur Schnitzler, Ernst Mach, and Peter Altenberg, along with Freud and others, responded to the survey, which Heller published under the title : « Vom Lesen und von guten Büchern » (Reading and good books) .

During World War I, Heller took-over the scientific section of the Deuticke publishing-house and became the « real publisher of the house of Freud » . For Heller, this change in Deuticke also reflected the new interest of psychoanalysis in terms of its applications for the mind sciences and the broadening of its readership toward a more general public. In the literary, but also the social-democratic context of this publishing-house, the following works of Freud were published : « Delusions and Dreams in Jensen's “ Gradiva ” » (1907) , « Totem and Taboo » (1912-1913) , the « Collection of short-writings on the theory of the neurosis » (4 volumes, 1907-1909) and « Introductory Lectures on Psychoanalysis » (1916-1917) . Its catalogue of authors also included analysts like Otto Rank and Alfred von Winterstein.

Hugo Heller also took the risk of publishing 2 psychoanalytic reviews, the « Internationale Zeitschrift für (ärztliche) Psychoanalyse » and « Imago » , after several other publishers had backed-down. Theodor Reik, who was working in Heller's book-shop at the time, took charge of the 2 reviews. During the First World War, the publishing-house suffered from production conditions that went from bad to worse, with the result that it became problematic to produce the 2 reviews. Finally, Heller publications could no longer ensure a regular production of books. As a result, Freud's work, « Zur Vorbereitung einer Metapsychologie » (Toward the Preparation of a Metapsychology) , which he had entrusted to Heller, never went to print and is considered to have been lost.

In 1912, when Arthur Schnitzler celebrated his 50th birthday patiently enduring the scandal surrounding his « Professor Bernhardi » , as his wife began to express growing dissatisfaction about the course of her singing career, it was Hugo Heller's report about the Christmas sales of his « Collected Work » that consoled him. At the end of March, Heller made plans for a private performance of « Professor Bernhardi » at the German People's Theater, plans, like those for a performance in Bratislava, that never materialized. The book-dealer would frequently take-up Schnitzler's cause. For example, on February 19th, 1921, in the middle of the « Reigen » scandal the show-windows of the book-shop were smashed because copies of « Reigen » were on display. The culprit's instrument of destruction was found at the scene of the crime : a brick wrapped in a clerical newspaper.

After the creation of the « Internationaler Psychoanalytischer Verlag » , in 1919, Hugo Heller handled only the distribution of periodicals and books. After World War I, although still a member of the Viennese Psychoanalytic Association, he no longer attended their meetings. When he died on November 29, 1923, an obituary in the « Internationale Zeitschrift für Psychoanalyse » observed that Viennese Psychoanalytic Society had lost one of its oldest members.

4 octobre 1910 : On Emperor Franz-Josef's Name-Day, the orchestrated version of the 13 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold's ballet-pantomime, « Der Schneemann » , is performed at the Vienna Court Opera, and causes a sensation. The « cafés » of Vienna are filled with gossip about the Korngolds, father and son, many people suspecting that Julius or Alexander von Zemlinsky were the real composers of the music.

The 1st New York Philharmonic performance of Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 4 « Romantic » was conducted by Gustav Mahler, on March 30, 1910. Mahler's marked score that he used at that performance became a part of the Philharmonic's Orchestra library.

Originally published on highly-acidic paper, the score had become so fragile that it was impossible for anyone to handle. In 2013, through the generosity of Jan and Mark Schapper, the score was preserved so that it could be photographed and studied.

Clark University music professor Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, the 1st scholar to extensively study this score, observed that :

« Mahler's treatment of the Finale removes more than a 3rd of the music. He radically altered the nature of this movement, effectively transforming it from an epic statement into a shorter and lighter piece by systematically deleting each appearance of the stormy 3rd theme group, adjusting some dynamics, and a bit of the orchestration, and reworking a key modulation. The result clearly goes against Bruckner's intentions, but does have a certain logic of its own. »

Obviously, the score was used in subsequent performances, and a few of the marks were made by individuals other than Mahler.

As for the orchestra parts used at the 1st Philharmonic performance, the Library catalog indicates that Mahler took the parts with him when he went to Europe and did not return them. Then, needing to explain why the parts were irrevocably lost to the Philharmonic, the librarian wrote :

« He died. »

The parts do exist in Vienna marked with the official New York Philharmonic stamp at the « Musiksammlung » of the « Wienbibliothek » . Doctor Korstvedt who has studied the parts in Vienna reports that the markings on the parts line-up with the marks in the score and that some contain performance timings written by the Philharmonic musicians. For instance, the tuba part is signed in pencil « Fred Geib, March 30, 1910 / Philharmonic Orchestra / Gustav Mahler Conductor. »

Le 1er enregistrement orchestral de la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » est commercialisé en 1910 : il s'agit du 1er mouvement du Concerto pour piano de Edward Grieg avec Wilhelm Backhaus qui, 2 ans auparavant, a gravé son 1er disque pour la firme, avec des extraits du « Clavier bien tempéré » de Bach. Un autre pianiste célèbre, Ignace Jan Paderewski, signe son 1er disque, en 1911.

En 1913, la « DGG » fait sensation avec son 1er enregistrement intégral d'une œuvre orchestrale : la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven, avec le Philharmonique de Berlin sous la baguette de son chef principal, Arthur Nikisch, paraît en 4 disques double-face, vendu 9,50 Deutsche Mark le disque (l'équivalent d'environ 1,70 € actuel) ; en Grande-Bretagne, l'enregistrement est publié en disques simple-face sur plusieurs mois. Paraissent également à cette époque des extraits de « Parsifal » de Wagner avec le Philharmonique de Berlin dirigé par Alfred Hertz.

Au début de la Première Guerre mondiale, les biens de la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » sont confisqués par le gouvernement allemand, sous prétexte que la firme est anglaise et qu'ils appartiennent donc à l'ennemi. En 1916, les firmes allemande et anglaise (cette dernière est destinée à devenir la firme « EMI » moderne) se scindent. La « DGG » ne peut plus utiliser la marque « His Master's Voice » (la Voix de son Maître) ni exporter d'Allemagne des disques enregistrés à l'étranger.

Comme la firme ne peut plus vendre de disques de grands noms comme Caruso, Melba et Patti, il lui faut bâtir un nouveau répertoire. Au cours des années suivantes, les enregistrements se focalisent sur les meilleurs artistes d'Allemagne et d'Europe centrale.

Mahler returns to Europe for treatment in Paris.

When this is unsuccessful and it becomes obvious that he is dying, he is taken-back to Vienna to be buried in his adopted home-town.

Even on his death-bed, he laments :

Felix von Weingartner resigns from the Vienna Opera, and Hans Gregor, a theatrical director and not a conductor, replaces him as Director. Bruno Walter tries, repeatedly during the season, to terminate his contract.

L'Âme des 9 Symphonies d'Antoine Bruckner

Le signataire de l'étude ci-dessous, Monsieur Alfred Westarp, doit diriger, le 23 mai, à un concert de la S. M. I. , une partie de la IXe Symphonie de Bruckner, musicien au culte duquel il s'est consacré, et il vient de fonder à Paris un cours d'interprétation musicale : dans lequel on étudiera « l'expression de l'âme par les sons » . La mentalité musicale de Monsieur Westarp est, certes, toute différente de la nôtre, et nos lecteurs pénétreront peut-être mal la pensée de ce musicographe allemand. Malgré cela, nous n'hésitons pas à insérer cette brève étude dont l'auteur a souhaité la publication dans notre « Revue » (note de la direction) .

Il n'y a aucun moyen d'expression qui soit plus profond et plus immédiat que la musique. C'est pourquoi le développement de l'art musical a commencé plus tard que celui des autres arts. C'est pourquoi aussi la musique n'est pas encore arrivée à la vérité sentimentale. Tous les créateurs musicaux transposent leur tempérament personnel dans le formalisme naïf de la tradition musicale et leur grandeur est en raison de la vivification de ces formes.

Considérons à ce point de vue l'œuvre de Bruckner ...

Chaque son est l'expression d'un sentiment musical. Un seul son contient tous les autres et tout le développement de l'œuvre. Ainsi, toutes les Symphonies de Bruckner commencent par un seul son ou par les sons de l'accord parfait. L'analyse des données naturelles qui sont contenues dans ce son unique a lieu sous l'action de la volonté intérieure de l'artiste. Le commencement de l'œuvre est plongé dans le crépuscule. L'incertitude est d'autant plus profonde que la volonté de l'artiste est plus personnelle. Le plus long des préludes de Bruckner est celui de sa 5e Symphonie. Mais la plupart de ses thèmes n'ont pas l'aspect d'une primitivité mélodique. Dans la 5e Symphonie, la mélodie, le soi-disant thème, n'apparaît qu'après quelques pages de vacillement. La 8e Symphonie ne parvient qu'assez tard dans sa tonalité. L'accord parfait comme remplaçant du seul son initial est à la base par exemple des 4e, 6e et 7e Symphonies.

Il va sans dire qu'une telle tonalité primordiale doit être autrement exécutée qu'une tonalité finale. La tonalité finale exprime la dissolution de la volonté personnelle dans la nature primitive des lers harmoniques. La tonalité primordiale n'est que l'expression de l'intensité changeante du son unique. Celle-ci doit se faire sentir dans l'exécution du commencement de l'œuvre. La notation habituelle découvre ici son insuffisance ; et la barre de mesure surtout n'a qu'une valeur relative.

La force créatrice du son unique se manifeste aussi dans les points d'orgue dont Bruckner appréciait la liberté d'expression, par exemple, dans la 1re partie de la 7e Symphonie.

Le développement de l'intensité du son unique ou de son accord parfait n'est cependant pas encore assez logique dans notre musique. C'est la pauvreté des rythmes qui en est la cause. La répétition et la symétrie de nos rythmes empêchent le cours naturel de la progression intérieure. Les surexcitations de l'intensité, que tout le monde reproche à Bruckner, ne sont que les conséquences de cet illogisme des moyens d'expression qu'une intensité changeante a à sa disposition. Aucun tempérament musical n'a jamais été plus profondément logique que celui de Bruckner. Cette logique, cependant, n'ayant pas encore été approuvée publiquement, se cachait dans l'inconscient.

La même logique gouverne aussi les sons différents qui résultent de l'intensité croissante du son primordial, qu'ils soient isolés ou groupés. Les groupes à 2 forment la multiplicité la plus délicate. Toute musique différenciée consiste dans la variation des groupes de 2 sons, qui sont plus ou moins entrecoupés par des sons isolés. La demande de mélodie, c'est-à-dire de retour dans la tonalité détruit le développement logique des sons. Bruckner a souffert aussi de cet illogisme de la tradition musicale. Et c'est ici que l'énigme de la forme de Bruckner trouve sa solution. Nous y reviendrons.

La direction des sons, dont l'intensité augmente, est généralement descendante. La direction des sons dont l'intensité diminue, est généralement ascendante. Ces 2 règles psychologiques sont mises en valeur par Bruckner comme par tout véritable musicien. Une augmentation de l'intensité qui se sert d'une montée de sons est anormale et elle exprime une surexcitation de la volonté. C'est ainsi que les 2 lres paires d'intervalles de la 1re Symphonie de Bruckner montent avec violence, pour retourner bientôt dans la direction descendante qui est naturelle à toute intensité musicale qui va grandissante ; tandis que la surexcitation du tempérament de Bruckner trouve à peine la direction naturelle dans le 1er thème de la 1re partie de la 8e Symphonie.

L'apparition d'un thème, d'une mélodie, dont nous avons constaté l'illogisme psychique, est presque toujours

accompagnée d'une surexcitation, qui ne s'exprime pas seulement par une intensité exagérée mais aussi par une direction anormale. Dans la 5e Symphonie et dans la 9e, déjà l'apparition du 1er thème est précédé par une montée anormale de la direction des sons. Dans la 7e Symphonie, c'est le 2e thème de la 1re partie (page 7 de la partition de piano à 2 mains) qui ne se produit que par une telle montée anormale, accompagnée d'une disharmonie douloureusement criarde. La suite la plus compliquée des thèmes se trouve dans le Finale de la 8e Symphonie et ce Finale est lui-même, par conséquent, le plus compliqué des 8 Symphonies de Bruckner.

La direction normale des sons est l'essence même des trilles. Certains trilles jouent un rôle très important dans le Finale de la 1re Symphonie, et dans la 1re partie de la 2e Symphonie. C'est le trille de la 2e Symphonie qui engendre le mordant (page 9 de la partition de piano à 2 mains) par la préposition et l'adjonction d'un son. C'est à tort que l'on qualifie le mordant de la 1re partie de la 7e Symphonie de wagnérianisme.

Même dans la partie la plus mélancolique que Bruckner ait jamais écrite, dans la 1re partie de la 6e Symphonie, c'est la règle de la direction normale du développement des sons qui nous révèle la volonté du compositeur malgré l'insuffisance de la notation. Dans la 4e mesure de cette 1re partie, les soi-disant triolets ne sont qu'une suite de 2 groupes de 2 sons qui sont entrecoupés par un son isolé. Dans chacun des 2 groupes, le son le plus grave est le plus intense. De même, tous les triolets qui se trouvent dans les Symphonies de Bruckner s'expliquent par la simple logique des sons comme expression d'une émotion changeante qui demande une certaine liberté de la mesure. On a fait gravement tort à la musicalité de Bruckner en expliquant ces triolets comme un rythme de danse. Cette incompréhension a fondamentalement défiguré le caractère de la 4e Symphonie, dont le Scherzo et le Finale débordent de triolets. On sait que Bruckner même a entretenu cette erreur par une explication programmatique de sa 4e Symphonie. Il semble que les interprètes de Bruckner n'aient pas pu oublier ce programme de la Symphonie, bien que Bruckner lui-même l'ait abandonné. Les 1res interprétations d'un grand musicien furent toujours extérieures et trompeuses.

L'intensité psychiquement normale, exprimée dans la direction normale des sons, anime aussi le 1er thème de la 5e Symphonie (page 5 de la partition de piano à 2 mains). Ce thème se détaille tout naturellement dans une suite de 2 sons accouplés, dont le plus grave est le plus intense. Seul le 3e son du thème est indépendant ; l'octave qui forme la fin décroît en montant.

Nous venons de parler de sons indépendants dans les thèmes de Bruckner ; et de ces sons indépendants, nous arrivons à la question de la forme des Symphonies de Bruckner. L'incompréhension de la forme de Bruckner a été jusqu'ici l'obstacle le plus important à sa gloire. On lui demandait d'après les habitudes de la tradition musicale des unités thématiques qui devaient être bien distinctes les unes des autres. Nous avons déjà vu que la sensibilité délicate de Bruckner plus que celle de tout autre compositeur qui l'a précédé, n'éprouvait que les multiplicités les plus délicates, c'est-à-dire les unités de 2 sons au plus, au lieu des unités thématiques. Au lieu de distinguer des unités thématiques, Bruckner développe ses formations tonales comme aucun autre compositeur ne l'a jamais fait avant lui.

Nous voyons, par cet admirable exemple, que l'activité créatrice d'un compositeur consiste dans l'emploi des éléments fertiles que chaque son et le plus minime groupement de sons lui offre. Nous plaignons de nouveau l'insuffisance de la notation qui ne permet pas encore aux compositeurs la confession écrite des procédés de leur âme musicale. La naïveté de la notation s'associe à la naïveté de la théorie musicale pour empêcher les instincts du compositeur d'entrer dans sa conscience.

Pour donner des exemples de développement des sons chez Bruckner, je devrais copier à peu près toutes les 9 Symphonies. Ce serait blesser des organismes que de détacher des parties de ces œuvres pour les présenter dans leur isolement. Qu'on se donne la peine de considérer tranquillement une de ces Symphonies, soit la 1re, soit la 9e. On ne pourra être que profondément touché de cette vivacité des sentiments musicaux.

Dans cette étude de l'âme des Symphonies de Bruckner, on devra cependant éliminer tout ce qui est plutôt primitif que personnel, tout ce qui est plutôt mélodique. C'est de cette façon seulement qu'on réussira à découvrir les sentiments personnels du compositeur et leur développement. Bruckner même, étant obligé par la tradition musicale de faire des thèmes de ses formations tonales, nous rend cette tâche assez lourde, quoiqu'il entreprenne, une fois lui aussi, de débarrasser une de ses compositions de quelques intervalles d'octaves. Nous sommes obligés d'agir beaucoup plus sobrement encore : car notre conscience n'est plus voilée par des besoins mélodiques comme l'était celle de Bruckner. Les thèmes traditionnels se détailleront ainsi et on aura un développement contenu de relations tonales. Je donne comme exemples les soi-disant 3 thèmes de la 1re partie de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner, pages 6, 8 et 12 de la partition de piano à 2 mains.

Les répétitions de thèmes, que la tradition prescrit et que Bruckner n'évite pas toujours entièrement, seront aussi moins sensibles après l'analyse des soi-disant thèmes. Les répétitions ont toujours arrêté le cours logique des sentiments musicaux. Bruckner s'en rendait compte et la forme de ses Symphonies s'est modifiée d'après les nécessités de la logique dans ce sens aussi. Il suffit pour s'en convaincre de lire ou de jouer la 1re partie de la 8e Symphonie, par exemple.

Les dernières parties des Symphonies de Bruckner sont naturellement les plus différenciées au cours du développement qui mène du confus au distinct. C'est pourquoi on leur a reproché encore plus qu'aux autres parties leur manque de forme au point de vue de la tradition musicale. Après avoir constaté 3 « thèmes » dans les 1res parties, l'énumération des « thèmes » n'en finissait plus dans les dernières et on était dans le plus profond embarras. Pour ma part, je ne connais aucun Finale de Symphonie qui m'ait semblé plus logique que celui de la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner.

La pénétration psychique des formations mélodiques nous est facilitée par la prédilection accordée par Bruckner à l'homophonie. Son contrepoint n'est plus le contrepoint de l'école, même dans le Finale de la 5e Symphonie. Il est assez rare que Bruckner se laisse encore aller à conduire une suite tonale dans une direction opposée à celle d'une autre.

L'expression polyphone de Bruckner est encore plus à la merci de l'harmonie traditionnelle que l'expression homophone qui souffrait de la mélodie traditionnelle. Car la mélodie en elle-même était exempte d'un règlement, étant assez étroitement liée par son essence mélodique même. Tandis que l'harmonie polyphone était exposée à la crue lumière de l'intelligence qui a été jusqu'ici l'ennemi mortel du sentiment musical. Nous ne nous étonnons pas que le courage disharmonique de Bruckner fût, par conséquent, un peu affaibli. Ce sont les temps présents qui y remédieront. Malgré tout, Bruckner nous a donné des polyphonies assez expressives, par exemple, dans les 6e, 8e et 9e Symphonies. À mesure que ses formations mélodiques s'affinent, ses formations harmoniques se compliquent comme autant de reflets de la délicatesse de son âme qui alla grandissante pendant toute sa vie.

18 mai 1911 : Gustav Mahler dies at age 50. His last word is : « Mozartl » - a diminutive nickname, something like « my little Mozarty » .

The end of an era viewed in retrospect by many as a « golden age » in Viennese music. Gustav Mahler's early death has an extremely profound effect on everyone in the Mahler and Schönberg circles.

Juin 1911 : Arnold Schönberg writes the last of his « 6 Little Piano Pieces » , Opus 19, as a memorial to Gustav Mahler.

Juin - juillet 1911 : Anton Webern composes the 1st and 4th pieces of his « 5 Pieces for Orchestra » , Opus 10.

Été 1911 : Arnold Schönberg's « Harmonielehre » is published with a dedication to Gustav Mahler's memory. The book was intended to be dedicated to Mahler while he was alive, in recognition of his superiority not only as an artist but also as an intellect and a human being.

Schönberg calls Mahler : « A Saint. »

The iconoclastic « Harmonielehre » will bring Schönberg as much notoriety as did his radical compositions.

Été 1911 : Arnold Schönberg composes the end of Scene 2 and the opening of Scene 3 of his Opera, « Die glückliche Hand » , the 1st significant music he produces for this project.

Été 1911 : Anton Webern composes the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, and 5th of his « 6 Bagatelles for String Quartet » , Opus 9.

A revised and enlarged version of Ferruccio Busoni's book, « Sketch of a New Aesthetic of Music » , is published in English translation.

The 30 year old Béla Bartók composes his Opera, « A Kékszakállú herceg vára » (Bluebeard's Castle) , for a competition. The 1st judges who review it reject it for its « lack of theatricality » , and it is possible that the musical judges never even see the score.

Août 1911 : The 37 year old Arnold Schœnberg becomes involved in an altercation with a neighbour in his building ; when it turns violent, Schœnberg abandons his Vienna apartment and stays with Alexander von Zemlinsky at lake Starnberg (Starnbergersee) , in southern Bavaria.

Fin-septembre 1911 : Arnold Schœnberg decides to leave his devoted students behind and to move back to Berlin, with a job giving lectures at the Stern Conservatory.

In Berlin, Arnold Schœnberg finally finishes the orchestration of his huge « Gurrelieder » , composed 10 years ago in a style from which he has by now moved away completely. He says later that this stage of work on the piece involved only minor bits of composition, primarily in « Klaus the fool » 's melo-drama, which involves the earliest use of « Sprechstimme » (speech-voice) , where the singer follows the rhythms precisely, but only sings the pitches tenuously, gliding away quickly as in speech. This technique is apparently a result of Schœnberg's (and his former pupil Anton Webern's) interest in micro-tonality, and is one that will be used by Schœnberg throught his long career.

Arnold Schœnberg had written positively about the possibility of micro-tonality in music in his « Harmonielehre » , but dismissed it as being impractical, mainly because of the lack of instruments ; note that he left Vienna at precisely the time that some composers there made those instruments available. Even though he was certainly exposed to Ferruccio Busoni's micro-tonal ideas while in Berlin, he probably did not get the opportunity to actually hear micro-tonal music, as Busoni wrote none ; given the micro-tonal activity in Vienna in the next few years by Willi Möllendorf and Jörg Mager (and, a bit later, Alois Hába) , Schœnberg and his circle might have explored quarter-tones further had Schœnberg stayed in Vienna.

20 novembre 1911 : Gustav Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » is premiered posthumously under Bruno Walter in Munich. Alban Berg travels there from Vienna to attend, and Anton Webern from Berlin ; Arnold Schœnberg wishes to go but cannot because he begins a lecture series in Berlin. Upon returning to Berlin, Webern plays it for him on the piano.

Back in Vienna immediately afterward, Alban Berg begins sketching his « Altenberg » Lieder.

Décembre 1911 : The « Schauspiel Overtüre » (Overture to a play) , Opus 4, by Erich Wolfgang Korngold is premiered by the Leipzig « Gewandhaus » Orchestra under Arthur Nikisch.

Décembre 1911 : Arnold Schœnberg composes « Herzegewächse » (Foliage of the Heart) , Opus 20, has the premiere in Vienna of « Friede auf Erden » , and his « Harmonielehre » is published. He begins touring to other European cities to conduct his works (Amsterdam, Saint-Petersburg, London) , conductor Hermann Scherchen going with him.

22 janvier 1912 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

Février 1912 : Wilhelm Furtwängler se rend à Hambourg avec son amie, Lilli Dieckmann, et fait la connaissance de Arthur Nikisch qui donne 2 concerts, les 9 et 23 du mois.

Josef Karl Tautenhayn, junior

11 février 1912, 11 heures du matin (dans le grand-hall - « Festsaal » - de l'édifice principal de l'Université de Vienne, au n° 1 de la « Universität ») : To celebrate the 50th anniversary of foundation of the Vienna Academic Choral Society (« Akademische Gesangverein ») , unveiling ceremony of a commemorative plaque honouring Anton Bruckner. The project was initiated by the Professors of the Faculty of Philosophy of the University of Vienna and it was funded by the Choral Society, itself.

The musical director August Göllerich pronounces the official speech. For the occasion, 2 works by Bruckner are performed by the « Akademische Gesangverein » and the « Wiener Konzertverein » .

The relief image of the Austrian composer (a profile of the head looking to the left) previously created by sculptor and medalist Josef Tautenhayn, junior (1868-1962) , is now placed on the 1st tier of a monumental marble tablet made of 2 superimposed rectangular reddish slabs. A laurel wreath linear border surrounds the upper-plate, on 3 sides, which symbolizes with distinction the Master of Saint-Flourain. The relief can be easily compared with a black-and-white picture taken from the archives of the University of Vienna (by R. Fenzl) : Josef Tautenhayn Junior probably decided to represent Bruckner at an advanced age. On the photograph, the Master has a round face, a very short hair-cut, wears a jacket, a shirt and a bowtied. Although the shape of the almost bald head and the shape of the nose show similarities, the composer looks overall much older, which is mainly due to the distinctive forehead wrinkles. (Tautenhayn focuses mainly on the head, giving no details of clothing) .

On the request of the artist and the Choral Society, the memorial is hanged to the wall (by 4 prominent salient metal brackets) in Section 28 (to the right of stairs VII) of the left-passage of arcades (« Arkadenhof ») of the University's main building.

The following inscription is chiseled, in large gilt letters, underneath the portrait :

« Anton Bruckner, Honorary Doctor of the University of Vienna, 1824-1896. “ Non confundar in æternum ”. Academic Choral Society. Vienna. »

« Anton Bruckner. Ehrendoktor der Wiener Universität MDCCCXXIV-MDCCCXCVI (1824-1896) . »

« Non confundar in aeternum »

« Ich werde nicht zuschanden werden in Ewigkeit. »

« Akademischer Gesangsverein Wien »

The imposing University Palace on Vienna's splendid new « Ring », in the immediate vicinity of the parliament, the City Hall, the « Burgtheater » and the Votiv Church, shows that the University was intended to hold an important position in Vienna. The building occupies an area of 161 metres by 133 metres and was originally intended to contain all the faculties.

In 1871, architect Heinrich had studied the older University buildings in Bologna, Padua, Genoa and Rome during a trip to Italy. The arcaded Court (« Arkadenhof »), modelled on the « Palazzo Farnese » in Rome, was intended by him to be a « Hall of Fame » for the University. The many sculptures and plaques testify to the capacity of scholars who have worked here.

The Court was intended to be a « campo santo » to commemorate renowned University teachers and a recreation area for young people engaged in studies. The 1st memorial was erected in 1888 to commemorate the lawyer Julius Glaser. Today, there are some 150 sculptures and reliefs of Viennese scholars, and, among them (as the only woman), is the poet and honorary doctor of the University, Marie von Ebner-Eschenbach. Especially noteworthy is the commemorative group by the sculptor Carl Kundmann (1892), which is dedicated to the Austrian educational reformers Leo Graf Thun-Hohenstein, Franz Exner, and Hermann Bonitz. There are also remarkable sculptures by such important artists as Franz Xaver Messerschmidt, Caspar Zumbusch, Richard Kauffungen, Josef Tautenhayn Junior, and others. The centre of the Court-yard has been occupied since 1910 by the Kastalia Fountain (« Kastalia-Brunnen »), the « Spring of Wisdom », that was created by Edmund Hellmer. In 1926, it was decreed that a term of 10 years must pass between the death of a scholar and the erection of a memorial in the arcade.

Josef Hermann Tautenhayn

The Austrian medalist and sculptor Josef Hermann Tautenhayn was born in 1837 in Vienna and died in 1911. He was the father of Josef (Karl) Tautenhayn, junior.

Josef Hermann studied at the Academy (1854-1860) under Carl Radnitzky (1818-1901) and sculpture under Franz Lukas Bauer (1798-1872), then, at the engravers' Academy of the Imperial mint. After his return from a study trip through Italy, France, and England, undertaken in 1869-1872, he was appointed Imperial engraver of coins and medals, and, in 1881, professor at the Academy.

Among a large number of choice medals those commemorating the coronation of Franz-Josef as king of Hungary (1867); the Imperial Silver Wedding (1879); and the bicentennial of the Relief of Vienna from the Turks (1883), are the most noteworthy. His plastic work on a large-scale includes a group of the « Birth of Athens », and statues for the University of Vienna, also statues for the Art-Historical Museum and the Houses of Parliament.

Denkmal Anton Bruckner im Arkadenhof der Universität Wien

Das Denkmal des Komponisten Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) wurde von dem Bildhauer, Münz- und Medaillegraveur Josef Tautenhayn dem Jüngeren (Junior) (1868-1962) für den Arkadenhof der Universität Wien geschaffen und am 11. Februar 1912 enthüllt.

Das Denkmal für Anton Bruckner wurde aus zwei übereinander gesetzten rechteckigen rötlichen Marmorplatten angefertigt und an der Wand des linken Gangs im Arkadenhof angebracht. Im oberen Drittel befindet sich eine oktagonale Vertiefung, aus der sich das Porträt des Komponisten im Profil im Relief erhebt. Der Bildhauer zeigt Bruckner in fortgeschrittenem Alter mit Falten, kahlem Kopf und vom Betrachter aus nach links blickend. Die Darstellung konzentriert sich auf den Kopf und weist keinerlei Anzeichen von Kleidung auf. In großen vergoldeten Lettern befindet sich unter dem Reliefporträt folgende Inschrift :

« Anton Bruckner. Ehrendoktor der Wiener Universität MDCCCXXIV-MDCCCXCVI (1824-1896) . »

Darunter befindet sich die lateinische Inschrift :

« Non confundar in aeternum »

Übersetzt :

« Ich werde nicht zuschanden werden in Ewigkeit. »

Den Abschluß bildet der Hinweis auf die Stifter der Tafel « Akademischer Gesangsverein Wien » .

Die monumentale Marmortafel wird von vier markant hervorstechenden Befestigungsklammern aus Metall an der Wand gehalten. Eine Lorbeergirlande umrahmt die obere Platte an drei Seiten und symbolisiert die Ehrung und Auszeichnung des Komponisten.

Der akademische Gesangsverein widmete der Universität Wien anlässlich der 50-jährigen Stiftungsfeier des akademischen Gesangsvereins ein Denkmal für Anton Bruckner, welches zuvor vom Bildhauer Josef Tautenhayn ausgeführt worden war. Es wurde gewidmet, um im Arkadenhof der Universität Wien aufgestellt zu werden. Das Professoren-Kollegium der philosophischen Fakultät sprach sich für die Errichtung des Denkmals aus. Vom akademischen Senat wurde die Inschrift « Anton Bruckner, Ehrendoktor der Wiener Universität, geboren am 4. September 1824, gestorben am 11. Oktober 1896. “ Non confundar in æternum ” » beschlossen. Widmung und Zirkel sollten in einer nicht auffallenden Form angebracht werden. Auf Wunsch des Künstlers und des Verbandes wurde als Aufstellungsort das Feld 28 rechts von der Stiege VII bestimmt. Anlässlich der Enthüllung des Denkmals fand am 11. Februar 1912 um 11 Uhr im großen Festsaal der Universität Wien eine Feier statt. Direktor August Göllerich hielt die Festrede, der akademische Gesangsverein und der Wiener Konzertverein brachten zwei Werke von Anton Bruckner dar.

Die Darstellung des Komponisten im Denkmal kann gut mit einem schwarz-weiß-Foto aus dem Archiv der Universität Wien verglichen werden : Josef Tautenhayn hat sich wohl entschlossen Anton Bruckner in fortgeschrittenem Alter darzustellen. Das Foto wurde wahrscheinlich in jüngeren Jahren Anton Bruckners angefertigt. Auf der Fotografie hat Bruckner ein rundliches Gesicht und sehr kurz geschnittene Haare. Im Relief auf der Denkmalplatte im Arkadenhof der Universität Wien kann man von solchen Details nur wenig erkennen. Die Kopfform und die Form der Nase weisen zwar Ähnlichkeiten auf, insgesamt wirkt er aber deutlich älter, was vor allem auf die prägnanten Stirnfalten zurückzuführen ist. In der Fotografie ist der Komponist als Brustbild wiedergegeben, er trägt Jackett, Hemd und gebundene Fliege.

Als weiterer Vergleich dient eine etwa 7 centimeter hohe rechteckige Porträtplakette mit der Darstellung Anton Bruckners im Profil. Sie wurde von Josef Tautenhayn dem Jüngeren ausgeführt und stammt aus der Sammlung seines Großneffen Wolfgang Tautenhayn. Die Plakette trägt die Signatur des Künstlers « JOSEF TAUTENHAYN JUNIOR » Parallelen zur Fotografie sind eindeutig erkennbar, was sowohl das Porträt betrifft, als auch die Wiedergabe von Kleidung. Die Kopfform stimmt mit jener am Denkmal Anton Bruckners überein, aber wirkt er in der Plakette wesentlich jünger. Anton Bruckner trägt wie auf der Fotografie ein Hemd mit Fliege, darüber ein Jackett und er hat ebenfalls sehr kurz geschnittene Haare. Grundsätzlich könnte die Plakette eine Vorstufe zum Denkmal sein, da die Modellierung der Kopfform durchaus Parallelen zu jener im Denkmal aufweist. Die Plakette wurde um die Lebensdaten des Komponisten ergänzt.

In der Plaketten- beziehungsweise Medaillon-Sammlung von Josef Tautenhayns Großneffen Wolfgang Tautenhayn befindet sich auch ein kleines rundes Medaillon mit der Darstellung des Kopfes Anton Bruckners die auch weitgehend mit dem Denkmalporträt übereinstimmt. Auf diesem kleinen Medaillon wirkt der Komponist jedoch noch ein bisschen jünger als auf der Denkmalplakette, da der Umriss des Haaransatzes fein und deutlich herausgearbeitet wurde. Knapp unterhalb des Halsansatzes befindet sich die Signatur des Künstlers.

Zur Datierung des Medallions, wie auch zur Plakette, ist nichts bekannt. Beides könnte noch vor der Arbeit am Denkmal entstanden sein und zur Erarbeitung des Porträts des Komponisten beigetragen haben. Im Denkmal konzentrierte sich Josef Tautenhayn der Jüngere (Junior) besonders auf das Profilporträt, das er ohne Kleidung und ergänzender Umschrift herausarbeitete. Erst unterhalb des Porträts werden Name, Titel und Lebensdaten in gold gefassten Versalien sichtbar.

Besonders auffällig an diesem Denkmal ist die Maserung des rötlichen Marmors, die das Porträt in die Oberfläche einbindet und deren Verlauf die individuellen Gesichtszüge des Komponisten beeinflussen. Das Porträt wirkt durch diese Linienführung besonders weich modellierung und fein herausgearbeitet.

Der Arkadenhof der Universität bildet das (ideelle) Zentrum des Hauptgebäudes der Universität Wien. Der Architekt der Universität Heinrich von Ferstel plante die Kommunikationswege dieses Monumentalbaus so, daß die Arkaden die zentrale Schnittstelle zu sämtlichen Gebäudeteilen und dadurch zum kommunikativen Herzstück werden sollte. In Zusammenarbeit mit seinem Berater, dem Kunsthistoriker Rudolf von Eitelberger, entwickelte Ferstel den Gedanken, diesen hochfrequentierten Raum als Raum des Andenkens an die bedeutenden Wissenschaftler zu gestalten. Im Juni 1885 beschloß der Akademische Senat diese Wissenschaftler durch Büsten und Plaketten zu ehren. Seit der Aufstellung des ersten Denkmals für Julius Glaser im Jahr 1888 wurden 152 weitere Gelehrtendenkmäler hier angebracht. Allerdings wurde im Arkadenhof der Universität Wien bis heute keine einzige Frau für ihre wissenschaftlichen Leistungen geehrt.

Im Arkadenhof der Universität Wien wurden zwischen 1889 und 2002 mehr als 150 Professoren der Universität Wien geehrt. Eine monumentale Granitintarsie in der Mitte des Hofes macht seit 2009 auf das Fehlen von Wissenschaftlerinnen in diesem Kontext aufmerksam.

Den Denkmälern der Universität, macht den Arkadenhof zum Ort der « lebendigen » Begegnung mit den Vertretern der Wiener Wissenschaftsgeschichte. Hier werden die Denkmäler nicht nur als Stellvertreter für die Wissenschaftler und dementsprechend als Ausgangspunkt für ein biographisches Interesse gesehen, sondern erstmals auch als bemerkenswerte künstlerische Leistungen, die teilweise von den führenden BildhauerInnen der jeweiligen Zeit entworfen wurden.

22 février 1912 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans le « Te Deum » d'Anton Bruckner. Les solistes : Gertrud Bartsch, Bertha Grimm-Mittelmann, Rudolf Jäger et Alfred Kase. À l'orgue : Karl Straube. Suivra en seconde partie l'Oratorio « Scènes du Faust de Gœthe » (« Szenen aus Gœthes Faust ») de Robert Schumann, avec les solistes Reinhold Gerhardt, Marie Hering-Warbeck, Hildegard Gebhardt, Kaethe Reiche-Handke et Kurt Taut. Il s'agit du 18e concert de la saison.

Fin-février 1912 : Arnold Schœnberg is to conduct his « Pelleas und Melisande » , in Prague. With Anton Webern following him from Berlin, Alexander von Zemlinsky already in Prague, and Alban Berg and several other Vienna students joining, it is a big reunion of the « Schönberg Circle ». Webern presents Schönberg with a copy of the « Tribute Book », written by Schönberg's students about him, in hopes of interesting other students in studying with him.

12 mars 1912 : Arnold Schönberg composes « Gebet an Pierrot » for « Pierrot lunaire » .

Fin-mars 1912 : The 37 year old Arnold Schönberg composes the 1st song for his cycle « Pierrot lunaire », featuring his novel « Sprechstimme » (speech-voice) technique.

Fin-mars 1912 : Arnold Schönberg takes a trip to Prague.

Fin-mars 1912 : The 27 year old Alban Berg begins composing his « 5 Orchestral Songs to Picture-Postcard Texts by Peter Altenberg », Opus 4, completing the 1st song (probably, the No. 4) before April 10th. Berg, then, has to interrupt the composition of this set until July, to make a piano-vocal arrangement of the 3rd and 4th movements of Arnold Schönberg's 2nd String Quartet.

Avril - mai 1912 : Arnold Schönberg composes virtually all the rest of « Pierrot lunaire » featuring « Sprechstimme » (speech-voice) throughout.

Avril - mai 1912 : The 28 year old Anton Webern is occupied with writing a 2 piano reduction of Arnold Schönberg's « 5 Pieces for Orchestra ». Then, he goes on vacation in Klagenfurt and Vienna, with a mountain climb in between, stops in Berlin to see his teacher Schönberg.

Fin-avril 1912 : Feeling that he is finally ready to compose a big piece, Erich Wolfgang Korngold begins (a few weeks before his 15th birthday, on May 29th) his « Sinfonietta » in B major.

21 juin 1912 : Anton Webern moves to Stettin to begin a new job at the Theater.

26 juin 1912 : At a music Festival in Vienna, Bruno Walter gives the « posthumous » premiere of Gustav Mahler's 9th Symphony, and conducts the Vienna premiere of « Das Lied von der Erde » .

The Mahler 9th Concert is framed by 2 concerts featuring music of Arnold Schönberg and his students, notably Schönberg's « Buch der hängenden Garten » and 2nd String Quartet, Alban Berg's Piano Sonata, Opus 1, and Anton Webern's 4 Pieces for violin and piano - and, this time, surprisingly, the « new music » is a big success with the audience but the newspaper-critics still hate it. The brochure accompanying these concerts contains the 1st critical study of the music of Berg and Webern.

Juillet 1912 : Arnold Schönberg completes his « Pierrot lunaire » .

Arnold Schœnberg's « Pelleas und Melisande » is published by Universal-Edition, in Vienna, as his Opus 5 ; and « Fünf Orchesterstücke » (5 Pieces for Orchestra) is published by Peters, in Leipzig, as his Opus 16. Schœnberg receives only 500 « Gulden » as payment for the latter (in contrast to the high-fees that had been earned by Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß for their works) .

Alma sets-up the « Mahler Foundation » , to award prize money to worthy young composers in Vienna, with Richard Strauß, Ferruccio Busoni, and Bruno Walter as jurors. The immediate reason for its existence is to continue Mahler's financial support for Schœnberg, and so, the 1st grant is given to him.

Juillet 1912 : Alban Berg completes the 2nd of his 5 « Altenberg Lieder » , Song No. 3.

After finishing his studies, the 19 year old Alois Hába gets a job as teacher in Bilovice, a small-town near the Hungarian border, and continues his musical studies independently.

Août 1912 : Schœnberg gets back to serious work on his Opera, « Die glückliche Hand » , which contains his 1st use of « sprechgesang » with a full choir of voices. By now, Schœnberg has rejected the ideas he expressed in his 1909 letters to Ferruccio Busoni, and his new work relies much more on traditional musical architectural procedures, as is plainly evident in comparing « Die glückliche Hand » with his other Opera, « Erwartung » .

At the same time, he conceives a huge « theater piece » based on Honoré de Balzac's religious novel, « Seraphita » , comprising 9 scenes presented over the course of 3 evenings, with a huge chorus and orchestra ... but, musically, not much progress is made on this project.

Août 1912 : The 15 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold completes the un-orchestrated score of his « Sinfonietta » in B major, Opus 5, a work that is on a much grander scale than its title implies (really a full-blown Late-Romantic Symphony) , and begins his Violin Sonata in G major, Opus 6.

Fin-août 1912 : Alban Berg announces the completion of the 3rd of his « 5 Orchestral Songs to Picture-Postcard Texts by Peter Altenberg » (the No. 5) , and the beginning of the 4th (the No. 2) .

Fin-septembre 1912 : Alban Berg finishes his « 5 Orchestral Songs to Picture-Postcard Texts by Peter Altenberg » with the last song (the No. 1) .

5 octobre 1912 : Le chef Rudolf Siegel dirige la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (il s'agit d'un « Concert Élite » sous la supervision de J. Sachs) .

Rudolf Siegel

Through Hans Pfitzner's recommendation and the suggestion of both « Frau » Lilli Dieckmann and Ida Boy-Ed, Wilhelm Furtwängler applied for an appointment to succeed Hermann Abendroth (1883-1956) as music-director in Lübeck, in the spring of 1911. He almost did not get the job. An experienced conductor named Rudolf Siegel had long been lined-up for the position, but custom dictated that there should be a competition among 4 contestants anyway. When Ernst Wendel, one of the contestants, dropped-out because he learned that the contest was « fixed » in favour of Siegel, Furtwängler applied to take his place.

16 octobre 1912 : The melodrama « Pierrot lunaire » is premiered at the « Berlin Choralion-Saal » with Albertine Zehme as the vocalist.

It is quite a success with the audience, while the critics remain hostile. Igor Stravinsky attends a rehearsal and is impressed ; his enthusiastic reception of Schönberg's progressive style will provide much inspiration for his experiments in « le Sacre du Printemps » .

18 octobre 1912 : Le chef Oskar Fried dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Ce concert est organisé par l'imprésario (de Gustav Mahler) Emil Guttmann.

25 octobre 1912 : The 48 year old Richard Strauß premieres at the « Hoftheater Stuttgart » his latest Opera, Ariadne auf Naxos (again, in a more old-fashioned style) , based on the German libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. The director is Max Reinhardt.

9 novembre 1912 (2e concert symphonique de la saison 1912-1913 à Lübeck) : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner, les « Kindertotenlieder » de Mahler (avec Marya Freund) et l'Ouverture « Der fliegende Holländer » de Wagner.

Décembre 1912 : Arnold Schönberg conducts his « Pelleas und Melisande » in Saint-Petersburg.

16 décembre 1912 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

27 décembre 1912 : Arnold Schönberg sketches the beginning of the final scene for his « Seraphita » project, which he says in a letter to Alma Mahler « requires a chorus of at least 2,000 singers » , but work on this progresses no further.

1912-1914 : Le chef (et organiste) Evert Cornelis dirige à 3 reprises des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » . Il est l'un des rares chefs, à l'époque, à programmer ses compositions.

En 1908, le directeur Willem Mengelberg lui demande, en vain, de devenir assistant-chef à l'Orchestre du « Concertgebouw » . Mais Cornelis accepte finalement l'offre en 1909. Il sera responsable de l'élargissement du répertoire de l'Orchestre autant en musique contemporaine (Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel) qu'en musique ancienne (Jean-Sébastien Bach) .

Evert Cornelis

The organist and conductor Evert Cornelis was born on 5 December 1884 in Amsterdam and died on 23 November 1931 in Bilthoven, a village in the Dutch province of Utrecht. At the Amsterdam Conservatory, he studied organ and piano under Jean-Baptiste Charles de Pauw and composition under Bernard Zweers. He became organist of the Lutheran Church in Amsterdam and conducted also the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra.

The Holland Bach Choir (« Het Bach Koor Holland ») was founded in 1921 by Johan Schoonderbeek to serve as the choir of the Netherlands Bach Society. In 1927, Evert Cornelis took-over the direction of the choir.

Evert Cornelis (Amsterdam, 5 december 1884 - Bilthoven, gemeente De Bilt, 23 november 1931) was een Nederlandse dirigent en organist.

Hij was de zoon van de « werkmán » Arnold George Cornelis en Evertje Oostervink. Hij groeide op in een gereformeerd, amuzikaal milieu, maar toch trad zijn talent al vroeg aan het licht.

Op 6 februari 1908 trouwde hij met Hilda Whitley. Zij kregen een dochter en een zoon, Evert Cornelis (junior) , die jurist werd en na de Tweede Wereldoorlog directeur en intendant was van verschillende culturele instellingen, waaronder het Residentie Orkest, het Holland Festival en De Nederlandse Opera.

Met steun van Daniël de Lange kreeg Cornelis een beurs voor de muziekschool en als 15-jarige ging hij naar het Amsterdamsch Conservatorium. Zijn docenten waren Jean-Baptiste Charles de Pauw (orgel en piano) en Bernard Zweers (compositie). Na het behalen van de Prix d'Excellence voor orgel in 1904 was hij organist in Ouderkerk aan de Amstel en later, tot 1923, in de Oude Lutherse kerk in Amsterdam. Toen al stond hij bekend om zijn gevarieerde repertoirekeuze. Zo brak hij een lans voor de muziek van Max Reger, die toen « moeilijk » werd gevonden.

Omdat zijn belangstelling meer uitging naar het dirigeren, werd hij in 1904 repetitor bij de Koninklijke Vlaamse Opera in Antwerpen en later assistent-dirigent bij de kortstondig heropgerichte Nederlandsche Opera van Cornelis van der Linden. Tussendoor begeleidde hij de sopraanzangeres Alida Loman-Lütkeermann (1869-1932) op een tournee door Nederlands-Indië en Australië in 1907.

Nadat hij al in 1908 vergeefs aan Willem Mengelberg had gevraagd of hij tweede dirigent kon worden bij het Concertgebouworkest, nodigde deze hem in 1909 inderdaad daartoe uit. Aanvankelijk had hij een ondergeschikte positie, maar gaandeweg wist hij zich onmisbaar te maken. Hij breidde het repertoire van dit orkest uit met zowel eigentijdse klassieke muziek als oude muziek, waarvoor Mengelberg en de andere tweede dirigent Cornelis Dopper minder belangstelling hadden. Tot zijn voorkeuren behoorde ook de muziek van Claude Debussy en Maurice Ravel.

In 1918-1919 raakte hij verwickeld in het conflict tussen Matthijs Vermeulen en het bestuur van het Concertgebouworkest. Vermeulen had een persoonlijke aanval op Dopper gericht en het programmabeleid van Mengelberg in krachtige bewoordingen bekritiseerd. Toen het conflict escaleerde, werd een concert van Evert Cornelis verstoord door actievoerders, onder wie de kunstenaar en activist Erich Wichman en de componist Daniël Ruyneman. Daarbij gaf hij openlijk te kennen dat hij het eens was met de kritiek van Vermeulen en zijn medestanders. Dit kostte hem zijn baan als tweede dirigent. Mengelberg liet merken dat hij in de ambitieuze en vooruitstrevende Cornelis een bedreiging zag. Hij sprak zelfs van « de staatsgreep van Evert Cornelis », die echter slechts zijdelings bij het tumult betrokken was en ook na zijn ontslag bleef getuigen van « de buitengewone betekenis van Mengelberg als orkest-dirigent ».

Vervolgens hield hij zich enkele jaren vooral bezig met solospel, kamermuziek, koördirectie en het begeleiden van de Belgische sopraan Berthe Seroen (1882-1957), met wie hij in totaal veertien jaar samenwerkte. De Seroen-Cornelisavonden hadden groot succes.

In 1922 werd hij aangesteld als chef-dirigent van het Utrechts Stedelijk Orkest (USO). Het abrupte vertrek van zijn voorganger Jan van Gilse (na langdurige conflicten met Willem Pijper en met het bestuur van concertzaal Tivoli) had het orkest gedemoraliseerd, maar Evert Cornelis wist het weer tot bloei en op hoog peil te brengen. Met een zowel gedurfde als doordachte repertoirekeuze, die hij voorzag van uitvoerige programmatoelichtingen, introduceerde hij veel Nederlandse en buitenlandse muziek uit de 20e eeuw (van onder meer Igor Stravinsky, Arthur Honegger, Béla Bartók, Zoltán Kodály, Arnold Schönberg en Anton Webern), maar ook uit andere stijlperiodes. Hij behoorde tot de weinige dirigenten die in die tijd symfonieën van Bruckner programmeerden. In het bijzonder prezen critici zijn vertolking van de Symfonie in D van César Franck. Hij was een pleitbezorger van de Franse componist Charles Tournemire, die twee werken aan hem opdroeg. Met het USO gaf hij ook concertante uitvoeringen van complete opera's, zoals Claude Debussy's « Pelléas et Mélisande », met Berthe Seroen in de rol van Mélisande. Ook koos hij Britse muziek die in Nederland zelden aan bod kwam, van onder anderen Frederick Delius en Ralph Vaughan Williams. Zijn programma's maakten zoveel indruk, dat nog 25 jaar na zijn dood de muziekpublicist Wouter Paap schreef :

« Voor de muzikkenner is het een even groot genot, de programma's van Evert Cornelis door te nemen, als het voor de wijnkenner een genoegen is, de catalogus van zijn wijnhandelaar in ogeschouw te nemen. »

Ook op het gebied van de authentieke uitvoeringspraktijk van barokmuziek was hij een pionier, bijvoorbeeld in het gebruik van het klavecimbel voor de basso continuo. Na het overlijden van Johan Schoonderbeek in 1927 leidde hij ook De Nederlandse Bachvereniging en voerde daarmee als eerste Bachs Matthäus-Passion en Johannes-Passion uit in complete vorm zonder de gebruikelijke coupures. Hij was ook de eerste in Nederland die voor de Messiah van Händel, die altijd in het Duits werd gezongen, de Engelse tekst gebruikte.

Ondanks een zwakke gezondheid gold Cornelis als een actief musicus en harde werker. Lijdend aan een ongeneeslijke ziekte kwam hij twaalf dagen voor zijn dood nog zijn bed uit om een abonnementsconcert te dirigeren. Kort voor zijn 47e verjaardag overleed hij in zijn woonplaats Bilthoven.

4 janvier 1913 : Décès d'Ignaz Bruckner, le frère cadet d'Anton ; 9e enfant de la famille.

Né le 28 juillet 1833, au prise avec de violentes convulsions. Il va finir par survivre mais non sans conséquences. Il héritera d'une faiblesse au niveau des yeux et sera considéré toute sa vie comme un demi simple d'esprit. Dès 1851, Ignaz Bruckner va agir comme jardinier à Saint-Florian, jusqu'à ce que sa vision commence à se détériorer. Après quoi, il sera transféré en tant que domestique au monastère ; une de ses fonctions principales consistera à être responsable du bon fonctionnement du soufflet de l'orgue pneumatique abbatiale du facteur Josef Mauracher (II/10 ; « Sub and Super Octaves ») situé dans la Chapelle mariale (« Marienkapelle ») . Ignaz est toujours resté proche de son frère Anton.

In der Marienkapelle befindet sich eine von Anton Bruckners Brüder Ignaz gestiftete pneumatische Orgel von Josef Mauracher aus dem Jahre 1903 (II/10 ; Sub- und Superoktavkoppeln) .

Lors de la rédaction du testament (1893) , Ignaz et sa sœur Rosalie (célibataires) furent nommés les héritiers légaux.

La plupart des journaux personnels de Bruckner qui ont survécu sont devenus la propriété de sa sœur, Rosalie Hueber qui résidait à Vöcklabruck. Ils seront finalement vendus par la famille Hueber à la Bibliothèque Nationale d'Autriche qui va aussi en acheter 1 ou 2 autres de particuliers.

À la fin de sa vie, Ignaz deviendra une source d'informations inestimable après la mort de son célèbre frère, le II octobre 1896.

Quelques témoignages d'Ignaz Bruckner :

« Je ne me souviens de rien de papa lorsqu'il se sentait bien. Mais je me souviens de lui lorsqu'il était très malade. À une occasion, il m'a appelé par mon nom et je me suis tout de suite enfui. Je me rappelle de lui, couché dans son lit ... »

« Maman comparait souvent mon frère Anton à papa. Des années plus tard, mon frère était devenu physiquement plus robuste que lui. »

« Quand papa est mort, il portait une soutane noire et un bonnet de nuit, aussi de couleur noir. »

« J'ai bien aimé la musique lors de l'enterrement de papa. Je riaais beaucoup. La dame officiant comme fossoyeure m'a dit : Tu ne dois surtout pas rire, c'est ton père qui est mort. »

« Je me souviens encore de la nourriture qui a été servie à l'enterrement. Parce qu'il s'agissait d'un jour de jeûne, nous avons eu droit à du Grießschmarrn (crêpes de semoule) . Il y avait aussi des boulettes de pain, du raifort, du riz et du raisin ! »

« La dernière chose dont je me souviens est de savoir comment nous sommes arrivés au village d'Ebelsberg. »

(Le père du jeune Bruckner rendra l'âme le 7 juin 1837. La mère et le reste de ses enfants déménageront à Ebelsberg - à environ 75 minutes au nord de Saint-Florian - seulement 6 semaines après le décès.)

« Je ne sais rien au sujet de mon frère. Il n'a jamais joué avec moi. Il avait des amis plus grands que moi. »

« Mon frère m'a souvent raconté comment il jouait au voleur dans les prés, en compagnie d'autres garçons de son âge. Lorsqu'ils finissaient par l'attraper, ils lui assénaient de grands coups de bâton dans le dos. Rusé, Anton avait prévu le stratagème : il enfilait, pour la circonstance, de vieux pantalons très rapiécés afin de mieux se protéger. Il ressentait beaucoup de satisfaction à être frappé sans ressentir de douleur. »

« Papa remarquait lorsqu'Anton rentrait (trop) tard de ses cours de chant. Furieux, il essayait de l'attraper par les cheveux mais il ne réussissait que partiellement. Mon frère prenait alors la fuite sans que papa ne lui fasse de mal. »

Janvier 1913 : Bruno Walter becomes the « Royal Bavarian “ Generalmusikdirektor ” » in Munich.

14 février 1913 : Le chef Georg Schumann dirige le « Psaume 150 » de Bruckner (WAB 38) avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et le Chœur de la « Sing-Akademie », accompagnés par la soprano Anna Hesse.

Georg Alfred Schumann (geboren 25. Oktober 1866 in Königstein/Sachsen ; gestorben 23. Mai 1952 in Berlin Lichterfelde-West) war ein deutscher Komponist, Pianist, Dirigent, Pädagoge und von 1900 bis 1952 Direktor der Sing-Akademie zu Berlin.

Georg Schumann war der Sohn des Stadtmusikdirektors Clemens Schumann (1839-1918) und ältere Brüder des Komponisten Camillo Schumann. Weitere Geschwister waren Alfred Schumann (1868-1891) , welcher zuletzt Konzertmeister bei den Bremer Philharmonikern gewesen war, und Clemens Schumann junior (1876-1938) , von 1900 bis 1936 Geiger in der Dresdner Staatskapelle.

Während Georg Schumanns musikalische Ausbildung in Dresden von dem sächsischen « Orgelkönig » Carl August Fischer und dem einstigen Julius-Otto-Schüler Friedrich Baumfelder weitergeführt wurde, trat er bereits als Solist mit Johann Nepomuk Hummels Klavierkonzert in A-Moll auf und erweckte durch eine selbst komponierte Klaviersonate die Aufmerksamkeit des Komponisten und Dozenten Carl Reinecke, der ihm eine Freistelle am Leipziger Konservatorium vermittelte, wo er von 1882 bis 1888 vor allem bei ihm studierte. Begegnungen mit Franz Liszt, Anton Rubinstein, Johannes Brahms, Arthur Nikisch, Gustav Mahler, Joseph Joachim, Carl Halir und Max Bruch befruchteten nach und nach Schumanns künstlerische Entwicklung.

Nach Tätigkeiten als Dirigent und Chorleiter des Gesangs-Vereins in Danzig (1890) und des Philharmonischen Chores und Orchesters in Bremen (1896) wurde er 1900 zum Direktor (1950 Ehrendirektor) der Sing-Akademie zu Berlin gewählt. 1907 erfolgte seine Berufung als Mitglied, 1918 als Vizepräsident und 1934 als amtierender Präsident der Preußischen Akademie der Künste, deren Meisterschule für Komposition er als Nachfolger von Max Bruch von 1913 bis 1945 leitete. Zu seinen Schülern gehörten und andere Hans Uldall, Shukichi Mitsukuri und Pantscho Wladigerow.

Von diesen Positionen aus hat Georg Schumann das Deutsche und insbesondere das Berliner Musikleben entscheidend mit beeinflusst. Gemeinsam mit Richard Strauß und anderen gründete er die Genossenschaft deutscher Tonsetzer (die heutige GEMA) deren Ehrenmitglied er wurde. Er war Mitbegründer des Verbandes Deutscher Konzertchöre, setzte sich im « Hilfsbund für deutsche Musikpflege » für notleidende Künstler ein und holte und andere Musiker wie Arnold Schönberg an die Akademie der Künste.

Er war Initiator des Erwerbs und der Erhaltung des Bachhauses Eisenach und dessen Ausgestaltung als Museum durch die Neue Bachgesellschaft mit direktem Einverständnis von Kaiser Wilhelm II. , bei dem er wegen finanzieller Unterstützung des Vorhabens warb. Durch eine persönliche Bürgschaft, Benefizkonzerte (und andere mit der Sing-Akademie zu Berlin und dem Berliner Philharmonischen Orchester in Eisenach 1905) sowie eine rege Sammeltätigkeit unterstützte und förderte Schumann dieses Projekt.

Mit Unterstützung Sergiu Celibidaches, des Dirigenten des Philharmonischen Orchesters sowie des Leiters des Berliner Philharmonischen Chores, Hans Chemin-Petit, arbeitete er für den Wiederaufbau des Musiklebens in Berlin nach 1945.

Schumann ist der ausgehenden Spätromantik zuzuordnen. Als Vorbilder lassen sich zunächst Johannes Brahms und Robert Schumann (mit Georg Schumann nicht verwandt) nennen.

Er schrieb über 100 Kompositionen, vor allem Chorwerke, zum Beispiel Oratorien, Kammermusik und Orchesterwerke, darunter eine preisgekrönte Symphonie (H-Moll Sinfonie) , das Chorwerk Amor und Psyche Opus 3 (1888) , das erst am 4. November 2003, in der Philharmonie Berlin nach über 50 Jahren vom Philharmonischen Chor Berlin wieder aufgeführte Oratorium Ruth Opus 50 (1908) , Variationen und Gigue über ein Thema von Georg Friedrich Händel Opus 72 (Orchester-Variation 1925) , eine Humoreske in Variationsform, Gestern Abend war Vetter Michel da Opus 74 (Orchester-Humoreske 1925) sowie die meisten Bearbeitungen für das so genannte « Kaiserliederbuch » , herausgegeben auf Veranlassung Seiner Majestät des Deutschen Kaisers Wilhelm II. , eine äußerst umfangreiche Sammlung von über 600 Volksliedern in älteren und neueren Sätzen, im Volksmund « Des Kaisers Liederbuch » , oder kurz « Kaiserliederbuch » genannt.

Georg Schumann erhielt zahlreiche Ämter, Auszeichnungen und Ehrungen. Neben den bereits erwähnten wurde er 1901 zum Königlichen Professor an der Friedrich-Wilhelms-Universität Berlin ernannt, 1909 zum Meister der Zelterschen Liedertafel und 1916 zum Ehrendoktor der Philosophischen Fakultät der Friedrich-Wilhelms-Universität Berlin. Er erhielt den Beethoven-Preis 1933, die Goethe-Medaille für Kunst und Wissenschaft 1934 und den Titel des Ehrendirektors der Sing-Akademie zu Berlin 1950.

Für seine Lebensleistung wurde Georg Schumann aus der Hand von Bundespräsident Doktor Theodor Heuß als erster Deutscher 1951 mit dem « Großen Verdienstkreuz » der Bundesrepublik Deutschland geehrt.

Sein Wohnhaus im Berliner Villenviertel Lichterfelde-West wird von der Georg Schumann Gesellschaft als Museum und Veranstaltungshaus geführt (Georg Schumann Haus) . Seine Grabstätte auf dem Parkfriedhof Berlin-Lichterfelde ist Ehrengrab des Landes Berlin.

Nach Tätigkeiten als Dirigent und Chorleiter in Danzig und Bremen wurde er 1900 zum Direktor (1950 Ehrendirektor) der Sing-Akademie zu Berlin berufen. 1907 wurde er Mitglied, 1918 Vizepräsident und 1934 amtierender Präsident der Preußischen Akademie der Künste, deren Meisterschule für Komposition er als Nachfolger von Max Bruch von 1913 bis 1945 leitete.

Von diesen Positionen aus hat Georg Schumann das Deutsche und insbesondere das Berliner Musikleben entscheidend mit beeinflusst :

Gemeinsam mit Richard Strauß und anderen gründete er die Genossenschaft deutscher Tonsetzer (die heutige GEMA) , deren Ehrenmitglied er ist. Er war Mitbegründer des Verbandes Deutscher Konzertchöre, setzte sich im « Hilfsbund für deutsche Musikpflege » für notleidende Künstler ein und holte und andere Musiker wie Arnold Schœnberg an die Akademie der Künste.

Bachhaus EisenachGegen den Trend der Zeit rang Georg Schumann zeitlebens um eine authentische Wiedergabe der Bachschen Werke. Ohne ihn gäbe es wohl das Geburtshaus Johann Sebastian Bachs in Eisenach nicht mehr. Er war es auch, der sich durch eine persönliche Bürgschaft für den Erwerb und Erhalt des Bachhauses einsetzte und das Bach-Museum durch Benefizkonzerte und eine rege Sammeltätigkeit förderte. Georg Schumann editierte Werke von Johann Sebastian Bach und seinem Sohn Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach.

52 Jahre Direktor der Sing-Akademie

Seit 1900 leitete Georg Schumann die Sing-Akademie zu Berlin. Diese Tätigkeit wurde zu seiner Lebensaufgabe. Ohne die traditionelle Bachpflege zu vernachlässigen, führte er den Chor in dem halben Jahrhundert seines Direktorats an die Moderne heran. Werke von Edward Elgar, César Franck, Giuseppe Verdi, Franz Liszt, Anton Bruckner und Max Reger sowie zahlreiche zeitgenössische Kompositionen wurden von der Sing-Akademie unter seiner Leitung, oft als Uraufführungen, zu Gehör gebracht. Mit dem auf 600 Mitglieder angewachsenen Chor begann Georg Schumann mit Reisen nach Italien, Osteuropa und Skandinavien über Berlin hinaus zu wirken. Neben dem Berliner Philharmonischen Orchester, mit dem der Chor regelmäßig musizierte, wurde die Sing-Akademie zu Berlin zum wichtigsten musikalischen Botschafter der Stadt im Ausland.

Georg Schumann litt wie viele seiner Kollegen unter den politischen Zuständen des III. Reiches, aber trotz zahlreicher Angebote aus dem Ausland hat er « seine Lebensaufgabe » (die Sing-Akademie zu Berlin) nicht im Stich gelassen. Seiner Voraussicht ist es zu verdanken, daß das für die Musikwelt unersetzbare Notenarchiv der Sing-Akademie (1999 in Kiew in der Ukraine aufgefunden und 2001 wieder in den Besitz der Sing-Akademie nach Berlin gebracht) rechtzeitig ausgelagert wurde, bevor Brandbomben das Haus am Festungsgraben zerstörten.

Bachhaus Eisenach Ebenso gelang es Georg Schumann, die Sing-Akademie zu Berlin dem Zugriff des Propaganda-Ministeriums zu entziehen, indem er sie unter Wahrung ihrer rechtlichen Selbständigkeit der Preußischen Akademie der Künste anschloß. Dies verhinderte ein Verbot nach Kriegsende und sicherte ihr unter alliierter Besatzung das Überleben. Zusammen mit Sergiu Celibidache, dem damaligen Leiter des Berliner Philharmonischen Orchesters, und Hans Chemin-Petit, Komponist und Leiter des Philharmonischen Chores, begann er, trotz seines hohen Alters bereits 1945 das Berliner Musikleben wieder zu beleben.

Für seine Lebensleistung erhielt er 1951 aus der Hand von Bundespräsident Doktor Theodor Heuß als erster Deutscher das Große Verdienstkreuz der Bundesrepublik Deutschland.

Georg Alfred Schumann (geboren 25. Oktober 1866 in Königstein/Sachsen ; gestorben 23. Mai 1952 in Berlin Lichterfelde-West) kam als zweites von zwölf Kindern des Stadtmusikdirektors Clemens Schumann zur Welt. Der Vater war sein erster Musiklehrer, und mit ihm trat er eines Tages in Stücken für zwei Violinen und Orchester auf, auch in den beliebten « Waldkonzerten » der Stadtkapelle auf der Festung Königstein. Der Großvater mütterlicherseits, Kantor Friedrich Wilhelm Müller, unterrichtete ihn im Orgelspiel. Nach dessen Tod übernahm der zwölfjährige (!) sogar vorübergehend den kirchenmusikalischen Dienst. Das sogenannte « Schumann-Haus » in Königstein wurde ab 1868 zu seiner Kindheitsstätte und zum Geburtshaus der später ebenfalls berühmten Brüder, dem Organisten und Komponisten Camillo Schumann (1872-1946) und der beiden Geiger Konzertmeister Alfred Schumann (1868-1891) und Kammermusiker der Staatskapelle Dresden Clemens Schumann junior (1876-1938) .

Während Georg dann in Dresden nacheinander von dem sächsischen « Orgelkönig » Carl August Fischer und dem einstigen Julius-Otto-Schüler Friedrich Baumfelder weiter ausgebildet wurde, trat er schon als Solist mit Hummels Klavierkonzert in A-Moll auf und erweckte durch eine selbst komponierte Klaviersonate die Aufmerksamkeit des Komponisten und Dozenten Carl Reinecke. Der vermittelte ihm eine Freistelle am Leipziger Konservatorium, wo er von 1882-1888 vor allem bei ihm studierte. In dieser Zeit trat er als Pianist und Komponist erfolgreich in Erscheinung. Begegnungen mit Franz Liszt, Anton Rubinstein, Johannes Brahms, Arthur Nikisch, Gustav Mahler, Joseph Joachim und Max Bruch befruchteten nach und nach Schumanns künstlerische Entwicklung.

Seine im Rahmen eines Kompositionswettbewerbs des Berliner Konzerthauses preisgekrönte « H-Moll Sinfonie », die unter 57 eingereichten Werken ausgewählt worden war sowie das Chorwerk « Amor und Psyche » Opus 3, 1888, machten ihn schlagartig als formgewandten Komponisten in Deutschland bekannt. Über die schon beachtlichen Stationen des Dirigenten des Danziger Konzertvereines (gerade einmal 24jährig) und 1896 des Philharmonischen Chores und Orchesters in Bremen, gelangte Georg Schumann schließlich 1900 als Nachfolger Martin Blumners zu dem Amt, in dem er wie kein anderer ein halbes Jahrhundert prägendes leisten sollte - seine Berufung im Jahre 1900 zum Direktor (1950 Ehrendirektor) der Sing-Akademie zu Berlin.

1907 wurde er Mitglied, 1918 Vizepräsident und 1934 Präsident der Preußischen Akademie der Künste, deren Meisterschule für Komposition er als Nachfolger von Max Bruch von 1913 bis 1945 leitete. 20 février 1913 : Le chef Werner Wolff dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Werner Wolff est le fils du fondateur du Philharmonique, Hermann Wolff. Enfant, le jeune Werner a eu le privilège de rencontrer à la maison les plus grands musiciens de son temps : Johannes Brahms, Camille Saint-Saëns, Anton Bruckner, Anton Rubinstein et Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky.

Werner Wolff est l'auteur d'une biographie sur le Maître de Saint-Florian : « Anton Bruckner, rustic genius », éditée pour la 1re fois en 1942 par E. P. Dutton & Co. , Inc. , New York (298 pages) .

Werner Wolff

The German-born conductor and musicologist Werner Wolff was born on 7 October 1883 in Berlin and died on 25 November 1961 in Rüslikon, Switzerland. He was conductor of the Hamburg Opera and founded the Chattanooga Opera Association in Chattanooga, State of Tennessee, USA.

He was the son of Hermann and Louse Wolff. His father was a founder of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and a secretary to conductor and composer Hans von Bülow. Werner Wolff's mother discouraged her son's early interest in music as a profession, so he took a law degree at Baden, but continued to compose music as an avocation. Encouraged in his interest by prominent musicians in Berlin, he studied at the Leipzig Conservatory during the years before World War I.

Following his musical training, Wolff took positions with Opera companies in Danzig, Düsseldorf, and Prague before becoming a conductor for the Hamburg Opera, in 1917. He continued with the Hamburg Opera until 1932, developing a reputation as one of the leading conductors in Germany.

Wolff and his wife, Operatic soprano Emmy Land, emigrated to the United States in 1938, fleeing Nazism. They resided in New York until Wolff was employed as head of the music department at Tennessee Wesleyan College in Athens, Tennessee, and Land became voice and music teacher at the same school. In the early 1940's, they were hired by the University of Chattanooga and the Cadec Conservatory of Chattanooga, Tennessee as teachers. In 1942, Doctor Wolff wrote a book entitled : « Anton Bruckner, rustic genius » .

Interested citizens learned of the Wolffs' Operatic expertise from their great success in Europe (mainly in Hamburg and Vienna) and asked them to organize a Chattanooga Opera Association which they did in 1943. Madame Emmy Land Wolff died in 1955 and Doctor Wolff retired from Opera 4 years later and returned to Rüslikon, Switzerland, where he died in 1961. Many feel that this couple created a sensation with their Opera productions in Chattanooga. The Opera company they founded (now part of the Chattanooga Symphony and Opera) is still active.

Werner and Emmy Land Wolff played significant roles in the creation of the Chattanooga Opera and enhancing the popularity of Opera in Chattanooga. Werner Wolff was born in Berlin on October 7, 1883. His father, Hermann Wolff, founded the Berlin Philharmonic, and Werner grew-up in the company of famous musicians and conductors. As a young man, Werner expressed an interest in making a career of music. His mother, Louse, however, dissuaded him from taking-up such an uncertain career and encouraged him to enter the legal profession. At the turn of the 19th Century, he entered school at Baden and took a degree in law. His heart remained set on music, though, and he continued to compose. By the early 1910's, his talent came to the attention of several prominent Berlin musicians, whose praise ended parental opposition to Werner's musical aspirations.

In the years before World War I, he studied at the Leipzig Conservatory. A series of positions with Operas in Danzig, Düsseldorf, and Prague followed. In 1917, he became conductor of the Hamburg Opera, where he remained until 1932. During his tenure, he established himself as one of Germany's leading conductors. At Hamburg, he met and married Emmy Land, the Opera's leading soprano, known for her performances at the Vienna « Volksoper », the Hamburg Opera, and the Berlin State Theater.

The couple fled Nazi-controlled Europe in 1938. They 1st settled in New York City and lived there until Tennessee Wesleyan College in Athens named Doctor Wolff head of the Music Department and hired Mrs. Land Wolff as music teacher. During their short tenure at Tennessee Wesleyan, they frequently drove to Chattanooga to participate in the city's lively community of music-lovers. In 1940, the University of Chattanooga and Cadek Conservatory hired the couple to teach Opera. They immediately set-out to make changes in the repertoire since they assessed the Cadek's typical recital pieces as dull and out of touch.

As a remedy, the Wolffs introduced Operatic performances into the recitals. After one of these wildly popular events, Chattanooga music enthusiast, Stella Ball Wietzel, determined that the city needed a full-time Opera company. She approached several prominent businessmen, who immediately agreed to support the project. Less than 1 month later, on August 24, 1943, the newly-formed Chattanooga Opera Association entrusted Wolff with conductorship of the fledgling organization. The speed with which the Opera company developed amazed the Wolffs, who told the « Chattanooga Times » that, in Europe, the same developments would have taken at least 6 months, if not a year.

The Wolffs dedicated themselves to producing high-quality performances and tapped into a pool of enthusiastic local amateur singers. During the Opera's 1st year, the Wolffs produced 4 performances (all held at the Central High-School auditorium) : « Carmen », « Hänsel und Gretel », and sections from « Der fliegende Holländer » and « Cavalleria Rusticana ». Though amateur productions, Doctor Wolff viewed his and his wife's work as building a foundation for a professional Opera company. In doing so, the Wolffs created the 1st Opera company in Tennessee and helped other mid-size cities see that Opera could flourish outside of major metropolitan areas.

The couple continued working with the Chattanooga Opera through the mid-1950's. Emmy died of a heart attack on November 11, 1955. Earlier in the day, she had been overseeing practice sessions for the upcoming performance. Werner retired from the Chattanooga Opera, in 1959, and moved to Rüsclikon, Switzerland. He continued writing music reviews for the « Chattanooga Times » from Europe, until he died on November 25, 1961.

The « Chattanooga Times » reported, on 20 October 1943, that 1,400 music-lovers gathered at Central High-School to hear the Chattanooga Opera Association's presentation of « Carmen » . Hard work by Doctor Werner Wolff, the former conductor of the Hamburg Opera, and his wife, Emmy Land Wolff, a leading soprano from Hamburg, brought Opera to a reality.

Werner Wolff was born in 1888, the son of a famous concert manager, Herman Wolff, who was one of the foremost names in music in Europe and founder of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. In his parents' home, young Werner met many of the great musicians of the time : Johannes Brahms, Camille Saint-Saens, Anton Bruckner, Anton Rubinstein and Piotr Ilitch Tchaïkovsky. After a brief detour with a law degree, Werner became an acclaimed European conductor, serving as the director of the Hamburg Opera for 17 years.

Emmy Land Wolff got her musical start in Vienna, and was soon called to be a dramatic soprano in the State Opera House in Hamburg. She subsequently performed in numerous concerts and grand Operas throughout Europe.

During the 1930's, the Wolffs saw that they could not conform to the Nazi idea of music reflecting only « the inborn German philosophy » . With their daughter, $ 60 and assistance from fellow musicians, they left Hamburg in 1938 to come to the United States. Arriving in New York, they were advised by friend and fellow expatriate Walter Damrosch to leave New York for a part of the country not so crowded with European musicians escaping the Nazis. The Wolffs found their way to Tennessee Wesleyan College, in Athens. Wolff remarked :

« We were given a gracious and friendly welcome by most of the people of Athens, although a few looked upon us as German spies. But the world was at the threshold of War, and we understood. I read the works of Mark Twain as a boy, and I think I understand American psychology. »

News of such prominent musicians relocating to Tennessee began to filter to the larger community of Chattanooga. In 1942, the Wolffs came to Cadek Conservatory. Their willingness to devote their talent and experience to amateur Opera productions, sometimes with just a few singers and a piano, made Chattanooga unique among cities of comparable size.

The 1st Opera under the Wolffs' leadership was « Il Trovatore » , performed on a tiny stage at the University of Chattanooga, with stage direction by Dorothy Hackett Ward. Local singers Milton Allen, who later served as music supervisor for Hamilton County Schools for many years, James Sasse and Carol Jones appeared in the 1st production. Jay Craven, clarinetist, remembers being instructed by Doctor Wolff :

« Don't play notes, play music. »

Tom Wolfe, a long-time Opera supporter, pointed-out that Doctor Wolff was particularly adept at identifying promising young singers. One was a young Beverly Sills, who came to town in 1955 to sing Dona Elvira in Mozart's « Don Giovanni » . On her 1980's farewell tour, she sang at the Tivoli and expressed her thanks to Chattanooga for helping to launch her brilliant career.

Madame Wolff died in 1955 and was buried in Forest-Hills Cemetery. Wolff continued conducting until 1959. After 17 seasons, his parting wish was :

« May Opera survive and thrive. »

The « Times » commented that Opera had grown from mere piano accompaniment to full-stage presentation, Symphony Orchestra and guest stars from the Metropolitan and New York City Opera companies during his time. Once retired, Wolff returned to Europe and died in Switzerland in 1961. A « Times » editorial commented :

« He left an area enriched as a result of his directorship for many years of the Chattanooga Opera, to which he and his late wife brought their long experience, acquaintanceship for decades with internationally famed artists, and their own keen and infectious sensitivity and talent. Wolff will be buried far from his beloved Emmy Land Wolff. But the very distance separating them will serve to emphasize the limitless breadth, significance and satisfaction of the art they so nobly served. »

In 1985, the Chattanooga Opera Association merged with the Chattanooga Symphony to create the nation's 1st joint Symphony and Opera company. Recent productions have included : « Amahl and the Night Visitors » , « The Pirates of Penzance » , « The Tabasco Opera » (1894) , and concerts of Opera arias and choruses.

23 février 1913 : The « Gurrelieder » is finally premiered, in the « Große-Saal » of the « Musikverein » , under the direction of Franz Schreker. It is Arnold Schönberg's 1st big triumph in his native city ; the by-now-very-old-fashioned piece is a resounding, even overwhelming, success, the greatest of his long career. Schönberg, bitter over the scandals from the audiences and hostility of the critics at the previous concerts of his more progressive works, refuses to acknowledge the audience's tremendous 15 minute ovation, turning his back to them, bowing only to the performers, and exiting.

Shortly after this, Schönberg makes his 1st tentative contact with Josef Matthias Hauer, who will later also claim priority as inventor of a 12 tone method.

La question de la paternité de la dodécaphonie en tant que composition avec 12 sons a longtemps été le sujet d'âpres disputes. Un contemporain et compatriote viennois de Arnold Schönberg, le compositeur Josef Matthias Hauer (1883-1959), avait en effet développé, à la même époque que lui, un système dont le rigorisme et le concept de base semblait en tous points similaire. Schönberg et Hauer se connaissaient, se fréquentaient et, au début, s'estimaient assez pour tenter de concilier leurs 2 méthodes qui se distinguaient tout de même par certains aspects ; le système de Schönberg est plus flexible que celui de Hauer, qui, lui, ne permet la répétition de la série de base que dans le sens où celle-ci est écrite, et non pas également à l'envers (en crabe : « Krebs »), transposée d'un ton, etc. Mais peu à peu, l'intransigeance méthodologique de Hauer, combinée au manque de reconnaissance qu'il expérimentait par rapport à son rival et aux élèves de celui-ci, le rendit assez amer pour que les 2 hommes se séparassent. Hauer a longtemps revendiqué pour lui-même le rôle du garant d'un dodécaphonisme (Hauer n'utilisant pas de séries au sens strict) réellement orthodoxe. Alors que Schönberg n'avait jamais cessé de se tourner, dans l'image qu'il se faisait du rôle du compositeur, vers un passé qu'il idéalisait, Hauer annonce dans son radicalisme novateur certaines écoles « anti-Schönbergiennes » des années 1970, notamment le minimalisme.

Quant au terme « dodécaphonisme », il a été utilisé pour la 1re fois par René Leibowitz.

10 mars 1913 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert »).

Le « Skandalkonzert » dirigé par Schönberg

When the « Konzerthaus » opened as the home of the « Konzertverein » Orchestra, establishing another essentially « conservative » institution, Viennese music and concert life was, again, shaken to its core, as it had been in 1870 with the performance of Richard Wagner's « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » at the Imperial Opera House.

31 mars 1913 : The « Akademischer Verband für Literatur und Musik » gave a concert in that bastion of tradition, the « Goldener Saal », with a program played by the « Konzertverein » Orchestra conducted by Arnold Schönberg. It consisted of Anton von Webern's « 6 Pieces for Orchestra », Opus 6 ; Alexander von Zemlinsky's « Mæterlinck » Songs (Nos. 1, 2, 3, 5), in their orchestrated version ; Schönberg's « Chamber Symphony », Opus 9 ; the 2nd and 3rd of Alban Berg's « Altenberg » Songs ; Gustav Mahler's « Kindertotenlieder » ; and it was to conclude with Wagner's Prelude to « Tristan und Isolde ». In response to the Webern and Schönberg works, the audience was mildly rowdy, but, after the Berg songs, all order broke down, and the Mahler could not be performed. As Richard Neutra, a noted architect, recorded in his diary :

« Tonight, I was at the concert Schönberg conducted. From the start, the people, that is some people, began to boo, laugh, and shout. There was ceaseless talking, yelling, and tramping around. The rabble simply sensed that there was someone ready for easy slaughter, someone who was fair game. It was all quite natural, but revolting beyond measure to witness. People who relate to art, as little as I, to card games continually made jokes which were considered brilliant by their respective lady companions. At times, I was almost beside myself. After the Schönberg Symphony (which, despite everything, gave me an impression of power and of being a true work of art) a hellish noise brake-out ; on the 2nd balcony, a few persons were thrown-out after a rough scuffle. For inexplicable reasons, Berg's songs were interrupted by a resounding whinnying noise. Prior to that, Loos had become so incensed that he almost committed acts of violence. Schönberg shouted threats into the auditorium. The songs could barely be finished. Then, all restraints broke down. People challenged each other, were forcibly separated by others, roared, laughed, whistled. Across from me, Arthur Schnitzler quietly sat in the 2nd loge. Somebody called to the audience to deport itself in a civilized manner or leave. Somebody yelled back " Lausub " (Rascal) . The 1st jump down into the crowd and vigorously boxed the ears of the one whom he suspected having insulted him. Everybody in the hall followed these events with fascination. Then, more bellowing. A uniformed policeman shouted something. Everything seems comical to me now, but while I was there, my whole body shook with anger. The musicians left the hall - the mob had succeeded in breaking-up the concert. Down below, they were quarrelling about something. Oscar Straus acted as mediator. The public is like a cowardly beast, foreign and hostile to art, which retaliates by shouting down and inciting others against what seems fair-game because it is compelled to bow to whatever is generally accepted. »

This scandal was a mortal blow to the « Verband » , which lost members and eventually disbanded. Alban Berg was disturbed by some false reports in the press and futilely tried to have retractions published. Anton Webern escaped to an Adriatic spa. Schönberg returned to Berlin. And Zemlinsky went to Prague.

The March 1913 concert was not the 1st time music by Schönberg and his students had been disturbed in public performances, and it certainly would not be the last. But as Schönberg himself believed, he was destined to follow in the tradition and, at the same time, break from it. He would not give-up on his goal of allowing new music to be heard in an environment that would foster its understanding. To this end, in 1918, Schönberg conducted 10 open rehearsals for his « Chamber Symphony » , Opus 9, the goal being to allow the audience to become intimately familiar with one piece by Schönberg through the processes of rehearsing. The publicity release underscored this desire :

« Arnold Schönberg, at the request of Hugo Heller Concert Management, has agreed to perform his " Chamber Symphony " , introduced in Vienna several years ago by the Rosé Quartet and the Wind Ensemble of the Court Opera, in a manner new to current concert format. Rather than giving a single performance, Arnold Schönberg plans to hold a series of 10 open-rehearsals. In the final rehearsal, the work will be played in its entirety, at least once without interruption.

In this way, the listener is offered the opportunity to hear the work often enough to grasp it in detail as well as in its entirety. It will be of interest to the audience, and especially to musicians, to be able to follow the performance preparation of such a difficult work from the very beginning. »

Contrary to this notice, at the last « rehearsal » of Opus 9 was played twice, between which architect and critic Adolf Loos read his Essay, « Beethoven's Disease of the Ear ». The series was a success for both musicians and non-musicians.

31 mars 1913 : The famous Vienna concert, nicknamed « Skandalkonzert » (or « Watschenkonzert ») , sponsored by the « Wiener Konzertverein » (Vienna Concert Society) , is conducted in the « Große-Saal » of the « Musikverein » by Arnold Schönberg. The audience takes his revenge because Schönberg refused to acknowledge the audience's tremendous 15 minute ovation at the premiere of the « Gurrelieder » , on February 23rd.

The programm is composed of the following pieces :

Premiere of Anton Webern's « 6 Orchesterstücke » (6 Pieces for Orchestra) , Opus 6.

Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 5 of the orchestral version of Alexander von Zemlinsky's « Mæterlinck » Songs (eventually published as Opus 13) with soloist Margarete Bum.

Arnold Schönberg's « Kammer-symphonie » (« Chamber Symphony ») in one movement, No. 1, Opus 9.

(The audience responds disruptively to the Webern and Schönberg pieces.)

Premiere of No. 2 and No. 3 from Alban Berg's « 5 Orchestral Songs on Picture-Postcard Texts by Peter Altenberg » , Opus 4, with soloist Alfred J. Boruttau. (Both the lyrical and musical side of this premiere were seen as provocative.)

It was during Alban Berg's Songs that the fighting began. The audience, shocked by the expressionism and experimentalism of the « Second Viennese School » called for both poet and composer to be committed, despite it being public knowledge that Peter Altenberg was already committed to the « Steinhof » asylum, at the time. Though not present at the concert, he was granted leave to attend the dress-rehearsal that morning and, 3 days later, he wrote a prose sketch depicting Alma Mahler there.

For Berg's « Altenberg Lieder » , the « Skandalkonzert » had lasting consequences : the songs were not performed again until 1952, and the full-score did not appear in print until 1966.

Consequently, the scheduled performance of Gustav Mahler's 1st « Kindertotenlieder » (« Nun will die Sonn' so hell aufgeh'n ») to be sang by the soloist Maria Freund, to conclude the concert, was cancelled with the arrival of the police.

Press reports from the period mention tumultuous riots : the followers of Schönberg, his student Berg, and opponents yelling at each other, throwing things, disturbing the performance, destroying furniture. A punch administered by concert organizer Erhard Buschbeck became the subject of a lawsuit, whereby Operetta composer Oscar Straus, heard as a witness, testified it had been the most harmonious sound of the entire evening !

The newspapers report on the event is not found in the « Arts » section but rather in the « Urban Crimes » section. It goes down in history as the « Skandalkonzert » , and is still today known as the worst riot in Viennese concert history.

The famous « fracas » at the premiere of Igor Stravinsky's « The Rite of Spring » took place in Paris, 2 months later, on 29 May 1913.

Le « Skandalkonzert » donné le 31 mars 1913 par le « Wiener Konzertverein » (aujourd'hui, le « Wiener Symphoniker ») sous la direction d'Arnold Schönberg a eu lieu dans la grande salle du « Musikverein » de Vienne.

Durant la représentation, le public, choqué par un programme expressionniste et expérimental typique de la « Seconde École de Vienne » , a commencé à protester provoquant un début de scandale artistique. Le concert s'est achevé prématurément. Un combat entre l'organisateur du concert Erhard Buschbeck et le compositeur d'Opérettes Oscar Straus a abouti à un procès.

Le programme comprenait :

La première des 6 pièces pour orchestre, Opus 6, d'Anton von Webern.

Les Quatre Lieder pour orchestre sur des poèmes de Maurice Maeterlinck d'Alexander von Zemlinsky, avec la soliste Margarete Bum.

La Symphonie de chambre (en un seul mouvement) n° 1, Opus 9, d'Arnold Schönberg.

Les « Altenberg Lieder » , Opus 4, d'Alban Berg, chantés par le soliste Alfred J. Boruttau. Le texte et l'écriture musicale de ces lieder ont été perçus comme une pure provocation.

Le 1er « Kindertotenlieder » (« Nun will die Sonn' so hell aufgehn ») de Gustav Mahler, que devait chanter la soliste Maria Freund pour clore la soirée, n'a pu être représenté à la suite de l'interruption du concert avec l'arrivée de la police.

Ces réactions violentes ont dissuadé Alban Berg de représenter à nouveau ses « Altenberg Lieder » . Ils ne l'ont été à nouveau qu'en 1952 et leur partition n'a été imprimée qu'en 1966.

Tout le monde connaît le « Musikverein » pour le mythique et prestigieux concert du Nouvel An mais, comme tout théâtre digne de ce nom, il abrite aussi des scandales. Le plus connu, provoqué par un concert de la « Seconde École de Vienne », est le « Skandalkonzert » du 31 mars 1913, surnommé aussi le « concert des gifles » (« Watschenkonzert »).

Ainsi, Arnold Schönberg se rend à Vienne pour diriger au « Musikverein » un concert de musique contemporaine avec au programme sa Ire Symphonie de chambre, des morceaux de ses élèves Anton Webern, Alban Berg et de Alexander von Zemlinsky et le 1er « Kindertotenlieder » de Gustav Mahler.

Mais l'Orchestre ne jouera jamais ce dernier morceau car la salle devint soudainement le théâtre d'une scène de bagarre qui ne prit fin qu'avec l'arrivée de la police. Le public était pourtant resté relativement silencieux pendant les 3 Iers morceaux, mais lors de l'un des « Altenberg Lieder » d'Alban Berg un éclat de rire foudroyant se répandit dans la salle, suivi par nombreux sifflets et agitation de trousseaux des clés. La guérilla pouvait commencer : Anton Webern se leva de son fauteuil et cria en direction du public de se taire, quant à Schönberg, il arrêta sa direction et annonça que tout fauteur de troubles sera évacué du Théâtre. Oscar Straus, compositeur de l'Opérette, « Un rêve de valse », remonta sur scène, provoqua Schönberg en duel et lui donna un gifle !

« Malheureusement, les concerts à Vienne ne sont pas au service de l'art ; ils sont purement politiques. La réception du public à une œuvre est déjà prévue d'avance ; les gens viennent au concert avec des idées bien arrêtées. Selon moi, cela nuit au succès de mes “ Gurrelieder ”. »

Telle est la déclaration de Schönberg faite le lendemain à l'hebdomadaire allemand, « Die Zeit ». S'il avait en reçu une belle gifle lors du concert du 31 mars, il avait néanmoins été acclamé à peine 1 mois auparavant, toujours au « Musikverein », pendant l'exécution de ses « Gurrelieder ». C'était le 23 février, les détracteurs de Schönberg, prêts à faire sonner leurs trousseaux de clés, se transformèrent en nouveaux adeptes, certains en étant même arrivés jusqu'aux larmes : Schönberg devint le héros du moment. Mais, appelé sur scène à la fin du concert, il tourne le dos au public et ne recueillit pas ses applaudissements pour faire, au contraire, la révérence à l'Orchestre.

Toutefois, ce n'est pas cette impolitesse qui provoqua la rixe au théâtre, 1 mois plus tard. Le 31 mars, ce sont les lieder de Berg à bouleverser le public. Le directeur Hermann Scherchen, présent au concert, témoigne :

Les lieder de Berg avaient, en effet, fait scandale car ils étaient inspirés par Peter Altenberg, pilastre autrichien à l'écriture impressionniste, interné à cette époque au « Steinhof », l'hôpital psychiatrique où le public incontrôlable souhaitait précisément envoyer Schönberg et ses partisans. C'était, selon les détracteurs du concert, une musique démentielle écrite sur le texte d'un dément. Et le pauvre Altenberg, présent aux répétitions sous la surveillance d'un infirmier déclara à Berg sur ses lied :

« C'était comme si quelqu'un raclait sans arrêt des assiettes avec des couteaux ! »

Le scandale finit avec un procès au tribunal qui fit la « une » des journaux. Tout Vienne en parlait, y compris Richard Strauß. Si Schönberg s'en sortit avec une gifle, le « Skandalkonzert » eut des conséquences plus graves pour les « Altenberg Lieder » de Berg qui ne furent ré-exécutés qu'en 1958, et publiés seulement en 1966. Il faut néanmoins se souvenir que 1913 fut une année riche en scandales : peu après, le 29 mai 1913, ce fut le tour de Igor Stravinsky qui, avec son « Sacre du Printemps », provoqua l'indignation à la salle du nouveau Théâtre des Champs-Élysées, inaugurée 1 mois avant.

Das Skandalkonzert von 1913 (auch Watschenkonzert) war ein musikgeschichtlich einzigartiges Ereignis, das am 31. März 1913 im Musikvereinsaal in Wien stattfand.

Es spielte das Orchester des Wiener Konzertvereins, der Vorläufer der Wiener Symphoniker, unter der Leitung von Arnold Schönberg. Das Publikum war entsetzt über die neuartige Musik der zeitgenössischen Komponisten, die größtenteils dem Expressionismus und der zweiten Wiener Schule angehörten. Während des Konzerts kam es zu einem Tumult, sodaß es vorzeitig abgebrochen wurde, als die Anhänger Schönbergs diesen gegen seine Gegner verteidigen mußten.

Im Laufe dieser Ausschreitungen soll der Schriftsteller Erhard Buschbeck, damals leitendes Mitglied des « Akademischen Verbandes für Literatur und Musik », der dieses Konzert veranstaltet hatte, einen die Aufführung störenden Konzertbesucher geohrfeigt haben. Im darauffolgenden gerichtlichen Nachspiel stellte der Operettenkomponist Oscar Straus, der mit Arnold Schönberg seit ihrer gemeinsamen Zeit bei Ernst von Wolzogens Überbrettel verfeindet war, fest : das Klatschen der Ohrfeigen « war noch das Melodiöseste, das man an diesem Abend zu hören bekam » .

Programm

Aufgeführt wurden :

Anton von Webern : Sechs Stücke für Orchester, Opus 6.

Dieses Werk erlebte bei diesem Konzert seine Uraufführung, auf dem Programmzettel wurde es als Opus 4 bezeichnet.

Alexander von Zemlinsky : Vier Orchesterlieder nach Gedichten von Mæterlinck, Solistin : Margarete Bum (Uraufführung) .

Arnold Schönberg : Kammer-symphonie, Opus 9, in einem Satz.

Die Kammersymphonie wurde bereits 1907 uraufgeführt, für die Aufführung von 1913 erstellte Schönberg eine Fassung für Orchester mit erweiterten Streichern und Bläsern. Diese Fassung ist nicht mit der Fassung Opus 9b identisch, letztere entstand 1935 und wurde in diesem Jahr uraufgeführt.

Alban Berg : Zwei Orchesterlieder nach Ansichtskartentexten von Peter Altenberg (aus einem Zyklus) , Opus 4, Solist : Alfred J. Boruttau (Uraufführung) .

Der Zyklus der Altenberg-Lieder besteht aus fünf Liedern ; am 31. März 1913 waren nur zwei Lieder zur Aufführung vorgesehen (nämlich die Nummern 2 und 3) . Diese Uraufführung war in musikalischer Hinsicht so provokant, daß das Konzert nach dem zweiten Lied infolge von Tumulten abgebrochen werden mußte.

Zu der geplanten Aufführung von Gustav Mahlers Kindertotenliedern mit Maria Freund als Solistin kam es nicht mehr.

Die Uraufführung von Schönbergs Gurre-Liedern am 23. Februar 1913, die ebenfalls im Großen Musikvereinsaal unter der Leitung von Franz Schreker stattfand, wurde ein überwältigender Erfolg. Doch der Komponist, gekränkt durch die frühere konservative Haltung des Wiener Publikums, weigerte sich den Applaus entgegenzunehmen. Dafür rächte sich das Publikum einige Wochen später im « Skandalkonzert » , anlässlich der nächsten Aufführung zeitgenössischer Werke im Musikvereinsaal am 31. März 1913.

Presseberichte jener Zeit sprechen von tumultartigen Ausschreitungen : die Anhänger Schönbergs, seine Schüler und Gegner hätten sich gegenseitig angeschrien, beworfen, die Aufführung gestört, das Mobiliar zerstört etc. Mehrmals hätten empörte Konservative aus dem Publikum fluchend die Bühne erklommen, um Arnold Schönberg zu ohrfeigen. Als dieser drohte, man werde mit Hilfe der öffentlichen Gewalt Ordnung schaffen, soll der Tumult erst richtig losgegangen sein.

Avril - mai 1913 : The 28 year old Alban Berg, who for 12 years has written only songs and chamber music, writes 4 pieces for clarinet and piano, in the same type of miniaturist aphoristic style, then, being used by Arnold Schönberg and, especially, Anton Webern. He also tells Schönberg about his plans to compose a Symphony after his planned trip to Berlin, in June.

Mai 1913 : Alban Berg is reading « Vom Tode » , a new German translation of Maurice Mæterlinck's « la Mort » (Death) , probably in hopes of finding an inspiration for an Opera.

Vers la fin-mai 1913 : The Schönbergs move to number 17a on « Berlinerstraße » , in Berlin-Südende, the 2nd floor of a house partly owned by Albertine Zehme.

29 mai 1913 : In Paris, at the « Théâtre des Champs-Élysées » , under the direction of Pierre Monteux, Igor Stravinsky premieres his ballet, « le Sacre du Printemps » (The Rite of Spring) . As with the Schönberg concerts in Vienna, a few months earlier, the sharply divided opinions of the audience lead to a riot, probably the most famous in the history of Classical music. The work is now recognized as a milestone in the history of European music, not only for its almost constant dissonance, but particularly for the constantly changing time-signatures of the last section (for a work which presaged this, refer to the 2nd movement of Mahler's 10th Symphony) .

Juin 1913 : Alban Berg visits Arnold Schœnberg at his new house in Berlin, and experiences a rehearsal and performance of Schœnberg's « Pierrot lunaire » prepared especially for him, and it makes an indelible impression. But on the last day of the visit, upon showing his tiny clarinet pieces to Schœnberg, Berg is harshly criticized - most likely because Schœnberg perceives that Berg is going against his nature by writing such small fare. Schœnberg knows that Berg has a flair for drama, and encourages him to write an Opera, and also to compose a suite of dances for his big orchestral piece, instead of the Symphony which Berg was planning. The harshness of Schœnberg's criticism leaves a deep scar on Berg's psyche. The orchestral piece which will result (« Drei Orchesterstücke » : 3 Pieces for orchestra, eventually to become his Opus 6) is obviously a reaction to Schœnberg's rough words.

18 juin 1913 : Upon going to Trahütten for the summer, steeped in his admiration of Gustav Mahler's 9th Symphony (especially its 1st movement) and taking Arnold Schœnberg's censure seriously to heart, Berg tries to begin composing the recommended « suite » with a « Präludium » for very large Orchestra, but finds that his compositional tendency keeps leaning towards designing a Mahlerian Symphony with a vocal solo in the last movement from Honoré de Balzac's novel, « Seraphita » , to satisfy his need to write « something big » .

By this time, Richard Strauß has decided to retreat from the expressionism and modernity which was displayed in his Opera, « Elektra » , and has regressed to a more old-fashioned idiom, 1st evidenced by his latest Opera, « Der Rosenkavalier » . Strauß goes along with the other jurors (Ferruccio Busoni and Bruno Walter) in awarding Schœnberg the « Mahler Foundation » grant, for the 2nd year in a row, but he confides to Alma that :

« Schœnberg would do better to shovel snow (the lowest-paying and most menial job in Berlin) than to scribble on music-paper, but give it to him anyway ... who knows what posterity will think ? »

Schœnberg finds-out about these comments and writes a nasty letter about Strauß. Their previously warm friendship is over.

À partir de l'été 1913 : Erich Wolfgang Korngold is composing his 1st Opera, « Der Ring des Polykrates » , Opus 7.

Juin - juillet 1913 : Anton Webern finishes his 6 Bagatelles, Opus 9, with the composition of the 1st and the 6th.

Été - automne 1913 : Having worked on his music-drama « Die glückliche Hand » , on and off for 5 years, Arnold Schœnberg gets down to serious work on it, while vacationing in Göhren on the island of Rügen.

Août 1913 : The 16 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold completes his Sonata in G major for violin and piano, Opus 6.

Septembre 1913 : Erich Wolfgang Korngold finishes the orchestration of his Sinfonietta in B major for large orchestra,

Opus 5, a work whose title fails to convey its true size and scope : it is in every respect a large Late-Romantic Symphony, sounding like the work of a man far older than a teenager. The theme of the Scherzo's Trio is very much like the music Korngold will later write for the movies in Hollywood, and which will set the tone of film-scores for decades.

Korngold began sketching the work in the Spring of 1912 (about a year after his childhood mentor, Gustav Mahler, died) , just before his 15th birthday and finished the sketches in August 1912. The orchestration of it dragged on for another year, until September 1913, by which time Korngold had composed his Violin Sonata, Opus 6.

Septembre - début octobre 1913 : Arnold Schönberg interrupts work on his music-drama « Die glückliche Hand » , to compose the complex orchestral song « Seraphita » , on Stephan George's German translation of a poem by Ernest Dowson - the title is the only thing this has in common with his stalled theater-piece project of the same name. (In 1916, Schönberg will join it with 3 other songs, to comprise 4 Songs for voice and orchestra, Opus 22.)

La musique de Bruckner sur rouleaux de piano

Automne 1913 :

Bruckner on Piano Rolls

(The following information was supplied by Rex Lawson of the Pianola Institute in London.)

Anton Bruckner's music also found its way on to piano-rolls. The firm of Hupfeld, located in Leipzig, Germany, certainly published the whole of the 4th Symphony on roll, as early as the autumn of 1913. Since the automatic reproducing piano was so prevalent in the United States, many Americans tend to think that all piano-rolls are recordings, in the sense that they represent some particular performance. That is not the case, however, and the Hupfeld, rolls, like the majority of piano-rolls, were simply transcriptions from the sheet music.

The Hupfeld catalogue supplement was published in the autumn of 1913. It came between the general catalogue, published in September, and the Christmas supplement, for that same year. They fitted the work on to 6 rolls, splitting the 1st and last movements into 2 each.

This particular entry deals with their series of 73-note rolls, one of their proprietary standards, but they also issued Bruckner on their full-scale, 88-note series. John F. Berky saw some rolls, many years ago in Buffalo.

Le procédé Hupfield DEA

The Hupfield DEA Reproducing Piano

Introduction

Whereas the « Welte-Mignon » was developed by a firm that specialized in « Orchestrons » and pipe organs, Ludwig Hupfeld's company was already a manufacturer of piano-players and player-pianos, well before it launched the DEA reproducing piano, which it seems at the outset to have spelled in capital letters. It must have come as something of a nasty surprise to Hupfeld that « Welte and Sons » , from a provincial town like Freiburg, had by late-1904 stolen a march on the whole German musical establishment, especially since Hupfeld was based in Leipzig ; one of the main commercial centres of early 20th Century Germany.

Hupfeld had introduced its « Phonola » , a foot-pedalled piano-player with a range of 72 notes, in the autumn of 1902, at the Leipzig Michaelmas Fair, and this innovative instrument included separate bass and treble sections, split between F and F# above middle C. The division of the mechanism, in this way, allowed melodic lines to be highlighted much more effectively than on any existing instruments, and it is remarkable that Hupfeld failed to patent the idea which, subsequently, became the accepted standard for the whole industry, though with the division transposed down by a semi-tone.

The « Phonola » was essentially the invention of Robert Frömsdorf, a brilliant and self-taught pneumatic engineer, who was manager of the main Hupfeld factory, in Leipzig, no doubt with a dedicated work-force under his command. Although the DEA was also developed under Frömsdorf's direction, and he can be seen operating the roll-marking machine in 1 or 2 of Hupfeld's recording session photographs, he nevertheless died in August 1908, within a year of the instrument's public launch, and at the rather early age of 48.

Back in 1905, as an initial reply to the « Welte-Mignon » , and as a 1st step towards developing a reproducing piano of its own, Hupfeld published its « Künstlermusikrollen » (Artists' Music Rolls) , which it began to record in the autumn of that year. Pianists visited the Hupfeld studios in central Leipzig, in similar fashion to those who were recording for the « Welte-Mignon » , at the « Popper Salon » , a few streets away. Although the resulting hand-played rolls were immediately available for the « Phonola » , with printed dynamic markings for the player to follow, they were also designed with Hupfeld's recent « Phonoliszt » in mind, an expression piano powered by an electric suction pump, with 3 levels of automatic dynamics, and variable speed crescendos between the levels. The grand-piano used for recording was linked pneumatically to the machine that marked the Master rolls, and an additional 5 tubes allowed for limited dynamic information to be recorded in real time. It is not yet clear whether there were separate sets of dynamic tubes for the treble and bass, since the « Phonola » had a divided mechanism, whereas the « Phonoliszt » did not.

It took Frömsdorf and his team another 2 years to perfect their 1st true reproducing piano, and the « Meisterspiel » DEA, to use its full title, was most likely introduced to the world at 5 o'clock on the afternoon of Saturday, 16 November 1907, at the opening of the new Hupfeld show-rooms in Berlin, at No. 123 « Leipziger Straße » . An audience of over 100 musicians, dignitaries and press attended the opening concert and, by all accounts, the DEA made an excellent impression, sharing the programme with a live « Phonola » player.

The pianist, Alfred Grünfeld, who heard the new instrument some 4 weeks later, was happy to state that he was « absolutely astonished at the note-for-note faithful reproduction of my playing, by means of the DEA. During my career as an artist, I have been able to examine and play all the other similar recording and reproducing instruments, and I can honestly say that not one of them is the equal of the DEA. »

Strong sentiments, though a careful reading of Grünfeld's comments reveals that he was simply reporting that the DEA was different from other reproducing pianos which, in those days, could only have meant the « Welte-Mignon » , and not that it was necessarily better !

In many respects, Hupfeld's main business divided neatly into 2 areas, at this time, with the « Phonola » catering for the domestic market, and the firm's numerous styles of « café » pianos and « Orchestrions » fulfilling the demand for music in hotels, restaurants and other public places. The loudly trumpeted Artists' Music Rolls were used for many of the different piano-based instruments which Ludwig Hupfeld manufactured and, in view of this similarity of repertoire between the firm's various player pianos, expression pianos and piano « Orchestrions » , the DEA itself was less prominent than it might have been with a smaller, more specialised firm. Nevertheless, it remained in Hupfeld's catalogues throughout the decade of the First World War, until it was finally replaced by the « Triphonola » , around 1920.

Musical Example

We are not aware of any Hupfeld DEA that plays to the standards of the other instruments and, so, in order to give a reasonable flavour of the performances which the instrument could produce, it seems sensible to provide a recording of one of the « Künstlermusikrollen » which were such a feature of the DEA's repertoire. Alexander Scriabin played 14 of his own compositions on the Hupfeld recording piano, and these were issued on Hupfeld's various types of music roll. The composer expressed his approval of the recording process in glowing terms :

« I am certain that the future belongs to the “ Phonola ” Piano, which, on an artistic level, leaves nothing to be desired. »

An musical example, with dynamics added by foot, is taken from Scriabin's 3rd Piano Sonata, the 3rd and 4th movements, recorded in January 1908, in Leipzig, according to correspondence surviving at the Scriabin Museum, in Moscow. Scriabin's playing was well-known for its intimate character, in contrast to Rachmaninov's more expansive style.

Alexander Scriabin (1872-1915) , from the Hupfeld Artists' Music Roll Catalogue, around 1908. Recorded by the Composer in Leipzig (January 1908) . This roll was played back on a Steck grand Pianola Piano in London, in June 2009.

The DEA Recording Process

Hupfeld began recording piano-rolls, as opposed to arranging them from the score, in late-1905, at which time, the main instruments available to play them were the « Phonola » and the « Phonoliszt » . The « Phonola » was foot-pedalled, and, so, there was no automatic dynamic coding on « Phonola » rolls, but the « Phonoliszt » had 3 levels of loudness, and it was theoretically possible to capture, at least, something of a pianist's dynamic shading. When the DEA was introduced, in late-1907, its 6 dynamic levels neatly doubled those of the « Phonoliszt » , and its mechanism provided variable crescendos and decrescendos, in addition. Luckily, we have both a Leipzig patent from 1908, and a written description from a contemporary music theorist, so it is possible to work-out with some certainty how Hupfeld recorded its rolls, at this early stage.

Ludwig Riemann, a music educationalist from Essen, in western Germany, visited the Hupfeld studios on more than one occasion, not least because he recorded 3 duet rolls with Gustav Riemann who was, at one time, the manager of Hupfeld's Leipzig show-room, and one suspects that the 2 men might have been related. Ludwig Riemann states that he was present when Edvard Grieg recorded his rolls, which we know to have been on 11 April 1906, and he co-operated with Doctor Otto Neitzel of Cologne in the writing of a guide to Hupfeld's « Phonola » and DEA repertoire, « Musikästhetische Betrachtungen » . In one of his many other books, « Das Wesen des Klavierklanges » , Riemann describes how the Hupfeld recording system used pneumatic means for marking note lines on a Master roll, while 5 further lines were available for dynamic recording. He, then, mistakenly concludes that 5 lines equates to 5 dynamic levels but, of course, the absence of any lines would, no doubt, have represented the quietest playing, and, so, 5 lines fits neatly with the DEA's 6 dynamic levels.

A patent was awarded in January 1908, 1 month after the DEA was launched, to Walter Bernhard of Leipzig, for a recording system that used exactly this style of dynamic line, though the patent drawings depict only 4 lines and 5 dynamic levels. At the time, Bernhard was a manager for the rival firm of Popper and Co. , so his invention may well have had more to do with that firm's reproducing piano, the « Stella » . But he confirms the point about the absence of dynamic lines indicating the quietest level, and he also suggests that the mechanism might be split into different sections, for treble and bass, or as desired. As we have observed elsewhere, pneumatic reproducing pianos were only ever capable of producing 2 levels at any one instant, and those levels had to be split between treble and bass.

The method Bernhard uses is certainly ingenious, and involves the piano key operating not just one, but 2 separate hammer mechanisms. The normal piano hammer hits the string in the usual way, while the 2nd strikes a mechanism that causes an increasing number of sprung electrical contacts to be made, as the note is played more loudly. The sets of contacts, in each half of the piano, are connected in parallel with each other, and separate outputs for the treble and bass lead to electrically operated pens at the edges of a blank Master roll. The net effect of this manner of recording is to preserve the peak levels at every instant and, for each half of the piano separately, in contrast to the « Welte-Mignon » , which recorded the averages. In all probability, Hupfeld used a similar, though pneumatically operated system, where the dynamic signals from the piano were sent by tubes rather than wires, but the principles of the system remain essentially the same.

Once perforated, such a recorded roll would instantly have provided a performance with 6 basic dynamic levels, and the DEA roll editors could then have created gradual crescendos and diminuendos, in order to shape the music more subtly. It is easy to understand how the Hupfeld dynamic recording process managed to reduce the editing time that would otherwise have been necessary, in order to produce music rolls of a convincing quality.

Pianists and Repertoire

The DEA catalogue was the smallest of the main reproducing piano systems, with fewer than 1,200 titles having been produced by 1914, of which around 450 had already been deleted, to judge from the catalogue issued in that year. Many of the pianists who recorded for « Welte » also took the opportunity of setting down their performances at Hupfeld's studios, so there were few surprises in the listings, though the composers Max Bruch, Leo Fall, Franz Lehár and Gabriel Pierné made their 1st appearances on the reproducing piano and, for some reason, Ignacy Paderewski was absent.

Hupfeld's wide range of piano-based instruments, including the « Phonola » and « Phonoliszt » , was reflected in the DEA popular and Operatic repertoire, a great deal of which was mechanically arranged, rather than hand-played. Much has been made, especially by modern-day recording companies who publish transfers of famous pianists on roll, of the determination of reproducing piano producers to preserve the performances of the great composers. This somewhat Romantic notion is put into perspective by the correspondence between Hupfeld and Scriabin, in January 1908, which makes it clear that the Russian composer was only being invited to play works of his that were not already in Hupfeld's catalogue. It was clearly the repertoire, and not the performance style, that was uppermost in the minds of Hupfeld's roll editors.

Despite the relatively small size of its catalogue, Hupfeld made a good effort to provide a representative choice of music, with 8 Beethoven Piano Sonatas, at least 12 of Franz Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies, the Liszt Sonata in B played by the composer's secretary, Arthur Friedheim, and several Concertos, including the Grieg played by Wilhelm Backhaus, and the Chopin E minor played by the 70-year-old Francis Planté who, 60 years before, had lived in Paris at a time when Chopin himself was still performing. Planté's interpretation must surely be the most authentic performance of the work that has come down to us and, perhaps, Hupfeld's musical staff had the same thought, because it was used as the high-point of one of the DEA's 1st important public concerts, on 25 November 1908, at the « Hôtel de Pologne » , in Leipzig, at which Planté played the solo part, « in absentia » , on a « Meisterspiel » DEA grand-piano, while the accompaniment was performed on a Solodant « Phonola » grand, by the expert « Phonoliszt » and DEA recording producer, Fredy Prokesch.

Divided as it is into several sections according to musical style, the DEA catalogue's distinction between « Classical » and « modern and parlor » music is, at 1st sight, rather strange to a 21st Century reader ; Brahms counts as modern, while Liszt on the whole does not, and Giovanni Sgambati, who died in 1914, is treated as a Classicist, whereas that unlikely champion of contemporary music, Johann Strauß, stands by contrast in the modern section. Perhaps, these are merely slips of the pen from the hands of individual recording producers, but we do well to remember how transitory our perspectives of music can be in the long-term. One may search without any success at all, for Mahler or Bruckner, regarded nowadays as the highest peaks to which young conductors can aspire !

Hupfeld DEA Instruments

Initially designed as an interior player in an upright « Rönisch » piano, the DEA was subsequently installed into « Rönisch », « Blüthner », « Grotrian-Steinweg », « Lipp » and « Schiedmayer » grands, and was also available as a push-up, or « Vorsetzer », with felt-covered fingers operating on the keyboard of a normal piano. Hupfeld entered into a contract with the French piano firm, Pleyel, shortly before the First World War, resulting in a brand of instrument known as the « DEA-Pleyela » .

Hupfeld upright pianos, based typically on Rönisch models, were remarkably substantial creations, with much of the internal workings overflowing at the back of the piano case. It is often remarked that, given the choice between using 1 screw or a 100, Hupfeld always chose the 100, and the construction of DEA upright pianos is no exception !

Septembre - octobre 1913 : Anton Webern finishes the 5 Pieces for Orchestra, Opus 10, by composing the 3rd, 2nd, and 5th.

The 38 year old Franz Schmidt composes his 2nd Symphony.

The 20 year old Alois Hába writes his 1st compositions, displaying an unwillingness to « follow the rules » that he will maintain all his life.

10 octobre 1913 : Le chef Rudolf Siegel dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

23 octobre 1913 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 2e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 2e concert de la saison.

31 octobre 1913 : Le disciple de Bruckner, le chef Ferdinand Löwe, dirige à Vienne le 2e mouvement (Andante molto) de la Symphonie en fa mineur (WAB 99) , dite « Symphonie d'étude » .

The review in the « Neue Freie Presse » commented on his affectionate interpretation but was rather lukewarm in its assessment of the movement itself.

8 novembre 1913 : Arnold Schönberg finally completes « Die glückliche Hand » . This score's careful coordination of text, music, action, and lighting makes it, perhaps, the closest realization to Richard Wagner's « Gesamtkunstwerk » (Total-art-form) idea to be achieved-up to this time.

30 novembre 1913 : The premiere of Erich Wolfgang Korngold's of Sinfonietta in B major for large orchestra, Opus 5, is given in Vienna, conducted by Felix von Weingartner (to whom the work is dedicated, in thanks to his support of Korngold) , and is a sensational success (resulting in further performances all over Europe and America) which is envied by Anton Webern in a letter to Alban Berg.

3 décembre 1913 : On Anton Webern's 30th birthday, the premiere of Franz Schmidt's 2nd Symphony (in a style reminiscent of Richard Strauß and Max Reger, with homage to the grandiosity of Anton Bruckner) takes place in Vienna. Rather traditional and Late-Romantic in style, it is successful, which irks those in the Schönberg circle.

This is Schmidt's longest Symphony and it employs a huge Orchestra. The central movement (of 3) is a highly-ingenious set of variations, which are grouped to suggest the characters of slow movement and Scherzo. The complex scoring of this magnificent Symphony renders it a considerable challenge for most Orchestras.

Début 1914 : Arnold Schönberg is making arrangements to produce a film version of « Die glückliche Hand » (silent, of course, with live orchestral or organ accompaniment) , but the project never reaches fruition.

The Bruckner Archive recently acquired a letter written in 1914 by conductor Siegmund von Hausegger. Von Hausegger's name will forever be linked to the music of Anton Bruckner thanks to his premiere performance of the Orel Edition of the Bruckner Symphony No. 9.

The letter (dated in Berlin on February 13, 1914, is a letter of recommendation written to (and for) “ Herr ” A. Persinger. It reads as follows :

« “ Herr ” Persinger was through one season the 2nd concert Master of the “ Blüthner Orchester ” and was, as such, active in my Symphony Orchestra. He has fulfilled his duties in an excellent, diligent and reliable manner, and this is highlighted by his outstanding technical and musical ability.

I must emphasize the great zeal and earnestness with which Mister Persinger fulfilled his task.

Siegmund von Hausegger »

My thanks to Dietmar Achenbach for his assistance in translating the letter. (John F. Berky)

1914 : 4 bi-folios (doubles feuillets) du Finale de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner, en possession du pianiste et disciple

Cyrill Hynais, sont expédiés à la Bibliothèque « Impériale et Royale » de Vienne. Et ils seront classifiés le 14 avril 1915.

3 janvier 1914 : Le chef Carl Maria Artz dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Carl Maria Artz

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre allemand Carl Maria Artz est né le 14 juin 1887 à Düsseldorf, dans la région de Sondershausen-Altenbeuren ; et est mort en 1963.

Artz fait ses études aux Conservatoires de Düsseldorf, de Dresde et de Leipzig. Il enseigne ensuite le chant et entame une carrière de chef d'orchestre.

Pendant les années difficiles de la Grande Guerre, Artz, en chef audacieux, décide de créer à Berlin (en 1916) la 2e Symphonie, Opus 17, de Heinz Tiessen. Il s'agit de l'une des toutes premières compositions à insérer les sections contrastantes dans un seul mouvement symphonique. Arnold Schönberg l'avait fait quelques années plus tôt (1906) avec sa « Symphonie de chambre », Opus 9.

De 1940 à 1945, Artz devient le directeur musical du « Loh-Orchester Sondershausen » .

Parmi ses compositions, citons : I Opéra ; le Poème symphonique « Am toten Maar », Opus 26 ; I Quatuor à cordes ; et diverses pièces pour piano.

Également, 4 Lieder pour voix soliste et piano composés sur des textes de Joseph von Eichendorff. Ils sont dédiés, avec le plus grand respect, à Son Altesse Royale, la Grande-Duchesse Louise de Bade :

« Gute Nacht », « Stimmen der Nacht », « Der Friedensbote », « An ... » .

5 janvier 1914 : Le chef Bruno Kittel dirige le « Psaume 150 » de Bruckner (WAB 38) avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, le Chœur Bruno Kittel et la soprano Rita Bergas. Il s'agit d'une 1re exécution dans le cadre d'un concert populaire éducatif. En 2e partie : la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven (avec 4 autres solistes) .

Bruno Kittel

The German violinist and choral conductor Bruno Kittel was born on 26 May 1870 in Entenbruch, near Posen (Germany) ; and died on 10 March 1948 in Wasserberg, near Cologne (Germany) .

Kittel studied in Berlin with Émile Sauret and Gustav Exner (Violin) ; Robert Radecke, Ludwig Bussler and Arno Kleffel (Music Theory and Conducting) ; Jenny Meyer and Franz Betz (Singing) .

He played in theatre orchestras there. From 1901 to 1907, he was conductor of the Royal Theater Orchestra in Brandenburg. He was also director of the Brandenburg Conservatory until 1914. In 1902, he established the « Kittelsche-Chor » , which quickly developed into one of the finest Choral Societies of Europe, and with which he made many tours. He was director of the Stern Conservatory in Berlin, from 1935 to 1945.

Bruno Kittel occupied a leading place in Europe during the 1st half of the 20th Century. He is also known for his work with conductors Oskar Fried and Wilhelm Furtwängler (the Berlin 1942 edition of Ludwig van Beethoven's 9th Symphony is a robust performance that also includes the soprano Tilla Briem) . Notwithstanding limited sonics, the 1941 recording of Mozart's « Requiem » is a moving account ; heightened by elite-status choral singing and by the masterly orchestral control of the « Berliner Philharmoniker » , the « tableau » is not complete without the very good (and sometimes impressive) soloists. It is a Classic reading of this Masterpiece : power, tension and the heavenly sense of a tragic era, but not without an unmistakable mozartian temperament. This recording is meaningful because it is one of the 1st studio recordings (maybe the very 1st) of the work. It also documents music-making during the Nazi regime. The somewhat somber light of the work is well-reflected by this performance and, despite the precarious quality of sound, we do hear a certain amount of details.

Bruno Kittel also produced some Bach, including a very good version of the « Saint-Matthew Passion » (BWV 244) .

Bruno Kittel (geboren 26. Mai 1870 im Forsthaus Entenbruch, Kreis Czarnikau, Provinz Posen ; gestorben 10. März 1948 in Wasserberg bei Köln) war ein deutscher Chorleiter und Violinist.

Sein Vater war Förster. Kittel studierte in Berlin bei Émile Sauret und Gustav Exner (Violine) , bei Robert Radecke, Ludwig Bussler und Arno Kleffel (Musiktheorie und Dirigieren) sowie bei Jenny Meyer und Franz Betz (Gesang) .

1896 bis 1901 arbeitete er als Geiger im Orchester der Königlichen Hofoper Berlin, 1901 bis 1907 war Kittel Dirigent des dortigen königlichen Theaterorchesters. 1901 bis 1914 zudem als Direktor des Brandenburgischen Konservatoriums für Musik in Berlin tätig. Der Chor des Konservatoriums wurde ab 1907 mehrfach zu Konzerten mit den Berliner Philharmonikern herangezogen.

Seine Anstellung im Jahre 1928 als Leiter des Hochschulchors der Hochschule für Musik entwickelte sich bald zum Fall Bruno Kittel : das preußische Kultusministerium verweigerte ihm, nach dem Weggang von Alexander von Zemlinsky, mit dem er sich zunächst die Leitung teilte, die Stelle ganz und unbefristet zu übertragen, obwohl die Hochschulleitung Kittel unterstützte. 1930 trat Kittel zurück.

Im Mai 1933 wurde Kittel Mitglied der NSDAP. Im Mai 1935 erfolgte seine Berufung zum Direktor des Konservatoriums der Reichshauptstadt Berlin, dem früheren Stern'schen Konservatorium. 1936 trat er dieses Amt an und behielt es bis 1945. Im April 1936 Ernennung zum Professor durch Adolf Hitler. Ab 1939 Leiter der Pflugschaft Chorleiter in der Fachschaft Musikerziehung der Reichsmusikkammer.

1902 gründete er den Bruno Kittelschen Chor (auch Bruno-Kittel-Chor) , der sich rasch zu einer der angesehensten Chor-Vereinigungen in Europa entwickelte. Eine der ersten Großtaten Kittels und seines Chores waren die beiden ersten Gesamtauführungen von Felix Dræsekkes Mysterium Christus : am 6./13./20. Februar 1912 in Berlin und am 5./12./16. Mai 1912 in Dresden. Nach der Machtergreifung Hitlers wurde der Chor zunehmend mit repräsentativen Konzerten betreut. 1942 erfolgte die Umbenennung des Chores in Deutscher Philharmonischer Chor (Bruno-Kittel-Chor) . Eine Aufführung des Requiems von Mozart im November 1944 ist das letzte nachgewiesene Konzert des Chores.

Seit Jahren hatte sich in Berlin, ursprünglich aus kleinen Anfängen, noch eine weitere Chorvereinigung entwickelt, die jüngste dieser Gattung, die in dieser Zeit Bedeutung gewann. Bruno Kittel hatte zunächst nur ein paar junge Mädchen und junge Männer mit hübschen, frischen Stimmen um sich geschart, mit denen er anfänglich nur kleinere, anspruchslose Werke auf das sorgfältigste einstudierte. In verhältnismäßig kurzer Zeit entstand ein stattlicher, gemischter Chor jugendlicher, unverbrauchter Stimmen, dem man die Freude am Musizieren anmerkte. Bald konnten größere Aufgaben in Angriff genommen werden, und der « Kittelsche Chor » mit seinen strahlend reinen, vorzüglich geschulten Stimmen rückte allmählich in die vorderste Reihe der Chorvereinigungen auf. Nach dem Tode von Siegfried Ochs wurde der Kittelsche Chor häufig zur Mitwirkung in den Philharmonischen Konzerten herangezogen. Wenn Kittel auch als Orchesterdirigent nicht bedeutend war, so hat er doch als Chorleiter Hervorragendes geleistet.

Bruno Kittel spielte Mozarts « Requiem » in der romantischen Tradition mit großem Chor und Orchester ein. Von den gleichzeitigen Bestrebungen Karl Straubes in Leipzig ... scheint Kittel wenig beeinflusst ... Dennoch beeindruckten die « Matthäuspassion » und das Mozart- « Requiem » in der Interpretation Bruno Kittels. Sein Chor verschmolz zu einem einheitlichen, symphonischen Klangkörper entsprechend dem Ideal Richard Wagners, so daß Chor und Orchester eine bruchlose Einheit bilden. Sie betonen durch Langsamkeit der Tempi den großen Ernst und die Schwere von Mozarts Musik.

15 janvier 1914 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 8e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 12e concert de la saison.

26 janvier 1914 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

Mars 1914 : The 29 year old Alban Berg begins composing a March and a Waltz for his projected Symphony-suite. He finishes the March before leaving Vienna for the Summer.

Printemps 1914 : The 16 year old Erich Wolfgang Korngold completes the orchestration of his 1st Opera, the I Act « Der Ring des Polykrates » , Opus 7, and begins sketching the music for his 2nd, « Violanta » , Opus 8, on which he will work for the rest of this year.

28 mars 1914 (7e concert symphonique de la saison 1913-1914 à Lübeck) : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner. Au même programme : air extrait de l'Opéra « la Clémence de Titus » de Mozart, interprété par Ilona Durigo ; 5 Lieder de Schubert avec Ilona Durigo, et Furtwängler au piano.

5 avril 1914 : Le chef Hermann Henze dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

May 1914 : Alban Berg attends several performances of the play « Wozzeck » , in Vienna ; it is unknown today whether it is the version of Karl Emil Franzos or that of Paul Landau. Berg is immediately inspired to write an Opera based on it (using Landau's version) .

Juin 1914 : Anton Webern composes the 3 Little Pieces for violoncello and piano, Opus 11, some of the shortest pieces ever written.

Été 1914 : Arnold Schœnberg spends the summer mostly in Murnau, working on a large Symphony which is to remain unfinished after many years of work - the project eventually morphs into « Die Jakobsleiter » (Jacob's Ladder) .

Converti au protestantisme en 1898 comme de nombreux juifs « arrivés » ayant choisi à l'époque l'assimilation, gage d'une certaine respectabilité, Arnold Schœnberg dut néanmoins se préoccuper de l'antisémitisme, ce qui l'amena à repenser sa propre religion. À priori, l'origine de Schœnberg, compositeur on ne peut plus germanique de tradition, n'a pas d'intérêt musical. Or, il est clair que des œuvres comme l'Oratorio inachevé « Die Jakobsleiter » (l'Échelle de Jacob) , l'Opéra inachevé (coïncidence ?) ; « Moses und Aron » (Moïse et Aaron) , également superstitieux, Schœnberg élimina le second « a » d'Aaron afin de ne pas se retrouver avec un titre de 13 lettres ; et la pièce de théâtre « Der biblische Weg » (le Chemin biblique) marquent l'évolution et l'approfondissement de son interrogation.

28 juin 1914 : Austria views Serbia's growing power with suspicion. Archduke Franz Ferdinand, the heir to the Austrian throne, is assassinated in Sarajevo (then, part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire) , and the fragile system of European political alliances breaks down. Austria makes demands on Serbia, but Serbia wants to negotiate, so without waiting for clarification.

Juin et juillet 1914 : While Helene Berg is away at the Karlsbad spa for the summer, Alban Berg is alone in Vienna teaching and composing. Rather than continuing with the Symphony, he completes the « Präludium » and decides to use it as the 1st of « Drei Orchesterstücke » (3 Pieces for Orchestra) , to become his Opus 6, makes the March the 3rd piece, and transforms the Waltz idea into the 2nd piece « Reigen » (Round-dances) . He continues his work even more intensively after going to Trahütten for the summer, on July 21st.

July 1914 was the month that changed the world. On 28 June 1914, Archduke Franz Ferdinand was assassinated, and just 5 weeks later, the Great Powers of Europe were at War. But how did it all happen ?

Would there be War by the end of the day ? It certainly seemed possible : the Serbs had only until 6:00 pm to accept the Austrian demands. Count Leopold Berchtold had instructed the Austrian representative in Belgrade that nothing less than full-acceptance of all 10 points contained in the ultimatum would be regarded as satisfactory. And no one expected the Serbs to comply with the demands in their entirety - least of all, the Austrians.

When the Serbian cabinet met that morning they had received advice from Russia, France, and Britain urging them to be as accommodating as possible. No one indicated that any military assistance might be forthcoming. They began drafting a « most conciliatory » reply to Austria while preparing for War : the Royal family prepared to leave Belgrade ; the military garrison left the city for a fortified town 60 miles south ; the order for general mobilization was signed and drums were beaten outside of « cafés » , calling-up conscripts.

How would Russia respond ? That morning, the Tsar presided over a meeting of the Russian Grand Council where it was agreed to mobilize the 13 army corps designated to act against Austria. By afternoon, « the period preparatory to War » was initiated and preparations for mobilization began in the military districts of Kiev, Odessa, Moscow, and Kazan.

Simultaneously, Sergei Sazonov tried to enlist German support in persuading Austria to extend the dead-line beyond 6:00 pm, arguing that it was a « European matter » not limited to Austria and Serbia. The Germans refused, arguing that to summon Austria to a European « tribunal » would be humiliating and mean the end of Austria as a Great Power. Sazonov insisted that the Austrians were aiming to establish hegemony in the Balkans : after they devoured Serbia and Bulgaria, Russia would face them « on the Black Sea » . He tried to persuade Sir Edward Grey that if Britain were to join Russia and France, Germany would then pressure Austria into moderation.

How would Britain respond ? Sir Edward Grey gave no indication that Britain would stand shoulder-to-shoulder with the Russians in a conflict over Serbia. His only concern seemed to be to contain the crisis, to keep it a dispute between Austria and Serbia. « I do not consider that public opinion here would or ought to sanction our going to War over a Servian quarrel. » But if a War between Austria and Serbia were to occur « other issues » might draw Britain in. In the meantime, there was still an opportunity to avert War if the 4 disinterested powers « held the hand » of their partners while mediating the dispute. But the report he received from Saint-Petersburg was not encouraging : the British ambassador warned that Russia and France seemed determined to make « a strong stand » even if Britain declined to join them.

When the Austrian minister received the Serb reply at 5:58 pm, on Saturday, he could see instantly that their submission was not complete. He announced that Austria was breaking-off diplomatic relations with Serbia and immediately ordered the staff of the delegation to leave for the railway station. By 6:30 pm, the Austrians were on a train bound for the border.

That evening, in the « Kaiservilla » at Bad Ischl, Emperor Franz-Josef signed the orders for mobilization of 13 army corps. When the news reached Vienna, the people greeted it with the « wildest enthusiasm » . Huge crowds began to form, gathering at the « Ringstraße » and bursting into patriotic songs. The crowds marched around the city shouting : « Down with Serbia ! Down with Russia ! » In front of the German embassy, they sang « Wacht am Rhein » ; police had to protect the Russian embassy against the demonstrators. Surely, it would not be long before the guns began firing.

28 juillet 1914 : L'Empereur Franz-Josef signe dans son bureau de l'aile-ouest de la « Kaiservilla » , la déclaration de guerre à la Serbie (et, le même jour, la célèbre déclaration « À mes peuples ») , qui aboutira rapidement au déclenchement de la Première Guerre mondiale, celle-là même qui conduira à la chute de la monarchie danubienne.

Despite it's size, the « Kaiservilla » is the place where many diplomatic meetings takes place and it is in his office at the « Kaiservilla » where Emperor Franz-Josef signs the fatal Declaration of War on Serbia. This results in the First World War and eventually, the end of the Habsburg monarchy.

...

Austria declares War on Serbia. Russia responds by sending troops to guard its border with Austria. 4 days later, Austria's ally Germany declares war on Russia. 2 days after that, Germany declares War on France and invades Belgium to begin a push toward the French border. The following day, England declares War on Germany. World War I has begun, changing life in Europe for everyone, forever.

With the start of the War, the 21 year old Alois Hába, dissatisfied by small-town life, moves to Prague and becomes a pupil of Vítězslav Novák at the Conservatory. Here, he analyzes Claude Debussy, Max Reger, Alexander Scriabin, and Richard Strauß, and studies non-functional harmonization of Moravian folk-melodies.

2 août 1914 : Alban Berg announces that he has completed the « Präludium » of his « Drei Orchesterstücke » .

15 août 1914 : In Panama, Central America, the Panama Canal construction is finished by the United States, and the canal is officially opened. The ship route from New York to San Francisco is cut from 14,000 to 6,000 miles.

23 août 1914 : Alban Berg announces the completion of his « Drei Orchesterstücke » but the middle-piece, « Reigen » , is not yet finished.

Automne 1914 : After sending the completed scores of the « Präludium » and « Marsch » from « Drei Orchesterstücke » with a dedication to Arnold Schœnberg for his 40th birthday, Alban Berg spends most of the fall working on a piano reduction of Schœnberg's « Kammersymphonie » .

15 octobre 1914 : Le chef Carl Maria Artz dirige la 3e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

30-31 octobre 1914 : Leopold Stokowski conducting Bruckner ...

One can only imagine what a Bruckner Symphony would sound like in the hands of conductor, Leopold Stokowski. That thought came to the fore recently when a concert program from the Philadelphia Orchestra verified a performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 4. The concert took place exactly 100 years ago (1914) .

Bruckner's « Romantic » Symphony was the 1st work on the program followed, after intermission, with the Violin Concerto by Edouard Lalo followed by the Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 by Franz Liszt - exactly the opposite order in which the works would be performed today.

30 novembre au 4 décembre 1914 : Arnold Schœnberg composes « Alle, welche dich suchen » (All who seek you) .

3 décembre 1914 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « GroÙer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 2e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 8e concert de la saison.

5 décembre 1914 (3e concert symphonique de la saison 1914-1915, à Lübeck) : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner. Au même programme : l'Ouverture « Der Freischütz » de Weber et le Concerto pour piano de Schumann, avec la soliste Ilse Fromm.

Fin 1914 : Arnold Schœnberg turns his attention to religious poems by Rainer Maria Rilke, setting 2 of them as songs accompanied by Chamber Orchestra.

Patriote autrichien dans l'âme (et, plus tard, nostalgique de l'Empire des Habsbourg) , Arnold Schœnberg se porte, malgré son âge relativement avancé, volontaire durant la Première Guerre mondiale et sert à l'arrière. Cet engagement lui vaudra l'animosité de Claude Debussy, tout aussi patriote que lui, mais du bord opposé.

...

Arnold Schœnberg will serve on active duty twice during the War, and his major work during the next decade is on « Die Jakobsleiter » (Jacob's Ladder) , which will remain unfinished.

World War I brought a crisis in the development of Schœnberg. Military service disrupted his life when, at the age of 42, he was in the army. He was never able to work un-interrupted or over a period of time and, as a result, he left many unfinished works and undeveloped « beginnings » . On one occasion, a superior officer demanded to know if he was « this notorious Schœnberg, then » . Schœnberg replied :

« Beg to report, sir, yes. Nobody wanted to be, someone had to be, so I let it be me. »

According to Norman Lebrecht, this is a reference to Schönberg's apparent « destiny » as the « Emancipator of Dissonance » .

In what the music-critic Alex Ross calls an « act of War psychosis » , Schönberg drew comparisons between Germany's assault on France and his assault on decadent « bourgeois » artistic values. In August 1914, while denouncing the music of Georges Bizet, Igor Stravinsky and Maurice Ravel, he wrote :

« Now comes the reckoning ! Now, we will throw these mediocre kitschmongers into slavery, and teach them to venerate the German spirit and to worship the German God. »

The deteriorating relation between contemporary composers and the public led him to found the « Society for Private Musical Performances » (« Verein für musikalische Privataufführungen ») in Vienna, in 1918. He sought to provide a forum in which modern musical compositions could be carefully prepared and rehearsed, and properly performed under conditions protected from the dictates of fashion and pressures of commerce. From its inception through 1921, when it ended because of economic reasons, the Society presented 353 performances to paid members, sometimes at the rate of 1 per week. During the 1st year and a half, Schönberg did not let any of his own works be performed. Instead, audiences at the Society's concerts heard difficult contemporary compositions by Alexander Scriabin, Claude Debussy, Gustav Mahler, Anton Webern, Alban Berg, Max Reger, and other leading figures of early 20th Century music.

Alban Berg thinks a lot about his 1st (and only completed) Opera, « Wozzeck » , preparing the way to compose it after the War.

The teenage Erich Wolfgang Korngold finishes the orchestration of his 2nd Opera, the 1 Act « Violanta » , Opus 8, which is produced on a double-bill with « Der Ring des Polykrates » in Munich, on 28 March 1916, under Bruno Walter.

1er janvier 1915 : On New Year's Day, Arnold Schönberg composes « Mach mich zum Wächter deiner Weiten » (Make me the watchman of your expanses) .

14 janvier 1915 : Concert-bénéfice dédié aux ressortissants nécessiteux autrichiens et hongrois. Le chef Siegfried Ochs donne la première berlinoise de la Grande Messe en fa mineur de Bruckner (WAB 28) avec l'Orchestre et le Chœur Philharmonique de Berlin.

Les solistes : Clara Senius, Paula Weinbaum, Paul Schmedes, Anton Sistermans.

Les solistes de l'Orchestre : Julius Thornberg, Willi Høeber, Paulus Bache.

À l'orgue : Bernhard Irrgang.

Second Chœur : Le « Anna-Schultzen-von-Asten-Chor » (chef de chœur : M. Herrmann) .

Au même programme : Création mondiale de la cantate profane en 4 mouvements « Frieden » (1914) d'Emil von Řezníček (1860-1945) , pour 4 solistes, chœur mixte et orchestre (Introduction ; Danse macabre ; Paix ; Épilogue) .

25 janvier 1915 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

15 février 1915 : Le chef Max Fiedler dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Une répétition (en tenue de concert) , ouverte au public, avait eu lieu la veille, sur l'heure du midi.

Au début de 1915, le « Kapellmeister » Arthur Bodanzky partit pour l'Amérique et le choix de son successeur s'avéra des plus difficiles. Les plus fameux chefs de l'époque postulèrent pour ce poste mais le public de Mannheim rêvait d'avoir Arthur Nikisch comme nouveau « Kapellmeister » . À l'époque, personne ne songeait à Furtwängler. À la différence de Lübeck, la principale activité de Mannheim concernait l'Opéra. Le 1er chef avait en charge le répertoire lié à l'Opéra ainsi que les 8 concerts symphoniques de l'Académie. Furtwängler avait, en fait, une certaine expérience théâtrale mais il avait dirigé très peu d'Opéras. Le 23 mars 1915, un comité de 5 membres se rendit à Lübeck pour assister à la représentation de « Fidelio » dirigée par Furtwängler. Ils furent tellement impressionnés qu'ils l'invitèrent à devenir le nouveau « Kapellmeister » de Mannheim. C'est ainsi que la Ville hérita d'un jeune chef inconnu.

Durant la Première Guerre mondiale, Carl Hagemann qui avait été Intendant de l'Opéra de Mannheim, de 1906 à 1910, fut à nouveau invité à ce poste, à partir de 1915. Il entama ainsi un 2e mandat de 5 ans : la seconde Ère Hagemann coïncidera avec l'Ère Furtwängler. Mannheim accueillit le jeune chef avec enthousiasme. Bertha Geißmar, la future secrétaire de Furtwängler, et qui appartenait à une vieille famille de la ville, écrivit dans ses souvenirs :

« Les citoyens de Mannheim avaient pris l'habitude de considérer leur Kapellmeister comme une espèce de demi-Dieu dont les faits et gestes constituaient l'essentiel des potins journaliers. »

Tout ce qu'il disait et qu'il faisait devenait le thème du jour. Furtwängler, qui était de nature plutôt timide, supportait difficilement cette popularité et, au début, avait pris l'habitude de se cacher derrière le dos de Oskar Grofé (un ami intime de Hugo Wolf) qui avait pris le jeune débutant sous sa protection.

Furtwängler et son assistant Felix Lederer se partageaient le répertoire : le nom du 1er apparut sur les affiches des Opéras de Gluck, Mozart, Wagner, Bizet, Verdi, alors que le 2e dirigeait Puccini ou des œuvres comme « le Chevalier à la rose » . D'autres œuvres que Furtwängler dirigea pour la 1re fois lui-même ou pour la 1re fois à Mannheim telles que « Violanta » d'Erich Wolfgang Korngold, ou les Opéras de son Maître, Max von Schillings (comme la « Mona Lisa ») , ou celles de Sekles ou de Klenau ont désormais disparu du répertoire. « Fidelio » fut le 1er Opéra que Furtwängler dirigea à Mannheim, le 7 septembre 1915, et Beethoven eut la part belle dans les programmes des concerts de l'Académie qui avaient lieu dans la « Musensaal » et dans la « Niebelungensaal » de Rosengarten.

L'excellente relation entre Furtwängler et Mannheim cessera brutalement pendant la saison 1932-1933 : le 26 mai 1933, en effet, un concert devait réunir les membres de la Philharmonie de Berlin et ceux de l'Orchestre du Théâtre, c'est-à-dire 170 musiciens. Les autorités nazies demandèrent à Furtwängler de remplacer son 1er violon, Simon Goldberg, en raison de ses origines juives, ce qu'il refusa catégoriquement. Le chef renonça à sa citoyenneté d'honneur, n'apparut pas à la réception qui suivit le concert et déclara qu'il ne mettrait plus les pieds dans cette ville. Il y reviendra néanmoins 22 ans plus tard, le 20 mai 1954, à l'occasion du 175e anniversaire de l'Académie, dirigeant, le 20 mai, l'Orchestre berlinois dans les 5e et 6e Symphonies de Beethoven.

18 février 1915 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 4e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 18e concert de la saison.

25 mars 1915 : Le chef Carl Maria Artz dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

11 novembre 1915 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 7e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 4e concert de la saison.

11 novembre 1915 : Le chef Hermann Henze dirige la création berlinoise de la 1re Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

1915 : Willi Möllendorf has another quarter-tone harmonium built, this time with a special keyboard. In 1917, he gives a presentation on it, in Vienna, which is so successful that he repeats it, 10 days later.

The 2nd German edition of Ferruccio Busoni's « Sketch of a New Æsthetic of Music » , further revised and enlarged, is published in Leipzig, in 1916. Picked-up by a book-club, it achieves much wider distribution this time.

Alois Hába is drafted into the Austrian Army and sent to the Russian front, to the Italian front in 1917 and, then, to Vienna, in early 1918, where he is assigned the collection of Slovakian soldier's songs. Inspired by recitals given by Willi Möllendorf, Hába writes his 1st quarter-tone piece, « Suite in the quarter-tone system » , for 2 pianos tuned a quarter-tone apart. He studies with Jan Brandts-Buys, then, Richard Stöhr, and becoming dissatisfied with these strict counterpoint lessons, in the spring of 1918, becomes a student of Franz Schreker, who brings-out his more radical tendencies.

The Austrian-born conductor (of Jewish ancestry) Rudolf Gerhard Schwarz was born on 29 April 1905 in Vienna and died on 30 January 1994 in London. He became a British citizen and spent the latter half of his life in England.

Schwarz was born in a Jewish family and, at the age of 6, began piano lessons followed shortly by the violin. His father was opposed to his son's ambition to become a conductor. Money for music lessons and gallery tickets at the Opera came from him given lessons himself. He studied with the composers Richard Robert, Hans Gál and Richard Strauß. At the age of 17, he played viola in the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1922, and he made his conducting debut in Düsseldorf as assistant to Georg Szell, in 1924. Schwarz also acted as director of the Choral Society in Rheydt.

After Opera experience in Düsseldorf, Schwarz moved to Karlsruhe, in 1927, as 1st conductor at the State Theatre alongside Josef Krips and Joseph Keilberth. There, he conducted all Wagner Operas except « Tristan und Isolde », and led Symphonic concerts. The Civil Service Law of 7 April 1933 led to his dismissal by the Nazis because he was Jewish.

In 1936, he became a director of the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » (JKB) in Berlin, a German-Jewish cultural organization backed by the Nazi Propaganda Ministry of Josef Goebbels, which allowed Jewish artists to perform for Jewish audiences. He also conducted in Gothenburg, between 1936 and 1938. The Nazis imprisoned him, from 1939 to 1940. When the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » was dissolved, in 1941, he was deported to Auschwitz, but Wilhelm Furtwängler's wife, Zitla, secured his release. He was, then, sent to Sachsenhausen and ended-up in Belsen concentration camp, in 1945. While at Auschwitz, he suffered a broken shoulder-blade, which inhibited his gestures as a conductor in later life. The effects of this injury on his conducting style can be seen in a DVD of him conducting the Finale of the Brahms Violin Concerto with David Oistrakh, in May 1958.

It is not clear why Schwarz did not attempt to leave Germany in 1939. Possible explanations include the security of his employment with the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » and the difficulty of finding work elsewhere.

After the end of World War II, Schwarz went to Sweden to recover from typhoid and, there, met his future 2nd wife Greta. In 1946, he received an offer to join Berlin Opera as conductor, which he refused.

He was preparing to go to America when, in 1947, his brother in London sent him an advertisement for a post in Bournemouth. After the trial concerts, the Orchestra voted unanimously for his appointment, in 1947, to lead the newly-reformed Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra, despite objections from the Musicians' Union which tried to prevent his appointment on the grounds that there were already too many non-British musicians in the country. He was central to rebuilding the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra, with notable performances of Ludwig van Beethoven's 9th Symphony ; Gustav Mahler's « The Song of the Earth » with Kathleen Ferrier and Richard Lewis ; and Arnold Bax's 3rd Symphony at Festival Hall, in 1951. The workload was immense, as Schwarz was required to lead 150 concerts in his 1st season.

Schwarz received praise from Thomas Beecham as an « able conductor » for his work with the Bournemouth Orchestra and, subsequently, held Principal Conductor positions with the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra (1951-1957) and the BBC Symphony Orchestra. With the BBC Symphony Orchestra, he was praised for his efforts « to reach the truth of the music » . However, in the 1961-1962 season, his interpretation of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 9 was criticized in the press as « blatant misrepresentation » , and as moving « from bad to worse » . In addition to press criticism, Schwarz contended with the appointment, in 1959, of William Glock as Director of Music at the BBC. Conflict between Glock and Schwarz, over such matters as style and repertoire, may have contributed to the conductor's departure from the organization, in 1962.

In 1964, Schwarz was appointed Artistic Director and Principal Conductor of the Northern Sinfonia, where he served until 1973. Schwarz returned to Bournemouth as a regular guest, from 1970 to 1979, and also held guest appointments in Bergen, and with the English Opera Group and National Youth Orchestra. In June 1973, he was appointed a Commander of the Order of the British Empire.

Schwarz received much praise from Northern Sinfonia musicians who played under him : violinist Martin Hughes said that his « sense of rhythm, structure and tempo was exceptional » and clarinetist George McDonald reflected that « he made the Sinfonia listen to themselves (blend with each other) . He helped form the Orchestra's style and gave them musical discipline. »

Oboist Janet Craxton praised his selflessness, while David Patmore considers that he « may not have been a great conductor, but he certainly was a great musician » .

Simon Rattle acknowledged Schwarz as a « formative influence » who taught him « the paramount importance of imposing his pulse on the music he played » . According to Rattle, Schwarz never « gave any interpretation that didn't have a real truth about it » .

Schwarz's 1958 recording of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5 with the London Symphony Orchestra, originally for the « Everest » label, has been highly-praised. In addition, he conducted for many Concerto recordings, as well as the Dvořák « Slavonic Dances » (BBC Symphony Orchestra) , and Liszt « Hungarian Rhapsodies » (Philharmonia Orchestra) . He started and ended his recording career with the Bournemouth Orchestra : several Overtures, in the early 1950's, and an LP of Schubert Overtures, in 1980 (all « EMI ») . There are further broadcast recordings by Schwarz in the British Library Sound Archive.

Une page « inconnue » : Furtwängler à Lille, en 1916

Wilhelm Furtwängler a toujours affirmé qu'il avait refusé de donner des concerts (durant la Seconde Guerre mondiale) dans les pays occupés par les troupes allemandes. (Il est vrai que les tournées européennes de la Philharmonie de Berlin furent assurées par Hermann Abendroth, Eugen Jochum, Clemens Krauß ou Hans Knappertsbusch.) Pourtant, sur un plan purement historique, ceci n'est pas totalement exact et une découverte récente vient le prouver mais les faits se déroulèrent durant la Première Guerre mondiale ! En effet, l'Opéra de Lille (ville alors occupée par les armées allemandes) reçut, en 1916, la visite de 2 chefs d'orchestre « réputés » : Fritz Reiner et Wilhelm Furtwängler.

Il convient ici de narrer brièvement l'histoire de l'Opéra (ou des Opéras successifs) de Lille. Une « Comédie » avait été inaugurée en 1702 qui accueillit, durant près de 80 ans, une partie de la vie musicale et théâtrale lilloise. Dès 1781, on décida de construire un « Grand Théâtre » dans le style de la Salle Favart de Paris : les travaux furent confiés à l'architecte Michel Lequeux (qui sera assassiné à 31 ans, en 1786, par un ouvrier du chantier) . L'ouverture eut lieu le 16 avril 1787. Le 6 avril 1803, un incendie le détruisit. Il fut rapidement décidé d'en construire un nouveau. 100 jours plus tard, le 30 novembre, fut achevé le Théâtre Sébastopol (provisoire) . Dès 1907, un concours fut officiellement ouvert aux architectes, en vue de la construction du futur Opéra qui échut à Louis-Marie Cordonnier. L'inauguration fut annoncée pour l'automne 1914 quand la Première Guerre mondiale éclata. Le 3 août, l'Allemagne déclara la guerre à la France ; le 4, les troupes allemandes envahirent la Belgique ; le 24, les principales armées allemandes entrèrent dans le nord de la France, repoussant les lignes alliées sur une ligne de front qui allait du Pas-de-Calais à l'Alsace, englobant la Champagne et la Lorraine. Lille restera durant toute la guerre en zone allemande.

Un an après leur installation à Lille, les Allemands s'intéressèrent au nouveau bâtiment qui n'était pas terminé. Le 8 novembre 1915, la « Kommandantur » demanda au Maire Charles Delesalle de le remettre en état d'exploitation. Celui-ci refusa de reprendre les travaux et d'exécuter des ordres allemands. Début décembre, les allemands réquisitionnèrent le théâtre et des soldats le remirent en état. L'inauguration eut lieu le 25 décembre par une représentation d'« Iphigénie en Aulide » de Goethe, jouée par une troupe allemande. Ce n'est qu'au printemps suivant qu'une véritable programmation fut mise en place, l'inauguration « officielle » ayant lieu le 6 juin 1916 par un concert de gala. Durant 2 années, de nombreuses troupes d'outre-Rhin (Opéras de Chemnitz, Stuttgart, Lübeck, Schwerin, Karlsruhe, München, Hambourg, Augsburg, Bremen, Berlin) viendront ainsi à Lille, interprétant tout un répertoire germanique (théâtre et Opéra). Ainsi, le 19 mai, le ténor Richard Tauber se produisit à Lille. L'hiver 1916 vit un grand nombre de représentations wagnériennes (« Tannhäuser », « le Vaisseau fantôme », « Lohengrin », « Parsifal ») ; en mai 1917, ce furent « les Noces de Figaro » ; en novembre, le « Ring » ; en décembre, « Tristan ». On se doute que ces productions n'étaient données que devant des publics allemands essentiellement militaires (d'où l'appellation de « Théâtre aux Armées ») - et, irrégulièrement, au profit des infirmières.

Le 29 avril 1916, Fritz Reiner, venant du « Semperoper » de Dresde, dirigea à Lille une représentation de « Carmen » avec la cantatrice Agnès Wedekind-Klebe, dans le rôle-titre, et Fritz Soot, dans celui de Don José. Cette représentation était la 99e dans la programmation du « Deutsches Theater », suggérant ainsi une importante activité artistique alors que ...

C'est dans ce contexte que, fin mars 1916, Wilhelm Furtwängler arriva à Lille avec la troupe de l'Opéra de Mannheim. Un autre chef l'avait précédé en février-mars : Steinbach mais la presse ne cite jamais son prénom. (Nous ignorons s'il s'agit du célèbre Fritz Steinbach de Cologne ou de son frère qui était également chef d'orchestre.)

Pour connaître l'activité de Furtwängler à Lille, il faut s'immerger dans le journal allemand de l'époque, le « Liller Kriegszeitung ». On y apprend qu'il a dirigé « Fidelio » de Beethoven (mais à une date incertaine que l'on peut situer entre le 1er et le 3 avril) et un concert symphonique, le 6. Selon d'autres sources (en particulier, une thèse d'un étudiant de l'Université de Lille, Olivier Denoyelle), il aurait également dirigé « les Contes d'Hoffmann » et « la Chauve-souris », ce qui reste à prouver. En effet, dans le n° 86 du « Liller Kriegszeitung », daté du 13 avril (le journal ne paraissait que 2 fois par semaine), il est indiqué qu'après « les Contes d'Hoffmann » fut jouée « la Chauve-souris » sous la direction du « Kapellmeister » Otto Urach (qui dirigea une autre représentation des « Contes », si l'on en croit le n° 84 du 7 avril). Furtwängler a-t-il dirigé une ou plusieurs représentations sans que la presse en rende compte ? Ceci est plausible mais non avéré. Par contre, dans le n° 83 du « Liller Kriegszeitung », en date du 4 avril, on trouve le compte-rendu suivant :

« L'exécution de " Fidelio " fut l'une des meilleures que nous ayons vue et entendue à Lille. Elle eut lieu sous la direction énergique et enflammée du " Hofkapellmeister " de Mannheim, Wilhelm Furtwängler. Melle Sophie Wolf, de Cologne, chanta Léonore, alors que Rudolf Ritter, de Stuttgart, nous remplit de joie dans le rôle de Florestan. Il faut saluer Karl Amster, en Fernando ; Alfons Schützendorf, en Pizzaro ; Otto Helgers, en Rocco ; Else Jülich, en Marcelline ; Hans Bollmann, en Jacquino. Le public quitta le théâtre avec la conscience d'avoir assisté à l'une des plus profondes manifestations de l'âme allemande et après avoir manifesté en applaudissant bruyamment les artistes, d'avoir partagé un sentiment durable de cordiale gratitude. »

Quant au concert symphonique, il eut lieu le jeudi 6 avril et comprenait un programme très « furtwänglerien » car uniquement consacré à Beethoven : l'Ouverture d' « Egmont », le Concerto pour violon (avec Félix Berber) et la 5e Symphonie. Le « Liller Kriegszeitung » écrivit brièvement (le n° 85 du 10 avril) :

L'Histoire se répétera à l'aube de la seconde guerre mondiale :

« Le 10 mai 1940, les armées allemandes déferlent sur la Belgique, les Pays-Bas et le Luxembourg. Lille est bombardée les 18 et 26 mai. Le lendemain, la ville est encerclée. Une fois encore, les combats d'une invasion éclair ont dévasté le Nord-Pas-de-Calais. La France est sonnée. C'est le " coma de l'été 40 ". À 20 ans de distance, l'Histoire se répète. Comme en 1914, les allemands vont mettre en place une occupation particulièrement dure et font pression pour que les théâtres rouvrent au plus vite. Il s'agit, cette fois, d'une décision politique diligente de Berlin par les services de Goebbels. C'est un véritable Théâtre allemand qu'on veut installer à Lille, le seul de ce type en France, partageant ce " privilège " avec les Opéras d'Oslo et de La Haye. Les principes appliqués 20 ans auparavant sont repris puisqu'il s'agit d'inviter des artistes d'outre-Rhin, troupes complètes pour les Opéras et grands Orchestres symphoniques. Le 13 janvier 1941, l'Opéra de Cologne vient donner " les Noces de Figaro " mais la 1re saison du " Deutsches Theater " de Lille est véritablement inaugurée le 10 mai avec un concert consacré à la musique de scène d' « Egmont » de Beethoven. Au début de l'année 1942, la chape de plomb qui s'abat sur les Juifs de France n'épargne pas les villes de province ni les milieux artistiques. À partir de juillet, le port de l'étoile jaune est obligatoire. Le 11 septembre, 520 personnes sont arrêtées dans les départements du Nord et du Pas-de-Calais et regroupées à Lille. Une semaine plus tard, elles arrivent à Auschwitz. À partir de 1944, des rumeurs commencent à circuler sur un repli du " Deutsches Theater " à Nancy. Dans les semaines suivantes, l'essentiel de la troupe est dissout. Le 3 septembre, les troupes britanniques entrent en libérateurs à Lille. Le 26 septembre, le Grand Théâtre est rendu aux Lillois avec un programme de musique française (Honegger, Dukas, Saint-Saëns) . » (J. M. Duhamel, Opus cité.)

1917 : The Boston Symphony Orchestra is the 1st major Orchestra to record for the Victor Talking Machine Company.

Victor, then, was the leading phonograph and phonograph recording company in the United States and, probably, in the world. It soon also soon owned 50 % of its nearest world rival, when on December 5, 1920, had purchased half of the shares of the Gramophone Company. Until 1917, Victor had not successfully recorded a full Symphony Orchestra, nor did they have the recording location to do so. Then, with the construction of the 8h Floor Auditorium of the Victor headquarters, the « Victor New Office Building No. 2 » , in 1917, Victor finally had a suitable recording location for a full Symphony Orchestra. This led on October 2, 3, 4 and 5, 1917, to Victor's 1st full orchestral recordings. These were of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Karl Muck directing. These recordings were followed on October 22, 1917, by the 1st recordings of the Philadelphia Orchestra under Leopold Stokowski.

From the surviving recordings and contemporary comment, it is clear that Karl Muck was one of the great conductors of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

27 janvier 1917 : Le chef Ferdinand Löwe dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

23 février 1917 : Le chef Rudolf Siegel dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

5 mars 1917 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

29 mars 1917 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 3e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 21e concert de la saison.

11 octobre 1917 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 2e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 2e concert de la saison.

6 novembre 1917 (2e concert académique de la saison 1917-1918 à Mannheim) : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner. Au même programme : 3 « chinesische Gesänge » de Braunschweig, avec la soliste Eva Bruhn ; 4 Lieder de Schubert : « Verklärung ; an den Mond ; an eine Quelle ; im Frühling » avec Eva Bruhn et Furtwängler, au piano.

8 novembre 1917 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la

3e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 6e concert de la saison.

1918

25 janvier 1918 (Berlin) : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Au même programme : l'Ouverture « Léonore » n° 3 de Beethoven et le Concerto pour piano de Schumann, avec le soliste Max Pauer.

20 février 1918 : Le chef Ferdinand Löwe dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

24 février 1918 : Parution dans le journal « der Tag », d'un texte de Wilhelm Furtwängler : « Anmerkungen zu Beethovens Musik » (Remarques sur la musique de Beethoven) .

12 avril 1918 (concert académique extraordinaire à Mannheim) : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner. Au même programme : le 5e Concerto pour piano (« Empereur ») de Beethoven, avec le soliste Edwin Fischer.

14 mars 1918 : Le chef Arthur Nikisch dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 21e concert de la saison.

4 août 1918 : Austria surrenders. The former Austrian Empire is now broken-up into several different pieces, comprising the new nations of Austria, Czechoslovakia, and Hungary, and other parts of the former Empire now belonging to Yugoslavia, Roumania, Poland, Ukraine (as part of the Soviet Union) , and Italy.

Immediately after the surrender, Alban Berg goes to Trahütten on leave and composes 2 large « melodrama » scenes from « Wozzeck », which use Arnold Schönberg's « Sprechstimme » vocal technique.

12 septembre 1918 : Le chef Hermann Scherchen dirige la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Hermann Scherchen

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Hermann Scherchen est né le 21 juin 1891 à Berlin et est mort le 12 juin 1966 à Florence des suites d'une attaque cardiaque.

Fils d'aubergiste, né dans un quartier ouvrier de Berlin, Hermann Scherchen, très vite passionné par la musique, connaît les chemins de traverse d'un autodidacte. Jeune, il apprend à jouer de l'alto et devient altiste dès l'âge de 16 ans. De 1907 à 1910, il joue régulièrement avec l'Orchestre Blüthner et, temporairement, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. C'est sa rencontre, en 1911 avec Arnold Schönberg, dont il est assistant pour préparer la création du « Pierrot lunaire », qui change tout. L'œuvre intéresse Scherchen par bien des points. Écrite dans une atonalité libre, annonçant l'atonalité ordonnée du sérialisme, elle s'inscrit dans un nouveau monde musical, rompant avec les théories Classiques. Grand érudit, ayant étudié pratiquement toutes les dernières recherches musicologiques, Hermann Scherchen se reconnaît pleinement dans ces audaces et devient l'un des plus fervents défenseurs des créateurs contemporains. Le « Pierrot lunaire » est créé à Berlin, le 16 octobre 1912, par Schönberg lui-même, et une tournée durant laquelle Scherchen fait ses débuts de chef d'orchestre est organisée en Allemagne.

En 1914, Hermann Scherchen devient l'un des chefs de l'Orchestre symphonique de Riga pendant sa saison d'été, mais, lorsque la Première Guerre mondiale éclate, il devient prisonnier civil de guerre jusqu'à la fin des hostilités. Il revient ensuite à Berlin, où il fonde un Quatuor à cordes qui porte son nom, ainsi qu'une Société musicale, la « Neue Musikgesellschaft » (Société de nouvelle musique), qui organise des concerts de musique moderne avec le concours d'artistes tels que Adolf Busch, Artur Schnabel et Béla Bartók. En 1919, il crée « Melos », une revue consacrée à la musique contemporaine puis, l'année d'après, devient lecteur à la « Musikhochschule ». En 1921, on le retrouve à la tête de l'Orchestre du « Konzertverein » de Leipzig, puis, de 1922 à 1924, à Francfort, où il remplace Wilhelm Furtwängler pour les « Museumskonzerte ». Dès 1923, il est l'un des membres fondateurs de la S.I.M.C (Société Internationale de musique contemporaine) et établit des liens très étroits avec la ville de Winterthur, où il dirige régulièrement jusqu'en 1947, prenant même, pour un certain temps, le poste de directeur du Collège de musique. En 1923, il dirige l'une des toutes premières exécutions de « L'Histoire du soldat » d'Igor Stravinsky avec Carl Ebert comme récitant.

Parmi ses « premières » de l'époque, on peut citer : les 3 fragments du « Wozzeck » d'Alban Berg ; l'air de concert « Der Wein » de Berg, avec la soprano Ruzena Herlinger ; le « Concerto à la mémoire d'un ange » du même, donné en première audition par la S.I.M.C. à Barcelone, le 19 avril 1936, soit 3 mois après le décès du compositeur ; de nombreuses œuvres de Paul Hindemith et l'Opéra en quarts de ton « Matka » (la mère) du Tchèque Alois Hába. Au début de l'automne 1924, Scherchen et Hindemith, organisent du 15 au 18 septembre, un petit Festival à Francfort-sur-le-Main consacré à Arnold Schönberg, dont le 50e anniversaire avait eu lieu le 13. Le programme comprend, entre autres, « Das Buch des hängenden Gärten » (le Livre des jardins suspendus) ; la Symphonie de chambre ; des pièces pour piano, avec le concours d'Eduard Steuermann ; et le « Pierrot lunaire » .

Scherchen écrit à Schönberg :

« En tant que musiciens, nous voulons ainsi vous faire honneur, avec nos propres forces, sans absolument aucune commission de financiers ignorants. Je ferai pour la « Symphonie de chambre » des répétitions tellement approfondies que vous n'aurez ensuite plus aucun travail technique à faire et que vous pourrez musicalement faire avec l'ensemble ce que vous voudrez. Cher Monsieur Schönberg, faites que ce Festival soit possible par votre venue. Paul Hindemith vous le demande aussi chaudement que moi-même. »

En 1928, Hermann Scherchen devient le directeur-général de la musique à Königsberg, poste qu'il occupe jusqu'en 1931. Par ailleurs, il devient chef de l' « Orchestre de l'ORAG », mais il en prend congé en 1933, en même temps qu'il quitte l'Allemagne nazie, en raison de son opposition au régime en place. Lors de son internement en Russie, il s'était senti proche de la Révolution d'Octobre et on lui prêta, dès lors, une sympathie pour l'idéal communiste. Il profite de son exil pour voyager beaucoup, travaillant à Bruxelles, à Vienne ou en Suisse comme chef-invité. Il finit par s'installer définitivement dans ce pays, d'abord à Neuchâtel, puis à Zürich, où il occupe un minuscule 2 pièces qu'il partage avec sa mère. En 1936, il est à Budapest et compte Rolf Liebermann parmi ses élèves :

« Pendant 6 semaines, nous ne vîmes pas l'Orchestre, relate ce dernier. Il nous confiait la “ direction ” d'une Symphonie dont il était le seul exécutant. Il chantait tout, tenant chaque pupitre tour à tour. Parfois, il changeait de méthode et nous dirigeait à son tour. Ainsi, nous apprenait-il le métier en éliminant tout ce qui lui était extérieur. Il ne nous enseignait ni à faire un geste élégant ni à danser sur l'estrade ni à prendre des poses théâtrales. »

En 1937, il crée à Vienne l'Orchestre « Musica viva », avec lequel il donnera son dernier concert, le 10 mars 1938, en raison de l' « Anschluß ». Il épouse alors la compositrice chinoise Xiao Shuxian, avec qui il aura 3 enfants, dont Tona Scherchen-Hsiao, elle-même devenue compositrice.

De 1944 à 1950, il dirige l'Orchestre de la Radio de Beromünster, la station de radiodiffusion de Zürich. Lorsque les 3 principaux Orchestres des radios de Suisse alémanique (Zürich, Berne et Bâle) s'unissent, ils prennent le nom de « Studio Orchester », et Scherchen en devient le directeur musical. Dans l'immédiat après-guerre, il reçoit plusieurs propositions pour revenir en Allemagne : chef principal de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, de l'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig ou de l'Orchestre Radio-Symphonique. Plus, même : on lui offre un poste à l'Opéra d'État de Berlin ainsi que la direction artistique du Conservatoire de Leipzig. Scherchen refuse tout en bloc, préférant créer à Bruxelles sa maison d'édition « Musica viva », destinée à publier les œuvres des auteurs contemporains.

L'année 1950 marque, pour Scherchen, la fin d'une première vie. Sa mère (peut-être son seul repère) meurt à 88 ans ; sa femme Xiao Shuxian le quitte, il rompt toute collaboration avec la radio suisse et se sépare, après 28 années de collaboration, du « Collège de Musique » de Winterthur. Poursuivi par son « ombre rouge » ; ayant fait, un peu maladroitement au retour d'un concert à Prague, l'apologie de la culture des pays de l'Est, il est en proie à une vindicte sans fin et préfère démissionner de toutes ses fonctions en Suisse alémanique. Il trouve refuge dans le Tessin, à Gravesano. Il rencontre alors la mathématicienne roumaine Pia Andronescu, qui va le sauver du suicide. Elle devient sa femme et la future mère de ses 5 derniers enfants, dont l'aînée, Myriam, a consacré sa vie non seulement à la mémoire de son père, mais aussi à la ré-édition des enregistrements de concert et de studio de son père grâce à la firme discographique « Tahra », fondée en compagnie de René Trémine. De plus en plus intéressé par les recherches électro-acoustiques, Scherchen crée, en 1954, avec le soutien de l'UNESCO, le « Studio de Gravesano », aboutissement d'un vieux rêve qu'il date lui-même des années 1920 :

« Je fis ainsi construire un studio avec 5 murs, et non 4, avec un plafond incliné, donc un local sans aucune ligne parallèle, raconte-t-il. J'expliquai à l'architecte : “ Écoutez-moi bien. Par cette disposition, je veux essayer d'amortir toutes les interférences et les ondes stationnaires. Je veux également minimiser les particularités du local. ” L'idée, au fond, était la suivante : chaque pièce est un individu, petit ou grand, capitonné ou nu et cet individu revêt

différemment chaque son qui existe dans l'espace. Une pièce aux murs nus crée un long écho et rejette fortement les hautes fréquences. C'est-à-dire que l'ambiance donne la coloration sonore à chaque musique qui y est jouée. Pourtant, il n'existe pas d'ambiance convenable du point de vue du son, il n'y a que des cas particuliers. »

Ce studio expérimental d'électro-acoustique donne lieu à de nombreux congrès. Dans ce cadre, Scherchen publie les « Graversaner Blätter ». En 1956, il est nommé avec Josef Krips Premier chef de l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne et effectue de nombreux enregistrements. Pendant 1 an (1959-1960), il prend la direction de la « Nordwestdeutsche Philharmonie » à Herford, en Westphalie du Nord ; ce sera son dernier poste permanent. Durant toutes ces années d'après-guerre, il est fréquemment invité à diriger en France, en Angleterre et en Italie. C'est également en 1950 qu'il se lie avec la firme « Westminster », pour laquelle il réalisera la plupart de ses enregistrements.

Sa passion pour la musique contemporaine fait de Scherchen un pionnier. Grâce à lui, et à sa faculté de perpétuelle quête, beaucoup de compositeurs du XXe siècle peuvent pleinement éclore. Ardent défenseur de la Seconde école de Vienne (Arnold Schönberg, dont il enregistre une vertigineuse version d' « Erwartung » avec Magda László ; Alban Berg ; et Anton Webern) . Il dirige aussi le Richard Strauß de la fin des années 1940 ; Edgar Varèse ; Albert Roussel ; Paul Dessau ; ou, encore, certaines œuvres de son élève, Karl Amadeus Hartmann, auteur de l'Opéra « Simplicius Simplicissimus », au livret duquel il a collaboré. Véritable découvreur de talents, il sait tendre la main à de jeunes compositeurs sériels comme Bruno Maderna, Pierre Boulez, Boris Blacher, Norman Del Mar, Walter Gøehr, Iannis Xenakis ou Luigi Dallapiccola, qui trouvent ainsi une audience internationale :

« Comment pourrais-je dire tout ce que je lui dois en tant que compositeur ? », interroge Dallapiccola.

« 15 de mes œuvres ont figuré régulièrement dans ses programmes et 4 ont été créées par lui, en particulier, “ le Prisonnier ” au “ Mai florentin ” de 1950, que l'on voulait saboter et que seules l'autorité et la conviction de Hermann Scherchen sauvèrent. »

D'hier à demain, celui que Xenakis appela l'accoucheur de la musique a, de fait, noué les liens improbables entre toutes les époques. Créateur de plus de 200 œuvres contemporaines, il compte sans doute parmi les chefs d'orchestres du Siècle au plus vaste répertoire, allant de Giovanni Gabrieli et Bonaventura Cavalieri à Luigi Nono et Karlheinz Stockhausen.

Parce qu'il est intransigeant, déterminé, engagé dans son Siècle et dirige, la plupart du temps, sans baguette, beaucoup voient en Hermann Scherchen une figure excentrique alors qu'il n'en est rien. Certes, il occupe une place atypique dans l'univers des chefs d'orchestre du XXe siècle, car il est un ennemi juré de la routine. Curieux de tout, enthousiaste et infatigable travailleur (il n'exécute jamais une œuvre contemporaine sans une étude préalable fort minutieuse de la partition) , il a toujours cherché à trouver le point d'union entre hier et aujourd'hui. Conscient que tout est affaire d'héritage, il s'est ouvert à toute nouveauté sans jamais couper les racines qui l'unissaient à la tradition.

S'il sait parfaitement expliquer (les séances de répétitions le montrent exigeant mais en dialogue permanent avec ses musiciens) , il sait aussi écouter. Ce musicien né a été à bonne école, comme l'atteste une lettre au vitriol d'Arnold

Schœnberg en 1914 :

« Cher Scherchen, j'ai plusieurs choses importantes à vous dire au sujet de la répétition d'hier de la " Symphonie de chambre ". D'abord, les bonnes : l'ensemble est bien travaillé. Mais, à part quelques rythmes hasardeux ou inexacts et quelques endroits qui ne donnent rien du tout, presque tout le reste aurait pu faire une excellente impression si (et maintenant, j'en viens aux mauvaises, que je dois dire énergiquement et auxquelles je souhaite que vous prêtiez la plus grande attention) vos tempi n'étaient tout du long trop vifs. Vous semblez tomber dans l'erreur qui consiste à confondre tempérament et vitesse !! Mais le tempérament en lui-même ne veut rien dire, et si cela signifie quelque chose comme tempérament fougueux, c'est pour moi sans valeur aucune. Débarrassez-vous de cette erreur et faites de la musique avec un tempérament réservé, retenu !! La chose la plus importante : c'est l'Adagio. Vous le jouez presque comme un Allegro !!! Le début doit en être calme, méditatif, et la progression ne doit rien avoir de passionné, mais ce doit être l' " intériorité " qui " s'intensifie ". Pour poursuivre : toute la ré-exposition est précipitée. Tout devient confus, aucune note n'est claire. Utilisez autant d'expression qu'il y a dans la pièce et n'essayez pas d'en donner toujours plus. »

S'il existe un terme pour exprimer ce que pouvait être son style, on le trouve dans le titre de l'un de ses essais, « l'Essence de la musique » , ou dans ces quelques conseils adressés à Rolf Liebermann :

« Il est inutile d'apprendre à diriger. Contente-toi d'étudier les partitions. Tu ne feras jamais un geste faux si tu entends bien le morceau dans ta tête. »

Certes, l'homme dérouté parfois, tant il infuse une sincérité passionnée et personnelle sans jamais être dictatoriale dans ses interprétations de Mozart, Vivaldi (fascinante lecture des « 4 Saisons » avec Julian Olevsky) ou, encore, Beethoven (avec l'une des plus puissantes exécutions de la Symphonie n° 3) , et des enregistrements légendaires des Concertos pour piano avec Paul Badura-Skoda. Il fait également renaître Bach, Haydn (dont il est le premier à réaliser un enregistrement intégral des « Symphonies londoniennes ») ou, encore, Purcell. Toute œuvre devient, avec lui, œuvre nouvelle à recréer car le temps n'a rien arrêté, ni figé ; tout, au contraire, continue.

Le compositeur anglais Humphrey Searle écrit ceci au sujet de Scherchen :

« Avec lui, la musique prend vie sans le secours d'aucun artifice virtuose. Scherchen, en fait, n'est nullement un chef virtuose qui veut imposer sa personnalité au public, écrit. Ce qu'il recherche, c'est d'exprimer ce qu'il ressent que le compositeur avait à l'esprit quand il écrivit l'œuvre et d'en faire une expérience vivante, pas un " musée Classique ". »

Il est vrai que, parfois, Scherchen tord le cou à certaines œuvres : il existe notamment un enregistrement de la 5e Symphonie de Gustav Mahler à laquelle Scherchen a apporté de nombreuses corrections, rayant une partie importante des notes. Mais Scherchen préférera toujours la critique ouverte à toute tentative d'influence sur les critiques. C'est encore en pionnier qu'il enregistrera pour la 1re fois un bon nombre des Symphonies du compositeur viennois (à savoir la n° 1, dite « Titan » ; les n° 2, n° 3, n° 5, n° 7, n° 8, ou « Symphonie des mille » ; n° 9 et n° 10) . Son travail sur Bach, avec l'orchestration de « l'Art de la fugue » , qu'il dirige le 14 mai 1965 à Lugano, offre une Maîtrise exceptionnelle de l'Orchestre où il choisit les timbres non pas comme une fin en soi, mais pour mieux éclairer l'organisation de l'œuvre. Aux cordes interrogatives répondent des vents affirmatifs :

« Il s'ensuit une dialectique de l'exposition et de l'expression propre à l'œuvre elle-même qui me semble se rapprocher considérablement de l'idéal que je vise. À savoir, communiquer à l'auditeur le message auditif apparemment le plus docte et le plus ardu d'une manière immédiate. » , explique Scherchen.

Sans doute par désir pédagogique, Scherchen a écrit plusieurs traités sur la musique et la direction d'orchestre. Par générosité et, toujours, curiosité, il prend sous son aile de jeunes débutants comme Francis Travis, qui fut d'abord son assistant avant de voler de ses propres ailes, ou Igor Markevitch, qui allait également devenir l'un des plus grands chefs d'orchestre du Siècle.

Toujours dans les années 1950, Hermann Scherchen dirige les premières de « Das Verhör des Lukullus » de Paul Dessau ou, encore, du « König Hirsch » de Hans Werner Henze. Il correspond toujours avec Schönberg dont il a créé à Darmstadt « la Danse autour du Veau d'Or » extraite de l'Opéra « Moses und Aron » . Par ailleurs, Scherchen travaille sur la partition pour son ami et collègue Hans Rosbaud qui en assure la première, le 12 mars 1954 à Hambourg. Scherchen, lui, dirigera l'ouvrage à Berlin, en 1959, en version scénique. Vieillissant et à moitié aveugle, Schönberg interroge le chef d'orchestre sur l'avenir de « Die Jacobsleiter » (« L'Échelle de Jacob ») . Il écrit :

« Je ne pourrai vous dire la formation requise pour “ Die Jacobsleiter ” qu'après avoir repris le travail dessus. Mon projet, dans la mesure du possible, est d'employer des bois par moins de 4 et des cuivres normaux.

1) Style : ce n'est pas une composition dodécaphonique, mais correspond au style de mon “ Erwartung ” et de “ Die Glückliche Hand ”.

2) Je suppose que cela durera 3 quarts d'heure. Mais je peux me tromper. Cela peut tout aussi bien durer 1 heure 1 quart. Je ne sais plus. »

Après être allé aux États-Unis pour diriger le « Philadelphia Orchestra » en 1964, celui que les Américains surnomment « le Magicien de Gravesano » retourne en Suisse. Le 12 juin 1966, il succombe à une crise cardiaque alors qu'il se trouve à Florence pour diriger « L'Orfeide » de Gian Francesco Malipiero.

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Hermann Scherchen joua un grand rôle dans la diffusion de la musique contemporaine. Altiste à la Philharmonie de Berlin, de 1907 à 1910, il débute comme chef d'orchestre en 1911, année où il crée la « Symphonie de chambre » , Opus 9, de Schönberg. Après la Première Guerre mondiale, il fonde en Allemagne la « Neue Musikgesellschaft » (Société de musique nouvelle) et la revue « Melos » , dont il est rédacteur en chef pendant 2 ans (jusqu'en 1921) . Anti-Nazi convaincu, il quitte l'Allemagne dès 1933, fonde à Bruxelles la revue « Musica viva » et, de 1944 à 1950, dirige aux radios de Zürich et de Beromünster. En 1954, il fonde à Gravesano un studio de musique électro-acoustique, et y édite les « Gravesaner Blätter » . En juillet 1951, quelques jours avant la mort du compositeur absent, c'est lui qui dirige à Darmstadt la Ire audition fragmentaire de l'Opéra « Moses und Aron » de Schönberg (scène autour du Veau d'Or, Acte II) . De son art témoignent des enregistrements légendaires, consacrés notamment à Schönberg, à Mahler et, en ce qui concerne le répertoire Classique, aux cantates de Bach et à une intégrale des Symphonies « londoniennes » de Haydn (réalisation sortant de l'ordinaire par le tempo très lent de ses Adagios et Andantes, mais à laquelle son souffle confère une singulière grandeur) .

The German conductor Hermann Scherchen was born in Berlin. Originally a violist, he played among the violas of the Blüthner Orchestra of Berlin while still in his teens. He conducted in Riga, from 1914 to 1916, and in Königsberg, from 1928 to 1933, after which he left Germany in protest at the Nazi regime and worked in Switzerland. Along with the philanthropist Werner Reinhart, Scherchen played a leading role in shaping the musical life of Winterthur for many years, with numerous premiere performances, the emphasis being placed on contemporary music. From 1922 to 1950, he was the principal conductor of the City Orchestra of Winterthur (today known as « Orchester Musikkollegium Winterthur ») .

Making his debut with Arnold Schönberg's « Pierrot lunaire » , he was a champion of 20th Century composers such as Richard Strauß, Anton Webern, Alban Berg and Edgard Varèse, and actively promoted the work of younger contemporary composers including Iannis Xenakis and Luigi Nono.

He was the teacher of Egisto Macchi, Marc Bélanger, François Bernier, Frieda Belinfante and Karl Amadeus Hartmann, and contributed to the libretto of Hartmann's Opera « Simplicius Simplicissimus ». He also premiered Hartmann's early work, « Miseræ ». Conductor Francis Travis was a pupil, then conducting assistant, for 5 years.

He is probably best-known for his orchestral arrangement (and recording) of Bach's « The Art of Fugue ». His 1953 « Lehrbuch des Dirigierens » (Treatise on Conducting) is a standard textbook. His recorded repertoire was extremely wide, ranging from Antonio Vivaldi to Reinhold Glière.

Like Vasily Safonov and (in later life) Leopold Stokowski, Scherchen commonly avoided the use of a baton. His technique, when in this mode, sometimes caused problems for players ; an unidentified BBC Symphony Orchestra bassoonist told the singer Ian Wallace that interpreting Scherchen's minuscule hand movements was like trying to milk a flying gnat. According to Fritz Spiegl, Scherchen worked largely through verbal instructions to his players and his scores were peppered with reminders of what he needed to say at each critical point in the music.

However, Scherchen did not always dispense with the baton. The film of his rehearsal of his edition of Bach's « The Art of Fugue » with the CBC Toronto Chamber Orchestra shows him using a baton throughout, and very effectively.

After a brief marriage to actress Gerda Müller, Scherchen married Chinese composer Xiao Shuxian. A daughter, Tona Scherchen, was born to them in 1938. She has also made a name for herself as a composer. The last of his 5 wives was the Zürich based Romanian mathematics teacher Pia Andronescu, with whom he had 5 children : Myriam, David, Esther, Nathan and Alexandra.

He died in Florence, survived by a number of children, from 5 wives and other women.

One his sons was Wolfgang (« Wulff ») Scherchen. Wulff's 6 year relationship with Benjamin Britten started when he was aged 13. John Bridcut describes the passionate exchanges of letters between the famous composer and the young boy in Britten's « Children » .

Until 2014, his daughter, Myriam Scherchen, co-ran the music label « Tahra » , which released officially authorized historical recordings of conductors such as Scherchen, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Willem Mengelberg and others, generally drawn from primary recorded sources. « Tahra » ceased business after the death of the co-principal of the label, René Trémine.

His sister Helen was married to the Hungarian psychoanalyst Sándor Radó.

« Music does not have to be understood. It has to be listened to. » (Hermann Scherchen)

Scherchen recorded an unusually wide range of repertoire, from the Baroque to the contemporary. His Mahler recordings, made before Mahler became a part of the standard repertoire, were especially influential ; so too were his recordings of Bach and Händel, which helped pave the way for the period-performance practice movement. Included as well were significant recordings of music by Haydn, Beethoven, Berlioz, Tchaikovsky, Glière, Bartók, Schœnberg and many others.

In 1960, Hermann Scherchen recorded works by Max Reger with alto Margarete Bence and the « Nordwestdeutsche Philharmonie », including : « Eine Lustspielouvertüre » (A Comedy Overture) ; Serenade for orchestra ; Romantic Suite for Orchestra ; « An die Hoffnung » ; Variations and Fugue on a Theme of Beethoven ; and Variations and Fugue on a Theme by Mozart.

In 1996, « Tahra » published the only commercially released recording of Gian Francesco Malipiero's complete « l'Orfeide ». It was a remastered live recording of the 7 June 1966 performance at the « Teatro della Pergola », in Florence, conducted by Scherchen only 5 days before his death. The cast included : Magda Olivero and Renato Capecchi (TAH 190/191) .

The eminent German conductor, Hermann Scherchen, was mainly self-taught in music. He learned to play the viola and was a violist, from 1907 to 1910, in the Berlin Blüthner Orchestra and, on a temporary basis, at the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He met Arnold Schönberg and made his debut with Schönberg's « Pierrot lunaire », in 1912.

In 1914, Hermann Scherchen became conductor of the Riga Symphony Orchestra. He was interned in Russia during the First World War. In 1918, he returned to Berlin and founded the New Music Society and a String quartet that bore his name. 1 year later, he created « Melos », a journal devoted to contemporary music. In 1920, he was reader at the Berlin Music College. He took-over the Leipzig Concert Association Orchestra, in 1921, and succeeded Wilhelm Furtwängler as conductor of the Frankfurt Museum Concerts. From 1923 (until 1947) , he worked regularly with the Winterthur Orchestra and was director of the Winterthur « Collegium Musicum » for a time. In 1923, he was a founder member of the International Society for Contemporary Music, on whose behalf, he also appeared as conductor. In 1928, he moved to Königsberg where he was chief musical director (until 1931) and principal conductor (until 1933) of the Eastern Radio Symphony Orchestra. In 1933, he left Germany and worked as guest-conductor in various countries. He created Orchestras and Journals in Brussels, Vienna and Switzerland, all with the name « Ars Viva » or « Musica Viva » and all devoted to contemporary music. From 1944 to 1950, he was conductor of the Zürich Radio Orchestra, which was renamed Beromünster Radio while he was working there. After the Second World War, he gave classes at the Venice Biennale and in Darmstadt. In 1950, he founded the « Ars Viva » publishing house in Zürich, publishing forgotten or unknown works by Classical and contemporary composers. He was also interested in electro-acoustic music and, with the support of UNESCO, founded a sound studio in 1954, in Gravesano (Switzerland) . From 1959 to 1960, he was conductor of the North-West German Philharmonic, his last permanent post. Scherchen is certainly one of the most important figures in the world of music in the 20th Century. He unearthed new talents but without neglecting old traditions. Even today, his interpretations of Mozart and the Romantics are unequalled. Scherchen was one of the few conductors who conducted without a baton.

Hermann Scherchen was responsible for many important 1st performances, including works by :

Arnold Schœnberg : Chamber Symphony No. 1 (1911) ; Alban Berg : 3 Fragments from the Opera « Wozzeck » (1924) ; « Der Wein » (1929) and Concerto for Violin and Orchestra (1936) ; Alois Hába « Matkà » (1930) ; Karl Amadeus Hartmann « Miseræ » (1934) and Symphonic Overtures (1947) ; Albert Roussel « Æneas » (1935) ; Anton Webern Variations, Opus 30 (1943) ; Richard Strauß Symphony for 13 Wind Instruments (1946) ; Luigi Dallapiccola « Il prigioniero » (1950) and « Canti di liberazione » (1955) ; Paul Dessau « Das Verhör des Lukullus » (1951) ; Karlheinz Stockhausen « Kontrapunkte I » (1953) ; Edgar Varèse « Déserts » (1954) ; Hans Werner Henze « König Hirsch » (1956) ; Boris Blacher « Abstract Opera » No. 1 (1957) ; Iannis Xenakis « Pithoprakta » (1957) ; « Achorripsis » (1958) and « Terreteklorh » (1966) ; and Claude Ballif « À Cor et à cri » (1962) .

German conductor and champion of 20th Century music. He was influential in the careers of many contemporary composers.

Hermann Scherchen was musically self-taught. Early in his career, he played the viola and, for a time, he toured with the Austrian composer Arnold Schœnberg. Interned in Russia during World War I, he returned to Berlin after the War and there, in 1918, founded the « Neue Musikgesellschaft » (Society for New Music) . He edited the music journal « Melos » , in 1920-1921. In 1933, he fled Germany for Brussels, where he edited the journal « Musica Viva » (1933-1936) . He conducted also in Spain, France, and elsewhere in Europe, during and after World War II ; he made his American debut with the Philadelphia Orchestra, in 1964.

Scherchen collaborated with avant-garde composers in introducing their works in recordings and live performances. He recorded with the Orchestras of Vienna, London, and Paris and devoted particular attention to the works of Baroque Masters and of Ludwig van Beethoven. Serving as an important link between Schœnberg and his School and the younger composers, Scherchen influenced the careers of Luigi Nono and other leading mid-Century composers, especially in Italy.

Scherchen wrote several books, including the « Lehrbuch des Dirigierens » (Handbook of Conducting, 1929) ; « Vom Wesen der Musik » (The Nature of Music, 1946) ; and « Musik für Jedermann » (Music for Everyman, 1950) .

Hermann Scherchen was one of the leading conductors in the middle part of the 20th Century, especially valued for his pioneering performances of the contemporary music of his time. He was essentially self-taught as a musician and became a violist in the Blüthner Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic when he was 16. In 1911, he was an assistant to Arnold Schœnberg in the preparation of « Pierrot lunaire » for performance. Following its Berlin premiere, the piece was taken on a tour in which Scherchen conducted. He became the conductor of the Riga Symphony Orchestra in 1914, but was soon interned by the Russians as an enemy alien when World War I started. He returned to Germany after Russia left the War to found the « Neue Musikgesellschaft » and the Scherchen Quartet. In 1919, he founded a militant magazine called « Melos » .

He succeeded Wilhelm Furtwängler as the director of the Frankfurt Museum Concerts, in 1922, and, in the same year, began a long relationship with the Winterthur « Musikkollegium » in Switzerland. From 1928 to 1933, he was the « Generalmusikdirektor » in Königsberg. He frequently conducted contemporary music Festivals, especially with the International Society for Contemporary Music, with which he was connected from its founding in 1923. Among his premieres in the 1920's and 1930's were the 3 Fragments from the Opera « Wozzeck » by Alban Berg and the quarter-tone Opera « Matkà » (Mother) by Alois Hába. He left Germany immediately upon the rise of the Nazis to power, in 1933, settling in Switzerland, where he became music-director of the Zürich Radio Orchestra and also gave courses in conducting, which became a regular summer school in Switzerland in 1939. In the same year, he founded the « Ars Viva » Orchestra. He married the Chinese composer Hsiao Shu-sien. They had a daughter, Tona Scherchen-Hsiao, born in 1937, who went back to China with her mother in 1949. She became a noted composer, especially after she moved to France in 1972.

Scherchen resumed his continent-wide activities after World War II ended. He was director of the Zürich Radio Orchestra (1944-1950) and, in 1950, with the support of UNESCO, opened a studio for electro-acoustic research in 1954, in Gravesano, the village where he lived. He continued his writing about new music in the Gravesano « Blätter ». Unlike many conductors of his generation, his « new music » was not merely the new music of his youth, but the continuing evolution of new music. In the 1950's, he conducted the premieres of such works as Luigi Dallapiccola's « Il prigioniero » ; Paul Dessau's « Das Verhör des Lukullus » ; and Hans Werner Henze's « König Hirsch ». He was the 1st to play any music from Arnold Schœnberg's Opera « Moses und Aron » in Darmstadt (1951) , edited it for its 1st performance under his colleague Hans Rosbaud, and led its 1st performance in Berlin. He did not appear in the United States until 1964 when he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra.

He was the author of a leading text on conducting and of many articles supporting modern music. He suffered a heart attack while conducting Gian Francesco Malipiero's « Orfeide », in Florence, and died 4 days later.

Hermann Scherchen, Dirigent, Pädagoge, Komponist, Bearbeiter, Musikschriftsteller, Musikverleger : geboren am 21. Juni 1891 in Berlin-Schöneberg, Deutschland ; gestorben am 12. Juni 1966 in Florenz, Italien.

Als Sohn eines Gastwirts, erhielt Scherchen bereits in jungen Jahren Violinunterricht, seine musikalische Ausbildung erfolgte ansonsten im wesentlichen autodidaktisch. Nachdem er als Bratscher in verschiedenen Orchestern gewirkt hatte, trat er 1912 zum ersten Mal öffentlich während der Uraufführungstournee von Arnold Schönbergs « Pierrot lunaire » als Dirigent in Erscheinung und erhielt zwei Jahre später in Seebad bei Riga seine erste Festanstellung als Dirigent eines Symphonieorchesters. Während des Ersten Weltkriegs war Scherchen als Zivilgefangener im Ural interniert. Dort konnte er weitere Erfahrungen als Dirigent, Bratscher und Lehrer sammeln, bildete sich in Literatur, Philosophie sowie Akustik weiter und widmete sich darüber hinaus der Komposition von Kammermusik und Liedern. Die Erfahrungen im revolutionären Russland sowie darüber hinaus den Kontakt zu Arnold Schönberg beschrieb Scherchen später als die prägendsten Erlebnisse in seinem Leben.

Zurück in Deutschland im Jahr 1918 nahm Scherchen eine breitgefächerte Tätigkeit als Dirigent und Vermittler Neuer Musik auf, die ihn bis Anfang der 1930er Jahre zu einem der gefragtesten Dirigenten seiner Generation machte. Neben seiner Haupttätigkeit als Dirigent spielten für ihn dabei auch die Arbeit als Pädagoge, Orchestergründer und -erzieher, Organisator von Arbeitstagen, Forscher, Komponist und Bearbeiter, Schriftsteller, Herausgeber von Zeitschriften und Musikeditionen sowie als Musikverleger eine große Rolle. Sein Engagement für Neue Musik verband er mit einem ausgeprägten Interesse für das moderne Musiktheater, die Symphonik von Gustav Mahler, Anton Bruckner und Ludwig van Beethoven sowie die Musik der Vorklassik.

Scherchen wirkte nach seiner Rückkehr nach Berlin als Dirigent verschiedener Orchester in Leipzig, Frankfurt am Main, Winterthur (ab 1922) und Königsberg (Ostmarken Rundfunk) . Tourneen führten ihn zudem durch ganz Europa, in den 1930er Jahren auch nach Palästina und China. Sein Einsatz für die neue Musik zeigte sich und andere in zahlreichen Uraufführungen, so etwa von Werken Alban Bergs, Ernst Kroneks oder Alois Hábas. Seine Fähigkeiten als Dirigent gab Scherchen auch als Lehrer weiter, praktisch in verschiedenen Dirigierkursen, und andere an der Musikhochschule in Berlin, und theoretisch in seinem 1929 publizierten « Lehrbuch des Dirigierens » . Institutionelles Engagement zeigte er mit der Gründung der Neuen Musikgesellschaft sowie der Musikzeitschrift « Melos » 1919 beziehungsweise 1920. Zu Scherchens Schaffen gehörte auch, ohne daß er einer Partei angehört hätte, das dezidierte Bekenntnis zur politischen Linken. Musikalisch zeigte sich dies in seiner Arbeit als Bundesdirigent des Arbeitersängerbundes, für den er Chorwerke, Arrangements und Textierungen anfertigte. Außerdem komponierte er verschiedene politische Kampflieder.

Hermann Scherchen war schon vor 1933 aufgrund seines vehementen Eintretens für die Neue Musik sowie wegen seiner Kontakte zu jüdischen Kreisen und zur Arbeiterbewegung öffentlich diffamiert worden (PauliH 1993, Seite 54) . Mit seiner Übersiedlung in die Schweiz 1933, die er selbst zunächst nicht als Exil verstand, entzog er sich der drohenden Verengung seiner künstlerischen Freiräume sowie politischen und ethischen Auseinandersetzungen. Zu formellen Aufführungsverboten im « Dritten Reich » war es zum Zeitpunkt seines Exils jedoch noch nicht gekommen. (Scherchens eigene Angaben zu seinem Exil sind nicht immer zutreffend. - PauliH 1993, Seiten 53-55.) Neben dem Dirigieren und Unterrichten organisierte Scherchen nach 1933 verschiedene Arbeitstagen, deren Ziel und andere die Beschäftigung mit der in Deutschland verbotenen Musik war. Seine Bemühungen um die Vermittlung Neuer Musik erhielten 1935 eine neue Facette. In Brüssel gründete er den Musikverlag « Ars viva » , der neben der Publikation unbekannter älterer Werke vor allem der Verbreitung zeitgenössischer Partituren und Textbücher, etwa von Karl Amadeus Hartmann und Wladimir Vogel sowie der Zeitschrift « Musica viva » diene. Scherchen gilt als « glücklicher Emigrant », da er in der Schweiz, zeitweise auch in Frankreich, Belgien und England, nach 1933 seine Karriere weiterverfolgen und ausbauen konnte (PauliH 1999) . Die Vielfalt seiner Tätigkeiten und der häufige Wohnortwechsel sind bei ihm nicht als exiltypisch zu werten, sondern entsprechen vielmehr seiner Lebensweise vor 1933 ebenso wie nach 1945. Während des Zweiten Weltkriegs erfuhr sein Wirken jedoch eine räumliche Begrenzung auf die Schweiz. Wirtschaftliche Schwierigkeiten im Exil waren ebenfalls nicht ursächlich auf die Exilsituation zurückzuführen, sondern darauf, daß er sich auf die finanziell riskante Gründung des Ars viva Verlags einließ.

Nach 1945 weitete Scherchen seine beruflichen Aktivitäten aus. Er setzte seine Tätigkeit beim Musikkollegium Winterthur fort, wurde im Zuge einer umstrittenen Neuorganisation des Studio-Orchesters beim Radio Beromünster, der Schweizerischen Rundfunkgesellschaft in Zürich, zu dessen Leiter ernannt, und überdies übertrug man ihm die Leitung der Nordwestdeutschen Philharmonie Herford. Scherchen setzte sich für die neue Komponistengeneration um Karlheinz Stockhausen, Hans Werner Henze, Rolf Liebermann, Luigi Nono, Iannis Xenakis und andere ein und war Dozent bei den Darmstädter Ferienkursen sowie bei der Biennale in Venedig. 1950 gründete er den Musikverlag « Ars viva » in Zürich neu. Eine Remigration in die BRD oder die DDR, wo er 1951 die Uraufführung von Paul Dessaus « Das Verhör des Lukullus » leitete, erwog Scherchen selbst dann nicht, als er 1950 seine Dirigiertätigkeiten für den Schweizer Rundfunk sowie für das Musikkollegium Winterthur aufgeben mußte. Nachdem er wegen seiner unverhohlenen Sympathie für den Kommunismus mehrfach ins Visier der Schweizer Behörden (bis hin zur Überwachung seiner Post 1944) geraten war, brachten sein Gastdirigat beim Prager Frühling 1950 sowie seine aktive Teilnahme bei der sich anschließenden « Tschechischen Kulturwoche » der Partei der Arbeit in Basel, die als « kommunistische Propagandaveranstaltung » der « Totengräber unseres Staates » (LienertKL 2009, Seite 235) bewertet wurde, das Faß sowohl beim Vorstand des Musikkollegiums Winterthur als auch bei der liberalen Partei der Stadt Basel und ihrem Presseorgan zum Überlaufen und führten zur Beendigung der erwähnten Engagements. Dennoch blieb Scherchen in der Schweiz. Er zog allerdings nach Gravesano ins Tessin, wo man ihn nicht als persona non grata behandelte. Dort richtete er 1954 mit Hilfe der UNESCO ein Experimentalstudio ein, das auf die Erforschung der Schallplatten-, Radio- und Fernsehtechnik ausgerichtet war. Die Ergebnisse seiner Forschung publizierte er seit 1955 in den « Gravesaner Blättern » . Zu einer Einbürgerung in die Schweiz, die er zuletzt im Tessin beantragte (20 Jahre früher hatte der Schweizerische Musikerverband schon beim bloßen Gerücht dieses Wunsches dagegen opponiert) , kam es nicht mehr, da er am 12. Juni 1966 in Florenz starb. Scherchens Interpretationen, insbesondere der Zweiten Wiener Schule, von Ferruccio Busoni, Luigi Dallapiccola, Paul Hindemith, Sergej Prokofjew und Igor Strawinsky, gelten als richtungweisend. Viele seiner Aufnahmen sind auch heute noch auf Tonträgern erhältlich, ebenso sind seine Schriften teilweise in Nachdrucken herausgekommen.

Hermann Carl Julius Scherchen (geboren 21. Juni 1891 in Berlin ; gestorben 12. Juni 1966 in Florenz) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Komponist.

Nach frühem Violinunterricht in der Kindheit studierte Scherchen an der Berliner Musikhochschule. 1907 begann er seine Musikerlaufbahn als Bratschist im « Blüthner-Orchester » , dem Vorgänger des Berliner Symphonie-Orchesters (heute : Konzerthausorchester Berlin) und als Aushilfe bei den Berliner Philharmonikern und in der « Krolloper » . Das Handwerk für seinen späteren Beruf des Dirigenten erlernte er hauptsächlich als Autodidakt.

In die 1910er Jahre fielen zwei prägende Ereignisse. Entscheidend für seine berufliche und künstlerische Entwicklung wurde 1911 seine Begegnung mit Arnold Schönberg, mit dem er für die Uraufführung von dessen « Pierrot lunaire » (1912) als Dirigent zusammenarbeitete, welches er im folgenden Jahr auch auf einer Tournee dirigierte. 1914 war er in Jūrmala als Dirigent des Rigaer Symphonieorchesters angestellt. Nachdem er zu Beginn des Ersten Weltkriegs in Lettland als feindlicher Ausländer von den Russen interniert worden war, wo er weitere Erfahrungen als Dirigent, Bratscher und Lehrer sammelte und sich auch der Komposition von Kammermusik und Liedern widmete, erlebte er als ziviler Kriegsgefangener in einem Lager im Ural 1917 die russische Oktoberrevolution mit.

1918 übersetzte er das Arbeiterlied Brüder, zur Sonne, zur Freiheit aus dem Russischen ins Deutsche. Von der musikalischen Avantgarde Russlands beeindruckt kehrte er nach Berlin zurück. Er gründete ein Streichquartett (« Scherchen-Quartett »), die Musikzeitschrift für zeitgenössische Musik « Melos » und die Neue Musikgesellschaft Berlin. Daneben begann er seine Lehrtätigkeit an der Hochschule für Musik Berlin und wurde Leiter zweier Arbeiterchöre. In den folgenden Jahren dirigierte er in Leipzig (1920-1921) das « Orchester des Konzertvereins » und in Frankfurt am Main (1922-1924) als Nachfolger von Wilhelm Furtwängler. Er war Leiter der Museumskonzerte der Frankfurter Museums-gesellschaft und wirkte in Winterthur (1922-1950), als Generalmusikdirektor in Königsberg (1928-1931) und war daneben bis 1933 musikalischer Leiter des dortigen Rundfunksenders. In Winterthur machte er als Dirigent das von Mäzen Werner Reinhart geförderte Stadtorchester des Musikkollegiums Winterthur europaweit bekannt.

Ab 1923 engagierte sich Scherchen in der Internationalen Gesellschaft für Neue Musik (IGNM). In diesem Umfeld lernte er auch Karl Amadeus Hartmann kennen, zu dessen Mentor er wurde. 1926 dirigierte Scherchen erstmals bei den Donaueschinger Musiktagen. Scherchen gehörte der KPD zwar nicht als Mitglied an, stand aber politisch links und war ein großer Freund der Sowjetunion. 1933 verließ er wegen seiner Ablehnung des Nationalsozialismus Deutschland. In Brüssel gründete er den Musikverlag « Ars viva », der neben der Publikation unbekannter älterer Werke vor allem der Verbreitung zeitgenössischer Partituren und Textbücher, etwa von Karl Amadeus Hartmann und Wladimir Vogel sowie der Zeitschrift « Musica viva » diente, aber keinen langen Bestand hatte. 1937 zog er in die Schweiz.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg war Scherchen von 1945 bis 1950 musikalischer Leiter beim Radioorchester Zürich, welches in Radio Beromünster umbenannt wurde, und Chefdirigent des Studioorchesters beim Schweizer Rundfunk. Ab 1950 engagierte er sich bei den Darmstädter Ferienkursen für Neue Musik und verhalf vielen der damaligen Avantgarde-Komponisten zu Uraufführungen. Im selben Jahr gründete er den Musikverlag « Ars viva » in Zürich neu. 1951 leitete er an der Berliner Staatsoper die Uraufführung von Paul Dessaus « Das Verhör des Lukullus ». 1954 gründete Scherchen in seinem Wohnort Gravesano mit Unterstützung der UNESCO ein Studio für Forschungen auf dem Gebiet der Elektroakustik (Rundfunk- und Aufnahmetechnik), wo Komponisten wie Vladimir Ussachevski, Luc Ferrari, François-Bernard Mâche und vor allem Iannis Xenakis arbeiteten. Die Ergebnisse dieser Forschungen veröffentlichte Scherchen in den « Gravesaner Blättern ».

Von 1959 bis 1960 war er außerdem Chefdirigent der Nordwestdeutschen Philharmonie in Herford.

Scherchen setzte sich in seiner Karriere wie kaum ein zweiter Dirigent für die Neue Musik ein. Er dirigierte viele Uraufführungen, darunter Werke von Arnold Schönberg, Alban Berg, Anton Webern, Paul Hindemith, Ernst Křenek, Richard Strauß, Karl Amadeus Hartmann, Edgar Varèse, Luigi Nono, Luigi Dallapiccola, Paul Dessau, Boris Blacher, Hans Werner Henze, Alois Hába, Albert Roussel, Claude Ballif, Karlheinz Stockhausen und Iannis Xenakis. Daneben gründete er Ensembles, die sich der Aufführung zeitgenössischer Musik widmeten, und Zeitschriften, die sich publizistisch um deren Verbreitung bemühten.

Scherchen war als Dirigent für unkonventionelle Interpretationen bekannt. So existiert eine Aufnahme der 5. Sinfonie von Gustav Mahler, in welcher Scherchen erhebliche Striche in der Partitur vornahm (möglicherweise, um eine einstündige Radioübertragung zu ermöglichen). Auch gehörte er zu den Ersten, die Beethovens Metronomangaben ernst nahmen, was auf einigen seiner Aufnahmen zu hören ist.

Zu seinen Schülern gehörten Karl Amadeus Hartmann, Ernest Bour, Bruno Maderna, Luigi Nono, Francis Travis und Harry Goldschmidt.

Während eines Konzerts in Italien 1966 erlitt er einen Herzinfarkt und verstarb wenige Tage darauf.

Elias Canetti portraitiert in seinem Buch Das Augenspiel - Lebensgeschichte 1931-1937 (1985) Scherchen - der als Charakter nicht unproblematisch war - in dem Kapitel Der Dirigent außerordentlich scharf.

Hermann Scherchen war zunächst verheiratet mit Auguste Maria Jansen ; der Ehe entstammt der Sohn Karl Hermann Wolfgang (Wulff) , geboren 1920, späterer Partner Benjamin Britzens. 1927-1932 war er verheiratet mit der Schauspielerin Gerda Müller, danach mit der chinesischen Komponistin Xiao Shuxian (Hsiao Shu-hsien) . 1937 wurde ihre gemeinsame Tochter Tona Scherchen geboren. Diese kehrte 1949 mit ihrer Mutter nach China zurück. Später machte sie sich einen Namen als Komponistin, vor allem nachdem sie 1972 nach Frankreich gezogen war.

Seine Schwester Helena war mit Sándor Radó verheiratet, den er während dessen Flucht 1944 eine Zeit lang in seiner Wohnung in Genf versteckte.

Society for Private Musical Performances

Automne 1918 : Arnold Schönberg returns to live in Vienna for the 3rd time, and founds the « Society for Private Musical Performances » (« Verein für musikalische Privataufführungen ») , in order to rehearse and perform difficult contemporary music properly.

Schönberg has the intention of making carefully rehearsed and comprehensible performances of newly-composed music available to genuinely interested members of the musical public. In the 3 years, between February 1919 and 5 December 1921 (when the « Verein » had to cease its activities due to Austrian hyper-inflation) , the organization gave 353 performances of 154 works in a total of 117 concerts.

Circumstances permitting, concerts were given at the rate of 1 per week, with each programme consisting entirely of modern works. The range of music included was very wide, the « allowable » composers not being confined to the « Schœnberg circle » but drawn from all those who had (as he himself put it) a real face or name. During the Society's 1st 2 years, in fact, Schœnberg did not allow any of his own music to be performed ; instead, the programmes included works by Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß, Ferruccio Busoni, Max Reger, Igor Stravinsky, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Béla Bartók, Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Erik Satie, Anton Webern, Alban Berg, and many others.

The players at these events were chosen from among the most gifted young musicians available, and each work was rehearsed intensively, either under Schœnberg himself or by a « Vortragsmeister » (Performance Director) specifically appointed by him. Clarity and comprehensibility of the musical presentation was the overriding aim, with audiences sometimes being permitted to hear « open rehearsals » , and complex works sometimes being played more than once, in the same concert.

Only those who had joined the organization were admitted to the events : the intention was to exclude « sensation-seeking » members of the Viennese public (who would often attend concerts with the express intention of whistling derisively at « modern » works by blowing across their house-keys) as well as keep-out hostile critics who would attack such music in their publications : a sign displayed on the door (in the manner of a police notice) would state that :

Applause was not permitted after the performance of any work on the program.

A successor Society under the ægis of Alexander von Zemlinsky, with Arnold Schœnberg as Honorary President and Heinrich Jalowetz and Viktor Ullmann among the « Performance Directors » , operated in Prague, from April 1922 to May 1924. At its peak, its membership was over 400, substantially larger than the Vienna Society - and, also unlike the Vienna Society, whose membership was largely made-up of professional musicians, the membership of the Prague Society was chiefly amateurs : a study published in 1974 instances « civil servants, writers, doctors, lawyers, university and school teachers, businessmen, actors and painters » , as well as « students and musicians of all kinds » .

In 1918, Arnold Schœnberg founded the « Verein für musikalische Privataufführungen » (Society for Private Musical Performances) , in Vienna. At the age of 44, Schœnberg was widely considered one of the most important and influential composers of his time. After his experiences in the conservative Viennese music life, culminating in the horrors of the infamous « Scandal-concert » of March 31, 1913, Schœnberg must have felt that the time had come to introduce a different way of presenting new music to an interested audience.

With Schœnberg as president and with a board of 19 friends and students an interesting format was developed : weekly concerts which would only be open to members of the « Verein » , music-critics were not allowed and audible approval or disapproval was not permitted.

The programs would remain secret until the evening of the concert. Compositions would be presented at the highest-level of performance standards. They would be repeated preferably 2 to 4 times during the season, sometimes even twice during the same concert, in order to understand the music better. Radio broadcasting was not introduced until 1923 and as gramophone records with this repertoire were not available, the repetition was very valuable ; even in today's music life it can be helpful.

The « Verein » 's main goal was « to provide artists and art-lovers with a real and precise knowledge of modern music » . It was also stated that this was a Society « not for the composers, but for the audience » . In sharp contrast to the common rehearsal practice in Vienna, during those days, the concerts of the « Verein » would be prepared aiming for the highest-standards « with care and thoroughly » . Schönberg and his « Vortragsmeister » (literally : « performance-Masters » , functioning as « rehearsal-Directors » Alban Berg, Anton Webern, Erwin Stein, Eduard Steuermann and Benno Sachs) were securing that the specific work could be properly presented in a performance. The performing musicians were carefully selected and only those who were sincerely interested in the music were accepted. Any display of virtuosity for its own sake was not tolerated.

The « Verein » was active in Vienna, from 29 December 1918 until 5 December 1921, when the economic crisis in Austria made further activities impossible. The repertoire performed in these 3 years contained songs, piano pieces, chamber music (Violin Sonatas, Cello Sonatas, Piano Trios, String Quartets) , smaller choral works, and orchestral compositions by mainly contemporary composers of different styles, from Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß to the most recent music. The repertoire also included many composers whose works do not belong to the Central European tradition. The orchestral works would be presented in arrangements for piano solo, piano 4 hands or 2 piano's (6 hands or 8 hands) , again, with « the highest-standards of concert performance » .

The « Verein » was not intended as a vehicle for for a specific type of music or for Schönberg himself. Max Reger (of whom 23 compositions were performed) and Claude Debussy (16 compositions performed) were the composers most presented and it was not until the 3rd season of the « Verein » that Schönberg introduced some of his own music. After the « Verein » in Vienna had been disbanded, another 3 seasons in Prague were presented with a total of 20 concerts, under presidency of Alexander von Zemlinsky, from May 25, 1922, until May 31, 1924. As had been the case in Vienna, Max Reger and Claude Debussy were performed most often, now followed by Schönberg, whose compositions were programmed by Zemlinsky.

Numerous 1st performances, as well as several world-premieres, were presented by the « Verein » . When looking at the 2 most popular composers of the « Verein » , Max Reger and Claude Debussy, who not only were the most performed but who also were celebrated at concerts that were exclusively devoted to their music, it is remarkable that the « Verein » acknowledged certain qualities in both Debussy and Reger and that our time only appreciates Debussy and seems to have forgotten about Reger. Can it be that our present music life does not do justice to the music of Reger, who was considered a genius by Schönberg ?

Since the days of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven, the use of piano reductions of orchestral music or even of string quartets had been a customary way of getting acquainted with new music. One could play the music at home, and repeat it as much as desired. Before technical progress made sound reproduction possible, this was not only the general way to become familiar with certain compositions. It also allowed presenting them in concert in this format, when the available funds would not allow the engaging of an Orchestra. In Schönberg's view, one would always be able to understand the real content of the music in these piano arrangements, sometimes even better, as there would be no distraction by an orchestration that might impress on its own. In the brochure of the « Verein » , it reads :

« In this manner, it is namely possible to hear and judge modern orchestral works stripped of all sound effects that only an Orchestra produces and of all of its sensory aids. Thereby, invalidating the common reproach that this music owes its effect solely to its more or less rich and striking instrumentation and does not possess all of the features which formerly were characteristic of good music : melodies, richness of harmony, polyphony, perfect form, architecture, etc.

For the 2nd season of the « Verein » , ambitious plans were made to arrange orchestral compositions for large chamber ensembles, still using the piano but including strings and winds, in order to preserve more of the original orchestral colours. The combination of several string and wind instruments with piano so far only existed in a few relatively insignificant works in the repertoire until Arnold Schönberg, in 1912, composed his « Pierrot lunaire » , Opus 21, for « Sprechstimme » and the unprecedented combination of flute/piccolo, clarinet/bass-clarinet, violin/viola, violoncello and piano.

Schönberg started the use of a new and richer type of arrangement for the « Verein » with his own 1920 arrangement of Gustav Mahler's « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » for what would soon become the standard ensemble : flute, clarinet, 5 string instruments (string quartet and double bass) , piano and harmonium, in this case with the exceptional addition of percussion.

The main principle of Schönberg's model of arranging was to leave from the original orchestration not only the string parts but also 2 or more of the wind parts as much as possible untouched. The remaining woodwind parts and additional string parts were given to the harmonium and the piano was pre-dominantly used for brass, harp and percussion parts.

Schönberg's method of arranging also served as a model for all other later « Verein » ensemble arrangements by his students : Erwin Stein, Karl Rankl, Hanns Eisler, Benno Sachs and Rudolf Kolisch. The arranging probably took place under Schönberg's guidance. The « Verein » ensemble performed only 6 of the total of 17 orchestral compositions that were arranged : Gustav Mahler's « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » and 4th Symphony ; Max Reger's « Romantische Suite » , Opus 125 ; Arnold Schönberg's 5 Orchestra Pieces, Opus 16 ; Anton Webern's 5 Orchestra Pieces, Opus 10, and 6 Orchestra Pieces, Opus 6. The other 11 arrangements remained unperformed until the revival of this particular « Verein » enterprise, much later at the end of the 20th Century.

Projects of the « Verein » as announced in the last season included the performances of chamber ensemble versions of all of Beethoven's Piano Concertos and Violin Concerto ; Reger's Violin Concerto and Piano Concerto ; Mozart's Piano Concerto in C minor, KV 491 ; Brahms's Violin Concerto and 2nd Piano Concerto ; plus Anton Bruckner's 7th Symphony.

Concerning Bruckner's Symphony, the prospectus mentions that it would be artistically necessary to remove the usual cuts. Of all these mentioned works, only the Reger Violin Concerto and Bruckner's 7th Symphony were arranged, but not performed.

The concept of arranging or even re-writing music for other, usually smaller ensembles has a long history and it still exists today in many forms. Composers often arrange their own music or that of others, ranging from very literal transcriptions to very free versions. Of course, these arrangements often had (and still have) to do with a lack of funding, as was the case in Vienna, around 1920. This situation led Schönberg to use the « Verein » chamber ensemble, with its new format in between the original Orchestra version and the piano reduction.

Such a reduction obviously means that one loses the potential massive sound of the Orchestra, and also the many colours of the full orchestration but, on the other hand, one gains the individual expression of the solo strings and the different energy of a chamber ensemble.

For the dedicated Brucknerian, for the student of the 1920's, in general, or the « Second Viennese School » , in particular - indeed, for any open-minded or broad-minded listener.

When Arnold Schönberg (together with Alban Berg and Anton Webern) founded his « Verein für musikalische Privataufführungen » , in November 1918, his intention was to present music (and not just contemporary music) which he regarded as under-valued, or deserving of particular promotion and attention. It was, as Berg put it in a prospectus, « not a Society for composers, but exclusively for the public » : in fact, the press was expressly excluded, and applause (as well as expressions of displeasure) forbidden. After 118 concerts, the Society was disbanded in September 1921 - 1 month before this version of Bruckner's 7th Symphony was completed, an accident of history which meant that its 1st performance (by the Thomas Christian Ensemble) had to wait until 19 March 2000.

Remember that, however much Schönberg and his 3 student-transcribers genuinely valued this music, the sound culture of the 1920's (by now, relatively linear, disciplined and monochrome) was very different to the massively colourful, organ-like sonorities favoured by Bruckner. Written as it was for a diminutive ensemble of limited range (in terms of both dynamic and sonority) , it was inevitable that this grandest of Symphonic essays should re-emerge as an exercise in textural « dieting » - more objective, but equally revealing ; more analytical, but no less involving ; more intimate, but almost as dramatic as the original.

Although the arrangement as a whole was jointly engineered by 3 of Schönberg's then-students, the 1st and 3rd movements were largely Hanns Eisler's work, whereas Erwin Stein worked on the Adagio, and Karl Rankl on the Finale. There are no discernible fingerprints which we can attach to any of these. In fact, working as they did in evident haste, they seem all to have adopted a common method of retaining orchestral string parts from the original score without significant alteration, with the clarinet taking the wind solos, the horn the brass, and the piano and harmonium being used where harmonic weight is required, for example in tuttis or wind and brass chords. To a large extent, therefore, these are arrangements of convenience, not great artistry.

What you most lose is the sheer weight and range of orchestral tone-colour. Bruckner's string tremolandi are crudely exposed on individual instruments, the great outbursts of brass instruments (in the Scherzo, for example) lack impact, and the solemn harmonic voice of the great Adagio is belittled by such a diversity of solo lines.

Advantages ? Hey, don't rule these out ! The intimacy of a small ensemble such as this is a very effective means of highlighting contrapuntal dialogue, and introducing light and shade into Bruckner's massive (sometimes dense) tuttis. So, detail emerges afresh as if caught in a spotlight. In the process, one is made more aware of the historical links between the « Second Viennese School » and its Schubert-Bruckner-Mahler ancestry. « Chamberised » Bruckner, as here, connects well with the Mahler of the 9th and the Schönberg of the « Chamber Symphony » . Listeners with an ear for such musical « family trees » will find this arrangement especially absorbing and illuminating.

Hanns Eisler, Erwin Stein, and Karl Rankl made this arrangement for Arnold Schönberg's « Society for Private Musical Performances » , a group that put on concerts for members only, with the press banned and any approval or disapproval of the music or the performances (which the founders modestly touted as « exemplary ») forbidden. But this outfit had a problem : it couldn't afford an Orchestra. So much of the music they played was in chamber arrangements. In this case, Bruckner's 100 players Orchestra with expanded brass section is portrayed by a string quintet making do for an entire orchestral string section, while the brass chorus is played by 1 horn and a piano duet ; 1 clarinet plus harmonium handle the woodwind parts. In this version, Bruckner's « Cathedral in Sound » is more suggestive of a chapel.

The « Society for Private Musical Performances » had the good fortune to go broke before this derangement could be played ; the score was lost and forgotten. This fortunate state of affairs ended 80 years later when a musicologist named Hans Winking found it in Schönberg's archives. It finally was brought to life in a concert in Cologne, in 2000. In this era where, if given the chance, someone will record anything, here it is on CD.

I have to say that the members of the Thomas Christian Ensemble are good musicians who play extremely well. The results are not unmusical. The poignant opening phrase of the Symphony sounds promising, as Andrew Joy's rich French horn sound soars-out. But, then, the string quintet's tremolando sounds like a silent movie band playing a bad suspense cue, not at all the hushed and reverent effect Bruckner intended. And so, it goes from there. There are occasional interesting nuances of timbre and atmosphere, but these are surrounded by long, texturally threadbare sections. When trying to duplicate Bruckner's awesome crescendos, the ensemble turns raw and shrill. And it's not helped by MDG's sound, recorded at a loud orchestra-size level.

Post-Verein

Since 1918, the « Verein » has had a lasting influence on the presentation of new music and it became the source of inspiration for many organizations for new music, from the early 1920's until our present times ; it has served as model for many concert Societies and Festivals after the Second World War and it still is influencing serious music presenters all over the world.

The renewed interest in the arrangements of the « Verein » started in the late 1970's. Most of the re-discovering and presenting of the arrangements of the « Verein » can be attributed to the « Schœnberg Ensemble » . The « Schœnberg Ensemble » , founded by the present writer (Henk Guittart) , in 1974, emerged from an ensemble of students at the Royal Conservatory in The Hague, The Netherlands. I was the ensemble's violist and artistic leader, and as such responsible until 1988 for the development of the repertoire. When I visited for the 1st time, in 1978, the newly-build Arnold Schœnberg Institute, in Los Angeles, as part of my research regarding performance practice questions and the studying of the manuscripts of Arnold Schœnberg, I found in the archives besides some interesting Schœnberg manuscripts of early compositions also many « Verein » arrangements.

The « Schœnberg Ensemble » started performing and recording most of these arrangements and we probably gave the 1st performance, or at least the 2nd performance after the Viennese « Verein » , of many of the « Verein » arrangements between the years 1978 and 1990. Already in the early 1980's, the « Schœnberg Ensemble » decided to continue the « Verein » tradition by commissioning composers-arrangers to build additional repertoire while using the « Verein » model of arranging. The value of performing these « Verein » and « post-Verein » arrangements, in today's music life, still lays in presenting underexposed repertoire, with obvious exceptions of composers such as Claude Debussy, Richard Wagner, Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler.

In the past 30 years, many ensembles world-wide have performed and recorded « Verein » arrangements, often to great acclaim. Our initiative to create new « Verein » arrangements has also been followed by many others, ensembles and composers-arrangers, in an increasing way.

In the past 20 years, I have conducted most of the « Verein » arrangements, remaining basically true to the original arrangement while comparing it with the original orchestral score and correcting obvious mistakes.

Until 2011, when I started revising many of the arrangements, I had restricted myself to minor changes in instrumentation, but closer inspection of the arrangements in comparison with the original instrumentation led me to the conviction that it would be in the spirit of the « Verein » to improve the instrumentation choices during rehearsal, thus, keeping it a lively art. This, I did often in co-operation with the musicians. It felt even more justified because many of the pieces were not performed during the days of the « Verein » , and actually never even rehearsed. This has led me in certain cases to add instruments, and exchange voices, particularly in the keyboards.

Der im November 1918 in Mödling bei Wien gegründete und 1921 wieder aufgelöste Verein für musikalische Privataufführungen ging auf eine Initiative des österreichischen Komponisten Arnold Schönberg zurück.

Ziel des Vereines war es « Künstlern und Kunstfreunden eine wirkliche und genaue Kenntnis moderner Musik zu verschaffen ». Dies sollte im Rahmen nicht-öffentlicher Konzerte, nur vor zahlenden Vereinsmitgliedern, stattfinden. Schönberg selbst übernahm Präsidentschaft und Programmauswahl, unterstützt von einem 19-köpfigen Vorstand aus dem Kreis seiner Freunde und Schüler. Eine wichtige Intention des bald auch als « Schönberg-Verein » bekannten Unternehmens war es, missliebige Pressevertreter von Aufführungen fernzuhalten (Konzerte und Uraufführungen der vorangegangenen Jahre endeten mehrfach als Skandale mit entsprechenden Zeitungskritiken, besonders berühmt wurde das von Schönberg geleitete Skandal- oder Watschenkonzert vom 31. März 1913) . So blieben, geregelt in umfangreichen Statuten, nicht nur Beifalls- und Missfallenskundgebungen, sondern auch Pressebesprechungen untersagt. Zur Gewährleistung eines gleichmäßigen Besuches wurden Programme vorher nicht bekanntgegeben. Die Programme wurden intensiv geprobt und aus didaktischen Gründen oft mehrfach wiederholt.

In den 3 Jahren des Bestehens fanden 117 Konzerte statt, bei denen 154 zeitgenössische Kompositionen aufgeführt wurden. Proben und Konzerte erfolgten und andere im Wiener Konzerthaus, Wiener Musikverein oder dem Festsaal des Kaufmännischen Vereins. Zu den aufgeführten Komponisten zählten beispielsweise Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß, Ferruccio Busoni, Max Reger, Igor Strawinsky, Erich Wolfgang Korngold, Béla Bartók, Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Erik Satie, Alban Berg und Anton Webern. Erst 1920 wurde auch ein eigenes Werk Schönbergs ins Programm genommen. Die Ausführenden waren überwiegend Schönberg-Schüler. Da kein Orchester zur Verfügung stand, wurden teilweise eigens Bearbeitungen für Kammermusikensemble erstellt, beispielsweise von Schönbergs 5 Orchesterstücken, Opus 16, Anton Bruckners 7. Sinfonie, Gustav Mahlers 4. Sinfonie oder Claude Debussys « Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune » .

Bevor der Verein im Dezember 1921 wegen Geldmangels infolge der Inflation in Österreich aufgelöst werden mußte, versuchte Schönberg noch durch einen Außerordentlichen Abend Geld aufzutreiben : Am 27. Mai 1921 fand ein Konzert mit vier Walzern von Johann Strauß Sohn statt, die von Arnold Schönberg, Alban Berg und Anton von Webern für Streichquartett, Klavier und Harmonium arrangiert wurden, die Autographe wurden im Anschluß versteigert.

Remaining in Vienna, Lois Hába attends Arnold Schönberg's « Private Society » concerts and studies Schönberg's works, becoming particularly influenced by the « athenatic » style used by Schönberg, in « Erwartung » . He works as proof-reader at Universal-Edition, which enables him to study many of the most recent scores by Schönberg and his students, and results in the 1st publication of his compositions (including the 2nd String Quartet, his 1st major quarter-tone work) . Hába follows Franz Schreker to Berlin, in 1920, finds his 1st success as a composer there, and begins publishing theoretical treatises.

15 octobre 1918 (1er concert académique de la saison 1918-1919 à Mannheim) : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner. Au même programme : Concerto pour violon (n° 2 ou n° 4) de Mozart, avec la soliste Eva Bernstein ; et le poème symphonique « Don Juan » de Richard Strauß.

30 novembre 1918 : Le chef Wilhelm Furtwängler dirige, à la « Großer Konzerthaus-Saal », la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le « Tonkünstler-Orchester » de Vienne. Au même programme : le poème symphonique « Don Juan » de Richard Strauß ; et les « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » de Mahler interprétés par le chanteur Hans Duhan du « Wiener Staatsoper » .

L'Orchestre autrichien du « Tonkünstler »

The Austrian « Tonkünstler » Orchestra (« Tonkünstler-Orchester Niederösterreich ») is based in Vienna and in « Sankt Pölten », Lower-Austria.

The Orchestra's name has its origins in the « Tonkünstler-Sozietät, Wien », which was organizing concerts in the era of Franz-Josef Haydn and Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. This name lived on in the Viennese « “ Tonkünstler ” Orchestra Association », which was founded at the beginning of the 20th Century. The 1st concert was performed in 1907 at the « Musikverein » presenting works of Karl Goldmark, Edvard Grieg, Franz Liszt and Ludwig van Beethoven. In 1913, the Viennese « Tonkünstler » Orchestra were the 1st to perform Arnold Schoenberg's « Gurrelieder ». The « Sunday Afternoon Concerts » of the Orchestra were very popular with the Viennese audience. During World War I, the Orchestra had to merge with the so-called « Vienna Concertverein » due to financial hardships. The association continued to organize concerts until 1933.

In the mid-1930's, the National-Socialist conductor Leopold Reichwein founded a new Orchestra, which took the name « N.S. Wiener Tonkünstlerorchester » after Austria was annexed by Germany in 1938. The Orchestra, then, became the « Gausymphonieorchester Niederdonau » in 1939. It was doing concerts throughout World War II, mostly with the « Kraft durch Freude » (KdF) and in supporting the « Wehrmacht ». The Orchestra re-named itself in 1945 to « Landessymphonieorchester Niederösterreich ». In 1946, this ensemble tied to the « Tonkünstler » tradition and called itself « Niederösterreichisches Tonkünstlerorchester » (Lower-Austrian « Tonkünstler » Orchestra) . The tradition of « Sunday Afternoon Concerts » was also revived. In 2002, the Orchestra underwent a re-structuring process and is now called : « Tonkünstler-Orchester Niederösterreich » (« Tonkünstler » Orchestra of Lower-Austria) . The « Tonkünstler » was the 1st Austrian Orchestra with a division focused solely on music education.

From 2004 to 2009, Kristjan Järvi was principal-conductor of the Orchestra, and his work with the Orchestra included a commercial recording of Leonard Bernstein's « Mass ». In the 2009-2010 season, Andrés Orozco-Estrada, who was the Orchestra's assistant-conductor for 2 years, took-up the post of principal-conductor. His contract with the Orchestra is through the 2014-2015 season, after which he is scheduled to step-down as principal-conductor. In November 2013, the Orchestra announced the appointment of Yutaka Sado as its next principal-conductor, effective with the 2015-2016 season, with an initial contract of 3 years.

The « Tonkünstler » Orchestra has its residencies in Vienna and Lower-Austria. In Vienna, they perform concerts in the « Golden-Saal » of the « Musikverein » . The « Musikverein » « Glass Hall » serves as the Orchestra's rehearsal-room. As the State Orchestra of Lower-Austria, « Tonkünstler » have a 2nd residency in the « Festspielhaus » of « Sankt Pölten » . From summer 2007, the Orchestra is also « Orchestra in residence » at the international Grafenegg Music Festival.

The « Tonkünstler » is the only Austrian Symphony Orchestra to boast 3 residencies. The « Sunday Afternoon Concerts » at the Vienna « Musikverein » have a tradition that stretches back over 60 years and remain the « Tonkünstler » 's most successful concert cycle to date. The « Festspielhaus » of « Sankt Pölten » was officially opened by the « Tonkünstler » , on 1 March 1997. As resident Orchestra, they have catered to a variety of genres since then with Opera, dance and educational projects, as well as an extensive range of concerts. They, thereby, form a large and integral part of the cultural life of the Lower-Austrian State capital. In Grafenegg, the « Tonkünstler » have 2 acoustically outstanding venues at their disposal in their capacity as Festival Orchestra : the « Auditorium » and the « Wolkenturm » . The latter was also officially opened by the « Tonkünstler » . Each year, the Midsummer Night's Gala (broadcast on radio and television in Austria as well as in several other European countries) opens the summer season in Grafenegg.

The political and social events and upheavals of the 20th Century have left their mark on the Orchestra's history. The 1st concert by the Viennese « Tonkünstler » Orchestra took place in the Vienna « Musikverein » , in October 1907, with 83 musicians performing. The conductors that night were Oskar Nedbal, a student of Antonín Dvořák, Hans Pfitzner and Bernhard Stavenhagen, a student of Franz Liszt. The « Tonkünstler » gave the 1st performance of Arnold Schönberg's « Gurre-Lieder » under the direction of Franz Schreker, in 1913 ; and Wilhelm Furtwängler was Principal Conductor, from 1919 to 1923. In the years that followed, the Orchestra worked with conductors such as Bruno Walter, Otto Klemperer, Felix Weingartner, Hans Knappertsbusch and Hermann Abendroth.

The « Tonkünstler » have been the State Symphony Orchestra of Lower-Austria since 1945. They have fulfilled the cultural, artistic and educational mandate this entails year on year through their extensive range of concerts at various locations across the region, including the New Year's concert series, as well as through music education projects and their commitment to contemporary music in Lower-Austria. The « NÖ Tonkünstler BetriebsgesmbH » was founded in 2001. A decisive factor in securing the Orchestra's future was the signing of a permanent subsidy agreement with the State of Lower-Austria and the associated incorporation into the « NÖ Kulturwirtschaft GesmbH » , which has since served as the Orchestra's cultural management organisation.

In 2003, the « Tonkünstler » was the 1st Austrian Orchestra to establish a department for music education. The « Tonspiele » (Sound Festival) is among the most extensive music education programmes in Austria.

Soloists who have collaborated with the Orchestra include :

Renée Fleming, Joyce DiDonato, Angelika Kirchschrager, Lisa Batiashvili, Sol Gabetta, Michael Schade and Daniel Hope as well as pianists Rudolf Buchbinder, Fazıl Say, Kit Armstrong and Lang Lang. Sought-after virtuosos such as pianist Maria João Pires, oboist Albrecht Mayer, violinists Augustin Hadelich, Christian Tetzlaff and Arabella Steinbacher as well as harpist Xavier de Maistre will perform in the upcoming 2015-2016 concert season as guest-soloists.

Tours have taken the « Tonkünstler » to Great Britain, Germany, Spain, Slovenia, the Baltic States and, several times, to Japan. In the 2013-2014 concert season, they went on an extended tour to Great Britain with Andrés Orozco-Estrada. A tour to Japan that is to last several weeks is in the works for May 2016 under the direction of the new Chief Conductor Yutaka Sado.

Numerous CD recordings reflect the Orchestra's versatile artistic profile. These include the Symphony No. 2 « Lobgesang » by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy and Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 1, both conducted by the then Music Director Andrés Orozco-Estrada. In 2014, Symphonies Nos. 1 and 3 by Mendelssohn-Bartholdy were released on CD ; Symphonies Nos. 4 and 5 are to follow in 2015. The complete recording of all 4 Symphonies by Johannes Brahms was also released in 2015. 2013 saw the release of the « Symphonie fantastique » by Hector Berlioz on « Cēms Classics » , also under the direction of Andrés Orozco-Estrada. Other recording projects include Leonard Bernstein's « Mass » , Joseph Haydn's Paris Symphonies and Ludwig van Beethoven's Symphony No. 9 in a version by Gustav Mahler, all under the direction of Kristjan Järvi. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy's « Sommernachtstraum » , Schumann's « Manfred » , Franz Schmidt's « Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln » as well as « Desert Music » by Steve Reich and « Zeitstimmung » (Rough Music) by Heinz Karl Gruber are also available. The CD « ZEIT : PUNKTE » was released in 2012, featuring 3 commissioned works.

The « Tonkünstler » feature in the « Tonkünstler » programme on Austrian radio every last Thursday evening of the month. The regional public radio for Lower-Austria, « ORF Radio Niederösterreich » , presents previews of musical highlights, information on current « Tonkünstler » projects and on other performances in the Lower-Austrian musical events calendar. The book « Die Tonkünstler. Orchester-Geschichten aus Wien und Niederösterreich » was published in 2007 on the occasion of the Orchestra's Centennial anniversary. Contributions by Otto Biba, Ernst Kobau, Philipp Stein, Markus Hennerfeind, Wilhelm Sinkovicz, Walter Weidringer and editor Rainer Lepuschitz examine previously overlooked or neglected aspects of Austrian Orchestral history.

Tonkünstler-Orchester Niederösterreich

Das Tonkünstler-Orchester ist das Symphonieorchester des Landes Niederösterreich.

Die Residenzen des Orchesters sind in Wien im Musikverein und in Niederösterreich im Festspielhaus Sankt Pölten. Im Sommer sind die Tonkünstler als Orchestra in Residence des Musik-Festival Grafenegg in Grafenegg tätig, wo es mit der Open Air-Bühne Wolkenturm und dem Konzertsaal Auditorium weitere Spielstätten gibt. Im Rahmen des Kulturauftrags als niederösterreichisches Landesorchester gastieren die Tonkünstler regelmäßig in allen Landesbezirken.

Am 10. Oktober 1907 fand im Wiener Musikverein das erste Konzert des Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchesters statt, das bis 1914 als eigenständiges Orchester bestand und noch bis 1933 für den Verein Wiener Tonkünstler-Konzerte spielte. Mitte der 1930er Jahre trat das nun von Leopold Reichwein dirigierte Orchester unter anderem als Orchester des Kampfbunds für deutsche Kultur im Wiener Konzerthaus auf. Nach der Fusion des Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchesters mit dem Wiener Concertverein sowie der Auflösung des Vereins « Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchester » wurde das Orchester in « Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchester » umbenannt. Kurz nach dem Anschluß firmierte das Orchester unter dem Namen N.S.

Wiener Tonkünstlerorchester. Aus dem N.S. Wiener Tonkünstlerorchester wurde im Jahr 1939 das Gausymphonieorchester Niederdonau, das sich insbesondere in der Betreuung der Wehrmachtssoldaten sowie für die Kraft durch Freude engagierte. Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde das Orchester in Niederösterreichisches Landes-Symphonie-Orchester und kurze Zeit später in Niederösterreichisches Tonkünstler-Orchester umbenannt und die Reihe der Sonntagnachmittagskonzerte wieder ins Leben gerufen. Seit einer Umstrukturierung im Jahr 2002 heißt das Orchester Tonkünstler-Orchester Niederösterreich.

Das « zweite » Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchester wurde primär von Leopold Reichwein geleitet. Mit dem Übergang zum Gausymphonieorchester im Jahre 1939 übernahm den Posten des Chefdirigenten der Steirer Bert Costa. Dieser wurde im Jahr 1941 zur Wehrmacht eingezogen, so daß das Orchester von nun an von wechselnden Dirigenten geleitet wurde. Im Jahr 1944 übernahm der musikalische Leiter der Reichsparteitage Friedrich Jung die Leitung des Orchesters.

Den Chefdirigenten Kurt Wöb (1948-1951) ; Gustav Koslik (bis 1964) ; Heinz Wallberg (bis 1975) ; Walter Weller (bis 1978) ; Miltiades Caridis (bis 1988) ; Isaac Karabtchevsky (bis 1994) ; Fabio Luisi (bis 2000) ; Carlos Kalmar (bis 2003) ; und Kristjan Järvi folgte mit Beginn der Saison 2009-2010 der Kolumbianer Andrés Orozco-Estrada, der seit der Spielzeit 2013-2014 als designierter Orchesterchef der Houston Symphony wirkt. Ab der Saison 2015-2016 ist Yutaka Sado Chefdirigent der Tonkünstler.

Die Mitglieder arbeiteten mit Gastdirigenten wie Jeffrey Tate, Bruno Weil, Andrew Litton sowie dem « Principal Guest Conductor » Michail Jurowski. In der Geschichte arbeitete das Ensemble auch mit Dirigenten wie Clemens Krauß, Paul Hindemith, Arvid und Mariss Jansons, Zubin Mehta und Christoph von Dohnányi zusammen. Zu den solistischen Partnern des Orchesters zählten unter anderem Christa Ludwig, Renée Fleming, Tamar Iveri, Angelika Kirchschrager, Michæl Schade und Bryn Terfel sowie Katia und Marielle Labèque, Arthur Grumiaux, Alfred Brendel, Wolfgang Schneiderhan und Lang Lang.

Die Zusammenstellung der Konzerte umfasst bekannte sowie selten gespielte Werke. Die Einbeziehung von Genres wie Jazz und Weltmusik im Rahmen der Plugged-In-Reihe erweitert das Repertoire des Orchesters. Darüber hinaus spielt das Orchester Auftragskompositionen von Krzysztof Penderecki, Kurt Schwertsik, Arvo Pärt, Christian Muthspiel, Heinz Holliger und Tan Dun. Als erstes österreichisches Orchester richteten die Tonkünstler 2003 eine Abteilung für Musikvermittlung ein, die Workshops für Menschen aller Altersstufen auf Konzerten und Musiktheaterbesuchen anbietet.

Im Rahmen von Konzertreisen gab das Orchester Konzerte in Großbritannien, Spanien, den baltischen Ländern, Japan sowie in Deutschland, Tschechien, Slowenien, Ungarn und Kroatien.

Die ersten Einspielungen des Orchesters fanden und andere mit dem Dirigenten Fritz Busch statt - auf den LP- und CD-Veröffentlichungen firmierte das Orchester unter unterschiedlichsten Namen und spielte Werken von Franz Schubert, Ignace Joseph Pleyel, Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß und Johann Strauß ein. Es erschienen auch Neuaufnahmen mit Werken von HK Gruber (Zeitstimmung / « Rough Music ») und Franz Schmidt (Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln) . 2009 erschien Leonard Bernsteins « Mass » . Im selben Jahr wurden zwei CD-Serien beim Wiener Label Preiser Records aufgenommen. In den Serien « Tonkünstler Live » und « Grafenegg-Live » erschienen seither Joseph Haydn's Pariser Symphonien sowie Beethovens 9. Symphonie in der Fassung von Gustav Mahler. 2010 wurden die Serien um Aufnahmen mit Werken von Gustav Mahler (Symphonie Nr. 1) ; Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy (Ein Sommernachtstraum ; Symphonie Nr. 2 Lobgesang) ; und Robert Schumann (Manfred) erweitert.

Ernst Décsey : « Bruckner : Versuch eines Lebens » , Severus Verlag, Taschenbuch - Nobel Press (Janvier 1920) ; 250 pages / Schuster & Loeffler, Berlin-Leipzig (1921) ; 231 pages / Deutsche Verlags-Anstalt (1922) ; 234 pages.

Dem auch als Organisten und Musikpädagoge hervorgetretenen Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) blieb lange die Anerkennung der Zeitgenossen als einer der innovativsten Komponisten seiner Epoche verwehrt ; erst 1884 gelang ihm mit der Uraufführung seiner 7. Symphonie der Durchbruch. Neben seinen spätromantischen acht Symphonie eine neunte blieb unvollendet, ist Bruckner auch als Kirchenmusiker hervorgetreten. Der Autor Ernst Décsey (1870-1941) hat Romane und Libretti sowie zahlreiche Musikerbiografien verfasst. Nachdruck der Erstaussgabe aus dem Jahr 1920. Seite 236.

1919 : Le chef Willem Mengelberg dirige, à 3 reprises, des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » .

1919 : L'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig met au programme un cycle complet des Symphonies de Bruckner, 23 ans après le décès du compositeur autrichien.

But, in the wake of German and Austrian military defeat in World War I, this was a time of political and economic instability, of uneasiness with the immediate cultural past. The Bruckner Cycle was a painful reminder of the ill-fated era of Emperor Wilhelm II. Younger composers, performers and audiences of the new age of the Weimar Republic rejected the old guard, embracing modern technology (radio, film, recordings) , exploring more remote periods of music and celebrating popular music. Bruckner's monumental Symphonic designs seemed especially anachronistic to Weimar modernists, who had adopted the Chamber Symphony as the the new orchestral ideal.

20 février 1919 : Le chef (national-socialiste) Camillo Hildebrand (1876-1953) dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Camillo Hildebrand

Camillo Hildebrand wurde am 31. Januar 1872 in Prag geboren, wo Antonín Dvořák am dortigen Konservatorium einer seiner Lehrer während des Musikstudiums war. Nach dem Studium ging er nach Frankfurt, wo er unter anderem Johannes Brahms begegnete. Später wurde er erster Kapellmeister in Heidelberg, Mannheim, Aachen und Mainz. Von 1912-1919 dirigierte er das Philharmonische Orchester in Berlin. Nach dem ersten Weltkrieg war er zwei Jahre lang Operndirektor in Freiburg und ging dann wieder zurück nach Berlin. Der Kapellmeister Camillo Hildebrand war von 1928-1932 der künstlerische Leiter der Orchestervereinigung Berliner Musikfreunde eingetragener Verein.

Er komponierte zu Beginn des Dritten Reichs zahlreiche Jubelstücke auf die neuen Machthaber wie « Brandenburgs S.A. sind wir », « Jungvolk marschiert », « Lied deutscher Mädchen (Hitlermädel) », « Lied der N.S. Frauenschaft », « Sturmlied der rheinischen S.A. » etc. , alle im Verlag Nationalistisches Volksliederbuch.

Darüber hinaus schuf er zahlreiche Chöre, Lieder, Orchesterstücke und auch Symphonien. Im zweiten Weltkrieg verbrannten viele seiner Kompositionen. Ende 1944 ging der Professor Camillo Hildebrandt nach Sonderhausen, wo er am 13. Januar 1953 hochangesehen starb.

À partir des années 1920, de nombreux partisans de Bruckner viendront à la défense de ses Symphonies (chacun à leur façon) en les qualifiant de « musique absolue » . Robert Haas, August Halm et Ernst Kurth en seront les principaux acteurs.

La controverse sur la validité des 1res versions autographes sont au cœur de ce que l'on appellera, de la fin des années 1920 aux années 1940, le « Problème Bruckner » . Ce qui sera compliqué par la perte de la plupart des manuscrits originaux transmis à l'imprimeur.

Ernst Kurth

The Swiss music theorist Ernst Kurth was born on 1 June 1886 in Vienna and died on 2 August 1946 in Bern. He studied music history at Vienna University under Guido Adler (a student of Anton Bruckner and Eduard Hanslick), completing his doctorate in 1908 with a dissertation on Christoph Willibald Gluck's Operatic style. After a period as a conductor, and as a teacher at the « Freie Schulgemeinde Wickersdorf », he took his « Habilitation » in Bern, in 1912, with a dissertation entitled « Die Voraussetzungen der theoretischen Harmonik und der tonalen Darstellungssysteme » (The Requirements for a Theory of Harmony and Systems of Tonal Representation), Max Drechsel Verlag, Bern (1913). He was appointed a « Privatdozent » in 1920, and, from 1927 to his death, held the chair in musicology.

Between 1917 and 1931, he produced 4 substantial and highly-influential books, in which he drew upon the ideas of Arthur Schopenhauer, Henri Bergson, and Sigmund Freud in examining Bach's counterpoint, Wagner's harmonic style, and Bruckner's music from a cognitive point of view, harnessing for musical purposes the concepts of kinetic energy (in melody) and potential energy (in chords) :

« Bruckner », 2 volumes, Max Hesse Verlag, Berlin (1925) .

« Musikpsychologie » (Music Psychology), Max Hesse Verlag, Berlin (1931) .

...

In a relatively short publishing career of about 15 years, Ernst Kurth wrote 4 enormously influential works : « Grundlagen des Linearen Kontrapunkts » (Foundations of Linear Counterpoint), « Romantische Harmonik und ihre Krise in Wagners " Tristan " » (Romantic Harmony and its Crisis in Wagner's « Tristan »), « Bruckner, and Musikpsychologie ». Kurth is also the author of a monograph on « Bruckner », in 2 volumes, Max Hesse Verlag, Berlin (1925) ; a portrait of the composer as an artist, as well as an analysis of a conception of musical form.

Since the 1940's, Kurth was gradually eclipsed by other theorists (notably, Heinrich Schenker) .

Heinrich Schenker had a low opinion of Ernst Kurth's work :

« What child would not see, exactly as does Kurth, that these notes in Bach ascend, these descend, but child and Kurth must say why only up to this height, this depth. » (DLA 69.930/12, April 3, 1924.)

However, Kurt's concept of « developmental motif » has remained influential. A developmental motif is one which gradually changes or grows, becoming a structural carrier of formal developments. An example is the triadic motif heard at the beginning of the 1st movement of Beethoven's 3rd Symphony (« Eroica ») which only becomes a closed theme at the culminating closing of the movement. Unfortunately, only a small selection of excerpts from Kurth's writings was translated into English by Lee A. Rothfarb.

Ernst Kurth studied with the musicologist Guido Adler, in Vienna. In 1912, he began teaching musicology at the University of Bern, becoming a professor in 1920. He acquired fame with his book entitled « Foundations of Linear Counterpoint » (1917) ; Russian translation (1931) , which concentrates on an analysis of the compositions of Johann Sebastian Bach. Among his most important works are « Romantic Harmony and Its Crisis in Wagner's "Tristan" » (1920) and a monograph on Anton Bruckner (volumes 1-2, 1925) , which provides a portrait of the composer as an artist, as well as an analysis of a conception of musical form. Kurth expounded his ideas on the nature of creative work in « Music Psychology » (1931) .

The monograph on Bruckner, Kurth's most ambitious analytical effort, arose from years of teaching about the Symphonies and choral works to a variety of audiences. He taught the music in public lectures, attended by non-matriculants, and took it upon himself to introduce the Symphonies to the wider Berne community in Wickersdorf-style lecture-demonstrations. As early as 1917, he offered a public lecture series on the Symphonies, all 9 of which were played in 4 hand piano arrangements, and, in 1918, gave a course entitled « Bruckner as Symphonist » . In the winter term of 1922-1923, he taught a seminar on Bruckner's harmony. The tone and analytical style of Bruckner reflect its formal as well as informal pedagogical origins.

The basis for Kurth's extensive analyses of the Symphonies is a portrayal of Bruckner as a visionary, as a quintessential mystic and embodiment of the expiring Romantic period. Like August Halm, Kurth considered Bruckner's music the zenith of late-19th Century harmonic technique and formal design, a consummate blend of Beethoven's thematic and formal procedures with Franz Schubert's and Richard Wagner's harmonic practices. Musicians and scholars had overlooked Bruckner's genius, Kurth claimed, because they had heard only the superficial traits of the music : the hierarchical binary periodicity, with Bruckner's habitual doubling and halving of rhythmic values and phrase lengths ; his predictable 3 theme Sonata and otherwise transparent ternary movements ; or, worse, alleged formal inconsequentiality and gargantuan amorphousness (Eduard Hanslick and his cohorts Gustav Dompke and Max Kalbeck) . For Kurth, such qualities were insignificant compared to the convulsive, explosive inner forces that invigorated such externalities. In focusing on static formalities, critics had neglected the dynamic shaping process that imbued the music, not only with grandeur and power, but with the very formal logic and sustained creative strength that Hanslick and others had denied Bruckner's music. As Kurth put it, critics « did not comprehend the large dimension and became lost in details » .

The key to understanding Bruckner's music is, therefore, an awareness of its underlying dynamism, its « control of force through space and time ». Just as counterpoint represents a balance of streaming and congealing forces, similarly form is a balance - a « transition » - between musical dynamicism and formal staticism. Form is neither the pure streaming of the formation process nor the pure fulfillment of borders, but rather the transition, the active transformation of the former into the latter. In music, form is neither movement nor its synoptically grasped rigidity, neither flux nor outline, but rather the lively struggle to grasp something flowing by holding on to something firm. Not the shape (« Form ») but the shaping (« Erflirmung ») is crucial. Form is not inert. Rather, it pulsates with tensions and counter-tensions, which represent the motion of a composer's creative psyche. Kurth calls such pulsations « waves », which range in magnitude from local « component waves » (« Teilwellen ») to cumulative, global « Symphonic waves » (« symphonische Wellen »). Formal action consists in variously paced, steadily mounting intensifications, which peak in « Apex waves » (« Gipfelwellen »). These are followed by one or more « reverberatory waves » (« Nachwellen ») and a « discharge » (« Entladung »). With his wave theory, Kurth verifies analytically that Bruckner's Symphonies are, indeed, logically shaped « sonic forms in motion ».

In order to do this, Kurth probes the interior substance of the music, the internal form. He examines escalatory and de-escalatory processes, involving, among other things, increasing and decreasing rhythmic activity ; thickening and thinning texture ; expanding and contracting register ; brightening and darkening timbre ; tonally near and distant harmonies (i.e. , luminescent « sharp-side » chords and dusky « flat-side » chords) ; or combinations of these techniques. The waves do not undulate in regularized crests and troughs but rather overlap variously, with no clear boundaries. Larger waves supersede smaller ones irregularly, but with clear processive logic. Kurth refers to « engthwise » and « crosswise » profiles (« Längsschnitt, Querschnitt ») in order to depict these multi-dimensional undulations. Exterior form (themes, transitions, etc.) is borne by interior form. Accordingly, we must penetrate to the latter before we can grasp and fully experience the formal logic and vitality of Bruckner's Symphonies.

Ernst Kurth was, of course, not the 1st to delve into Bruckner's music. A number of life-and-works-style books on Bruckner did of course exist, for example Max Auer's Bruckner and Oskar Lang's « Anton Bruckner ». But discussions of the Symphonies in such works were primarily biographical and only topographically or hermeneutically analytical. August Halm's « Die Symphonie Anton Bruckners » is a notable exception in this regard. It is one of the earliest substantive analytical studies of the Symphonies. Unlike Kurth's book, it does not offer a complete analysis of each Symphony. However, it does probe deeply into the formative processes in each of the movement types (Scherzo, Adagio, etc.) as illustrations of Bruckner's formal dynamism. As such, it was an important forerunner of Kurth's monograph, as was Leo Funtek's booklet « Bruckneriana ».

Like « Grundlagen und Romantische Harmonik », Bruckner turned-out to be controversial, only more so, partly because of the split opinion on the music itself (remnants of the Bruckner-Brahms feud) and partly because of Kurth's innovative methodology. His psychologically oriented, intuitive methods ran headlong into the traditional German formalistic, scientific methods. Frank Wohlfahrt, author of a book on Bruckner's Symphonies, praised Kurth's work for its synthetic quality, its clarity and compellingly objective explanations, and commended Kurth for outstanding scholarly intuition. Georg Gohler asserted precisely the opposite. He accused Kurth of vagueness, unscholarly method, « colossal prolixity » , « unnatural expressions » , and of general floweriness. « Heaven protect German musicology » , Gohler appealed, « from books like Kurth's becoming a school of thought » .

August Halm, « Die Symphonie Anton Bruckner » , Georg Müller Verlag, Munich (1914) .

Like Kurth, Halm intended his Bruckner book for professionals and amateurs :

« I do not want to overlook addressing myself particularly to those who, for whatever reason, cannot find access to these music-theoretical, primarily technical compositional discussions, or do not themselves want to try to find access. For I would like to have written this my book also for such individuals. » (xiv)

Ernst Kurth was also fond of Karl Grunsky's « Anton Bruckner » which gives cursory, hermeneutic analyses of all 9 Symphonies, movement by movement (pages 53-99) . More important than the analyses for Kurth's « Bruckner » , though, is Grunsky's notion of dynamic form (pages 40-41) as an externalization of mental life (pages 26, 40, 45) .

Ernst Kurth (geboren 1. Juni 1886 in Wien ; gestorben 2. August 1946 in Bern) war ein Schweizer Musiktheoretiker und Musikpsychologe österreichischer Herkunft.

Kurth studierte Musikwissenschaft bei Guido Adler in Wien und erlangte 1908 den Doktorgrad mit einer Dissertation über die frühen Opern Glucks. Nach kurzer Tätigkeit als Dirigent und als Lehrer in der freien Schulgemeinde Wickersdorf habilitierte er sich 1912 in Bern mit den Voraussetzungen der theoretischen Harmonik. Er war seit 1920 Privatdozent und hatte von 1927 bis zu seinem Tod den Lehrstuhl im neu gegründeten musikwissenschaftlichen Seminar inne.

Kurths Werk, von der Philosophie Schopenhauers und zeitgenössischen Strömungen der Psychologie beeinflusst, beschäftigt sich mit dem Verhältnis von musikalischen Phänomenen zu Vorgängen in der Psyche. In den Grundlagen des linearen Kontrapunkts (1917) erklärt er die Satztechnik Johann Sebastian Bachs als ein Produkt von energetisch gedachten Wellenbewegungen einzelner Linien. Kurth entwickelt hier das der Physik entlehnte Begriffspaar von potentieller und kinetischer Energie (Erstere im Auflösungsbedürfnis von Akkorden, Letztere in der Gestalt der melodischen Linie) .

Die Romantische Harmonik und ihre Krise in Wagners « Tristan » (1920) betrachtet die Harmonik des 19. Jahrhunderts und ihre Geschichte unter einem philosophisch-psychologischen Blickwinkel. Die Ursache von Akkorden und ihren Verbindungen liegt für Kurth nicht in physikalischen Phänomenen, sondern in unbewussten psychischen Spannungszuständen. « Das Wesen der Harmonik » sei « das Überfließen von Kraft in Erscheinung » und Akkorde « Reflexe aus dem Unbewußten » . Im Zentrum der Arbeit steht Richard Wagners Tristan und Isolde als Höhe- und Wendepunkt in der Geschichte der Harmonik. Der Tristanakkord und seine Behandlung reflektieren als akustische Erscheinungen « das unerfüllte, leidvolle Liebesehnen, das aus zartester Regung zu stürmischer Gewalt anschwillt, und unerfüllbar wieder in sich selbst zu endlosem Sehnen zurücksinkt » . (Wagners Erläuterung zum Tristan-Vorspiel) .

Bruckner (1925) verbindet eine gründliche Künstlerbiographie mit einem neuen Ansatz zur Formenlehre, in dem das Entstehen der Form, die « Formung » ins Blickfeld rückt und die Vorstellung von Form als einer vorgegebenen Schablone verdrängt.

Die von Musiktheoretikern und -psychologen gleichermaßen wenig beachtete Musikpsychologie (1931) versteht sich als Gegenentwurf zu Stumpfs Tonpsychologie, indem sie Kurths Konzept der unbewussten psychischen Energie und ihr Verhältnis zu musikalischen Phänomenen systematisch zusammenfasst.

August Halm

Bien qu'il ait pu être considéré comme la « conscience musicale de son temps » , le compositeur et musicographe allemand August Otto Halm (1869-1929) est une personnalité beaucoup moins connue et prisée des historiens de la théorie musicale que son contemporain Heinrich Schenker (1868-1935) ou que son aîné Hugo Riemann (1849-1919) . L'une des raisons de cette notoriété moindre réside probablement dans la nature des écrits de Halm, destinés à un public plus large, et s'appuyant pour cette raison sur une technicité beaucoup plus feutrée. August Halm aborde l'analyse musicale dans une optique radicalement différente de celle de Schenker, avec qui il sera en contact épistolaire à partir de 1916 : il n'a pas pour objectif de construire un système théorique applicable de façon uniforme, mais de produire des lectures contextuelles caractérisées par une « orientation phénoménologique » (page 55) . À partir des années 1960, et plus encore à partir de la décennie suivante, la théorie schenkérienne a rencontré aux États-Unis une soif de formalisation théorique qui en a fait à la fois l'objet d'étude et l'outil privilégié des théoriciens pendant au moins 3 décennies Celle de Riemann, nettement moins diffusée sur le continent nord-américain, a toutefois connu un regain d'intérêt inattendu à partir des années 1980, alors que les théories dites « néo-riemanniennes » remettaient à l'honneur la classification très singulière des progressions harmoniques, que le célèbre pédagogue avait développée dans les années 1880 et 1890. Les écrits de Halm, à l'inverse, ne contiennent à l'ère vue rien qui ait pu susciter un tel engouement de la part de la « music theory » : ils promeuvent une philosophie de l'écoute et de l'analyse musicales bien plus qu'une méthode analytique.

The German composer, writer on music, music-critic and theorist August Halm was born on October 26, 1869, in Grossaltdorf and died on February 1, 1929, in Saalfeld. He was an influential figure in German music education, and advocate of Anton Bruckner.

Son of an pastor, Halm was tutored early in piano and violin, attended Gymnasium in « Schwäbisch-Hall » , then studied protestant theology and music composition in Tübingen. From 1893 to 1895, he studied under Josef (Gabriel) Rheinberger and Felix Weingartner at the « Königliche Musikschule » in Munich. His 1st professional post, from 1895 to 1903, was as conductor of the Society for Classical Church Music in Heilbronn, and custodian of that city's music archive. From 1903 to 1906, he worked as a music teacher at the private country boarding school in Haubinda, and then, from 1906 to 1910, at the « Freie Schulgemeinde » in Wickersdorf, holding several appointments as a conductor and briefly becoming music-critic of the « Süddeutsche Zeitung » in Stuttgart. From 1914 to 1920, he was a music instructor at the teachers' college in Esslingen am Neckar, returning to Wickersdorf in 1920. His wife from 1913 was Hilda Wyneken, sister of the founder of the « Freie Schulgemeinde, Gustav Wyneken » . Halm died unexpectedly of complications from an appendix operation.

As a composer, Halm wrote Symphonies, incidental music, chamber music, keyboard works, vocal-music, broadly speaking in late-Romantic style, and pedagogical works. In July 1910, Wyneken founded a « Society for the Publication of the Works of August Halm » to ensure the survival of Halm's compositions. Gustav Wyneken founded a Halm Society in summer 1929 ; it existed up until 1995, when it was absorbed into the Society for Music History in Baden Württemberg.

August Halm (1869-1929) was a composer and theorist whose writings on music, especially his « Harmonielehre » (1900) and « Von zwei Kulturen der Musik » (1913) , were widely known and highly-respected in the early 20th Century, particularly in Germany. In « Von zwei Kulturen der Musik » , Halm describes 2 historical cultures of music, opposes them dialectically, and identifies their synthesis. His 1st culture (melody) is exemplified by Bach's fugues. The 2nd culture (harmony) is exemplified by Beethoven's works in Sonata form. Halm believed a 3rd culture that united the previous 2 had arisen in Bruckner's Symphonies, the subject of his next book, « Die Symphonie Anton Bruckners » (1914) . In « Von zwei Kulturen » , Halm demonstrates the way that these 2 cultures are different manifestations of dynamic forces in music. To Halm, a well-written fugal subject contains the seed from which the entire piece is generated. A fugue will only be as good as its subject, for its listener must be able to immediately apprehend the dynamic course of the piece. In contrast, the Sonata form is the form of opposition that gains its energy from the working-out of its 2 primary key areas. His idea of the organic nature of form is clear in his description of the fugue as the « formula of individuality » and the Sonata as the « formula of the collective activity of many individuals » , that is, an « organism in the large » . Halm's « Von zwei Kulturen » also provides us with valuable commentary on analytical practices of the time, as Halm criticizes the hermeneutic approaches taken by theorists such as Hermann Kretzschmar (1848-1924) and the narrative approach taken by critics like Paul Bekker (1882-1937) . Halm believed that analysis or criticism that relied upon hermeneutic description or imposed narratives not only failed to educate one on the merits of good music and musical form, but also encouraged one to evaluate music according to the inventiveness of the analyst or critic. It is my hope that the English version presented here will introduce many readers to Halm's unique perspective on music and criticism.

August Halm and Heinrich Schenker

From 1916 through late-1927, August Halm and Heinrich Schenker exchanged publications with one another, and conducted a correspondence that is of particular interest for its substantive discussions of aesthetic and music theoretical matters. The 2 men were in agreement that European music was in a period of decline and was in need of revitalization. By contrast, they were in fundamental disagreement on many other issues, not least on their evaluation of the music of Anton Bruckner. Yet, each considered it worthwhile to maintain contact with the other for his own advantage : Schenker saw Halm as a useful spokesman for his work, while Halm was hopeful that Schenker would be a supporter of his music and writings.

50 items of correspondence are known to survive between Schenker and Halm ; those from Halm to Schenker survive at OJ 11/35 (28 items : 1917-1929) , and OC 12/7-17 (3 items : 1923-1924, those from Schenker to Halm in the « Deutsches Literatur-Archiv » as DLA 69/930 (16 items : 1917-1927) , and OC 1/B (3 items: 1916-1922) .

Lee Rothfarb, « August Halm : A Critical and Creative Life in Music »

(University of Rochester Press, 2009 ; xix 293 pages, Eastman studies in music.)

In the early 1900's, August Halm was widely acknowledged to be one of the most insightful and influential authors of his day on a wide range of musical topics. Yet, in the 80 years since his untimely death at age 59 (in 1929) , Halm (the author of 6 widely read books and over 100 essays) has received much less attention than such contemporaries as Hugo Riemann, Heinrich Schenker, Ernst Kurth, and Arnold Schönberg. Lee Rothfarb's engaging and deeply researched study provides the missing images that comprise the multi-faceted life of this astute musical sage. « August Halm : A Critical and Creative Life in Music » begins by setting the cultural stage and examining Halm's life with rich details from unpublished personal letters, diaries, notebooks, and lecture notes. Further Chapters explore Halm's notion of musical logic and his proposal that the evolution of compositional technique had, by his day, culminated in 3 successive musical « cultures » epitomized in Bach (Fugue) , Beethoven (Sonata) , and Bruckner (Symphony) . Another Chapter examines, for the 1st time anywhere, Halm's own compositions, their motivating aesthetic premises, and their connection with late-20th Century post-modernism. The volume closes with an assessment of Halm's significance for present-day music theory, including its branches that deal with narrativity, plot theory, embodiment, and semiotics.

Halm's subject matter and creative activities ranged widely, and he aimed at maintaining a style that would be accessible and intriguing to music amateurs and music educators at all levels. Lee Rothfarb's book (written in the same spirit) will interest not only music theorists and musicologists but also composers and classroom and private music teachers.

Lee Rothfarb is Professor of Music at the University of California, Santa Barbara. His previous publications include « Ernst Kurth as Theorist and Analyst » and « Ernst Kurth : Selected Writings » .

A strange sense of melancholia kept coming over me as I was reading Lee Rothfarb's absorbing study of August Halm. Perhaps, it had something to do with the repeated vexations of Halm's life, such as his perpetual frustration in finding stable and satisfying employment. Maybe it was that he never seemed to have settled the question of his vocation : was he a music educator or a theologian ? A theorist or a critic ? A composer or a conductor ? He made efforts in all those areas, yet, each seemed only a piece of some greater ambition, some greater project that never quite materialized in his life. Then, again, there was the obvious discontent he felt (and expressed in his writings) about the sorry state of musical culture as he scanned the landscape of Europe in the 1st decades of the 20th Century. Like Heinrich Schenker, with whom he enjoyed an avid correspondence, his « theory », if we may call it that, was conservative in its pedigree, yet, almost utopic in its aspiration. Of course, Halm never attained the fame of Schenker (and it is not hard to detect an obvious intimidation in the tone of many of his letters to his Viennese counterpart) . One is not surprised to learn that, at the end of his life, he lamented that no one would be reading his writings in another 20 years (page 173) .

Fortunately, this prophecy has proven not quite accurate. Thanks to Lee Rothfarb's book, we can learn a great deal about Halm's writings today, and many of us will hopefully be inspired by this critical biography to start reading some of them ourselves. (I) They are well worth the effort. I found it somewhat gratuitous for Rothfarb to justify at the end of his book the significance of Halm's words (Chapter 7, « Halm's Oeuvre : Wisdom and Prophecy ») on account of the surprising intimations they hold for much of the new « critical analysis » that we have witnessed in recent decades or the « return to tonality » by many composers. Still, there is no doubt that Halm could be a bracing voice for so many of us who are trying to incorporate critical perspectives within our music analyses. If Halm's writings were not the future of music criticism avant la lettre, they might still provide an invigorating tonic to our ongoing disciplinary conversations.

The life of August Halm was comparatively uneventful, although Rothfarb has industriously dug-up just about every piece of evidence one could hope to find in piecing together his biography. (Rothfarb has not only exhausted the archives for his book, he evidently interviewed and befriended descendants of Halm still alive in Germany for additional information and documentary material ; tellingly, the end notes of the book come to some 77 pages, over a 3rd as long as the text itself !) The basic facts of Halm's life are easy to recount from Rothfarb's 1st Chapter (« An Intellectual and Creative Life in Music » , pages 1-47) . He was born in 1869 in Schwäbisch Hall, in Baden Württemberg, and rarely ventured far beyond this southwest corner of Germany. His initial training at Tübingen for the Protestant clergy was soon derailed by his passion for music, and he left his 1st church appointment, in 1893, to pursue advanced compositional studies in Munich with the composer Josef Rheinberger, then one of the leading doyens of music education in Bavaria. While Halm ended-up deeply disappointed by his studies with Rheinberger, whom he considered to be hopelessly pedantic, the experience obviously had the effect of cementing his determination to pursue a career in music (13) . More importantly, it was in Munich that Halm began to recognize the need for a new kind of music education that would break through the academicism and elitism he found pervading the Munich Conservatory.

In 1895, Halm passed his final examinations in Munich and accepted an appointment in the city of Heilbronn as director of the « Verein für klassische Kirchenmusik » . This would be only the 1st of some half-dozen minor appointments over the following years, in which Halm was called variously to teach piano and violin to children, to conduct amateur choirs or youth orchestras, and to give lectures on the appreciation of music to a generally untutored audience. A happy exception occurred in 1906, when Halm received an offer to teach at the Free School in Wickersdorf (in southwest Thuringia) founded by Gustav Wyneken, an early champion of educational reform in Germany. Halm recognized in Wyneken a kindred spirit, and the 2 became life-long friends. (Indeed, Halm ended-up marrying Wyneken's daughter, Hilda, in 1913.) Above all, music bound the 2 together ; Wyneken was convinced that music should be a vital component of any educational curriculum for youth (and adults, for that matter) , and he found an ideal partner for his designs in Halm. It was at Wickersdorf that Halm began developing many of the ideas that would soon be presented in later publications.

Halm stayed in Wickersdorf for only 4 years, whereupon (due to political tensions at the school and the sudden departure of Wyneken) , he accepted a conducting position in Ulm. Over the next few years, Halm struggled financially, taking on various other low-prestige teaching or conducting positions, failing to gain any of the more elite academic or journalistic appointments to which he applied. Still, the years between 1910 and 1919 were certainly some of the most productive for Halm. During this time, he published his 2 most important books : « Von zwei Kulturen der Musik » (1913) ; and « Die Symphonie Anton Bruckners » (1914) . In addition, he began churning-out a large number of essays and reviews for various regional music journals and newspapers. (2) It was during this difficult period, too, that Halm made his most concerted efforts in composition, though he had trouble securing very many performances given the strains of the war. In 1919, Wyneken returned to the Free School at Wickersdorf, newly re-opened after the War years. 1 year later, a grateful and relieved Halm rejoined his friend in their old stomping grounds to remain there for the remaining 9 years of his life.

It is worth rehearsing these details of Halm's biography, as they underscore how un-dramatic and provincial his career was. Located for most of his life away from the major musical and cultural centers with which we associate many other German musicians of the early 20th Century (Vienna, Leipzig, Berlin) , Halm was left to develop his own ideas in relative isolation. Still (or perhaps consequently) , the result is a truly original corpus of writings of quite ambitious scope. Halm addresses a gamut of topics in his books and articles, ranging from questions of contemporary music, music theory and music education to analytic essays on his favored triumvirate of composers : Bach, Beethoven, and Bruckner. Thanks to Lee Rothfarb's superb study (which builds on a number of earlier articles that have appeared over the past few years) , English-speaking music theorists can now see what they have been missing.

It's probably not accurate to refer to a Halmsian « theory » of music, for he was never as systematic and disciplined a thinker as, say, Heinrich Schenker, or even Ernst Kurth, for that matter. Still, there are many unifying ideas in his writings. To begin with, Halm early on developed a strong antipathy to many modernist elements that he began hearing in the music of his contemporaries (although he never developed the noxious strains of nationalist chauvinism that we read in Schenker) . Above all, attempts by composers to move beyond or repress tonality in their music were in his mind grave errors. For tonality was the great unifying (and universal) logos of music ; learning to harness the dynamic potential of tonality was not just a stylistic choice for a composer, since tonality was precisely the source of music's affective and (ultimately) spiritual content.

Halm was also deeply distressed about the sorry state of music theory and criticism. On the one hand, he believed most systematic theories to be too sterile in their abstractness and alienating in their pseudo-scientific pretensions. (Here, he was undoubtedly thinking of someone like Hugo Riemann.) On the other hand, he rejected just as vehemently attempts to reach the masses through the crutches of poetic hermeneutics. The many pleasant stories that writers such as Paul Bekker or Hermann Kretschmar penned to accompany their discussions of Beethoven Symphonies were, in Halm's view, childish, shallow, and distracting ; they drew the listener's attention away from the music itself into a fantasy land of pictures and imaginative drama. Not that music lacked drama, of course. But it was a drama not of characters, but of forces, of spirit, and above all, of musical logic. What was needed, Halm became convinced, was a kind of grown-up hermeneutics in which listeners learned to sense those life-giving forces that pulsed through the greatest musical works, to learn how the greatest composers manipulated the various parameters of music (melodic, rhythmic, harmonic, formal) in order to control the ebb and flow of musical energy. For it was in this alchemy of musical forces that the greatest Masterworks of music evinced their true spiritual content.

Halm's repeated emphasis upon the spiritual element of music may seem obvious evidence of his strong religious views. But Halm used the term « Geist » in a more philosophical, Hegelian sense of objective spirit ; it is a spirit that is both intellectual and historical. If we are to look for the real evangelical credentials in Halm's writing, I think Rothfarb is correct that we look towards the zeal with which he tried to speak to the broadest audience of music lovers possible (pages 16-22) . More than, perhaps, any other major music theorist since Johann Mattheson, Halm mounted the pulpit in the public sphere by regularly publishing his musical views and analyses in a variety of newspapers and journals aimed at non-specialists. He was convinced that the true appreciation of great music was not reserved for the elite or connoisseurs ; music was something that (like the Christian gospel) anyone could learn to know if only they would open their hearts and minds.

Or maybe their bodies ? For in Halm, we have a distinctly corporeal kind of music theory in which musical elements seem to have palpable physical effects. The energetic forces that course through the greatest musical works are ones that can be felt by a listener and must be expressed by performers. Indeed, apprehending these forces was key to any true understanding of music, and the job of music criticism was to make as clear as possible how a particular musical work expresses and controls these forces.

We know today, of course, that a concern for musical energy was hardly unique to Halm. Numerous theorists prior to Halm discussed issues of musical dynamics and energy in their writings. (And no one has taught us more about the history of energetics in musical thought than Rothfarb himself : see Rothfarb 2002.) Over the course of Chapters 2 and 3, we learn how much of Halm's understanding of energetics derived from a number of immediate predecessors in music theory, psychology, and philosophy who developed theories of musical dynamics, musical logic, and empathetic perception in their writings : Karl Grunsky, Theodor Lipps, Johannes Volkelt, and especially Robert Vischer (pages 48-88, passim) . But it was Halm who most clearly saw the implications of this work for the field of music.

Halm felt the purest expression of musical energy in unconstrained melody. And there was no composer who better understood this (and projected it in his music) than Johann Sebastian Bach. In Bach's melodic Mastery, we can hear absolute musical motion in its most elemental state. This is what made Bach's fugues so powerful. Each fugal subject seemed to contain in itself a kernel of bound-up energy that is then released and given full expression in the course of its contrapuntal unfolding.

Yet, Halm was not some latter-day apostle of Rousseauian æsthetics in the primacy he gives to melody. For harmony was equally endowed by nature (or, at least, the overtone series) with energetic force - especially in the major 3rd of the harmonic triad. (Ernst Kurth would later characterize the difference between harmonic energy and melodic energy as « potential » versus « kinetic » , respectively.) What harmony possessed that melody did not, though, was a potential to become form defining. By exploiting the capacity of harmony to articulate moments of closure or temporal suspension through a dampening of melodic motion, composers discovered means of creating large-scale architecture. This is seen ideally in Sonata form, in which melody becomes necessarily subordinated to the forces (and constraints) of harmonic drama. Here, Beethoven stands as the paradigmatic composer.

Bach's fugal art and Beethoven's Sonata compositions illustrate the 2 primary ways musical forces may be unleashed and then controlled. It is a thesis that Halm called the « 2 cultures » of music and that is elaborated in his 1st major book, « Von zwei Kulturen der Musik » from 1913. While he produced many other writings, as mentioned, they all can be fitted more or less within the general framework he sets-up in this book (cited hereafter in its 2nd edition as Halm, 1920) .

Now, there has been a great deal of mis-perception concerning Halm's 2 cultures, and we can be grateful to Rothfarb for offering one of the most succinct and clarifying discussions of the concepts in his book (especially, in Chapter 4, pages 89-107) . (3) As defined by Halm, the cultures are not to be understood as narrowly conceived historical « genres » of music. Nor are they meant to tell a story of just 2 composers. It is, rather, a story of 2 competing dynamics of music whose interrelation and tension can be seen as drivers of the whole history of music.

For Halm, fugue represents the most primal element of music : motion in time. It is the individual idea, the single theme that generates its own form. It is thus the principal of natural unity. The Sonata, on the other hand, represents structure in space ; it is the collective in music and manifests itself in the principal of opposition or division. Here themes and melodies are subordinated to the form - or more accurately, to harmonic forces.

In calling the Sonata the form of division, Halm does not mean by this what we might at 1st guess, given our penchant to think of Sonata form as a binary structure based on the opposition of tonic and the dominant (or other non-tonic key areas) . His is a far more organic sense of opposition in which the Sonata damps the natural tendency of melody towards uninhibited development. This is partly due to the use of contrasting themes and key areas, to be sure. But the point is that musical energy is more controlled and cultivated in the Sonata in order to allow for the greater structural expanse of the genre. If the fugue represents unconstrained melodic flow, the Sonata represents constrained movement and energy.

To further elaborate the differences between fugal and Sonata cultures, Halm adds a number of other dialectic pairs in the course of his book : fugue is natural, while the Sonata is material ; in the fugue, Bach « com-poses » (« kom-poniert ») while, in the Sonata, Beethoven « dis-poses » (« dis-poniert ») ; the fugue represents the detail, the Sonata the general ; they represent solidity and malleability, respectively, the active versus the passive. In one striking metaphor, Halm suggests that the fugue might be seen as the individual citizen while the Sonata represents the « state » (page 96 ; Halm 1920, page 34) .

All these dialectics can make the reader dizzy. Still, I think Halm was drawing a critically important phenomenological distinction in the ways we think (and talk) about music as a temporal phenomenon and as an architectonic structure. This difference can perhaps be most clearly grasped by considering the different natures of a fugal theme and a Sonata form theme.

For Halm, the theme was the most important element of any composition. If the theme was poorly conceived or inappropriate to the genre, it would be fatal for the subsequent music. (This is perhaps why so much of Halm's analytic attention in « Von zwei Kulturen » is directed to the thematic material.) In the fugue, Halm tells us in a pithy formulation, the form serves the theme, whereas in the Sonata it is the theme that serves the form. This is why, Halm observed, so many of Beethoven's Sonata themes are less individualized ; they are shorter, often unremarkable, even banal motives that need the dramatic context and development of the Sonata form to reveal their nature. In an analysis of Beethoven's « Tempest » Sonata, Halm shows how the ambiguity of the opening (the very question of what the « 1st theme » of the movement is) underscores the processive element that constitutes the real dynamics of the music. Whereas a fugal theme can in one sense be self-sustaining, a Sonata theme is unformed and dependent. It needs the ecology of the movement for its nature to emerge, whereas a fugue theme creates its own environment, so to speak.

At its best (and this means in selected moments of Beethoven) , the Sonata has the capacity of creating unrivaled musical dramas. By following the logic of thematic and harmonic development, Beethoven produces a sense of « consequential succession » (« Folgerichtigkeit ») in his music. Yet, this logic requires a sensitivity to (and exploitation of) the tension created in juxtaposing melodic and harmonic forces. Only certain kinds of themes work well in a Sonata context. This is why Halm thought Mozart's Sonatas, for all their obvious lyricism and beauty, were ineffective. The leisurely and self-sustaining themes of Mozart's music provided insufficient means (or necessity) for subsequent development. This is also why so many composers after Beethoven failed to understand the true nature of the Sonata, so bound are they to the tyranny of « Formenlehre » .

Yet, even Beethoven, like Homer, would occasionally nod. Halm could be surprisingly critical of Beethoven for lapses in his musical judgment. Consider his harsh assessment of an opening theme from Beethoven's String Quartet No. 14 in C-sharp minor (Opus 131, movement 7) :

« The symmetry is flatly laid-out ; stated but not realized. A call, an order, but no law ; just a phrase. Strong, but weak within itself. Tense, but without any inner tension itself, without inner content. Competent, but not good. An outward appearance of life, but with no life. It is as far from real life as mere prettiness is from color. » (4)

One senses that Halm sometimes felt that the whole Sonata form construct contained in itself a fatal flaw with its dependence upon division, opposition, and closure. Not without a touch of disparagement, I think, did he, at one point, compare the Classical Sonata to an ant colony ; Halm (1920) , page 253. All this suggests that, however historically necessary the Sonata may be in the history of music, it represents something of a loss over the unity that was found in the fugue. The massive architectonic structures afforded by the Sonata came at the expense of the free-flowing melodic energy of fugal culture.

As with any structural dualism, Halm's thesis regarding the 2 cultures can be criticized for its Procrustean rigidity. For in dividing Classical music into 2 essentially opposing camps, Halm often ignores moments (and whole repertoires) that do not fit easily into his schema. Consider his analysis of the subject from Bach's B-flat minor fugue from Book 2 of the « Well-Tempered Clavier ». Halm's discussion covers some 12 pages of text, making it one of the most intensive and sustained analytic examples we have by him ; Halm (1920) , pages 206-218. The subject, as he correctly notes, is a small miracle of concealed motivic repetition unfolded with intricately accumulating rhythmic energy. And indeed, it does seem to exude the unconstrained melodic flow Halm celebrates as the hallmark of fugal culture. But while his observations of the 4 bar theme are acutely sensitive, not a word is said about the remaining 97 measures of the fugue. It's an odd omission, for the development of this 4 voiced fugue contains some of the most virtuosic contrapuntal invention all of the « Well-Tempered Clavier » , with a « tour de force » of double counterpoint (at both the octave and the 10th) , points of close imitation, and a thema inversum (treated simultaneously with the recta subject in double counterpoint and close points of imitation) . In the thicket of this contrapuntal morass, it's sometimes hard to know how the subject is able to project its unique dynamic profile. At the very least, it seems clear that Bach had a number of things on his mind when composing this fugue other than just the dynamics of the subject.

Was there a way that the Sonata could ever recapture some of those melodic forces of fugal culture ? Fortunately, there did indeed seem to be a way, a possible « 3rd » culture shown to us by Anton Bruckner. For in the Symphonies of Bruckner, we find a brilliant reconciliation of fugal and Sonata cultures. This becomes the theme of Halm's subsequent book, « Die Symphonie Anton Bruckners » (1914) .

Halm's advocacy of Bruckner was not as idiosyncratic as it might 1st seem. While historians have fixated upon the Brahms-Wagner rivalry at the end of the 19th Century (and the debate over who was the true heir of the legacies bequeathed by Bach and Beethoven) , there was, at the same time, a small but enthusiastic cabal of Bruckner enthusiasts who worked vigorously to promote his Symphonies. Halm stood-out, though, by offering « the 1st thoroughgoing analytical monograph devoted to Bruckner's Symphonic output as a whole » (page 111) . In Halm's ear, Bruckner was the composer who more than anyone else understood how to incorporate the temporal flow of melody within the spatial architecture of the Sonata through his « art of escalation » (« Steigerung ») . (Ernst Kurth later subsumed this idea within his notion of « wave dynamics » .) By scaling and concatenating all tonal and thematic blocks of sound in a process that Halm called « epic succession » , Bruckner was able to sustain a sense of movement and connection over massive expanses of time.

What today might we learn from Halm ? As we read his critical discussions of works by Bach, Beethoven and Bruckner (or, at least, those sections that are translated for us by Rothfarb) , it never is clear quite how we might appropriate his ideas in our own analyses. There is nothing systematic about his outlook, as I have already mentioned. We have a highly-developed vocabulary of adjectives and images by which Halm attempts to capture in words some of the intensities of musical energy and compositional logic. (And readers who know Rothfarb's earlier study of Ernst Kurth will not be surprised find in the present book sensitively nuanced translations of Halm's analytic vocabulary.) But I fear that no amount of translational fidelity can teach us how we are to apply concepts such as « consequentiality » , « intensification » , or « epic succession » to our own analyses of music with any empirical rigor. One sometimes wonders how much of an improvement all of this is over Paul Bekker or Hermann Kretschmar.

At their best, Halm's analyses display acute, focused listening ; he subjects single themes or moments in a piece of music (as in the B-flat minor fugue subject) to excruciating examination. Halm's analyses are a celebration of the detail ; he shows exquisite sensitivity to the placement of a single dotted rhythm, the use of a mordent at just this moment, the precise length of a rest or pause, the appearance of a single chromatic inflection or a repeated note. Each is analyzed for its potential energy-building (or inhibiting) role, for its contribution to the overall logic of the music. But this hardly adds-up to a theory. For all his sensitive insights, Halm's judgments remain the subjective observations of a connoisseur. When he wants to rise above thematic detail to make broader generalizations, Halm often has recourse to only the vaguest metaphysics or oracular judgments. What does it mean, for example, for Halm to describe a theme of Bach « possessing spiritualization of symmetry » (« Vergeistigte der Symmetrie » , 1920, page 231) ? Or consider his gnomic dictum that the best theme is a cosmic, necessary achievement. It does not speak, but it shows in itself that which must be shown. The light of pre-existence shines from it ; not only logic, but also the supralogical, metalogical, and its law is made known through it. It is a portrait, not just a simple image or likeness, of eternal life. (5)

As this last quotation suggests, Halm could not seem to escape using the very hermeneutic poetics that he elsewhere so derisively dismissed. More than once, he lapses into the most rhapsodic of descriptive metaphors. Consider this passage concerning a moment in the development section of Beethoven's « Pastoral » Symphony, 1st movement :

« After the climax of all this excitation, or if you will, this ecstasy, the stormy back and forth tossing causes the motive to be torn loose from the harmony, as if it were abducted from solid ground and driven by clouds and winds. The motive's impression of strength soon gives way to exuberance, but then a sense of unsteadiness and wavering sets in, a sense of exhaustion. » (6)

Halm could be a very scolding critic. We have already had occasion above to mention his criticisms of Beethoven. But not even Bach and Bruckner could escape the censorious gaze of the school Master. For all the brilliance of these later 2 artists, there were moments (and whole pieces) in which each inexplicably let his guard down, becoming temporarily numbed to the deficiencies of a given theme, some ungrounded harmony, or a superfluous repetition ; e.g. Halm (1920) , pages 239-241) . Composing is obviously hard work.

It is thus something of a surprise to learn from Rothfarb how self-confident Halm seemed to be about his own tries at composition (Chapter 6, pages 130-166) . He seemed quite sure that his own works correctly reflected his æsthetic desiderata. But it's hard to share his faith, at least given the sampling of excerpts in Rothfarb's book. For after a brief period early on in which Halm seemed to move precipitously close to a kind of extended chromatic tonality in the mold of Hugo Wolf or Max Reger, he quickly retreated to a more conservative, idiosyncratic strain of neo-Classicism. While admitting that his style was imitative of earlier historical styles (he openly characterized himself as a compositional traditionalist and « epigone ») , he claimed it was still « original » in the most authentic sense of the word - as music in accord with its origins. With his typical dialectics, Halm defended the virtues of « Originalität » (original-ness) against the narcissistic ambition of « Originellität » (innovativeness) that lures so many younger artists astray ; page 131. But I suspect the resulting works we are given tastes of a Symphony in D minor for strings, a few inventions and fugues for keyboard, and an ambitious Concerto in C major for piano will hardly convince many readers today. They certainly don't convince Rothfarb, who turns-out to be a much harsher critic of Halm the composer than I would have expected (pages 136-137) .

Lee Rothfarb ends his study by pondering the legacy of August Halm. He notes both his influence upon later writers, as well as the prescience of Halm for our own academic culture of music analysis. I certainly agree with his 1st point. Halm has been an important if unacknowledged source for ideas that we have learned from more familiar music-critics such as Jacques Handschin, Theodor W. Adorno, and Carl Dahlhaus. Indeed, for those readers familiar with Dahlhaus' writings on Beethoven, one will come away from Halm's writings with a shock of recognition. (7) But I am not so sure that Halm is a reliable ally of our many contemporary music theorists who have attempted to explore musical processes as dramatic metaphor (e.g. Marion Guck, Fred Maus, and Peter Kivy) or who have thought of music in terms of embodied correspondences (David Lidov, Janna Saslaw, Candace Brower, and Arnie Cox) . (8) Certainly, there are congruencies in all their writings. But Halm was much too dogmatic of a critic in his judgments, too much of a stylistic reactionary. I also don't share Rothfarb's belief that Halm's strong defense of tonality in the early 20th Century has much to say for us today (page 185) . While the question of « tonal oder nicht tonal » may have been an animating one for earlier generations of musicians, is it something we worry about so much anymore ?

Perhaps, we should worry about it. Maybe we should be concerned that so much music today no longer possesses the power to move us with the urgent, moral force it seemed to in the past. Maybe we should be worried about a system of education in which music occupies a largely peripheral role in the up-bringing of our children, and in which contemporary criticism and analysis have become so abstruse and insulated as to be virtually irrelevant to any greater public discourse. Are these concerns that are no longer tenable in our cynical, post-modern age ? Are they merely utopic visions of a latter-day John the Baptist ? If so, Halm would see it as our loss - and our failing. For whatever else we may say, August Halm was convinced music played a vital role in human society that entailed the gravest responsibilities on the part of its composers, critics, and listeners.

Here must have been the cause of the melancholy I felt when finishing Rothfarb's book. August Halm lived a world in which music (and theories about music) truly mattered. It is in most ways a lost world to us today. To be sure, it was never perfect in Halm's own day, either, as he would have been the 1st to tell us. But, for a fleeting moment in a small school at Wickersdorf, at least, his vision seems to have been realized. Is it no longer realistic of us to hope for anything similar today ? Might it be possible to recapture the same sense of moral purpose and spiritual urgency that Halm saw for the vocation of music theory ? These are questions we might well find worth pondering today in our own melancholic culture of disciplinary dyspepsia.

Since Halm started-out his career as a preacher (and we see now that he never really left the pulpit) , it is only fitting that I give him the final word :

« We must decide whether we want to view music as existing for the sake of humanity or to view humanity as existing for the sake of music. Through duty to music, or through our participation in its existence and welfare, we declare ourselves as belonging to a humanity obligated to the spiritual dimension ; that we acknowledge human dignity ; the fact of being human, in the labor in the interest of Spirit. (9)

(1) Rothfarb was hardly the 1st scholar to take note of Halm. In 1978, Siegfried Schmalzriedt published an anthology of articles written by Halm that included a sympathetic introductory essay on Halm's life and writings ; Halm (1978) . But Rothfarb's book completely eclipses Schmalzriedt in both breadth and depth.

(2) Schmalzriedt counts over 270 of these smaller writings in his bibliography. A few of his major essays were collected and published in a volume, in 1916, that he entitled somewhat enigmatically, « Von Grenzen und Ländern der Musik » ; about 3 dozen others were later collected and reprinted by Schmalzriedt in « Von Form und Sinn der Musik » ; Halm (1978) , see : note 1.

(3) It is a scandal that this book has never been translated into English, though it went through 3 editions in German (1913, 1920, and 1947, respectively) . For the time being, English readers can consult the dissertation by Laura Lynn Kelly (2008) .

« Die symmetrie platt hingelegt ; constatiert, nicht geschehend. Ein Ruf, ein Befehl, kein Gesetz ; gerade noch ein Satz. Gewaltsam, aber in sich schwach. Spannend, aber selbst ohne innere Spannung, ohne inneren Halt. Tüchtig, aber nicht

gut. Ein äusserer Lebensgang, aber kein Leben ; von wirklichem Leben so fern, wie Buntheit von Farbigkeit. »

August Halm (geboren 26. Oktober 1869 in Großaltdorf in Württemberg ; gestorben 1. Februar 1929 in Saalfeld / Saale in Thüringen) war ein deutscher Komponist, Theologe und Musikpädagoge.

August Halm kam als dritter Sohn von Hermann Friedrich Halm und Charlotte Auguste (geborene Kulmbach) zur Welt. Der Vater war zu jener Zeit Pfarrer in Großaltdorf. Sein Studium der Theologie an der Universität in Tübingen verband er mit einem Studium der Komposition. Als ein Lehrer und Förderer galt hierbei der akademische Musikdirektor Emil Kauffmann. Nach der Jahrhundertwende lernte er Hermann Lietz, Gustav Wyneken und Paul Geheeb kennen. In den Jahren 1906 bis 1910 sowie in der Zeit von 1920 bis 1929 war er an der Freien Schulgemeinde Wickersdorf nahe Saalfeld tätig.

Halm galt als der bedeutendste Musikerzieher und Wortführer der Musikalischen Jugendbewegung. Als Komponist blieb er in dem Bestreben, die Kompositionstechniken der Fuge und der Sonate miteinander zu verbinden, hinter seinem Vorbild Anton Bruckner zurück. Er machte sich jedoch als Musikästhetiker wie auch als Musikschriftsteller einen bedeutenden Namen. Seine Schriften zeichnen sich durch eine direkte, einleuchtende und klare Sprache aus.

Reviews

In May 1920, the 1st ever Mahler Festival was held in Amsterdam under the conductor Willem Mengelberg. The Viennese composer Egon Wellesz wrote a detailed report on the events in two separate articles for the Neue Freie Presse which I have translated. One was at the beginning of the festival and the other at its conclusion. It's not only interesting to read about these early performances at a time before gramophone and broadcasting, but it reminds us of how unstable the world still was. The photograph that accompanies this article shows Alma Mahler in the middle with a broad dark hat and a white blouse and loose wrap with Arnold Schœnberg on the right (her left). Sitting on the floor is Richard Specht (third from the right); Standing in the middle is Egon Wellesz and in the crowd we also see the publisher Emil Hertzka; Egon's wife Emmy Wellesz; Alma's step-father Carl Moll; Guido Adler and Anton von Webern. This photo must have been taken on the free day described by Wellesz in the accompanying article. Much of the admiration for Mengelberg and general optimism that was expressed by Wellesz was to be betrayed, as demonstrated in the following post in a letter from Mengelberg's office to Wellesz in 1949.

17 May 1920 : « Neue Freie Presse » , Doctor Egon Wellesz ...

It's a degree of recognition that no other composer could possibly expect. In the coming days, here in Amsterdam, we shall hear the complete works of Gustav Mahler. A sequence of events and coincidences has meant that the combination of a culture-mad citizenry along with the conductor Willem Mengelberg, tireless efforts to establish Mahler, have established Amsterdam as a citadel where his Symphonies are cultivated as nowhere else. Thus, a circle is completed that started with genius, inflamed a conductor to be the prophet of new, never-heard-before beauty, a new greatness and now having inspired a large community, they in devoted gratitude, return to their provider in order to honour him.

Willem Mengelberg has been conductor of the « Concertgebouw » Orchestra in Amsterdam for 25 years - he has brought it to a standard that could never have been imagined. One has no feeling of any separation between musicians and conductor ; rather together, they form a higher-unity that grows closer in the course of performance. This is an understanding that can only develop over a period of decades of mutual hard work and discipline. The best is merely just good enough. This singleness of purpose between conductor and Orchestra is even carried over to the public who, over the years, have come to understand the works of Mahler as nowhere else - not even in Vienna itself. It was here, in Amsterdam, that Mahler enjoyed his 1st, unqualified success ; and it was from here that he returned home with new inspiration and a desire to carry-out new work. It was here that, in 1903, he conducted his 1st and 3rd, in 1904 ; his 2nd and 4th, in 1906 ; his 5th and 7th, in 1909. And if one takes in the number of performances conducted by Mengelberg which were taking place around the same time as those conducted by the controversial Mahler, then one can come to appreciate how it is that the Chorus and the Orchestra have become the composer's own instruments of choice : Amsterdam is to the cultivation and preservation of Mahler's music what Bayreuth, in its more glorious years, was to Wagner.

Isn't it odd that, as a Viennese, one has to travel to Amsterdam to celebrate Mahler's 60th birthday ? Vienna, which is so besotted with both the arts and artists, simply ignored this event. And it is here in our but appreciative Amsterdam, that the spirit of Mahler thrives. Everyone here appears to have known him, to have adored and valued him. His eccentricities were met with the healthy respect one brings to such personalities - personalities in which such things are both anticipated and appreciated. The spirit that dwells in his Symphonies, the mystic and the religious are deeply felt. The reception here has been open for the broadest arc of his creativity ; the significance of the most minute detail followed him here. One maintained in this city, without betraying oneself or one's artistic opinions, a respectful distance to the artist.

Mengelberg was meant to have received a particular recognition from his friends in Amsterdam ; instead of personal recognition, he requested that Amsterdam be the city where a Mahler Festival could be held to which people from all over the world would come in order to hear all of Mahler's work in Mengelberg's definitive interpretation. The still unclear (political) relationships which continue to plague our world today did not seem to represent the slightest hindrance to this goal. The Festival committee took-up the challenge with unprecedented generosity. It was decided to make those participants from beyond the Dutch borders Holland's special guests (they covered the arrangements for travel, accommodation and all expenses) only because of this act of generosity was it possible for us Viennese to attend.

The journey started in a happy mood for our small group of fellow-travellers in the comfortable, not too crowded carriages of the « Holland Express » . We crossed all borders without difficulties and arrived without any delays in Amsterdam. We were met by members of the Festival committee who took charge of our luggage and brought us all to our respective quarters : some in hotels and some in private accommodation. The tickets to all of the events were already waiting for us in our quarters, along with the programme. Everything worked perfectly : nothing was forgotten

- every need, no matter how trivial was met. The Viennese were met with particular generosity and courtesy. The locals are well-aware of the deprivations and difficulties we still suffer in our homeland and have tried their best to make us as comfortable as possible, if only to make their sympathy and understanding clear to us, that even abroad, we are united by a shared, and valued culture. It was in this context that the Viennese were accorded the principal addresses in the opening events.

« Hofrat » (Imperial Court Council ; a uniquely Austrian title) Guido Adler opened the events with a warmly appreciative speech in Mahler's memory that touched on the artist and the man. He spoke of their common home and their youthful years together along with their very 1st departure into the wide world. He spoke about the roots of Mahler's creativity and its relationship with the nature of the folk-song, march rhythms and (militaristic) signal calls that characterize his works. He recalled both the military and the country-folk poetry that would develop into his « Wunderhornlieder » .

Paul Stefan gave a lively speech without notes about Mahler, the Theatre director. He sketched-out in short sections what Mahler had contributed to the stage-craft of Opera and how he managed to force the visual presentation to ever more fantastic and enchanting images - he outlined everything that he achieved in order to reach never imagined experiences. Both speeches were received with the greatest of sympathy. The 3rd speech was delivered by the Italian Alfredo Casella who has also spent a good deal of time in France. His speech was a profound declaration for a new, international life of the artistic and intellectual spirit. He accentuated how for the 1st time since the end of the War, people from all countries had come together where the concepts of friend, foe and neutral no longer existed - such was the spirit of Mahler that had been able to create this unity. He concluded with something we all felt :

« Art has always existed apart from worldly matters. It will no longer be debased or exalted as a means of propaganda that supports or defiles different peoples. Humanity now unites those who previously had called each other enemies. To the ruthlessness of war-fare that had previously broken all spiritual bonds and after the flood of hate and distrust had now appeared the dove of peace. »

One arrives in the auditorium of the « Concertgebouw » for the very 1st Festival event. The podium is covered with wreaths of red azaleas and laurel trees have been placed behind the seating for the Chorus that surrounds the Orchestra. At the very front is a bust of Mahler. Mengelberg walks-out to applause that last many minutes, followed by a vacuum-like silence. He makes a gesture and the Chorus rises without a sound. A sharp wrap of the baton and we hear the opening of « Das Klagende Lied » .

A rehearsal with Mengelberg : the hall is divided from the stage by a large curtain - where, normally, the Chorus are sat, we find musicians and conductors from everywhere in the world, whom Mengelberg has specially invited to observe him at work. It is only here since Mahler's own lifetime that it is possible to experience what a rehearsal of one of his works should be. External perfection is demanded and any passage that even slightly sounds shoddy is repeated. After the general rehearsal, Mengelberg meets the strings the following day to rehearse a particular figure in the 1st violins with the Concert-Master. At another point, he brings in the celli and rehearses a « cantilena » passage until he achieves the intensity of desired expression. There was never a loud or discourteous word. The Orchestra knows that everything he demands is fully-justified and yields without question to his will.

Mengelberg's significance in this city is felt in the manner by which all of Amsterdam is caught-up in the spirit of the Festival. The music shops all offer scores of Mahler Symphonies in their displays, and the book-stores all offer copies of a publication in honour of Mengelberg, meant as a permanent manifestation of what he has achieved. The original consists in its entirety of 7 volumes of testimonies (including a volume of drawings) by musicians and important personalities of his time. It was presented to him in special chest designed by (Jan) Toorop, which now holds pride of place in his home, itself a tiny museum filled with paintings, wood-cuttings and stained glass. One notes that the influence of this man extends well beyond his own discipline as conductor. His mere presence has had a galvanizing and determining effect on all the local arts. He is an educator in the highest-meaning of the word ; both servant to the work and its creative interpreter. He has taken on a responsibility, the successful execution of which was doubted by many. Nevertheless, he seems to have managed it and without fatigue. As proof, on every 2nd day from the 6th to the 21st of May, he will perform a work of Mahler. It is this work of love and indeed piety with which he will build his most lasting monument.

31 May 1920 : « Neue Freie Presse » , Doctor Egon Wellesz ...

This is the very 1st time that one has the opportunity of becoming acquainted with the complete works of Mahler. It is the most difficult of all cycles to pull-off. Only a very few will last the course. All weakness will be doubly felt, all the limits of talent will be unforgivably apparent. So much of devoted relevance has been written already throughout this journey that I feel that I can save myself the words needed to express thoughts on each individual work, by relating instead the totality of the experience. One thing that must be 1st stated is that Mahler's works come into sharper relief through their cyclic performance. One work simply prepares us for the next without one overshadowing the other. One experiences an upward journey from the 1st piece to his 9th Symphony and there is not one work that one would feel did not belong in its rightful place. What both Mengelberg and his Orchestra have accomplished in these last days borders on the incomprehensible.

One of Germany's leading conductors said to me after a performance, that he would rather give-up altogether after experiencing such accomplishment. But the musicians are also aware of their unique central role, amongst the Viennese Arnold Schoenberg, who attended each and every rehearsal. And there were other representatives from America, Sweden, Norway, Germany and Italy. The precision of the bowing under the Concert-Master Zimmerman and the warmth of sound were astonishing. The moment Mengelberg hears the slightest discrepancy, he responds with « Systematic ! » which means « not good » . At this point, he starts to rehearse without mercy each and every individual tone and every point within the phrasing. « System » is the word that encapsulates his method with the Orchestra over the last 25 years. In reality, « System » is simply a means of achieving exactness in execution, not losing one's head and to maintain a consistent pulse and tempo. For our ears, we find the oboes sound very strange. They have a strong nasal sound and are weaker in dynamic than our Viennese instruments. The flutes, on the other hand, are dignified and full-sounding ; trumpets and trombones are excellent. Another extraordinary brass player is the bass-tuba, who wears gloves in order that his fingers not have direct contact with the keys of his instrument.

Mengelberg's conducting gestures are precise. He beats sharply and energetically with the right-hand. His left, often balled in a fist, is used for conveying expression and indicating entrances. He reaches climaxes by swinging his entire, rather small body about before this hot-head rises above proceedings. He has an agreeable manner of dealing with his Orchestra which comes from many years working in mutual trust and understanding with the same people. Occasionally, the atmosphere in rehearsals seems to balance on a knife-edge ; at this point, he tells a joke and rescues the situation. He rehearses long stretches and, only afterwards, does he tell the Orchestra what he wishes to change. He not only explains the technical, he tells the Orchestra what the individual intentions of the composer were. When he speaks with his sonorous, resonant voice, nobody else makes a sound. One senses an inner-contact, and it is in this manner that he can achieve the best results from his players - just as a virtuoso gets the best out of his instrument. They tune precisely and co-operate through each rehearsal of a transitional passage. Nobody thinks of marking during rehearsal - Mengelberg demands full sound at all times and the highest-degree of tension and concentration. One of the typical rehearsal programmes went along the following lines :

From 9h00 until 13h00, he rehearses the 4th and 5th Symphonies. In the evening, there are rehearsals of the 9th and 5th from 20h00 to 22h00. At 22h00, he rehearses the Chorus for the 8th Symphony while the 2nd Concert-Master rehearsed the « Adagietto » from the 5th. He makes sure that the musicians are rested during their breaks. They're given milky coffee and an endless supply of cheese sandwiches. After rehearsals, Mengelberg returns home and studies the scores for the next day's rehearsals until deep in the night.

Yet, there is nothing that is taken for granted on his part. He gets-up in the morning, refreshed and must re-establish his authority from zero - he betrays no sense of entitlement by replacing his attempts to achieve expression by mere routine. For us who have come to observe, it's a revelation the way he can create tension without snapping and elicit emotion without losing control. These Festival performances are unique. They have never been matched in the devotion shown by those giving the performances or those attending them. Any attempt at repeating such a venture will be doomed to failure - if there is a repetition of such an undertaking, it would demand an entirely different approach. It is the 1st time that we have the entirety of Mahler's work separated from its creator and finally launched into the wider world. Mahler no longer belongs just to Vienna, to Austria or to Europe, but has now been handed-over to the entire world. For example : this winter, the 8th Symphony will be performed in New York, and Mengelberg will continue to present Mahler's works in various other American cities. This elementary effect of Mahler's music on the masses of music-lovers must come as a surprise to those who had admired him from the very beginning. But that his day of musical resurrection would be so soon - well none of us could ever have anticipated it.

Amsterdam's Mahler Festival is set chronologically with performances of his Symphonies and orchestral songs and can be heard over 9 evenings' of performances to which may be added 4 public rehearsals and 5 performances of international, contemporary chamber-music. The performances start in Amsterdam at 19h30 and carry-on until 22h30 or even 23h00. In the 1st concert on the 6th of May, we heard « Das Klagende Lied » , « Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen » and the 1st Symphony. One could not have heard a more complete version of « Das Klagende Lied » even under Mahler himself. This work of exuberant youthful talent, orchestrated by the experienced composer, was offered to devastating effect. Just as surprising in its impression, was the effect of the last movement of the 1st Symphony, which many, including myself, regarded until the present performance as one of his weakest works. Mengelberg knew how to draw the pieces together in order to create an entirely different picture.

The next day brought us the lectures about Mahler that we have already reported as well as a general rehearsal of the 2nd Symphony. This was followed, the next day, with a performance that will never be forgotten by those who were present and able to appreciate the mystery and quietness of the Chorus' entrance : « Arisen - yes ! Arisen ! » after the call in the horns and the trumpets. Nor can we forget the performance of « Urlicht » or the powerful surge of the final when Mengelberg extracted the final reserves of both Chorus and Orchestra.

The performance of the 3rd Symphony, on Monday the 10th of May, resulted in a particular celebration for Mengelberg. The Prince Consort Heinrich handed-over both laurel and floral wreaths and was introduced to both visiting and local music-lovers, all of whom had made the effort to honour the life and work of Gustav Mahler. The 4th Festival concert, on Wednesday the 12th of May, brought us the 4th and 5th Symphonies. The latter, in Holland as in Vienna, one of the most seldom performed. Yet, under Mengelberg's direction, it left an exceptional and lasting impression. The 4th, on the other hand, was met as more of a « succès d'estime » . The combination of both Symphonies in a single evening's performance was a challenge to any public while, at the same time, offering a unique opportunity of comparing the 2 works. It is apparent that, in the 4th symphony, Mahler can be heard departing from the style of his earliest works as he begins to become more polyphonic. Within the 5th symphony, this principal has already developed masterly.

The following day was completely free and brought both performers and listeners a well-needed period of respite. In the afternoon, we set-out together to view an Indian steamship which offered an opportunity of viewing the local harbour in the course of its day-to-day activities as we watched the arrival of freighters, no doubt returning from the colonies in order to unload their goods. Everything appeared to be a part of a greater whole and offered the impression of a population that seemed to have survived the scorched earth of recent years and now, with double energy, was bringing different nations together with a broader cultural mission.

One anticipated the performance of the 6th Symphony with a certain anxiousness. This work is also less well-known in Amsterdam than its predecessors and « Das Lied von der Erde » . And, again, we experienced a triumph. If I recall the 1st performance of this work in Vienna under Mahler, I sense that, here, the percussion and brass are softer - indeed, almost muted in comparison. The last movement, which must be one of the greatest and most plastic of any within Mahler's Symphonies, was particularly rewarding under Mengelberg's direction. He was able to control the steady development to the climax by unyielding control and instrumental balance, never arriving too soon, and splendidly unravelling the dense knot of musical subjects.

The 7th Symphony has a very special place for Mengelberg as he owns Mahler's manuscript and sees it very much as « his » Symphony. However, there are many inward connections that give this Symphony its own Amsterdam attachment. Mahler's 1st « Nachtmusik » was inspired by Rembrandt's « Night-Watchman » . Mengelberg explained to the Orchestra that the music is not to be understood by the painting itself, but in the sequence of visions that viewing the picture unleashed in Mahler : a nightly round ; moonlight on the rooftops of the city ; lovers whispering ; the distant sounds of a herdsman's bells. Mengelberg explained the meaning of the work - the technical aspects have long been settled. 2 weeks before the performance, he handed-over to his trusted deputy Dopfer both the strings and brass so that could be rehearsed separately and prepared to the point that Mengelberg needed only to file away a few rough edges, thus, adding wings to the work's spirit.

Following the performance of the 7th, the chronological sequence of works was disrupted in order to accommodate the technical requirements demanded of the 8th Symphony. There followed, therefore, the most transfigured of Mahler's works : « Das Lied von der Erde » and the 9th Symphony, the performance of which fell on the day commemorating Mahler's death. It is not possible to express in words the reverence that was demonstrated by this performance, the mystical transformation of the musicians. With the sound of the last note resonating in the hall, there followed only silence, which was maintained as we departed from the auditorium.

The monumental high-point of the Festival was the grandiose performance of the 8th symphony. The 1st violins were led by Carl Flesch ; the violas by Adolf Busch. The 1st soprano was as ever Mrs. Gerturd Förstel ; 2nd soprano was Mrs. Noordewter-Reddingtus ; the altos were Mrs. Cahier and Mrs. Burigo ; the tenor, Mister Urlis. At the piano sat Leonid Kreutzer. Again, there were endless rehearsals that went on until deepest night, and involved both Chorus and Orchestra. These were followed by individual rehearsals with the soloists, with the harps and with the piano. All stood in the grip of the transcendental, indefatigable power of Mengelberg and everyone marvelled and allowed him to do with them as he wished.

In addition to the fullness of the Symphonic performances were added 5 chamber performances on the free-days in-between. These took place under the direction of Professor Alexander Schmuellers and in organization with the pianists Lamond, Kreutzer, Schnabel, Mrs. Stokowski and Moritz Löwensohn, the marvellous cellist. Together, they presented a series of representative contemporary chamber-music recitals consisting of works by, amongst many others, the Italian composer Casella, the Frenchman Florent Schmitt, and an important vocal work by Artur Schnabel.

An additional 2 lectures were offered to bring the work and person of Gustav Mahler closer to the public. Felix Salten gave us a graphic depiction of the atmosphere that Mahler's work elicited and the role that was played by both his person and the city of Vienna ; Richard Specht, the trusted biographer of Mahler, spoke of the artist and the triumphs of his vision, which Mengelberg has so visibly transmitted to us all in recent days. It has been agreed that these lectures will be kept as a perpetual memorial to this Festival in Amsterdam and are to be published.

There is something special about the performance of works in the context of a Festival. While we experienced these days, we already sensed the memory of earlier performances slipping away, only to remain as something we cannot describe. Yet, despite this, something permanent survives that will bind all of us together as we go our separate ways throughout the world.

That this event could take place at all is thanks to the committee led by his Excellence Köell, Mister K. van Rees and Mister Dudok van Heel. For the production and presentation of the programme along with the writing of the accompanying notes, we thank Mister Rudolf Mengelberg, who also organised the guest-lists and events. For the administration of the Festival, we thank Mister Benkers van Ogtrop and Mister Frejer along with Mister de Marez Oyens.

For us, Viennese, this was not only an enormous gain artistically, but also a display of great humanity. One was again surrounded by friendship and love. The generosity of our hosts was such that we could again believe in the words (of Schiller, set by Beethoven in his 9th Symphony) : « Alle Menschen werden Brüder, wo dein sanfter Flügel weilt. » The shared goal of something artistic brought us out of, and beyond ourselves, and created an atmosphere of artistic and profound seriousness. That this could happen, we are indebted to the man who is Mengelberg and his circle of supporters and friends.

May the spirit of goodness that came from this place continue to support all that is beautiful so that people are, once again, bound together in everlasting friendship.

En 1920, à l'âge de 25 ans, Wilhelm Kempff fait son 1er disque pour la « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » (Beethoven), de même qu'Elisabeth Schumann (« Non so più » de « Figaro », chanté en allemand).

Ainsi se dessinent une nouvelle orientation pour la firme « DGG », avec des artistes comme la soprano Maria Ivogün, des chefs tels Hans Pfitzner, Leo Blech et Hermann Abendroth, et une philosophie de l'enregistrement qui privilégie les versions intégrales, fidèles à la partition. En 1921, Frida Leider enregistre la Salutation d'Elisabeth dans « Tannhäuser » et Richard Strauß accompagne au piano, dans ses propres lieder, le baryton Heinrich Schlusnus, qui devient bientôt l'un des principaux chanteurs de la maison.

En 1924, la « DGG » est autorisée à réutiliser la marque déposée « la Voix de son Maître » du chien Nipper ainsi que ses matrices d'avant-guerre pour publier en Allemagne, tandis que le logo « Polydor » est créé pour les disques exportés. Les parutions de cette époque mettent l'accent sur Richard Wagner et font souvent entendre la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin dirigée par Leo Blech ou le Philharmonique de Berlin sous la baguette de Max von Schillings.

En 1925, lorsqu'est introduit le système d'enregistrement électro-acoustique, la firme a fait paraître les 9 Symphonies de Beethoven, avec Oskar Fried et d'autres à la tête de la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin, ainsi que des Symphonies de grande envergure comme la 7e de Bruckner et la 2e de Mahler. En 1926, Wilhelm Furtwängler surmonte son scepticisme face au disque pour enregistrer la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven et l'Ouverture du « Freischütz » de Weber avec le Philharmonique de Berlin.

En 1927, pour l'« Année Beethoven », alors que la firme reprend l'étiquette américaine « Brunswick », son catalogue comporte également les Symphonies du compositeur dirigées par Otto Klemperer, Hans Pfitzner et Richard Strauß, ainsi que l'Adagio de la 8e de Bruckner par Klemperer, la Symphonie « Oxford » de Haydn par Hans Knappertsbusch, la 39e et la « Jupiter » de Mozart par Strauß, la « Pathétique » de Tchaïkovski par Bruno Walter et l'Ouverture de « la Chauve-souris » par Erich Kleiber, toutes avec la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin, qui joue également dans les enregistrements des poèmes symphoniques de Strauß dirigés par le compositeur (1926–1933) .

Au moment de la mort de Joseph Berliner, en 1928, et de celle d'Emile, l'année suivante, la production annuelle de la « DGG » atteint près de 10 millions de disques, et l'usine de Hanovre emploie quelque 600 personnes.

The corner-stone of Hans Knappertsbusch's Symphonic repertoire was the music of Anton Bruckner. As early as the 1920's and 1930's, he was conducting « Bruckner Evenings » throughout Germany.

1920 : Georg Witkowski publishes a new version of « Woyzeck » based on a new reading of the manuscripts. Alban Berg becomes aware of this and notes the spelling of Woyzeck's name, but decides to leave it as « Wozzeck » for his Opera because he doesn't want to change the sound of its pronunciation.

Berg completes the composition of « Wozzeck » in late-1921 ; and the orchestration, in April 1922. Thanks to Alma Mahler's intervention, Universal-Edition accepts it for publication, in March 1923. There is a good deal of positive press, and, in the fall of 1923, conductor Erich Kleiber accepts it for the Berlin Opera ; the premiere finally takes place on 14 December 1925 and « Wozzeck » is, by far, the biggest success of the entire « Second Viennese School » .

The big musical development in Viennese circles, after the War, is Arnold Schœnberg's publication of his « 12 tone method ». Schœnberg has also been in contact with Josef Matthias Hauer, who discovers the « 12 tone law » in 1919, at age 36, through the study of his own works, and 1st applies it intentionally in his « Nomos » for piano, Opus 19. From the popularity of « Wozzeck » and the critical debate over the « 12 tone method », Schœnberg and his circle obtain quite a bit of recognition in the 1920's.

Arnold Schœnberg develops the most influential version of the dodecaphonic (also known as 12 tone) method of composition which, in French and English, was given the alternative name « serialism » by René Leibowitz and Humphrey Searle, in 1947. This technique was taken-up by many of his students, who constituted the so-called « Second Viennese School ». They included : Anton Webern, Alban Berg and Hanns Eisler, all of whom were profoundly influenced by Schœnberg. He published a number of books, ranging from his famous « Harmonielehre » (Theory of Harmony) to « Fundamentals of Musical Composition », many of which are still in print and used by musicians and developing composers.

Schœnberg viewed his development as a natural progression, and he did not deprecate his earlier works when he ventured into serialism. In 1923, he wrote to the Swiss philanthropist Werner Reinhart :

« For the present, it matters more to me if people understand my older works. They are the natural fore-runners of my later works, and only those who understand and comprehend these will be able to gain an understanding of the later works that goes beyond a fashionable bare minimum. I do not attach so much importance to being a musical bogey-man as to being a natural continuer of properly-understood good old tradition ! »

Heinz Unger

The German conductor Heinz (Heinrich) Unger was born on 14 December 1895 in Berlin and died on 25 February 1965 in Toronto, Canada. In later life, he lived in Britain and Canada. He was known particularly for conducting the works of Gustav Mahler.

The son of a lawyer, Unger studied law at Ist - Doctor Juris (Greifswald) . In 1915, in Munich, where he was studying, he heard Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » , conducted by Bruno Walter, which was influential in his decision to become a conductor. From 1916 to 1919, he studied at the Berlin Conservatory and was taught by, among others, Wilhelm Klatte and Theodor Schoenberg (theory) , Eduard Mœrike and Fritz Stiedry (a few conducting lessons) . In 1917, he receives the State Music Teacher's Diploma of Prussia.

In 1919, he conducted his 1st professional concert, with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra ; it was the 1st of several concerts with this Orchestra, which included Mahler's Symphony No. 1 and « Das Lied von der Erde » . In 1921, he founded and conducted the Choir of Saint-Cecilia (« Cäcilienchor ») of Berlin. In 1923, he conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and the Berlin Symphony Orchestra, together, in a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 8. He was guest-conductor in several German cities, and in Vienna and Oslo. During the 1920's, he made several tours of the Soviet Union ; from 1934 to 1936, he was conductor of the Leningrad Radio Orchestra for annual 6 month seasons.

In 1933, he emigrated to Britain. He conducted the Northern Philharmonia Orchestra until 1947, and was a guest of other British Orchestras, including the London Philharmonic Orchestra with which he made many appearances. On 21 October 1945, he conducted this Orchestra in the 1st complete performance in Britain of Mahler's Symphony No. 5. Having made his debut in North America with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in Canada, in 1937, and returning there in 1938, he settled in Toronto in 1948. He was a guest-conductor of the Promenade Symphony Orchestra, which gave concerts at the Varsity Arena, in Toronto. He also conducted the CBC Symphony Orchestra, and was guest-conductor for other Orchestras, in Canada.

In 1953, the York Concert Society was formed : an Orchestra made-up of members of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and the CBC Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Unger, gave an annual series of 4 spring concerts. These continued until Unger's death, in 1965.

He also appeared as conductor in Spain, Latin America, Switzerland, Germany and Britain. In 1956, he conducted 2 concerts with the Berlin Philharmonic ; this was his 1st return to Berlin since 1933.

He gave the premieres of works by several Canadian composers. His repertoire was large, but was primarily of composers of Germany and Austria. In 1958, he became an honorary director of the Gustav Mahler Society of America.

The Heinz Unger Award, given to young professional conductors in Canada, was established in 1968 by the York

Concert Society.

While a law student, Heinz (Heinrich) Unger heard Bruno Walter conduct Gustav Mahler's « The Song of the Earth » in Munich, in 1915, and decided on the spot to become a conductor and a champion of Mahler. Soon afterward, he had his 1st conducting experience with a Berlin amateur Orchestra, in part of Beethoven's Symphony No. 5. In 1919-1920, he made his professional debut, conducting the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in several Mahler concerts, including the Symphony No. 1 and « The Song of the Earth » . He conducted some of the « Konzerte des Anbruch » Series in 1920-1922, led the Berlin Symphony Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic combined in Mahler's Symphony No. 8 in 1923 and, for 9 seasons (1924-1933) , directed the concerts (usually, 6 per season) of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » , engaging the Berlin Philharmonic. In 1921, he became the founder and conductor of the « Cäcilienchor » of Berlin. He appeared as guest-conductor in other German cities, in Vienna, and in Oslo and, at the suggestion of Artur Schnabel in 1924, he undertook the 1st of 13 trips to the Soviet Union. On these visits, he led concert and Radio Orchestras in Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, and other cities and, in the mid-1930's, he was under contract with the Leningrad Radio Orchestra for annual 6 month seasons. Unger's enthusiasm for the musicianship of Russian and Ukrainian Orchestras and the responsiveness of their audiences was dampened eventually by his experiences with Soviet bureaucracy, and he wrote a book of memoirs : « Hammer, Sickle and Baton » , London (1939) , describing his enticement and disenchantment.

In 1933, Unger settled in London. He conducted the Northern Philharmonia, from 1933 to 1947, and was a guest with the major British Orchestras including the London Philharmonic, with which he made over 100 War-time appearances throughout Great Britain. In the 1930's, he conducted in other countries, notably Spain, made his North American debut with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra, on 9 November 1937, and returned by invitation in 1938. Having enjoyed his visits to Toronto, Unger settled there, in 1948. During the next few years, he often was a guest-conductor with the Promenade Symphony Concerts and built-up an amateur Orchestra. He filled a total of 24 engagements, from 1952 to 1964, with the CBC Symphony Orchestra and, as a guest, conducted CBC Orchestras in Vancouver, Winnipeg, and Montréal (like « l'Heure du concert » on television) , building a high-reputation with audiences and critics alike. To provide a concert outlet for his talents, his supporters formed the York Concert Society, which organized annual series of 4 spring concerts, using a Classical-size Orchestra of top-players from the Toronto Symphony and the CBC Symphony. Most concerts were held at Eaton Auditorium, but works demanding a larger Orchestra were performed at Massey Hall. The York Concert Society made its debut in a Beethoven concert, on 23 April 1953, and maintained a high-standard in the ensuing 12 years of its existence, providing a welcome complement to the Toronto Symphony Orchestra series. Its guest artists included Betty-Jean Hagen, Lubka Kolessa, Anton Kuerti, Moura Lympany, Lois Marshall, James Milligan, Mary Simmons, and others. Because of financial difficulties, there was no 1961 season and, in 1963, when Unger was ill, the 1st guest-conductor, the expatriate Canadian Harry Newstone, was engaged for one concert. After Unger's death, Hans Bauer led the remaining concerts of the Society's final season, the last on 29 April 1965.

After World War II, Unger renewed his travels as a conductor, appearing particularly in Spain, but also in Latin America, Switzerland, and Germany and as a guest on the BBC. An invitation by Wilhelm Furtwängler led to 2 concerts with the Berlin Philharmonic in 1956, Unger's 1st return to his native city since 1933.

Primarily a guest-conductor, Unger programmed only works of whose merit he was convinced. His repertoire, though focused on the Austro-German Masters (from Bach to Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß and the young Arnold Schönberg) was large. Among contemporary composers, he favoured conservative works. He gave the Canadian premiere of Carl Nielsen's Symphony No. 4 and featured Canadian scores by Alexander Brott, Harry Freedman, Frederick Karam, Pierre Mercure, Oskar Morawetz, Harry Somers, and Healy Willan, introducing some to foreign audiences. Besides the Viennese Classics and Bruckner, his great love was the music of Gustav Mahler, which he championed with the fervour of an apostle. He introduced some of Mahler's works to the USSR, Spain, and Latin America and gave the London premiere of the Symphony No. 5. In Canada, he introduced 3 of the Symphonies (No. 2, in 1958 ; No. 5, in 1959 ; and No. 9, in 1963) , as well as other works.

In Unger's preparation of a score for performance, no detail was left to chance. He exploited the potential of each phrase for articulation and dynamic shading. He tended at times to over-conduct, but he always succeeded in bringing the music to life and conveying its emotions to the audience.

In 1958, Unger was named an honorary director of the Gustav Mahler Society of America ; in 1959, he was awarded the Mahler medal of the Bruckner Society of America ; and, in 1961, he was elected an honorary member of the Vienna « Gustav-Mahler-Gesellschaft » . In 1965, his 50th anniversary as a conductor, he was awarded the Commander's Cross of the Order of Merit of the Federal Republic of Germany. A few weeks later, after recording the 1st 3 movements of Mahler's Symphony No. 6, for its Canadian premiere on CBC radio, he died of a heart attack. A Heinz Unger scholarship, administered by the OAC, was set-up to assist promising young conductors. Unger's widow donated his extensive score library and his papers and tapes to the National Library of Canada.

A Jewish conductor, a devoted Mahlerite, and a delicate string : The musical life of Heinz Unger (1895-1965)

Abstract :

The orchestral conductor Heinz Unger (1895-1965) was born in Berlin, Germany, and was reared from a young age to follow in his father's footsteps and become a lawyer. In 1915, he heard a Munich performance of Gustav Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » conducted by Bruno Walter and, thereafter, devoted the rest of his life to music and particularly to the dissemination of Gustav Mahler's music. This doctoral dissertation is conceived as a contextual biography that explores the manner in which the strands of German Jewish identity converge and are negotiated by a musician who, as a consequence of persecution, lived a sizeable portion of his life in a « Double Diaspora » (in the Jewish « Diaspora » , as well as exiled from his European home) , yet, never cut the ties to a German Jewish tradition informed by the strains of a European cultural heritage. It is a work that discusses the process of Jewish emancipation in Central Europe and, in so doing, sheds light on the complex issues of ethnicity, « race » , nationalism, secularization, and culture and thought as they developed in the modern period and impacted upon Europe and beyond in the 1st half of the 20th Century. In tracking Heinz Unger's many movements and activities around the world and covering his eventual emigration to Canada, the work simultaneously probes the manner in which European cultural values manifested themselves in disparate parts of the world. It is also a detailed examination of the values that Mahler's « œuvre » represents and of one musician's negotiation of these sites of meaning by way of his commitment to Gustav Mahler's music. The 1st 3 Chapters serve as an extended introduction that, in turn, surveys Jewish identity in the « Diaspora », constructions of Jewish music and their meaning, and the specific cultural significance of Mahler's music in a German Jewish context. The following 5 Chapters are cast as a biography of Heinz Unger (based on the Heinz Unger Fonds at Archives Canada, Ottawa, Ontario) that explores the manner in which the German Jewish musician understood and expressed his dual identity by way of his allegiance to music.

Fritz Busch

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Fritz Busch est né le 13 mars 1890 à Siegen, en Westphalie ; et est mort le 14 septembre 1951 à Londres.

Solide musicien, à l'art profond, à l'esprit fort, ferme dans l'intention et l'exécution, avec autant d'idéalisme que de sens pratique, il est considéré comme un des chefs les plus marquant de la 1re moitié du XXe siècle.

Fils-aîné d'une famille de 8 enfants, Fritz Busch connaît une enfance plutôt modeste. Ancien garçon de ferme, Wilhelm, son père, a appris le métier de charpentier puis celui de luthier. Sa mère, Henriette, de 20 ans son aînée, se passionne pour le théâtre et la danse. La famille, plutôt errante, va de ville en ville. Lors d'une étape à Hambourg, Wilhelm apprend à jouer du violon et se trouve un pianiste à Rotterdam. Ils s'établissent alors un temps à Venlo, toujours aux Pays-Bas, et jouent dans des cafés ou lors de mariages afin de gagner leur pain quotidien.

Fritz écrit :

« Je suis issu d'un couple de paysans-musiciens. Je crois bien être né au son des Sonates de Mozart et Beethoven. »

Le garçonnet a 4 ans lorsqu'on lui offre un tout petit violon, mais lui préfère le piano familial dont se délecte son petit frère Adolf, né 1 an après lui. Inséparables, ils savent très tôt déchiffrer les partitions. Lors d'une promenade, Wilhelm surprend le son d'une brouette : « Quelle note est-ce ? » , demande-t-ils aux 2 frères. « Un fa-dièse » , répondent ceux-ci en chœur. C'est un fait : ils possèdent l'oreille absolue. Ils seront musiciens.

De retour à Siegen, Wilhelm Busch ouvre un magasin d'instruments de musique ainsi qu'un atelier de réparation. Fritz prend alors des cours privés et touche à tous les instruments possibles. Avec Adolf, ils prennent l'habitude de jouer ensemble sur la place du marché où un vieil homme se charge de faire la quête pour eux, ainsi que se souvient Fritz :

« Il y avait bien des boutons parmi les pièces mais nous n'étions pas peu fiers de participer au budget familial ! »

À 7 ans, menant de front études élémentaires et études musicales, toutes 2 données par le même professeur, il donne son 1er concert avec la Sonate n° 16 en do majeur de Mozart, plus connue sous le surnom de « Sonate facile » et saura jouer de tous les instruments d'un Orchestre à l'âge de 12 ans. Avec Adolf, ils se produisent sur scène dans une chorale. Dès le lendemain, on ne parle plus que d'eux.

En 1902, la famille déménage pour Siegburg, la ville natale d'Engelbert Humperdinck, auteur de l'Opéra « Hänsel und Gretel » . Fritz s'amuse alors à donner l'appellation de « Kapelle Busch » à sa petite formation. Avec le soutien de son professeur d'école qui lui obtient une place gratuite, il part en 1906 pour 3 ans au Conservatoire de Cologne, alors sous la direction de Fritz Steinbach qui s'était fait reconnaître en succédant brièvement à Hans von Bülow à l'Opéra de Meiningen et dont Johannes Brahms lui-même avait admiré sa façon de diriger ses Symphonies. Parmi les étudiants se trouve un certain Hans Knappertsbusch qui, ironie du sort, deviendra des années après, son rival à l'Opéra de Munich. Fritz fait la connaissance de Karl Böttcher, son futur professeur de piano, ami de Gustav Mahler, d'Arthur Nikisch, alors à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin et de Felix von Weingartner. La famille suit, agrandie. Elizabeth, la 1re sœur, est née, ainsi que Willi, qui deviendra acteur et Hermann, le futur violoncelliste du Quatuor Busch. Wilhelm Busch ouvre alors tout naturellement un nouveau magasin d'instruments de musique.

Böttcher initie son élève à l'œuvre de Wagner et de Brahms qu'il admire, mais aussi à la littérature : Goethe, Ibsen, les écrivains russes et français.

« Durant ces années, j'ai travaillé la musique aux limites du possible, mais un bon livre m'aidait toujours à récupérer de mon intense fatigue. »

Fritz apprécie également à Cologne un enseignement peu scolaire, qui permet aux étudiants de s'exprimer en totale liberté.

Il écrit :

Mais une toute autre histoire va les lier à jamais. Bœttcher a, un jour, montré à Fritz la photographie de sa nièce, Grete, une ravissante jeune fille de 23 ans dont le chef d'orchestre est tombé virtuellement amoureux.

Été 1908, lors du traditionnel Festival offert par la ville de Cologne, Arthur Nikisch vient diriger « les Maîtres-Chanteurs de Nüremberg » et Fritz est dans la fosse, aux percussions :

« Nikisch prit tout son temps puis, avec une brusque énergie, leva sa longue baguette et nous dit : “ Messieurs, s'il vous plaît, lors des 2 Ires mesures, laissez éclater les cuivres puis, laissez-les se retirer pour donner la pré-séance à nos splendides cordes. ” S'il faut bien reconnaître qu'il n'avait pas de don spécial pour former un Orchestre, il faut ajouter qu'il était un chef-né ; une sorte d'improvisateur de génie. Après lui, quand Felix Mottl est venu diriger “ les Noces de Figaro ”, ce fut presque une déception ! »

La même année, il assiste à la première de l'Opéra « Salomé » dirigée par Richard Strauß lui-même, et se lie d'amitié avec Max Reger.

Peu après, Fritz, qui tient de son père un tempérament volontiers colérique et une tendance à l'hypertension, se brouille avec Steinbach. C'est grâce à son remplaçant d'une saison, Waldemar von Baussern, que Fritz Busch comprend que le temps est enfin venu pour lui de quitter la fosse pour le pupitre et diriger le Concerto pour violon d'Édouard Lalo. Quand Steinbach revient et demande à entendre cette œuvre, Busch lui fait savoir qu'il estime s'en charger. En dépit de leurs différends, le directeur approuve :

« Après le 1er mouvement, quelque chose d'incroyable s'est passé, Steinbach est monté sur scène, m'a pris dans ses bras et a hurlé : “ Voici le chef d'orchestre du futur ! ” »

Son diplôme en poche, assez fier de lui et porté par les « hourras » de son frère Adolf, Fritz quitte le Conservatoire en 1909 pour de nouvelles aventures.

Juste avant de partir, Fritz Busch se voit proposer un mystérieux contrat avec l'Opéra russe de Riga pour la saison d'hiver. Avant de recevoir le document, tout ce que le jeune homme de 19 ans sait concerne son salaire ; à savoir 75

Roubles par mois, qui équivalent à 150 Marks. Trop peu pour vivre, surtout que ses parents ont désormais besoin de son aide, mais comment refuser ?

Au printemps 1909, Fritz Busch reçoit une copie du contrat, l'ouvre et lit :

« Le Théâtre allemand de Riga a le plaisir d'engager Monsieur Fritz Busch comme “ Kapellmeister ”. »

C'est l'euphorie, et Wilhelm, le père, signe immédiatement à la place de son fils, qui est mineur. À Cologne, un contrebassiste du Conservatoire lui offre 500 Marks en lui demandant seulement d'honorer ce contrat du mieux que possible. Avant de gagner la Baltique, il passe l'été à la station thermale de Bad Pyrmont, où il dirige l'Ouverture d' « Oberon » de Carl Maria von Weber ; le Concerto pour violon en ré majeur de Ludwig van Beethoven et la 2^e Symphonie de Johannes Brahms.

Fin-août 1909, Fritz arrive à Riga où son frère Adolf vient le rejoindre. La ville appartient certes à l'ancienne Russie, mais l'influence allemande y est fortement présente. Le théâtre où Busch est appelé a été construit en 1863, et on le surnomme « la Maison Blanche » . Le 1^{er} « Deutsches Theater » de Riga a été détruit, et c'est dans cet Opéra disparu que s'est illustré, de 1837 à 1839, un « Kapellmeister » particulier : Richard Wagner. La légende voudrait que son départ, après 3 saisons de travail intense, lui ait inspiré la composition du « Der fliegende Holländer » .

Durant l'année, il dirige de nombreuses œuvres, dont « le Jongleur de Notre-Dame » de Jules Massenet, une sorte d'Opéra-farce qui l'amuse. On le retrouve aussi dans la fosse, où il remplace un corniste défaillant lors d'une soirée consacrée à Brahms, avec Artur Schnabel comme soliste pour le Concerto pour piano en si bémol. 20 ans plus tard, à Dresde, il retrouvera Schnabel et lui demandera, sur le ton de la plaisanterie, quel était son plus mauvais souvenir.

Le pianiste répond :

« Oh, sans doute à Riga, lorsque j'ai dû subir un corniste tellement pénible qu'aujourd'hui encore, mes oreilles sifflent quand j'y repense ! »

À la fin de son contrat, et alors qu'on lui demande de le renouveler, Fritz Busch hésite. Sa vie à Riga, entre un directeur de théâtre psychopathe et un second « Kapellmeister » ivrogne (selon ses dires) , il préfère boucler sa valise et retourner à Bad Pyrmont.

La station thermale, connue pour ses émanations thérapeutiques de dioxyde de carbone qui surgissent de la terre, fut, entre autres, fréquentée par Gœthe et demeure un lieu unique en Europe pour de riches patients en quête de soins et de repos. Fritz et Adolf Busch y arrivent au printemps de 1910. Le 1^{er} doit de nouveau prendre en charge un poste de « Kapellmeister » dans le petit théâtre local, très fréquenté par les curistes. Même si l'on y a déjà joué « la Walkyrie » de Richard Wagner et quelques pages de Beethoven, la mode est plutôt aux Opérettes. Busch, qui a mis la main sur l'ensemble des partitions pour Orchestre d'Antonín Dvořák, en profite pour se démarquer de cette musique plaisante, et, sans prendre le temps de répéter, donne à entendre les œuvres du compositeur tchèque lors des concerts du soir. Le public ne s'y retrouve pas, et le directeur du théâtre exige que Dvořák disparaisse des programmes au profit de compositeurs plus populaires, comme Paul Lincke, heureux créateur de musique légère. C'est tout ce que Busch déteste le plus, et s'il consent à inscrire le nom du petit Maître berlinois dans sa programmation, il continue d'imposer Dvořák et organise un Festival Schumann où, entre autres, il dirige les 4 Symphonies, la Fantaisie pour violon, Opus 131, et le court Opéra « Manfred », inspiré d'un poème de Lord Byron. Pour « Manfred », l'acteur et baryton allemand Ludwig Wüllner et sa sœur Anna viennent à Bad Pyrmont chanter le rôle-titre masculin et le rôle féminin d'Astarte.

Après la représentation, quelque peu ému, Busch demande à Wüllner ce qu'il a pensé de sa prestation :

Au lieu de s'offusquer, Busch s'interroge. Il lui faut donc chercher derrière les notes.

L'année 1911 marque, pour Fritz, un tournant considérable. Depuis qu'il a découvert, en photo, la belle Grete Bøttcher, il l'a rencontrée et la passion virtuelle est devenue bien réelle. La jeune fille est très férue en musique et joue régulièrement du violon dans un Orchestre de chambre. Elle aime également la littérature, aussi semble-t-elle la compagne idéale pour le « Kapellmeister ». Lorsqu'elle arrive à Bad Pyrmont, ils décident de se marier et choisissent la date du 28 août, anniversaire de la naissance de Goethe, pour célébrer leurs noces dans la vieille église de Mengershausen.

Malgré ses concerts dans la station thermale, Busch est à cours d'argent. Il y a une place de chef d'orchestre à prendre à l'Académie musicale de la ville de Gotha, et, malgré son jeune âge, sa candidature est retenue. Il laisse à Bad Pyrmont son ami Max Reger ainsi que l'Orchestre Blüthner de Berlin et, en 1 saison, se refait une petite santé financière et accroît sa notoriété. C'est ainsi qu'il débarque à Aix-la-Chapelle, où on lui offre son 1er poste de directeur musical.

Les 3 années passées là sont heureuses. Busch découvre un grand théâtre à l'acoustique impeccable, et y dirige tout aussi bien la « Passion selon Saint-Matthieu » de Bach que la « Missa solemnis » de Beethoven, le « Messie » de Händel ou encore « le Requiem allemand » et la « Rhapsodie pour Alto » de Brahms. En 1914, Grete donne naissance à un fils, Hans Peter et Fritz accumule les projets, mais la Guerre mondiale éclate en août, et le musicien va devenir soldat volontaire.

Après avoir servi son pays et perdu, en 1916, son fidèle ami Max Reger, Fritz Busch sort sonné d'une tornade où, dit-il :

« J'ai appris les mensonges de la politique, la vanité du héros de guerre, et me suis demandé, si une tragédie de ce type devait recommencer, si je mettrais en danger ma vie, ma carrière et mon travail pour un idéal qui, désormais, me semblait particulièrement douteux. »

Au printemps de 1918, alors qu'il se trouve encore en uniforme de lieutenant à Gera, une ville de Thuringe, il apprend que Max von Schillings vient de quitter la direction de l'Opéra de Stuttgart. La ville est alors un petit royaume qui a rejoint l'unité allemande, tout en préservant son indépendance. Busch pose sa candidature et est retenu. Reçu par l'intendant-général, le baron Gustav von Putlitz, Busch comprend vite l'intérêt tout particulier que celui-ci porte à l'Opéra. Va-t-il devoir faire ses preuves ? Non, sa réputation l'a précédé et, sans l'entendre diriger, le baron le nomme « Kapellmeister » du Théâtre royal de Württemberg. Le 1er violon, Carl Wendling, a, dans le passé, dirigé l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston et fréquenté Bayreuth avec Hans Richter. C'est un musicien de qualité, cultivé qui a complètement restructuré l'Orchestre royal, faisant notamment appel à des chanteurs renommés tels que Hélène Wildbrunn, George Meader, un ténor américain, ou, encore l'alto suédoise Sigrid Hoffmann-Onéguin.

Fritz Busch fait en juillet ses débuts avec « Tristan und Isolde » mais, dès août, les échos de la Révolution russe sèment le chaos. Lors d'une performance de « l'Or du Rhin », en novembre, il s'oppose violemment au baron von Putlitz qui exige, sur demande expresse de la Reine, que toutes les lumières du nouveau théâtre restent allumées :

« Très bien, sachez alors qu'il n'y aura pas de musique et que je vais sortir de ce lieu sauf si l'obscurité souhaitée par Wagner arrive avant la toute Ire note. »

À la fin de l'année, la Monarchie succombe, et l'État indépendant du Württemberg, rattaché à la République de Weimar, prend sa place. Stuttgart en devient la capitale :

« Durant la Guerre, j'avais été témoin d'un racisme de classes sociales qui protégeait les puissants et voilà que cela continuait. Alors si novembre 1918, après les éruptions venues de l'Est, nous promettait une révolution sociale ouvrant la porte à une vraie démocratie, j'étais partant. »

La vie musicale continue, et Busch dirige « les Noces de Figaro » et « Fidelio » au Festival de la petite bourgade de Mühlacker, puis à la station thermale de Freudenstadt, fréquentée alors par le Chancelier social-démocrate Friedrich Ebert, futur 1er président de la République de Weimar. Toujours engagé dans la découverte, il dirige l'Opéra de Hans Pfitzner « Palestrina » dont la première avait été assurée par Bruno Walter à Munich ; organise un Festival Bruckner avec, entre autres, la Symphonie n° 7 (Busch possède un manuscrit de 2 pages d'un arrangement pour 12 instruments de cette Symphonie) ; et, lors d'un séjour à Francfort, dirige un Opéra de Paul Hindemith, « Mörder, Hoffnung der Frauen », qui déclenche un scandale. Busch persiste dans l'exploration des compositeurs contemporains, et dirige des œuvres de Ferruccio Busoni, Franz Schreker, Walter Braunfels, Igor Stravinsky et Othmar Schoeck avant d'aborder la première en Allemagne de « Boris Godounov » dans la version de 1872. Habilement, il alterne avec des Opéras plus sages, tels « le Trouvère » ou « Falstaff » de Giuseppe Verdi.

Fritz Busch et sa famille sont indéniablement heureux à Stuttgart, mais pendant l'hiver de 1921, alors que Nikisch meurt, une invitation de l'Opéra d'État de Dresde va tout changer. Appelé pour n'être qu'un chef-invité, il va s'y installer dès l'automne de 1922, en prenant à 32 ans, la succession de Fritz Reiner en tant que directeur (enfin !) de l'un des Orchestres les plus anciens et les plus vénérés d'Allemagne.

Dresde est splendide, son Opéra, magnifique, mais la ville vit à l'heure de l'inflation délirante de la monnaie allemande.

Le 1er salaire annuel de Fritz Busch s'élève à 200,000 Marks qui, vite, se transforme en millions et milliards. Les meilleurs chanteurs désertent la ville pour la Tchécoslovaquie proche où les salaires sont constants. Ayant choisi « Fidelio » pour ouvrir la saison, Busch reçoit durant l'été un télégramme laconique :

« Qui va interpréter Leonore ? »

Après avoir résolu le problème, il programme « le Chevalier à la rose » et « les Maîtres-Chanteurs de Nuremberg » .

Appelé à Berlin pour diriger l'Orchestre philharmonique lors du 1er anniversaire de la naissance de l'Allemagne, Busch fait l'aller-retour en voiture.

« Mon nouveau poste était bien différent des autres. On acceptait tout de moi et on me pardonnait tout. Lors de mon installation, dans une étrange euphorie générale, un critique musical plutôt situé à Droite, avait tout simplement écrit : “ Habemus Papam ”. Pour ceux qui se réclamaient de la Gauche, j'étais devenu “ le Roi Midas ” qui transforme en or tout ce qu'il touche. Cette situation m'était d'autant plus intolérable que les tenants du conservatisme en appelèrent vite à la suppression d'Opéras à leurs yeux “ insignifiants ”, tels le “ Benvenuto Cellini ” de Berlioz pour jouer 2 Opéras de Siegfried Wagner, à savoir : “ Bärenhäuter ” et “ Herzog Wildfang ”. »

L'événement le plus important de la saison 1922-1923 consiste en la reprise, avec Issay Dobrowen, de « Boris Godounov » . Fritz Busch l'a considérablement remanié, grâce, entre autres, à la collaboration d'un artiste resté anonyme :

« Il se trouve qu'un jour un musicien russe me demanda la faveur d'un siège gratuit. Je le lui concédais et nous nous mîmes à discuter. J'appris ainsi qu'il avait dirigé cet Opéra bien plus de fois que moi, et en Russie. Presque comme un acteur, il se mit à mimer la scène du couronnement et ne se releva pas du sol. La partition indiquait, certes, une longue pause après la sonnerie des cloches du Kremlin mais, au piano, j'avais pris l'habitude de ne pas la respecter. Or, cet ancien “ Kapellmeister ” m'expliqua qu'elle était essentielle car, dans le silence complet de la foule, le grand créateur du rôle-titre, Fédor Chaliapine baisait symboliquement la terre russe. »

Cette importante modification, tant musicale que scénique, explique que la postérité ait retenu cette production comme étant la création de l'Opéra en Allemagne, et pas celle de Stuttgart.

Busch s'inscrit officiellement dans l'exploration des artistes contemporains. Il programme l'« Arlecchino » de Ferruccio Busoni dont il crée également « Doktor Faust » , en 1925, après le décès du compositeur. Busoni a quand même eu le temps d'introduire l'un de ses protégés, Kurt Weill, qui propose à Busch son très court Opéra, « Der Protagonist » (1926) . Avec lui arrive l'avant-garde allemande du moment : Ernst Křenek, Paul Hindemith et son Opéra « Cardillac » dont Busch assure la création dans une scénographie de Oskar Kokoschka, mais également Max Slevogt, et Oskar Strnad (1926) . Il offre, par ailleurs, la fabrication des décors de « Don Carlos » au peintre Hein Heckroth, ceux de « Don Giovanni » à Hans Pœlzig, l'architecte en titre de Dresde ou, encore, la conception d'un « Ring » entier à l'architecte Oskar Strnad. Fritz Busch se fait également aider par Erich Engel qui fut l'assistant de Leo Blech et de Bruno Walter à l'Opéra de Charlottenbourg. Ces années seront les années les plus fastes.

En dehors de l'Opéra, Busch doit mener à bien de nombreux concerts. Habitué des lieux, Richard Strauß ou Otto Klemperer en assurent parfois quelques-uns, mais l'atmosphère est au conservatisme. Busch ne parviendra pas à dépoussiérer, comme il l'a fait avec l'Opéra, le répertoire symphonique. Personne ne veut prendre le moindre risque, et l'Orchestre de Dresde répugne à interpréter des œuvres encore inconnues. Quant aux solistes engagés, ils se doivent de jouer déjà d'une solide réputation. Ainsi voit-on arriver Artur Schnabel, que Busch a déjà aperçu du fond de la fosse à Riga ; Rudolf Serkin, alors âgé de 19 ans, Egon Petri, Emil Sauer, Bronisław Huberman, Josef Szigeti et, bien évidemment Adolph Busch. Le 8 novembre 1923, un certain Adolf Hitler, chef du NSDAP, Parti national-socialiste des travailleurs allemands, tente un coup d'État à Munich, mais échoue.

Busch écrit :

« À ce moment-là grâce à l'emprisonnement des protagonistes du “ Putsch ”, le monde pouvait encore se prémunir du Diable qui le menaçait. »

En 1924, Busch reçoit une lettre de Karl Muck, alors responsable de l'Orchestre de Bayreuth depuis le décès, en 1916, de Hans Richter dans laquelle il l'invite à venir au Festival qui vient de rouvrir après un silence de 10 ans. Pratiquement en même temps, Siegfried Wagner lui a ouvert les portes du « Temple », en lui demandant d'y diriger « les Maîtres-Chanteurs de Nüremberg ». Le fils de Richard Wagner a beaucoup voyagé, notamment aux États-Unis. Grâce à lui, l'Orchestre est neuf, les interprètes comptent parmi les meilleurs. Pour Busch, la tentation est grande et il accepte.

Lorsqu'il arrive dans les lieux, Hugo Rüdell, chef des chœurs et grand musicien, est déjà en train de répéter l'œuvre. Avant d'assurer la première, le 4 août, Busch demandera, à son tour, une bonne centaine de répétitions. Quand le moment est venu, avec la présence de Hermann Weil, ancien interprète du « Metropolitan Opera » de New York dans le rôle de Hans Sachs, la satisfaction du public comme de la critique est unanime :

« Le Mæstro Fritz Busch, directeur-général de l'Opéra de Dresde, a conduit l'Orchestre d'une manière qui peut être qualifiée d'aussi brillante qu'une tapisserie aux couleurs chatoyantes », écrit le critique du « Time Magazine » .

Pendant son séjour, Fritz Busch va découvrir les nouvelles exigences de son pays, non sans un certain malaise :

« J'avais écrit un article pour le “ Bayreuther Blätter ” au sujet de l'avenir de l'Orchestre de Bayreuth. Les réactions à ces quelques mots me heurtèrent beaucoup. Les événements de 1918 et l'évolution politique et sociale qui en avait découlé n'avait en rien entamé certaines mentalités. Et, à l'exception de l'Orchestre symphonique de Boston, rien ne pouvait rivaliser avec les Orchestres allemands. J'avais mentionné Arturo Toscanini parmi les personnalités d'exception, entre autres pour son travail mené au sein de la Scala et de son Orchestre, complètement rénovés, et voilà que l'on me faisait savoir que je manquais de “ sens patriotique ”. J'étais d'autant plus accablé que Siegfried Wagner s'était montré très réticent aux désirs du Mæstro italien. Alors que j'avais plaidé pour qu'il vienne à Bayreuth dès 1925, il m'avait répondu que “ la présence d'un étranger à Bayreuth n'était pas opportune ”. »

Plus grave, Busch découvre que ce refus vient directement de la Villa Wahnfried, à savoir de Cosima Wagner elle-même, devenue hystérique dès que l'on se mettait à parler de Toscanini :

« On avait l'impression que des humanistes comme Hans Richter, Felix Mottl ou Karl Mück n'avaient jamais été présents dans ce qui était devenu un sanctuaire. Pourtant, à la fin des “ Maîtres-Chanteurs ”, j'ai été comme habité par la véritable âme wagnérienne ; par le talent de ce compositeur dont mon cher ami Thomas Mann avait dit que “ d'un point de vue strictement artistique, il était inégalé et pouvait peut-être être perçu comme le génie absolu de toute l'histoire de l'art ”. »

Cosima daigne écouter l seul Acte des « Maîtres-Chanteurs » , lors des dernières représentations. C'en est trop. Appelé par Siegfried à venir rencontrer la crème de la crème allemande à Wahnfried, une litote pour ne pas nommer le général Erich Ludendorff, qui avait activement participé au putsch d'Hitler, Fritz Busch refuse, demande à Mück de le remplacer pour l'été suivant et fait ses bagages. Retour à Dresde.

De retour à Dresde, Fritz Busch se rend vite compte que, vers la fin des années 1920, la vie quotidienne des Théâtres d'Opéra allemands est au plus mal. À Berlin, à Vienne, à Munich comme ailleurs, l'argent manque cruellement. Les raisons de ces déficits sont multiples, mais les salaires ahurissants exigés par les chanteurs comptent parmi les premières. La raison l'emporte sur le désastre quand tous ces Théâtres font front commun et se fondent dans « l'Union des directeurs des Théâtres allemands » , initié par Alfred Reucker, qui fixe à 1,000 Marks le cachet des interprètes que, par ailleurs, on se partage.

Busch note :

« Si nous avons pu donner une nouvelle production de “ la Chauve-Souris ”, c'est uniquement parce que notre charmante et talentueuse Rosalinde chantait le même rôle, presque en même temps, à Berlin ! »

Plus important est le lien rétabli entre Richard Strauß et Fritz Busch. Depuis la création, le 4 novembre 1924, d' « Intermezzo » avec la grande cantatrice Lotte Lehmann, les 2 hommes s'étaient quelque peu perdus de vue.

Le compositeur bavarois, alors âgé de 60 ans, joue volontiers les « grands Seigneurs » , mais demeure reconnaissant à la capitale de la Saxe d'avoir programmé la création de la plupart de ses Opéras, notamment sous la direction de Ernst von Schuch. Fervent admirateur du compositeur, Alfred Reucker, l'intendant du Théâtre, compte parmi les lers à soumettre à Busch une nouvelles création, celle d' « Hélène d'Égypte » . Le chef d'orchestre connaît déjà l'œuvre, que Strauß en personne lui a jouée à Garmisch, et sait qu'il souhaite voir son Opéra officiellement dévoilé à Dresde sous sa direction. Pourtant, il est réticent. « Hélène d'Égypte » n'a pas la consistance d' « Intermezzo » ni de « Salomé » ; quelque chose de suave, de sirupeux émane de la partition :

« Je lui dit, entre autres, que le chant de Daud, en si bémol me semblait pauvre. Je lui conseillais de revoir l'ensemble de ses “ inspirations ” d'une façon plus stricte. Strauß ne me désapprouvait pas et répéta même ce que je venais d'exprimer à sa femme, tout juste arrivée dans la maison. Celle-ci, surprise, prit un tout autre ton, et m'expliqua avec un réel cynisme que ces prétendues “ suavités ” étaient tout ce que le bas-public réclamait. Elle ajouta même : “ Mon cher Busch, personne n'aurait aimé ' Tannhäuser ' si l'on n'y pouvait entendre l'air ' O Du, Mein holder Abendstern '. Quant à ' la Walkyrie ' sans les " Orages d'Hiver ". Non, non, voyez-vous, c'est ce qu'ils veulent. " »

Malgré ses réticences, Busch accepte.

La première d' « Hélène d'Égypte » a lieu le 6 juin 1928, avec Elisabeth Rethberg dans le rôle-titre et Busch au pupitre. En guise de remerciements, Strauß lui dédiera, ainsi qu'à Reucker, son « Arabella » . Mais une fois le pouvoir nazi en place, et Busch parti, cette dédicace disparaîtra. Durant ces dernières années, Dresde s'ouvre à un cycle mozartien - indubitablement, le compositeur préféré de Busch, avec, entre autres, « Idoménée » et « Così fan tutte » pour lequel il a fait appel à une protégée de Toscanini, la cantatrice Editha Fleischer-Engel. Busch dirige également « Turandot » de Puccini, « André Chénier » de Giordano ou, encore, « Xerxès » de Händel. Par ailleurs, il contribue à sortir Verdi de la routine en jouant avant tout le monde « Don Carlos » et « la Force du destin » , création qui fait arriver Arturo Toscanini en voiture depuis Milan, soucieux d'entendre une œuvre avec laquelle il a, selon ses dires « toujours échoué » . Lorsqu'il arrive, la jeune cantatrice Meta Seinemeyer, qui doit interpréter le rôle d'Amelia, est trop malade et le spectacle est annulé. À la place de l'Opéra de Verdi, Toscanini assiste à une représentation d' « Hélène d'Égypte » , et finit la soirée à en discuter longuement en italien avec Busch. Les 2 hommes s'apprécient hautement. Busch a déjà fait un voyage à Zürich pour voir Toscanini diriger mais, là-aussi, la soirée avait dû être annulée.

Les 2 hommes se rencontrent de plus en plus souvent, à la Scala, à Rome, Florence ou Venise. Toscanini est déjà venu à Dresde en grand secret pour écouter « Don Giovanni » , mais Busch ne s'estime pas encore à la hauteur de l'œuvre et interroge alors son ami qui réplique en souriant :

« Caro amico, io lo faccio da quaranta-tre anni ! »

Le contrat de Busch avec l'Opéra de Dresde lui permet de voyager un peu partout : en Hollande, en Angleterre, en Scandinavie, en Suisse ainsi qu'à La Scala de Milan, à l'Augusteo de Rome comme aux États-Unis ou dans les pays de l'Est (Russie, Tchécoslovaquie) . Le Mæstro, qui en a déjà profité pour fouler le sol américain, repart outre-Atlantique où il prend la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de New York pour 3 mois (1927-1928) .

« Ma plus belle expérience, lors de cette 2e visite, fut de rencontrer Yehudi Menuhin, alors seulement âgé de 12 ans ! Son art du violon était parfaitement maîtrisé et, comme il devait participer à l'un de mes concerts, je lui demandais ses préférences. " Le Concerto en ré majeur de Beethoven ", répondit l'adolescent. Je pensais que c'était impossible et rétorquais : « Jackie Coogan n'a pas la permission d'interpréter le rôle d'Hamlet ! " Mais il insista, et son père aussi. Je l'entendis donc dans ma chambre d'hôtel. Il joua tellement magnifiquement et si professionnellement qu'après le second tutti, j'étais conquis. En fait, mon travail avec le jeune prodige fut, pour moi, une source d'enrichissement. »

Le concert a lieu à « Carnegie Hall » où Menuhin fait merveille, surtout avec le Stradivarius offert par un banquier de New York, qu'il ne devait plus jamais quitter. La famille Menuhin vient retrouver Busch en Allemagne, en 1929, et Adolf se charge d'entraîner le jeune violoniste qui se produit dès lors en Europe, à Dresde, Bâle et au « Queen's Hall » de Londres (1929) . Ce voyage new-yorkais permet aussi l'invitation de grands musiciens américains, notamment William Vilonat, excellent pédagogue et Frank Damrosch, directeur de la toute nouvelle « Juilliard School » , née de l'extrême générosité d'un riche marchand de textile qui avait légué environ 12,5 millions de dollars pour créer une Fondation musicale.

Fritz Busch, devenu un Mæstro à la réputation quasi-internationale, fait venir à Dresde des interprètes de renom, tels Erna Berger, la mezzo-soprano Martha Fuchs, le ténor Max Lorenz ou, encore, la basse Ivan Andresen. Grandement aidé par le fidèle Alfred Reucker, il offre à la ville de Saxe ses plus belles nuits. Pourtant, Busch continue de se poser mille questions concernant son métier :

« Même dans les circonstances les plus agréables, les résultats d'un Opéra différeront toujours largement entre ce que les gens attendent et ce que l'on est à même de produire. »

Plus tard, il dira carrément que, né d'un paradoxe, l'Opéra survivra en tant qu'énigme magnifique. Le jeudi 24 octobre 1929, la Bourse américaine de « Wall Street » s'effondre, entraînant dans sa chute la plupart des pays d'Europe.

« Je me dois de reconnaître, que les circonstances qui m'ont menées à devenir chef d'orchestre et d'Opéra n'ont jamais été vraiment agréables : j'ai débuté alors qu'une Révolution remuait les entrailles du monde après une Guerre mondiale perdue, et mes 10 années à Dresde peuvent se résumer en cette phrase : commencées dans l'inflation et achevées dans l'une des plus graves crises économiques de tous les temps. »

C'est alors qu'il fait la connaissance du producteur Carl Ebert, qui s'était jadis illustré en tant que narrateur dans « l'Histoire du soldat » de Igor Stravinski.

« J'avais vu sa production de “ l'Enlèvement au Sérail ” à l'Opéra de Berlin, et j'étais enthousiaste. Ebert me proposa d'emblée le poste de directeur-musical à Berlin, mais je n'étais pas encore prêt à quitter Dresde. Nous allions demeurer en contact, et l'avenir devait faire le reste. »

L'avenir ne se conjuguera pas au futur. En juillet 1932, Adolf Hitler se présente à la Présidence de la République de Weimar et obtient 37,4 % des voix qui équivalent à 230 sièges au « Reichstag ». Pendant qu'il dirige pour la Ire fois au Festival de Salzbourg avec « l'Enlèvement au Sérail » et, surtout, « Un bal masqué » qui soulève un enthousiasme sans précédent, Busch sait déjà que la peste est entrée en Allemagne.

Fritz Busch se sent allemand. Profondément allemand. Mais jusqu'aux années 1930, il ne s'était pas mêlé de politique. Aussi, lorsqu'il vient à Coblenz pour une cure de repos, est-il étonné, puis vite révolté de voir des S.A. dans les rues, des affiches nazies et des croix gammées sur tous les murs ainsi que l'avertissement : « Interdit aux Juifs » dans son hôtel, où se tient un rassemblement autour d'un révérend local dont les propos sont sans ambiguïté. Il se plonge alors dans la lecture de « Mein Kampf » :

« J'avais abordé ce livre avec une aversion profonde. Après l'avoir lu, l'aversion avait fait place au complet rejet intellectuel de tout ce que cet ouvrage contenait. En quelque sorte, plus d'affect, mais une opposition consciente. »

Le chef d'orchestre de Dresde est une personnalité à ménager ; mais il est aussi un citoyen incapable de se taire. Busch exprime donc clairement, en 1932 et 1933, ce qu'il pense du National-Socialisme et d'Hitler. La doctrine du Parti (ceux qui ne sont pas avec moi sont contre moi) se retourne vite contre lui. Les Nazis ont compris qu'il leur serait difficile, voire impossible de rallier pareil homme à leur cause. Ils ne lui feront plus de cadeau. Les élections de juillet 1932 ont donné à la Saxe une écrasante majorité et il sera très facile, pour faire taire le chef d'orchestre, de lui ôter son salaire et de réduire au tiers le budget de l'Opéra. Le Parti nazi a déjà tenté de discriminer Busch aux yeux des allemands en publiant une attaque en règle contre lui dans la presse nationale socialiste, notamment le « Freiheitzkampf », devenue de plus en plus influente. Non seulement son talent est remis en question, mais sa personnalité même est touchée par les plus basses calomnies, nourries par des taupes ayant infiltré le Théâtre. De plus en plus choqué, Busch sent qu'il est temps de quitter Dresde. Les menaces se font de plus en plus inquiétantes. Même s'il se sépare des éléments douteux de son Théâtre, il n'a plus beaucoup de pouvoir au sein même de sa maison. Un soir, il reçoit un courrier du « Gauleiter » Cuno Meyer où on lui fait savoir que la cantatrice Hildegard Tausche, qui avait été renvoyée, était une interprète de talent, comme l'Opéra de Dresde dans ses meilleurs jours n'en avaient probablement jamais connue, et que sa mise à l'écart ne pouvait être attribuée qu'à la faiblesse d'appréciation et à l'attitude pernicieuse du « Musikdirektor ». Aussi devait-elle être immédiatement ré-embauchée sinon, lui, Meyer, prendrait au nom du Parti des sanctions contre l'Opéra. Busch réplique officiellement :

« Sachez, « Herr » Meyer, que l'on m'a fait savoir que vous n'étiez qu'un petit fabricant d'engrais artificiel alors que, personnellement, l'Opéra occupe ma vie entière depuis plus de 20 ans. Dans le cas d'Hildegard Tausche, je vous suggère de vous en occuper avec votre râteau à fumier et de me laisser les responsabilités qui sont les miennes. »

Avec son réseau d'amis, entre autres les membres du « Rotary Club », Busch sait que, même si elle n'arrive pas à destination, sa lettre sera lue.

Le « Musikdirektor » sait qu'il n'est pas seul à oser se lancer dans pareille croisade. Dès 1931, en Italie, Arturo Toscanini, a refusé de jouer en public « Giovinetta », l'hymne de la jeunesse fasciste, et s'est retrouvé confiné à résidence, via Durini, sans passeport et après avoir été roué de coups lors d'un concert à Bologne. Parmi les télégrammes de soutien qu'il reçoit, Winifred Wagner, l'épouse de Siegfried, enverra le sien : elle a trop peur que le Mæstro se désiste lors du Festival de Bayreuth. Ce qu'il fera.

À Dresde, les événements se précipitent. Le mardi 7 mars 1933, alors que Busch se prépare à partir pour l'Opéra où il doit diriger « Rigoletto », on le prévient que des drapeaux nazis ont été dressés à l'entrée du Théâtre. Quelques minutes plus tard, une amie arrive, en pleurs, et lui confie avoir entendu la foule crier qu'« il fallait tuer ce Busch ». Parvenant à calmer son tempérament orageux, le chef d'orchestre part pour faire répéter les chœurs. Une fois sur place, le piège se referme sur l'artiste :

poste d'intendant, m'expliqua certes poliment mais explicitement, qu'il n'en serait rien. Le balayant d'un bras, je gagnais la fosse d'orchestre et mon pupitre, où je fus accueillis par des hurlements de haine. “ Busch, traître ! ” ; “ Busch, dehors. ” Les membres de l'Orchestre qui tous, 11 ans auparavant, m'avaient élu avec enthousiasme, demeuraient pâles et silencieux. L'hystérie avait tellement envahi le public que les quelques pauvres spectateurs me soutenant encore faillirent passer par la balustrade. Le “ Kapellmeister ” Striegler fut appelé à la rescousse pour diriger à ma place et là, l'Orchestre se mit à jouer. »

Le jeudi 9 mars, Busch est officiellement appelé par Posse au « Taschenberg Palast » pour prendre acte des doléances reconnues contre lui. À savoir :

Trop de marchés conclus avec les Juifs.

Trop d'avantages accordés aux Juifs et chanteurs étrangers.

Une tendance à l'absentéisme.

Un salaire trop élevé.

Refusant d'entrer dans des discussions de « race » , le chef d'orchestre se contente de ruiner les allégations d'absentéisme et de salaire trop élevé.

« Puis je leur dis que, plus jamais, je ne conduirais à Dresde. »

Et Bayreuth ? Le grand chef d'orchestre Heinz Tietjen, sûr du refus de Toscanini, a déjà joué les intermédiaires. Les 2 personnes se téléphonent :

« Et si je refuse ? » , interroge Toscanini.

« Hé bien, ils feront appel à moi. » , répond Busch.

« Et alors ? » , demande Busch.

« Hé bien je dirai non. “ Ah, Caro Amico ”. » , s'exclame l'Italien en raccrochant.

Busch met alors les points sur les « i » . Après une brève entrevue avec Hermann Göring où chacun campe sur ses positions ; après avoir clairement dit à Richard Strauß que la première d' « Arabella » se ferait sans lui, il part pour Gênes et, le 15 juin 1933, monte à bord du Conte Biancamano et quitte l'Allemagne. Sa famille l'accompagne. Irene, la fille d'Adolf, est fiancée à Rudolf Serkin, alors persécuté par les Nazis.

Fritz Busch laisse derrière lui des années rayonnantes, où presque 1,000 œuvres, tant lyriques que symphoniques, ont été données ; où des créations contemporaines ont été assurées et d'autres ré-inventées.

À Toscanini, toujours inquiet pour Bayreuth, Busch envoie un télégramme, tiré d'une chanson populaire :

« L'armata se ne va, Se non partiss' anch'io. »

(L'armée s'en va ; si je ne la suivais pas, alors quel lâche serais-je !)

Peu avant de quitter son pays, en mai 1933, Fritz Busch a reçu un télégramme du « Teatro Colón » de Buenos-Aires où l'actuel directeur lui offre un poste pour la saison à venir. C'est donc tout naturellement qu'il se rend en Argentine pour y découvrir « l'un des Théâtres les plus modernes du monde ». En fait l'édifice, flambant neuf, vient à peine de rouvrir, après d'intenses années de travaux. L'Orchestre a travaillé sous les plus grands : Arturo Toscanini en 1922 ; Otto Klemperer ; Arthur Nikish, peu avant son décès ; ou, encore Erich Kleiber qui, en 1926, a conduit un cycle Beethoven et y reviendra après son départ de l'Allemagne en 1935. En fait, dès 1933, le « Teatro Colón » résonne à l'heure internationale et, plus particulièrement allemande. Démis à son tour de ses fonctions à Berlin, Carl Ebert ne tarde pas à rejoindre Buenos-Aires, où il devient producteur de la plupart des Opéras dirigés par Busch, qui va prolonger son contrat pour 8 autres années et en profiter pour aller diriger au Danemark, où on l'attend depuis longtemps.

Pour l'heure, après les « Temporada de Primavera » (Concerts du Printemps) , la programmation de l'année 1934 s'ouvre, le 25 septembre avec la première de la « Passion selon Saint-Matthieu » de Bach où s'illustre Koloman von Pataky dans le rôle de l'Évangéliste ; suivie de la 9e Symphonie de Beethoven qui vaut à Busch une longue salve d'applaudissements. Il dirige également « Così fan tutte » avec Ina Souez et John Brownlee ainsi que « Don Giovanni » où le public découvre un Leporello étonnant, le baryton Salvatore Baccaloni. En 1935, il dirige tout à la fois la « Passion », la Messe en sol mineur et le « Ring » de Wagner, suivi de « Lohengrin » et de « Tristan und Isolde ». S'ensuivront des performances mémorables : l' « Arabella » de Strauß (que Fritz Busch dirige pour la 1re fois en sachant pertinemment que le compositeur a volé au secours de Winifred Wagner pour remplacer Toscanini à Bayreuth) et l' « Alceste » de Glück. Se produisant un temps au Chili, il revient en 1936 pour une série d'Opéras alors que la Guerre d'Espagne éclate. Le 20 septembre, il dirige « le Chevalier à la rose » avec Tiana Lemnitz en Octavian et Alexander Kipnis en baron Ochs ; le 22, « Parsifal », avec le ténor belge René Maison dans le rôle-titre et Marjorie Lawrence dans celui de Kundry ; et le 25, la Symphonie n° 41 surnommée « Jupiter » de Mozart. Par ailleurs, il dirige également une superbe production de « la Chauve-Souris » .

Entre temps, Carl Ebert a traversé l'Europe et a rencontré, à Londres, un certain capitaine John Christie, héritier du domaine de Glyndebourne dans le comté du Sussex, qui avait annoncé par voie de presse désirer bâtir un Opéra dans ses champs. Alors âgé d'une cinquantaine d'années, le plus célèbre célibataire d'Angleterre (comme on le surnommait) avait fini par se marier le 4 juin 1931, à Audrey Mildmay, une charmante soprano au très léger filet de voix qu'il avait rencontrée pour la 1re fois dans sa propre maison, en 1928, au cours d'une représentation de l'Acte I de « l'Enlèvement au Sérail » où, pour un salaire de 5 livres Sterling, elle avait chanté le rôle de Blondchen.

Christie, excentrique comme seuls les Anglais peuvent l'être, n'avait nullement l'intention de mener à bien un projet sérieux, en engageant une bonne centaine de musiciens, mais plutôt de se créer un espace musical où une poignée d'amateurs viendraient accompagner quelques « cordes » semi-professionnelles pour interpréter, dès l'été de 1933, « la Walkyrie » , « Don Giovanni » , un « Ring » entier avec « Parsifal » en apéritif. Comment s'est répandue la légende du « milliardaire mélomane bâtissant un Théâtre musical de ses propres mains » ? Nul ne le sait vraiment mais, toujours est-il que cette publicité ne déplaît pas au Maître des lieux, désireux de gagner l'amitié et l'assistance du chef d'orchestre Sir Thomas Beecham. Cela semble peu sérieux : Beecham est déjà engagé ailleurs et l'on n'improvise pas des œuvres aussi lourdes.

Approché alors qu'il se produit à Eastbourne, par Frances Dakyns, une jeune et énergique violoniste devenue secrétaire, intendante, et muse à tout faire, Adolf Busch apprend l'existence de John Christie et de ses projets. En novembre 1933, ayant réussi à retracer le parcours compliqué de Fritz, Frances écrit au Mæstro allemand qui se trouve à Copenhague afin de l'inviter dans le domaine de l'homme du Sussex pour y assurer des productions d'Opéras de Mozart. Fritz Busch, trop pris, ne peut honorer cette proposition, mais accepte de venir l'année suivante. Frances Dakyns organise alors une rencontre, à Amsterdam, entre Grete Busch et John Christie, et l'affaire semble conclue, surtout que Busch peut compter sur l'aide de Carl Ebert.

Ce dernier, nommé producteur et Busch, directeur artistique, vont devoir s'occuper de tout, car Christie vit dans ses rêves, loin des réalités aussi triviales que budget, salaire des musiciens, salaires et choix des interprètes. Ayant rencontré, en Allemagne, le futur directeur du « Metropolitan Opera » , Rudolf Bing, le chef d'orchestre lui demande, dès 1933, de venir les rejoindre afin de s'occuper de l'intendance artistique :

Bing accepte de venir pour la somme de 100 livres Sterling, incluant les frais de son voyage. Après avoir négocié l'engagement des nombreux musiciens, Bing et Busch, en accord avec John Christie, font appel au violoniste George Stratton, qui a dirigé le « London Symphony Orchestra » , pour prendre la direction de l'Orchestre. Pour les chanteurs qui devront s'imposer dans les 2 Opéras de Mozart, tous décident de faire venir de jeunes et prometteurs interprètes pour les 2 Opéras de Mozart choisis : « les Noces de Figaro » , et « Così fan tutte » , donnés pour la Ire fois en italien. Ainsi arrivent d'Allemagne et d'Autriche et du Danemark Irene Eisinger, Luise Helletsgruber, Lucie Manen, Herta Csonka-Glatz, Aulikki Rautawaara et Willi Domgraf-Fassbænder, alors tout jeune baryton formé par Toscanini et dont la carrière sera glorieuse. D'Angleterre, autour d'Audrey Mildmay, on trouve Heddle Nash, Constance Willis, Roy Henderson et Ina Souez, née aux États-Unis, mais de nationalité britannique. Le 28 mai 1934, le rideau se lève sur Glyndebourne et son parterre de Lords et de Ladies. Le triomphe est absolu.

La Ire saison s'achève sur un déficit budgétaire de 7,000 livres Sterling mais avec une critique unanime, qui dépasse l'Angleterre. Ainsi, dans un journal zurichois, applaudit-on à une « réussite totale rendue possible par l'union de Fritz Busch et Carl Ebert » . Pourquoi ne pas poursuivre ? Busch, qui n'avait accepté de participer au Festival de 1934 uniquement parce qu'il pensait qu'il n'y en aurait pas d'autres, accepte de renouveler son contrat avant de repartir pour Buenos-Aires et d'autres pays. En fait, il reviendra dans le Sussex jusqu'à ses derniers jours.

Pour l'année 1935, John Christie ambitionne de programmer les 2 Opéras allemands de Mozart : « l'Enlèvement au Sérail » et « la Flûte enchantée » . Mais il décide de se mêler des distributions, et surtout du rôle de Pamina. Après avoir contacté à peu près toutes les cantatrices ayant déjà chanté à Glyndebourne, l'idée saugrenue lui vient de le confier à sa femme, Audrey Mildmay, qui est sur le point d'accoucher. Rudolf Bing sursaute et tente de convaincre Busch, alors au Danemark, de choisir 2 Pamina, l'une chantant le rôle de la Seconde Dame pendant que l'autre serait Pamina, et réciproquement. Bing lui-même doit se trouver dans le plus profond embarras, car Audrey Mildmay n'a nullement la voix du rôle.

Busch lui répond immédiatement :

« Cette Audrey est véritablement agréable et délicieuse à entendre, mais que Christie envisage pour elle (si elle ne l'envisage pas elle-même) d'aborder Pamina me semble problématique. Certes, elle apporterait son charme au personnage, mais même si elle parvient à le chanter, je crains fort que son naturel nerveux et son hyper-sensibilité ne ruinent le projet. Rautawaara n'aurait pas la vivacité d'Audrey, mais serait plus sûre. Ne peut-on pas, dès maintenant, priver Audrey de la première ? Je crains bien que non. »

Comme pour jeter de l'huile sur le feu, Luise Helletsgruber, qui avait espéré hériter du rôle de Pamina, accepte d'interpréter la Première Dame uniquement si Audrey Mildmay (la femme du patron, en quelque sorte) était Pamina. Si toute autre cantatrice accédait au rôle, alors elle ne chanterait pas du tout. Déjà débordé malgré un renfort de poids en la personne de Hans Busch, le fils de Fritz, Rudolf Bing doit faire face à d'autres caprices. Tout d'abord, il faut au plus vite trouver une soprano « colorature » pour assurer les rôles de La Reine de la Nuit et de Constanze. La soprano tchèque Mila Kochova est contactée et, fort heureusement, accepte. Autre déconvenue : tellement sûrs d'avoir Ina Souez pour interpréter Fiordiligi, John Christie et son « manager » Alfred Nightingale ne lui ont envoyé son contrat qu'à mi-février, et la cantatrice n'y répond que 1 mois plus tard, exigeant un salaire plus élevé car le contrat lui est parvenu hors-délai. Depuis son lieu de vacances, à Sorrento, Busch entre alors dans une de ses légendaires colères et fait savoir à tout le monde que si Souez ne chante pas, alors il ne dirigera pas. Devant pareil désordre, il multiplie lettre sur lettre, expliquant qu'il n'est pas homme à travailler dans de pareilles conditions et que personne au monde ne saurait remplacer Souez en Fiordiligi, surtout en si peu de temps.

Le Mæstro note, avant de signer :

« Je sais qu'Ebert ne peut qu'être de mon avis. »

Puis, le soufflé retombe et, comme Busch l'espérait, au soir du 27 mai, le rideau se lève sur une « Flûte enchantée » où Aulikki Rautawaara chante Pamina et Helletsgruber, la Première Dame. Cédant aux pressions de Busch, Audrey Mildmay a accepté de se retirer de l'affiche. Pour « L'Enlèvement au Sérail », Mila Kochova ne convainc pas, et est remplacée lors des répétitions par Noel Eadie. Carl Ebert, pour sa part, s'offre le luxe de paraître en Pacha Selim. À la fin de la saison, le déficit frôle, cette fois-ci, les 10,000 livres Sterling mais Christie ne semble pas plus préoccupé que cela. Il fait, certes, des coupes dans le budget futur, remplace Alfred Nightingale par Rudolf Bing et programme, pour 1936, toutes les œuvres de Mozart déjà jouées, avec « Don Giovanni » en plus.

Comme les 1res années, le crû de 1936 est d'une rare qualité, avec un « Don Giovanni » où Busch, sur un tempo jamais relâché, rend palpable le duo-duel entre la vie et la mort. Les années suivantes verront s'inscrire au programme la première anglaise de « Macbeth », à laquelle Toscanini assistera, et le « Don Pasquale » de Donizetti (1938) . Le magazine « Times » rendra compte avec finesse de l'art de Busch, capable « de diriger Donizetti avec élégance, sans jamais tomber dans la facilité » .

Pour le Festival de 1939, Christie désirait, plus que jamais, offrir à Toscanini la possibilité de diriger « Falstaff » . Glyndebourne se divise alors en 2 camps : les pro-Toscanini, parmi lesquels on compte Frances Dakyns et Adolf Busch, et les anti-Toscanini, où se trouvent Fritz Busch, l'ami de toujours, Carl Ebert et Rudolf Bing. Leur argument est simple : appeler Toscanini à Glyndebourne consiste purement et simplement à contenter la haute-société et à priver tous les autres citoyens anglais d'un tel plaisir. Les « anti » gagnent et John Christie se range à leur jugement. Plus les événements mondiaux passent au rouge, plus Bing, Ebert ou Busch cherchent d'autres engagements. Malgré un conseil paternel de Busch, John Christie et sa femme ont accepté une visite en Allemagne où Audrey Mildmay n'a pas hésité à chanter tout en acceptant de se produire, plus tard, à Salzbourg. La nouvelle glace le sang de Rudolf Bing. Certes, John Christie est quasiment ignorant en politique. Il appartient à cette élite anglo-saxonne prête à donner le « bon Dieu » sans confession à quiconque se montre aimable - « gentleman », en quelque sorte. Il ne se rend pas compte de l'effet produite par son inconsistance sur ses amis. Plus : il explique publiquement comment il a su résister aux pressions de Hitler qui souhaite le renvoi de Busch et d'Ebert.

« Ils n'ont fait que fuir leur pays parce que l'on y mêle trop la politique avec l'art. Maintenant, ils sont conscients de ne pouvoir faire chemin arrière ! »

De départs en retours, de débats en conciliations et de compromis en sauf-qui-peut, le Festival a quand même lieu. Venue d'Islande, la soprano Maria Markan interprète la comtesse des « Noces » , la très exotique Margherita Grandi, originaire de Tasmanie, chante Lady Macbeth et Risë Stevens prend les rôles de Cherubino et Dorabella.

Le couple Chamberlain est présent lors de l'ouverture. Les « Accords de Munich » ont laissé un goût âpre. La guerre gronde aux portes, alors que les robes longues et les « smokings » se côtoient à Glyndebourne.

Cette fois-ci, le 15 juillet, le rideau tombe pour longtemps sur Glyndebourne, qui ne rouvrira qu'en 1946. Rudolf Bing prend le bateau pour les États-Unis ; Carl Ebert part construire un nouvel Opéra à Ankara ; et Fritz Busch rentre à Copenhague.

Au Danemark, Fritz Busch se sent un peu chez lui. Mais il est hors de question, pour lui, de demeurer inactif alors qu'un second conflit mondial vient d'éclater. Il repart pour l'Amérique latine puis revient en Scandinavie pour travailler à Malmö, Göteborg, Oslo et Stockholm où il dirige « Così fan tutte » - là encore, pour la Ire fois en italien. Son fils Hans rentre d'Angleterre et Carl Ebert, d'Ankara. Il est cependant hasardeux de planifier quoi que ce soit, même dans ce coin de la planète où la Finlande vient d'entrer dans le conflit international.

« Nous errons dans le brouillard. » , lui dit un soir le chef d'orchestre suédois Johannes Norrby.

Après le mariage de sa nièce Irène avec Rudolf Serkin, c'est au tour de sa propre fille, Eta, d'épouser le chanteur français Martial Singher, rencontré à Buenos-Aires. Le couple décide de s'installer à Paris. Ils auront un fils, le chef d'orchestre Michel Singher, aujourd'hui installé en Californie. La vie continue. À Montevideo, à Lima, ou encore à Santiago au Chili.

En 1945, avec l'aide de Toscanini, Fritz Busch est invité à New York pour y présider à la destinée de l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York. Il y dirigera sans discontinuer jusqu'en 1949. En 1936, Toscanini lui avait déjà offert de lui succéder à ce poste, mais l'Allemand avait refusé, préférant demeurer au Danemark. Cette fois-ci, il accepte, et tout le monde déménage outre-Atlantique où ils s'installent. Busch se sent d'abord complètement désorienté. Les New-Yorkais, qu'il connaît déjà, manquent, à ses yeux, de chaleur, et le catastrophique conflit européen ne cesse de le hanter.

En octobre, il reçoit un mot de John Christie :

« Alors, comment vous sentez-vous en Amérique ? »

En fait, pas si mal que cela. Certes, les hivers de New York n'auront pas la douceur des hivers argentins mais, au moins, peut-il travailler. Grâce aux efforts constants de Helen Dismore, alors épouse du riche Lytle Hull, Busch ré-organise le « New Opera Company » afin d'y présenter de la musique et des Opéras de chambre avec, à la fois, des chanteurs confirmés et de jeunes débutants, dont, sans doute, Erna Berger et Sena Jurinac qui trouveront, sous sa direction, la meilleure école qui soit.

Ce fut ainsi que démarra la carrière de Regina Resnik :

« Je n'avais que 19 ans quand j'ai chanté le premier aria de Lady Macbeth devant Fritz Busch et son fils Hans Peter. Au lieu d'un poste parmi les choristes, tous deux m'offrirent de chanter le rôle en tant que doublure. Au matin du 4 décembre 1942, on m'appela du Théâtre de Broadway où, en costume, j'ai survolé toute la partition (en chantant de larges passages) avec Fritz Stiedry au pupitre. Le lendemain, avec Toscanini parmi le public, je chantais le rôle en remplacement de Florence Kirk, souffrante. Stiedry conduisait à la place de Fritz Busch, qui avait préféré écouter l'Opéra dans le théâtre. Je n'avais aucun pouvoir me permettant d'exiger quoi que ce soit. Je n'avais qu'à chanter pour prouver que le “ New Opera Company ” avait eu raison de pousser la débutante que j'étais sur scène. J'étais complètement préparée et, pourtant, totalement inconsciente des conséquences possibles. Le fait est que ma préparation était si complète (ce que je devrai toute ma vie au Docteur Busch) que je fus immédiatement jetée dans la piscine olympique ! »

Malgré tout, l'ambiance très « star-system » du « MET » ne lui plaît pas et, pourtant, il y assurera des soirées exceptionnelles, notamment avec « Otello » où chantent, entre autres, Licia Albanese, Ramón Vinay et Leonard Warren ; « Tristan und Isolde » et « Lohengrin » avec Helen Traubel ; « Don Giovanni » avec John Brownlee ; ainsi que « les Noces de Figaro » avec Eleanor Steber, Jarmila Novotna et Salvatore Baccaloni. Il dirige également Brahms, Bach et Mahler dans plusieurs villes d'Amérique du Nord.

De retour à Copenhague, il prend la direction artistique de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio danoise. On le trouve aussi à Vienne, à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique avec lequel il dirige des œuvres de Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Brahms et Schubert.

Le 6 juillet 1950, il retrouve Glyndebourne qui avait rouvert 4 années auparavant. Il y dirige Mozart, une fois de plus, avec le même enthousiasme. En 1951, il retrouve une Allemagne détruite et repart pour le Festival du Sussex. Installé à l'Hôtel Savoy de Londres, il montre une fatigue excessive et Grete fait venir des infirmières dans sa chambre. Rien n'y fait.

Le 13 septembre 1951, il murmure à son épouse :

« Je suis fatigué, si fatigué. Trop fatigué pour travailler. »

Le 14 septembre, il succombe à une crise cardiaque.

À sa mort, Fritz Busch n'est âgé que de 61 ans ; l'âge où les chefs d'orchestre se trouvent, en général, au sommet de leur art. On ne refait pas l'histoire, mais cet homme d'exception qui pouvait très naturellement marquer son siècle avec les plus grands (Orchestres ou interprètes) a, en quelque sorte, sacrifié sa carrière pour ses idées. Tous n'ont pas eu cette grandeur d'âme. Mais tous ne nous ont pas laissé en héritage une interprétation de « Don Giovanni » qui, 82 ans après son enregistrement à Glyndebourne, demeure inégalée.

Depuis 1993, l'Opéra de Dresde (ou le « Semperoper »), délivre chaque année un Prix Fritz Busch destiné à honorer un instrumentiste s'étant particulièrement illustré dans ce lieu. Les lauréats reçoivent ce prix lors d'un gala en leur honneur. Parmi eux, citons Peter Bruns, violoncelliste, en 1993 ; Peter Damm, corniste en 1995 ; ou, encore, Eckart Haupt, flûtiste en 1996.

Parmi les enregistrements de Fritz Busch, on trouve des Opéras de Mozart à Glyndebourne et un double-album d'orchestre (Beethoven : Ouverture de « Léonore » ; Mozart : Symphonie n° 36 ; Mendelssohn : Symphonie n° 4 « l'Italienne » ; Brahms : « Ouverture tragique » et Symphonie n° 2 ; Haydn : « Sinfonia concertante » ; Strauß : « Don Juan »), dans la collection « Great Conductors of the 20th Century » chez EMI.

Fritz Busch (1890-1951) was born in Siegen, Westphalia, Germany, studied 1st locally and, later, in Cologne with Fritz Steinbach. After appointments in Riga (1909), Aachen (1921), Stuttgart (1918-1922) as General Music Director, he was appointed to the Dresden State Opera where, for a decade, he raised the musical standards to a high-level. Busch, who was vehemently opposed to the ethos of Adolf Hitler and the Nazi Party, resigned in 1933. He, then, worked in Buenos Aires (from 1934 to 1936 and 1941 to 1945) and the « Metropolitan Opera » in New York (from 1945 to 1949) . It was his achievements at Glyndebourne, from 1934 to 1939 and 1950 to 1951, however, which have kept his name alive. His testament as an outstanding Mozartian is exemplified in his recordings of the 3 Da Ponte Operas, allied to memorable performances of both Verdi and Wagner. He was also much admired as a Symphonic conductor. He was the brother of the violinist Adolf Busch.

The German conductor Fritz Busch was born on 13 March 1890 in Siegen, Province of Westphalia ; and died on 14 September 1951 in London.

He was the son of a former itinerant musician. His brothers were also musicians, the violinist Adolf Busch and the cellist Hermann Busch. He attended the Cologne Conservatory in 1906 where he studied conducting with Fritz Steinbach. He served as conductor at the « Deutsches Theater » in Riga, in 1909, and, from 1911 to 1912, toured as a pianist. Busch was hired as the music-director by the city of Aachen, in 1912, and worked there until the beginning of World War I, when he enlisted. At the end of the War, he returned to Aachen where he conducted the Aachen Municipal Opera. However, 6 weeks later, he was appointed music-director of the Stuttgart Opera. There, he became known for his efforts to increase the breadth of the repertoire including featuring new composers, such as Paul Hindemith and Hans Pfitzner. His performances, including modern stagings and set-designs by Adolphe Appia for Richard Wagner's « Ring » cycle Operas, led to his increasing renown. In 1922, he was appointed the music-director of the Dresden State Opera. During his tenure of 11 years, he kept the Opera at the highest-level, combining innovative, provocative stagings, with prominent artists engaged to design costumes and sets. He premiered works by Richard Strauß : « Intermezzo » in 1924, and « Die Ägyptische Helena » in 1928 ; Ferruccio Busoni : « Doktor Faustus » in 1925 ; Paul Hindemith : « Cardillac » in 1926 ; and Kurt Weill : « Der Protagonist » in 1926. In 1924, he made his only appearance at the Bayreuth Festival conducting « Die Meistersinger » . Upon arrival, he decided to attend to a chorus rehearsal that was in progress, only to be dragooned into the tenor section by the chorus Master Hugo Rüdel who had mistaken him for a member of the choir. His 1932 Salzburg Festival production of Mozart's « Die Entführung aus dem Serail » , which was designed by Carl Ebert and was sung by a carefully selected cast, was a highly-successful collaboration.

5 weeks after Adolf Hitler came to power, in 1933, Busch was removed from his post at the Dresden State Opera in a politically motivated dismissal. The March 1933 dismissal was humiliating. Nazis in the front rows shouted : « Out with Busch » at the beginning a performance of « Rigoletto » , leading to his replacement as conductor by Kurt Striegler. The Nazis charged that despite his high-salary, Busch had taken frequent leaves from the Opera to take-up guest-conducting jobs elsewhere, although these had been built into his contract. Not himself Jewish, he counted many Jews among his friends and was opposed to dictatorship.

He went on to make several tours of South America before becoming the music-director of Glyndebourne Festival Opera in England, in 1934. He remained at Glyndebourne until the outbreak of World War II, in 1939. He focused on work at the « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires (from 1934 to 1936 and from 1940 to 1947) and at the « Metropolitan Opera » in New York, and, from 1934, at the Danish National Symphony Orchestra. He conducted the Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1937 until 1940. Despite assistance from the German writer Thomas Mann, he was unsuccessful in getting Swiss citizenship but, in 1936, succeeded in obtaining Argentinian papers. He resumed the Glyndebourne musical directorship in 1950 following a healing of breach with the organization over Busch's failure to cast Audrey Mildmay for a 1941 « New Opera Company », New York production of « Così fan tutte » at a time when she badly needed money. He also conducted at the « MET » in New York, from 1945 to 1949 ; and the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, from 1948 to 1950. After World War II, he also returned to work in Copenhagen and Stockholm.

He was a National Patron of « Delta Omicron », an international professional music fraternity.

Busch was the brother of the distinguished violinist Adolf Busch and of the cellist Hermann Busch. He was married to Margarete Bøettcher-Busch. His son, Hans Busch, later stage-director at the Indiana University Opera, was born in 1914.

Fritz Busch was one the greatest German conductors of the 1st half of the 20th Century, noted for his illuminating performances and his ethical principles. His father was a former itinerant musician who became an instrument maker, and his brothers were violinist Adolf Busch and cellist Hermann Busch. Fritz Busch went to Cologne Conservatory in 1909, studying conducting with Steinbach.

The city of Aachen hired him as music-director in 1912. He served there until the First World War began, enlisted, and returned at War's end to conducted the Municipal Opera. 6 weeks later, he was appointed music-director of the Stuttgart Opera. He quickly became famous for his performances and for the reforms he instituted to enlarge the repertory and discover new composers. He premiered 2 One Act Operas of the young Paul Hindemith, Operas by Hans Pfitzner, and shook-up the Wagnerian tradition by using Adolphe Appia's modern approach to staging and sets for the « Ring » Operas. Busch accepted a position with the Dresden State Opera, becoming music-director in 1922. Among his premieres in the 11 years, he remained there were Richard Strauß's « Intermezzo » (1924) and « Die Ägyptische Helena » (1928) ; Hindemith's « Cardillac » (1926) ; Ferruccio Busoni's « Doktor Faustus » (1925) ; and Kurt Weill's « Der Protagonist » (1926) . He was credited with keeping Dresden at the highest-level of German Opera production with stagings that were often provocative, with some of the finest of modern artists designing sets and costumes. One of the most important was a production of Mozart's « Die Entführung aus dem Serail » , designed by Carl Ebert and including a meticulously chosen cast, at the 1932 Salzburg Festival.

Busch was openly contemptuous of the new Nazi government that was appointed to power in Germany, in 1933, and was fired from his Dresden post. At the « Teatro Colón » in Buenos Aires, he conducted the 1st complete performance of Johann Sebastian Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » ever given in the Americas. He returned to Europe, appearing with the Danish Radio Symphony Orchestra and the Stockholm Philharmonic Orchestra, beginning a long-standing relationship with them. Then, John Christie asked Busch to become music-director of a summer opera festival at Glyndebourne, England. Busch accepted, bringing Ebert as artistic director. Glyndebourne was soon among the most prestigious of summer Festivals, famous for meticulous musical preparation and use of the best and most appropriate voices. Mozart has always been a mainstay of Glyndebourne but, under Busch, it also staged larger-scale works, including Gaetano Donizetti's « Don Pasquale » and Giuseppe Verdi's « Macbetto » .

With the outbreak of the World War II (which closed Glyndebourne for the duration and made travel to Scandinavia impossible) , he withdrew mainly to South America, although he made appearances at the New York Philharmonic Orchestra. His « Metropolitan Opera » debut was on November 26, 1945, in Wagner's « Lohengrin » . He remained on the « MET » 's conducting roster until 1949, but asked to be allowed to concentrate on conducting the company's annual national tours. He frequently conducted the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, from 1948 to 1950, and resumed his association with the Scandinavian Orchestras in 1949, and at Glyndebourne in 1950. He returned to lead a few concerts in Austria (at the « Wiener Staatsoper » , in 1950) and in Germany (in Cologne and Hamburg, in 1951) .

He died in London, leaving several important recordings. The Busch Brothers Society private label has released several of them as part of a program to document the legacy of Busch, his 2 brothers, and the piano Trio they often formed.

Fritz Busch, deutscher Dirigent : geboren 13. März 1890 in Siegen ; gestorben 14. September 1951 in London.

Fritz Busch studierte bei Fritz Steinbach in Köln. Mit 19 Jahren wurde er Kapellmeister in Riga, anschließend in Bad Pyrmont und in Gotha. Von 1912 bis 1918 war er als Musikdirektor beim Sinfonieorchester Aachen engagiert.

Von 1918 bis 1922 war er Generalmusikdirektor beim Staatsorchester Stuttgart und anschließend, bis 1933, an der Semperoper in Dresden, wo er durch exemplarische Inszenierungen zu einem Protagonisten der Verdi-Renaissance wurde. 1924 und 1925 dirigierte er in Bayreuth, 1927-1928 in New York und 1929 in London. Mit dem Orchester der Sächsischen Staatsoper gastierte er und andere bei den Salzburger Festspielen mit Wolfgang Amadeus Mozarts Die

Entführung aus dem Serail und am Deutschen Opernhaus in Berlin mit Giuseppe Verdis « Un ballo in maschera » (Ein Maskenball) .

Adolf Hitler, Josef Goebbels und Hermann Göring wollten diesen berühmten Dirigenten in Berlin haben. Busch schilderte das Gespräch mit Göring wie folgt :

Ich sagte, daß ich keinem jüdischen Kollegen den Platz wegnehmen würde.

Göring :

« Na, lieber Freund, wir haben ja auch Mittel in der Hand, Sie dazu zu zwingen ! »

« Versuchen Sie das nur » , platzte ich heraus.

« An einem erzwungenen “ Tannhäuser ” unter meiner Leitung werden Sie keine Freude haben. So etwas Stinklangweiliges haben Sie in Ihrem Leben noch nicht gehört. »

Damit war die Werbung der Nazis beendet. Am 7. März 1933, vor Beginn einer Rigoletto-Vorstellung, wurde Busch von SA-Männern vom Pult gebrüllt und mußte sein Amt als Generalmusikdirektor an der Semperoper aufgeben.

Busch emigrierte nach England und begründete in Glyndebourne zusammen mit Carl Ebert als Dramaturg die dortigen Festspiele, die sie bis zum Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs durchführten. Weitere Exilstationen waren Buenos Aires, wo er 1936 die argentinische Staatsangehörigkeit erwarb, Stockholm, ab 1934 beim 1925 gegründeten Dänischen Nationalen Symphonie Orchester (DR Symfoni Orkestret, dem Orchester des Dänischen Rundfunks) in Kopenhagen, Edinburgh und Zürich. 1940 flüchteten Busch und seine Frau Grete aus Europa nach Amerika. Dort hielten sie sich vorwiegend in Argentinien auf, aber 1941 und 1942 dirigierte Busch auch in New York. Von 1945 bis 1950 wurde Busch zum künstlerischen Leiter der « Metropolitan Opera » New York auserwählt. Im Sommer 1950 dirigierte er zum ersten Mal wieder die Aufführungen des Glyndebourne-Festivals. Im Februar 1951 kehrte Busch nach Deutschland zurück, um in Köln die erste Opernproduktion des damaligen Nordwestdeutschen Rundfunks (NWDR) im neuen Sendesaal zu dirigieren : Verdis Maskenball. Seiner Berufung an die Wiener Staatsoper kam sein Tod am 14. September 1951 zuvor. Anlässlich seines einhundertsten Geburtstages wurde er postum zum Ehrenmitglied der Staatskapelle Dresden ernannt. Er war unter anderem mit Richard Strauß und weiteren namhaften Dirigenten befreundet. Erst 65 Jahre nach der Vertreibung aus seinem Amt als Dresdner Generalmusikdirektor durch die Nazis, kommt es am 22. September. 1998 zur symbolischen Entschuldigung durch Giuseppe Sinopoli für diesen barbarischen Akt.

Fritz Busch war der Bruder des Geigers Adolf Busch, des Schauspielers Willi Busch, des Cellisten Hermann Busch sowie des Pianisten Heinrich Busch. Sein Vater war der Geigenbauer Wilhelm Busch.

Das Maß an Aufgaben war übergroß. « Ich verlaße die Oper nur, wenn ich schlafen gehe », sagte er, und selbst der NSDAP-Gauwart Posse, der maßgeblich an Buschs späterer Amtsenthebung beteiligt war, mußte ihm in einer Auseinandersetzung nach dem 1933er Eklat zugestehen, daß er « wie ein Vieh » gearbeitet habe.

Es ist nachweisbar, daß Busch in der Saison 1925-1926 nicht weniger als 104 Opernvorstellungen dirigiert hat ; darunter waren neun Premieren mit vier Uraufführungen, einer Erstaufführung und vier Neueinstudierungen von Repertoireoperen.

Außerdem leitete er elf Abonnementskonzerte (jeweils mit öffentlicher Generalprobe) und zwei Sonderkonzerte.

Hinzu kamen die Proben mit dem Sängersonal und dem Orchester, das Lektorieren zahlreicher eingesandter Partituren, das Studium neu zu erarbeitender Werke sowie all seine administrativen Verpflichtungen. In einer Eingabe an den Intendanten wies Busch darauf hin, daß eine solche Belastung auf Dauer seine physischen und psychischen Kräfte zu überfordern drohe (1928 kam denn auch der gesundheitliche Zusammenbruch) .

Aber nur wenig änderte sich - Für 1930-1931 registrierte er noch immer 98 Opernabende, neun Neueinstudierungen und die Übernahme zweier von Hans Pfitzner und Richard Strauß dirigierter Premieren im täglichen Repertoire. (Man vergleiche mit diesen Zahlen einmal die Verpflichtungen, die heutzutage musikalische Chefs für ihre Häuser einzugehen bereit sind !)

Die Angebote, künstlerische Verantwortung unter weitaus günstigeren Bedingungen an den Staatsopern in Wien oder Berlin oder beim Gewandhausorchester Leipzig zu übernehmen, müssen zeitweise schon recht verlockend gewesen sein. Dennoch hielt Busch Dresden die Treue.

Fritz Busch hatte den gesamten Opernbetrieb vom Engagement der Gastdirigenten, Regisseure und Bühnenbildner bis zur Kontrolle der Abendeinnahme « im Griff » .

Er holte Prominenz wie Strauß, Pfitzner oder Strawinsky ans Pult, ließ Erhardt, Gielen, Mora, Toller oder Dobrowen inszenieren und Slevogt oder Kokoschka die Szene gestalten - alles allererste Kräfte !

Wenn er nicht selbst dirigierte, saß er häufig als kritischer Beobachter in den Aufführungen, und seine Vorstellungsberichte (mit Schlußfolgerungen) laßen an Deutlichkeit nichts zu wünschen übrig.

Der Erhalt der Klangkultur der Kapelle lag ihm besonders am Herzen. In diesem Orchester, das offenbar jeder Schwierigkeit gewachsen war und mit einer Anpassungsfähigkeit und Stilsicherheit ohnegleichen den Weg seiner Konzert- und Opernplanung mitging, sah er die Grundlage seiner gesamten Arbeit.

Um deßen Fortentwicklung zu sichern, unterstützte er die Gründung einer « Orchesterschule der Sächsischen Staatskapelle » zur praxisorientierten Heranbildung des eigenen Musikernachwuchses, bevorzugt durch Kapellmitglieder als Lehrer.

Wenn ihm Zeit blieb, spielte er mit Kollegen Kammermusik im Tonkünstler-Verein.

Bei Probespielen legte er hohe künstlerische und menschliche Maßstäbe an die Kandidaten an, die er nicht selten selbst begleitete. Er war, beinahe im Sinne der Kantoreiordnung von 1548, ein echter « Zuchtmeister », der auf Disziplin in der Dienstausbübung sah und seine Forderungen unnachgiebig durchsetzte, aber durch Humor und Freundlichkeit die Atmosphäre immer wieder aufzulockern verstand.

Sein Ideal formulierte er so :

« Es gibt nichts Erfreulicherer für den Beobachter als einen Dirigenten, der außer der höchsten Achtung seiner Orchestermitglieder auch deren Liebe genießt. »

27 octobre 1922 : Le chef Ernst Wendel dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Ernst Wendel

The conductor, violinist and violin teacher Ernst Wendel was born on 26 March 1876 in Breslau, Germany ; and died on 21 May 1938. He became the Concert-Master of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra for 1 season (1896-1897) under Theodore Thomas. When the breach between Theodore Thomas and Max Bendix reached the point where Bendix failed to return to the Chicago Orchestra, Theodore Thomas recruited Ernst Wendel from Germany. Wendel came to Chicago to join the Orchestra, in October, 1896, aged only 21. He then returned to Germany, where he was later most noted as being conductor of the Bremen Philharmonic Orchestra (full name : the State Philharmonic Orchestra of the Free Hanseatic Town of Bremen) , from 1909 to 1935. He was also a violin teacher of Georg Kulenkampff (1898-1948) . In 1914, he was also conducting in Stuttgart and, in 1925-1926, he conducted in Frankfurt at the Museum Concerts. Ernst Wendel was apparently a Bruckner specialist, with a number of performances, including the premiere of Bruckner Symphony No. 9 in Russia, in 1913. According to « Towards a Theory of Musical Reproduction » , Wendel was a solid conductor, but also cautious and routine and did not transcend the limits of a careful, traditional reading of the Austro-Germanic musical literature.

Ernst Wendel married the concert pianist Ilse Wendel (born Wolde) . His younger son was the set and costume designer Heinrich Wendel (1915-1980) .

Ernst Wendel (geboren 26. März 1876 in Breslau ; gestorben 21. Mai 1938) war ein deutscher Violinist und Dirigent. Für eine Saison war Wendel 1896-1897 Konzertmeister des Chicago Symphony Orchestra unter Theodore Thomas. Von 1909 bis 1935 war er Generalmusikdirektor des Bremer Philharmonischen Staatsorchesters. Als Geiger unterrichtete er Georg Kulenkampff. 1914 dirigierte er in Stuttgart und 1925-1926 die Museumskonzerte in Frankfurt am Main. 1913 führte er die 9. Sinfonie von Anton Bruckner erstmals in Russland auf. Er prägte die Musik in Königsberg.

Der Königsberger Musikverein engagierte sich mit Ernst Wendel und Paul Scheinflug erfolgreich für die Neue Musik.

Wendel war mit der Konzertpianistin Ilse Wendel (« née » Wolde) , verheiratet. Sein jüngerer Sohn war der Bühnen- und Kostümbildner Heinrich Wendel (1915-1980) .

...

Die Königsberger Oper darf in der Reihe ihrer Dirigenten auf Richard Wagner weisen, der allerdings nur für kurze Zeit in Erscheinung trat. In ihren Spielplänen war sie stets darauf bedacht, den Hörer mit allem bedeutsamen Neuen auf dem laufenden zu halten. So brachte sie 1876 unter Stägemann die deutsche Uraufführung von Bizets « Carmen » . Ein besonders ehrenvolles Datum. In den Sinfonie- und Künstlerkonzerten musizierten die größten Künstler ihrer Zeit, unter denen Johannes Brahms ebensowenig fehlte, wie Franz Liszt (der Königsberger Ehrendoktor) , Joseph Joachim, Pablo de Sarasate, Anton Rubinstein, Hans von Bülow und die zahllosen Gesangsgrößen von Rang und Namen. Wie fast überall in deutschen Landen war auch der Königsberger Musikfreund vorwiegend konservativ eingestellt. Ein Beethovenabend war immer ausverkauft, Konzerte mit Neuerscheinungen brachten ein Defizit. Das hing natürlich in gewisser Weise auch von der Führung durch die Presse ab. Diese hatte in Louis Köhler, dem einst berühmten Klavier-Pädagogen, und Konstanz Bernecker zwei bedeutsame Pioniere des Fortschritts. Beide waren Bannerträger der Zukunft der Musik Wagners. Bernecker auch schon für Richard Strauß.

Auf der anderen Seite stand, allerdings etwas später erst, Gustav Dömpke. Gleichzeitig mit ihm wirkte in Königsberg um die Jahrhundertwende Ernst-Otto Nodnagel, ein fanatischer Apostel des Fortschritts, einer der ersten Pioniere Hugo Wolfs. Zwischen ihm und Dömpke war sofort Urfehde angesagt. Unter dem Titel « Kannegießer als Erzieher » ließ Nodnagel eine Broschüre erscheinen, in der das « Diobskurenpaar » Dömpke und Emil Krause (damals Literaturpapst der Hartungschen Zeitung) unbarmherzig mit Spott übergossen wurde.

Dömpke ließ sich dadurch nicht im geringsten anfechten. Richard Wagner und Anton Bruckner wurden bei jeder Gelegenheit aufs schärfste angegriffen. Ganz zu schweigen von Richard Strauß, Max Reger und Hans Pfitzner.

Mit der Gründung des « Bundes für Neue Tonkunst » durch Paul Hölzer wurde alles Neue systematisch gepflegt und zur Diskussion gestellt. Es wehte ein frischer Wind, und allzulange aufgestapelte Vorurteile wurden weggefegt, ohne daß ein gesundes kritisches Gefühl dabei Schaden litt. Der « Bund » eröffnete seine Tätigkeit zu Beginn der sogenannten Systemzeit. Die Kunst stand damals im Stadium des Gärens und zeitigte oft höchst unerquickliche Erscheinungen. Das Prinzip der Atonalität wurde in Wort und Tat durchgefochten. Generalmusikdirektor Doktor Hermann Scherchen (Symphoniekonzerte Rundfunk) und der Intendant der Oper, Doktor Hans Schüler, haben alles irgendwie Repräsentative des neueren und neuesten Musikschaffens in vorbildlichen Aufführungen dargeboten. So fanden Paul Hindemith, Igor Strawinsky, Alban Berg und andere schon einen ganz anderen Nährboden, als es noch wenige Jahre zuvor möglich gewesen wäre. Königsberg war in jener Zeit ein Tuskulum des musikalischen Fortschritts. Das künstlerische Niveau der Aufführungen lag so hoch, daß der Widerhall bis weit ins Reich drang. Das Tonkünstlerfest des Allgemeinen Deutschen Musikvereins 1930 gab mit seinen vorbildlichen Aufführungen neuer Orchester- und Chorwerke unter Scherchen, mit Alban Bergs « Wozzeck » und der Uraufführung von Ernst Tochs « Der Fächer » im Opernhaus ein Bild dieser musikalischen Hochblüte.

Nach 1933 ging das Königsberger Musikleben mehr in die Breite als in die Tiefe. Bei der oft wechselnden Leitung im Opernhaus war nicht mehr die Sicherheit des kulturellen Instinkts bemerkbar, die kurz zuvor so schöne Früchte zeitigte.

Der jahrzehntelangen Kulturarbeit des städtischen Orchesters darf nur mit größter Dankbarkeit gedacht werden. Unter Max Brode, Ernst Wendel, Paul Scheinpflug, Rudolf Siegel, Wilhelm Sieben, Ernst Kunwald, Hermann Scherchen, Bruno Vondenhoff und Wilhelm Franz Reuss hat es in zahllosen Konzerten den Klassikern gedient, doch ebenfalls alles irgendwie bedeutungsvolle Neue den Königsbergern unterbreitet. Nicht minder rege war die Pionierarbeit des Rundfunkorchesters, das unter Erich Seidler, Leo Borchardt, Hermann Scherchen und Wolfgang Brückner ebenfalls ein Riesenmaß von Arbeit geleistet hat und und andere der instrumentale Hauptträger des Tonkünstlerfestes 1930 war.

Bemerkenswerter noch als die Existenz von zwei Orchestern war die Tatsache, daß Königsberg 1923-1925 zwei Opernhäuser besaß. Anstatt, wie es mancher wohlhabende Mann zu tun pflegt, sich einen Rennstall zu halten, ritt Bruno Dumont du Voitel (ein Königsberger Großkaufmann) das Steckenpferd des Opernintendanten. Seiner ganz privaten Initiative, seinem Privatkapital war die « komische Oper » zu danken, in der ein sehr interessanter Spielplan in beachtlichen Aufführungen abrollte. Leider war dem Unternehmen nur eine kurze Lebensdauer beschieden.

In hoher Blüte stand in Königsberg von je das Chorwesen. Die beiden ältesten gemischten Chöre, Musikalische- und Singakademie, schlossen sich nach 1933 zu einer Vereinigung zusammen. Ihre vorbildlichen Aufführungen der großen Meisterwerke von Bach, Beethoven und Brahms klingen über das Trümmerfeld Königsberg in der Erinnerung ebenso nach wie die Konzerte des Domchors, die stets Kammermusik waren, und die programmatisch oft sehr anregenden Abende des Bachvereins und des Lehrgesangvereins.

Eine stille, innige Liebe hatte der Königsberger Musikfreund von je zur Kammermusik. Sie wurde schon im 18. Jahrhundert in den Stadtpalais einiger Aristokraten im Kerzenschimmer der Rokokozeit gehegt und gepflegt. Diese private Pflege, von der nur wenige wußten, hielt bis ins 20. Jahrhundert an und gedieh in den Häusern einiger Königsberger Ärzte bis zu höchster künstlerischer Reife. Öffentlich trat sie in Erscheinung in den Konzerten des Brode-Quartetts und des Wendel-Quartetts (mit Ernst Wendel, Hedwig Braun, Paul Binder, Fritz Herbst) . Diese Abende im kleinen Saal des Deutschen Hauses wird niemand vergessen, der sie miterlebt. In späteren Jahren haben das Königsberger Trio mit Sophie Arnheim, Hedwig Hulisch und Kurt Wieck, das Königsberger Streichquartett mit August Hevers und das Peter Esser-Quartett diese Tradition fortgesetzt.

Seit 1919 war der lange verwaiste musikwissenschaftliche Lehrstuhl an der Universität wieder besetzt und durch die Initiative Professor Müller-Blattaus mit einem musikwissenschaftlichen Seminar und einem Institut für Kirchen- und Schulmusik verbunden. Diese blieben auch für die weitere Dauer die einzigen musikalischen Bildungsstätten auf staatlicher Grundlage. Die beiden Konservatorien (zu denen später noch ein drittes sich gesellte) lagen in privaten Häusern. Der immer wieder unternommene Versuch der Gründung einer staatlichen Hochschule für Musik scheiterte. Man folgte wohl der richtigen Einsicht, daß Königsberg auf die Dauer in gesamtultureller Beziehung kein so anziehender Mittelpunkt gewesen wäre wie Berlin, Leipzig, Köln oder Frankfurt am Mainz, ganz abgesehen von seiner exponierten geographischen Lage.

1923 : Le chef Karl Muck dirige à 2 reprises des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner avec le « Concertgebouworkest Amsterdam » .

18 mars 1923 : Création au monastère de Klosterneuburg de 3 mouvements de la Symphonie d'étude en fa mineur (n° 00) par le chef Franz Moißl.

1923 : Alois Hába meets Ferruccio Busoni, who had advocated the 6 tone (36-tET) system (altho he never composed in it himself) , and who encourages Hába to continue his work in micro-tonality. Hába attempts the establishment of a school of micro-tonal music, only acheiving it in the 1930's, in Prague.

Recherchant de plus en plus le systématisme de la construction musicale dans l'esprit du Classicisme du XVIIIe siècle tel que synthétisé par Johannes Brahms, mais dans une expression moderne (il s'agit donc d'une double transcendance de l'esprit bacho-mozartien, car c'est finalement dans le « conservateur » Brahms que Arnold Schœnberg reconnaît le véritable novateur) il inaugure, en 1923, une technique de composition fondée sur la notion de série qui le place à l'avant-garde du mouvement musical : Suite pour piano (1923) ; Quatuor à cordes n° 3 (1927) ; Variations pour orchestre (1928) ; « Moses und Aron » (Moïse et Aaron, Opéra inachevé, 1930-1932) .

27 et 28 septembre 1923 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec le « Tonkünstler-Orchester » de Vienne. Au même programme : le poème symphonique « Tod und Verklärung » de Richard Strauß.

Face à la montée de l'antisémitisme, qu'il subit lui-même, bien que converti, lors d'un séjour en vacances à Mattsee, en 1921, Arnold Schönberg devient, surtout à partir de 1923, de plus en plus amer et virulent.

Octobre 1923 : Mathilde Zemlinsky-Schönberg dies. The following year, Arnold Schönberg marries Getrude Kolisch and, in 1925, they move to Berlin where, upon Ferruccio Busoni's death, Schönberg is appointed head of an academic Master-class. Here, he writes much of his Opera, « Moses und Aron » , which remains unfinished.

Another big Operatic hit of the late-1920's is Ernst Křenek's « Jonny spielt auf ! » (Johnny plays-up !) , written in 1925, and one of the earliest uses of jazz by a German composer.

16 novembre 1923 : Le chef Werner Ladwig dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Werner Ladwig

Werner Ladwig (geboren 18. August 1899 in Halle (Saale) ; gestorben 23. März 1934 in Dresden) war ein deutscher Dirigent.

Werner Ladwig war ein Sohn des Kaufmanns Carl Ladwig. Er besuchte die Latina in Halle und studierte Philosophie, Kunstgeschichte und Musikwissenschaft an den Universitäten Halle und Leipzig. Paul Græner war sein Lehrer in der Kompositionsklasse, und Otto Lohse im Dirigieren. Sein erstes Engagement war von 1921 bis 1924 als Kapellmeister und Korrepetitor an der Oper in Duisburg. Von 1924 an war er für vier Jahre Landesmusikdirektor in Oldenburg (Oldenburg) , und von 1929 bis 1931 Operndirektor in Königsberg (Preußen) .

Wegen seines Eintretens für moderne Musik wurde er als « Nichtarier » denunziert. Auch deshalb verließ er Ende 1932 Schwerin und nahm eine Berufung zum Ersten Kapellmeister der Dresdner Philharmonie an. Er starb nach einer zweimaligen schweren Operation.

25 et 26 novembre 1923 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec la Philharmonie, à Berlin. Au même programme : l'Ouverture « Il Matrimonio segreto » de Cimarosa ; et le Concerto pour piano n° 20 de Mozart, avec le soliste Artur Schnabel (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

1924

1924 : Fêtes du Centenaire de la naissance de Anton Bruckner.

Au début du concert, monsieur Ramín joua à l'orgue le Prélude et Fugue, sur le nom de B.A.C.H. , de Max Reger.

31 janvier 1924 : Le chef Fritz Stiedry dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Fritz Stiedry

Le chef d'orchestre et compositeur autrichien Fritz Stiedry est né le 11 octobre 1883 à Vienne et est mort le 8 août 1968 à Zürich.

Stiedry apprend le droit à l'Université de Vienne et, parallèlement, fait ses études à l'Académie de musique dans la même ville. En 1907, sous la proposition de Gustav Mahler, il obtient un poste à l'Opéra de Dresde, où il assiste Ernst von Schuch. Les années suivantes, Stiedry travaille comme chef d'orchestre à Poznań, Prague, Nuremberg et Cassel. En 1914, il se trouve à la tête de l'Opéra de Berlin, où il dirige notamment « Der Rosenkavalier » de Richard Strauss et d'autres Opéras. Stiedry reste à ce poste jusqu'en 1924, puis, il va pour quelque temps à Vienne participer à la première de « Die glückliche Hand » d'Arnold Schönberg ; mais, l'année suivante, il retourne à Berlin. Sous sa direction, les Opéras rares de Giuseppe Verdi sont mis-en-scène, ainsi que la nouvelle version de « l'Anneau du Nibelung » de Richard Wagner.

En 1933, après l'arrivée d'Adolf Hitler au pouvoir en Allemagne, Stiedry émigre en URSS et y devient chef principal de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Leningrad. Le 15 octobre 1933, c'est Stiedry qui dirige la première du Concerto pour piano n° 1 de Dmitri Chostakovitch, avec le compositeur au piano.

En 1937, le gouvernement soviétique demande que les chefs d'orchestre étrangers adoptent la nationalité soviétique. Certains l'ont fait, mais Stiedry refuse et s'en va aux États-Unis. À New York, il crée le « New Friends of Music Orchestra » , qui joue les œuvres de Jean-Sébastien Bach, Franz-Josef Haydn et Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart mais aussi de la musique contemporaine, telle que la 2e Symphonie de chambre de Schönberg. Dans les années 1940, Stiedry revient à l'Opéra, d'abord à Chicago et, en 1946, il débute au « Metropolitan Opera » avec « Siegfried » de Richard Wagner.

Ce spectacle a beaucoup de succès et Stiedry reste au « Met » jusqu'en 1958, lorsqu'il termine sa carrière et déménage à Zürich.

Stiedry représente l'École viennoise Classique de la direction d'orchestre. Son style traduit l'influence de Gustav Mahler et est marqué par une passion mais aussi par une logique et un sens de la forme.

The Austrian conductor and composer Fritz Stiedry was born on 11 October 1883 in Vienna and died on 8 August 1968 in Zürich.

While still a law student at the University of Vienna, Stiedry's talent for music was noticed by none other than Gustav Mahler, who appointed him his assistant at the Vienna Court Opera, in 1907. This was followed by other assistant posts, leading to chief conductorships at the Operas of Kassel and Berlin.

Stiedry left Germany when Adolf Hitler came to power in 1933 and, from 1934 to 1937, was principal conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra. He was involved in rehearsals for the premiere of Dmitri Shostakovich's 4th Symphony until the premiere was canceled for reasons, in all probability political, that remain controversial. Some claim that Shostakovich felt Stiedry was unable to deal with the Symphony's complexities, but others maintain that the real reason was that Communist Party officials pressured the composer to withdraw the work.

In 1937, Stiedry left Leningrad for the United States and the « New Friends of Music » Orchestra in New York, conducting long-neglected works by Bach, Haydn and Mozart and premiering Arnold Schönberg's 2nd Chamber Symphony. From 1945 onwards, he returned to Opera, conducting the Lyric Opera of Chicago and the Metropolitan Opera of New York and co-founding the Hunter College Opera Workshop.

He has left us brilliant, exquisitely styled recordings of Franz-Josef Haydn's Symphonies Nos. 67, 80, 99 and 102, and his finely conducted live « Met » broadcast of Giuseppe Verdi's « La forza del destino » has been transferred to CD (sadly omitting the Act I « inn » scene, as customary there in the 1950's under Rudolf Bing) .

The eminent Austrian-born American conductor, Fritz Stiedry, studied at the Conservatory in Vienna with Eusebius Mandyczewski (composition) , and also pursued a degree in law from the University of Vienna, graduating with a doctorate in that field. His musical gifts, however, drew the attention of Gustav Mahler and, in 1907, Stiedry was appointed assistant conductor at the Vienna Court Opera. That same year, and again on Mahler's recommendation, Stiedry was engaged in Dresden as an assistant to Ernst von Schuch (1907-1908) . In quick succession came other engagements in Teplitz, Poznań, Prague, Nuremberg, and Kassel. At the Kassel's Court Opera, Stiedry was made chief conductor in 1913 and, from 1914 (AMG) or 1916 (Theodor Baker's) to 1923, he was 1st conductor at the Berlin Opera. After his Berlin engagement, he guest-conducted widely, spending 1 year at the Vienna « Volksoper » , succeeding Felix Weingartner (1923-1925) . After travelling as a guest-conductor in Italy, Spain and Scandinavia (1925-1928) , he returned to Berlin as music-director of the « Städtische Oper » (1928-1929 to 1933) , a position previously held by Bruno Walter. In this period, Stiedry served as president of the Berlin division of the International Society for Contemporary Music. During his tenure at the Opera, Stiedry worked with stage-director Carl Ebert, the 2 of them undertaking several productions of middle-period Verdi and mounting a new « Der Ring des Nibelungen » . In 1932, the conductor presided at the world-premiere of Kurt Weill's « Die Bürgschaft » , a tragic Opera to a text by Casper Neher, described by the composer as « a return to real music-making » . Unfortunately, the Nazi's assumption of control, in 1933, made it clear that neither composer nor conductor had a future in Germany and Stiedry left for the Soviet Union.

From 1934 to 1937, Fritz Stiedry served as general music-director of the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra. His responsibilities included conducting concerts in Moscow as well, and he led Opera performances in both Leningrad and Moscow on a guest basis. He was involved in rehearsals for the premiere of Dmitri Shostakovich's 4th Symphony ; however, the premiere was canceled for reasons that remain controversial. Some claim that Shostakovich felt Stiedry unable to deal with the Symphony's complexities : however, others say that the real reason was that Communist Party officials pressured the composer to withdraw the work.

In 1937 (AMG) or 1938 (Theodor Baker's) , Fritz Stiedry immigrated to the United States, and became a naturalized American citizen. In 1938, Stiedry entered upon a productive period as conductor of the freshly-formed « New Friends of Music » Orchestra, in New York. The music of Johann Sebastian Bach figured prominently in his programming and he led a series of Franz-Josef Haydn Symphonies, several of them newly-edited by musicologist Alfred Einstein and not performed since the composer's lifetime. In 1940, Stiedry turned his attention to Mozart with a cycle of that composer's Concertos and Symphonies.

During the 1945-1946 season, Fritz Stiedry conducted the « Chicago Lyric Opera » and, in 1947, at Glyndebourne. On November 15, 1946, he made his debut at the « Metropolitan Opera » of New York directing a performance of « Siegfried » by Richard Wagner which also introduced « Heldentenor » Set Svanholm to the theater. He remained on the roster of the « Met » as one of its most distinguished conductors until 1958. His conducting won positive reviews for its breadth and liveliness, qualities observed and valued in other performances of Wagner, Mozart, and Verdi over the course of 12 seasons and more than 250 performances. When Rudolf Bing became the « Metropolitan » manager in 1950, Stiedry's role became even more central. He was on the podium for Bing's calling-card production of « Don Carlo » , in 1950, and both oversaw and led the celebrated « Così fan tutte » of 1951.

As a conductor, Fritz Stiedry championed the 2nd Viennese School of composition. He was a close friend of Arnold Schönberg, and conducted world-premieres of his Opera « Die glückliche Hand » in Vienna (1924) , and his 2nd Chamber Symphony with the « New Friends Orchestra » in New York (1940) .

Fritz Stiedry studied music at the Vienna Conservatory and received further training in the Opera theaters of Vienna and Dresden, as an assistant conductor to Gustav Mahler and Ernst von Schuch. Until 1923, he conducted the Berlin Opera. He led the Vienna « Volksoper » , in 1924 and 1925, and the Berlin Municipal Opera, from 1929 to 1933 ; he also undertook several European tours.

After the Fascists came to power, Stiedry left Germany and served as principal conductor of the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1933 to 1937. In 1938, he took-up residence in the United States, where he founded and conducted the « New Friends of Music » Orchestra. In 1946, he was engaged as a conductor at the « Metropolitan » Opera. He spent the last years of his life in Switzerland.

Stiedry combined an impetuous performance style with a logical approach to the music and a sense of form. These qualities made him an outstanding interpreter of the Viennese Classical school and the Romantics, notably : Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Franz-Josef Haydn, Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler. He was also known for his performances of the Operas of Giuseppe Verdi and Richard Wagner. Stiedry conducted the premiere of Dmitri Shostakovich's 1st Piano Concerto, with the composer as soloist.

Whether due to some managerial deficiency or simply a lack of personal push (and there's the lottery of fame, « sempre capriccioso » !) , Fritz Stiedry never had a big recording contract and he didn't multi-task much. In his sunset years in public, he appeared almost exclusively in the pit of the « Metropolitan » Opera, from which he conducted performances of Richard Wagner and late-middle period Giuseppe Verdi that gave much pleasure indeed. Not the sort to conduct full tilt almost to the grave like Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Günter Wand and a number of others, he simply retired when the time was right to the happy geriatric grounds of Switzerland where so many conductors of whatever nationality have chosen to live, drawing renewal one suspects from mountain and stream not to speak of the country's perennial while imperfect « neutrality » .

Fritz Stiedry's credentials were excellent. Like Bruno Walter, he was tapped by the great Gustav Mahler for an assistantship at the Vienna Opera, and like Walter again, he conducted Opera in Berlin in those golden days of the Weimar Republic. Then, just as Nicolai Malko fled the Communists, Stiedry (well, not quite simultaneously but almost) dodged the Nazis by taking a train in the opposite direction and doing his stint at the head of the Leningrad Philharmonic Orchestra, even presiding over the famously aborted premiere of Dmitri Shostakovich's 4th Symphony. Next step, New York (1937) where Otto Klemperer turned down an invitation to conduct the « New Friends of Music » , a « Mostly Haydn and Mozart » series that shone brightly for several seasons, and Stiedry got the job. The « Met » years followed, Stiedry evidently satisfied with the repertoire awarded him by the imperious Rudolf Bing who was not so obliging to the likes of Pierre Monteux and that excellent conductor whose lottery numbers were frequently terrible, Jonel Perlea.

Although Viennese, Stiedry had a somewhat drier beat than the « Berliner » Bruno Walter, his performances made their way on the evenest of rhythmic keels. But his phrasings, the inflections of his music-making, were lively and warm, creative. He had no trouble catching the delicacy of a musical situation. No conductor has injected more anguish into the 2nd Act Prelude of Richard Wagner's « Die Walküre » (a « Met » broadcast of the 29th January 1949, with Rose Bampton and Max Lorenz as the lovers fleeing for their lives in this music) and no paragon of the podium has caught better the balance of sorrow and elegance in the landmark postlude to Fiesco's « Il Lacerato Spirito » in Giuseppe Verdi's « Simon Boccanegra » (with Mihaly Szekely at the « Met » , on 28 January 1950) . The murmurous opening of this « Boccanegra » , mellowly dressed by Stiedry in a little scrim curtain of sound, arrives like a gentle breeze on the bay of Genoa. In the next scene, the « blessing » duet of Gabriele and Fiesco (Szekely and Richard Tucker) is unusually slow, more hymn-like than ever, the voices seeming to curl about a trellis by the sea. And, of course, the « Council Chamber » Scene sizzles with its characters on a very hot roof of emotion.

Stiedry's « La forza del destino » (from 17 March 1956, at the « Met ») is another journey with revelations. There is a spring in the phrasing from the start but, repeatedly, the music is weighted by uncertainty, stern forces in the Orchestra claw at the benign, the music has to push its aching shoulder against the stone wall of an unobliging forza. Relief ? Let's jump to the end of a Stiedry « Götterdämmerung » (from 1954 at London's « Covent Garden ») and listen to the absolute Innocence of the Rhine as it appears in Wagner's tremendous postlude - here, we have a swimmers' river, the Rhinemaidens' own, RESTFUL ! And, for the record : Stiedry's calling-card in America was a lone « Victor » album with the « New Friends » mating Franz-Josef Haydn's 67th and 80th Symphonies, gramophonic newcomers. The performances are crisp as a cold needle shower but always open to flashes of comedy or passion.

Fritz Stiedry (geboren 11. Oktober 1883 in Wien ; gestorben 8. August 1968 in Zürich) war ein österreichisch-amerikanischer Dirigent.

Den Wechsel zur Musik verdankt Stiedry Gustav Mahler, der dessen Fähigkeiten erkannte, als Stiedry noch Jurisprudenz an der Universität Wien studierte. Stiedry schloß sein Studium zunächst mit dem Doktor iuris ab.

Mahler ernannte ihn 1907 zu seinem Assistenten an der Wiener Hofoper. Dies führte zu einer Reihe anderer Assistentenposten und letztlich wurde Stiedry Chefdirigent in Kassel und Berlin (Deutsches Opernhaus / Deutsche Oper Berlin) .

Uraufführung von Arnold Schœnbergs 2. Kammerinfonie ; auf dem Programm standen zudem das erste und vierte Brandenburgische Konzert von Bach. Ab 1945 wandte er sich wieder der Oper zu und arbeitete sowohl am Opernhaus in Chicago als auch an der « Metropolitan Opera » in New York.

Fritz Stiedry schrieb Kammermusik und trat auch als Schriftsteller hervor.

« Der gerettete Alkibiades » , Nachgelassene Oper.

Hanns Rohr

Conductor Hanns Rohr was born on 20 January 1885. He had a doctorate in music. Having gotten by as an itinerant guest-conductor, from 1928 to 1934, he now accompanied his wife, a violinist, at the piano. If not for generous hand-outs from music-loving friends and the odd guest-conductor's job, the couple would have gone under. By 1937, Rohr was suffering from a heart condition ; 1 year later, his distraught wife entered a sanatorium.

During WWII, by order of Hans Frank (Nazi Germany's chief-jurist, and Adolf Hitler's personal lawyer) , the Governor-General of Poland, in July 1940, the so-called Philharmonic of the General Government was created. The Orchestra of the General Government Philharmonic was formed by Polish professional musicians (outstanding instrumentalists, music schools professors, former members of the Poznan and Warsaw Philharmonics) . The only German member of the ensemble was Fritz Sonnleitner, the Concert-Master of the 1st violin section. At 1st, the Orchestra was conducted by Hans Rohr, while the 2nd conductor was Rudolf Erb. After sudden death of Rohr, the position of the conductor was taken-up in 1942 by Rudolf Hindemith (a brother of Paul Hindemith, the composer) and, in 1944, by Hans Swarowsky. Under such circumstances, the Orchestra used to provide protection for musicians. Owing to the employment documents issued by the Orchestra, musicians had avoided being sent to the « Reich » for the forced hard labour, being called to the « Baudienst » or deported to Auschwitz death-camp as well. This indisputable immunity was managed by Rohr since, for him, music and musicians were the highest-value. The repertoire covered mostly music of German and Austrian composers : Johann Sebastian Bach, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms and Richard Strauß. Starting from 1942, after lifting a ban on performing Polish composers, national music by Karol Kurpiński, Frederic Chopin, Stanisław Moniuszko, Zygmunt Noskowski, Karłowicz Żeleński was played. Paradoxically, despite such difficult living and working conditions under the Nazi oppression, the Orchestra was one of the best European Orchestras as « an ensemble with impressive coherence and expression abilities » .

9 avril 1924 : Le chef Felix Maria Gatz dirige l'Ouverture en sol mineur (WAB 98) , la 2e Symphonie et le « Te Deum » de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, accompagné du Chœur Bruckner (« Bruckner-Chor ») . Les solistes : Margarete Arndt-Ober, Else Juelich-de Vogt. Le concert est commandité par la Société Anton Bruckner.

The mention of the Overture given as a premiere is rather hard to explain since it is also mentioned « as a premiere » on 7 January 1922. Furthermore, there can be no explanation for the inclusion of singers because there is no non-Bruckner work programmed.

Août 1924 : Arnold Schönberg married Gertrud Kolisch (1898-1967) , sister of his pupil, the violinist Rudolf Kolisch. She wrote the libretto for Schönberg's I Act Opera, « Von heute auf morgen » , under the pseudonym : Max Blonda. At her request, Schönberg's (ultimately unfinished) the piece. « Die Jakobsleiter » was prepared for performance by Schönberg's student, Winfried Zillig. After her husband's death, in 1951, she founded Belmont Music-Publishers devoted to the publication of his works. Arnold used the notes G and E \flat (German : Es, i.e. , « S ») for « Gertrud Schönberg » , in the Suite, for septet, Opus 29, of 1925.

Following the 1924 death of composer Ferruccio Busoni, who had served as Director of a Master-class in composition at the Prussian Academy of Arts, in Berlin, Arnold Schönberg was appointed to this post the next year but, because of health problems, was unable to take-up his post until 1926. Among his notable students during this period were the composers Roberto Gerhard, Nikos Skalkottas, and Josef Rufer.

1924 : Ivan Wyschnegradsky takes Willi Möllendorf's quarter-tone harmonium (with the special keyboard) with him to Paris. Micro-tonality enjoys a certain vogue for a few decades largely because of the efforts of Alois Hába and Wyschnegradsky, but the rise to power of the Nazis and, then, the Communists brands it as a « decadent » practice, and, only in the 1980's and 1990's, does it begin to become a major trend in music.

Août 1924 : Anton Schönberg épouse Gertrud Kolisch (1898-1967) , sœur de son élève, le violoniste Rudolf Kolisch. Ils eurent 3 enfants : (Deborah) Nuria, Ronald (Ronny) et Lawrence (Larry) , ce dernier conçu à l'âge de 66 ans. Nuria deviendra l'épouse du compositeur italien Luigi Nono. Randol Schœnberg, l'un de ses petits-fils (notons les anagrammes - Ronald, ou Arnold - que forment son prénom) est, quant à lui, un important avocat américain, spécialiste du droit de succession et tout particulièrement des restitutions de biens spoliés par les Nazis, dont les débuts sont décrits dans le film « la Femme au tableau » .

11 juin 1924 : 3 excerpts for voice and orchestra from « Wozzeck » are performed by Hermann Scherchen at the New Music Festival of Frankfurt. This brings Alban Berg his 1st public and critic success.

9 octobre 1924 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige à la « Großer Saal » la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec « das städtische und Gewandhaus Orchester » de Leipzig. Il s'agit du 1er concert de la saison.

12 octobre 1924 : Création au monastère de Klosterneuburg de la Symphonie en ré mineur dite « Nullte » (n° 0) et du Scherzo de la Symphonie d'étude en fa mineur (n° 00) par le chef Franz Moißl.

17 octobre 1924 : Dans le cadre du Centenaire de la naissance du compositeur Anton Bruckner, le chef Otto Klemperer dirige la 8e Symphonie avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. « Concert de la relève allemande » .

Durant cette période, Klemperer dirige l'Adagio de la même 8e Symphonie, dans la version de 1892 (préparée par Bruckner et Josef Schalk) et éditée par Haslinger-Schlesinger-Lienau, avec l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Berlin (« Orchester der Staatskapelle Berlin ») . Enregistrement acoustique sur étiquette « Polydor » ; étiquette « Archiphon » , CD : ARC 121/5.

Otto Klemperer

Le chef d'orchestre allemand Otto Klemperer est né le 14 mai 1885 à Breslau, dans l'Empire allemand et est mort le 6 juillet 1973 à Zürich. L'écrivain et philologue Victor Klemperer (1881-1960), et les frères de ce dernier, les médecins Georg et Felix, étaient ses cousins.

Klemperer fut un disciple de Gustav Mahler à Vienne et prit des leçons de composition auprès de Arnold Schoenberg à Berlin, puis à nouveau pendant la guerre, aux États-Unis.

Chef à l'Opéra de Strasbourg dirigé par Hans Pfitzner puis à l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin, il créa des œuvres de Schoenberg, Paul Hindemith, Kurt Weill, Franz Schreker, Ernst Křenek et dirigea tous les compositeurs modernes de son époque.

Le 12 février 1933, alors que Adolf Hitler est arrivé à la Chancellerie, le 30 janvier, Klemperer donne encore un concert auquel se rend Josef Goebbels, lequel note dans son Journal :

Bien que converti au catholicisme, Otto Klemperer quitte en 1933 son Allemagne natale pour fuir le régime nazi et s'installe aux États-Unis où il est rapidement nommé chef d'orchestre du « Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra ».

Le monde musical allemand se montrant réticent à le réinstaller à la tête d'une phalange importante dans l'immédiat après-guerre, il dirigea, d'abord à Budapest, puis à Londres, où il fut pris sous contrat pour « EMI » par Walter Legge. Devenu un « elder statesman » de la musique, surtout après la mort de ses collègues et contemporains Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Arturo Toscanini, Erich Kleiber, Willem Mengelberg, Bruno Walter et Fritz Busch, il devint sur ses vieux jours un invité de marque de nombreux orchestres, surtout à partir de la fin des années 1950. C'est à cette époque que Walter Legge fait connaître Klemperer au monde entier en enregistrant en une quinzaine d'années presque tout son répertoire avec l'Orchestre « Philharmonia » de Londres dont il devient chef principal. À la fin des années 1960, une série de concerts triomphaux à Vienne et à Munich (succédant à ceux donnés à Cologne, quelque temps plus tôt) marqua, au moins extérieurement, la réconciliation entre le chef et l'univers culturel dont il fut toujours le digne représentant.

Marqué par l'expérience amère de l'exil, Otto Klemperer s'est détourné après 1945 du répertoire moderne (à l'exception de Gustav Mahler) pour se consacrer au répertoire austro-germanique Classique et Romantique. Sa discographie officielle ne comptant presque que des œuvres écrites avant 1918, et ses tempos étant quelquefois d'une lenteur surprenante, mais toujours soutenue sans relâche (exemple : le 1er mouvement de la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, en 1968) on a oublié qu'il avait été, dans sa jeunesse, un chef particulièrement fougueux et avant-gardiste. Cette évolution de style et de répertoire se retrouvera plus tard chez

Sergiu Celibidache, qui l'admirait beaucoup, ou encore Günter Wand.

Klemperer a laissé, chez « EMI » et « Hungaroton », des enregistrements d'une extraordinaire intensité et puissance de Beethoven, Bruckner, Bach, Mahler, Mozart, Haydn, Brahms et Wagner (Ouvertures) . Haut de près de 2 mètres, c'était à tout point de vue l'un des plus grands chefs de tous les temps. Il était également connu pour son humour acerbe et noir. Très amoindri sur le tard par une série d'infarctus, il n'en continua pas moins à diriger en chaise roulante jusqu'à un âge extrêmement avancé, impressionnant tous les orchestres par l'expression sévère de son visage à moitié paralysé.

En tant que compositeur, Otto Klemperer a écrit des Symphonies d'inspiration mahlérienne qui n'ont laissé aucune trace dans le répertoire à ce jour. Son enregistrement monumental de la 7e Symphonie de Mahler, paru chez « EMI », et malheureusement épuisé, est couplé à un enregistrement de sa propre 2e Symphonie, dont le style savant et l'inspiration spirituelle ne cachent pourtant pas les limites de l'originalité.

Chef d'orchestre allemand considéré comme l'un des ultimes détenteurs des traditions d'interprétation germanique du XXe siècle, Otto Klemperer constitue un maillon essentiel entre Gustav Mahler et Richard Strauß, 2 compositeurs qu'il a bien connus, et la génération suivante.

Né à Breslau, le 14 mai 1885, il étudie le piano avec James Kwast et la théorie avec Ivan Knorr à la « Musikhochschule » de Francfort-sur-le-Main, à partir de 1901. Puis, il travaille la composition et la direction d'orchestre avec Hans Pfitzner au Conservatoire « Klindworth-Scharwenka » de Berlin. En 1905, il rencontre Gustav Mahler, alors directeur de l'Opéra de Vienne, qui encourage ses débuts. L'année plus tard, il dirige « Orphée aux enfers » de Jacques Offenbach à Berlin dans une production de Max Reinhardt puis est engagé comme chef des chœurs au Théâtre allemand de Prague, en 1907. Il gravit rapidement les échelons de la hiérarchie et devient chef permanent. En 1910, après avoir été l'assistant de Mahler pour la création de sa « Symphonie des Mille », il est nommé, sur la recommandation de celui-ci, 1er chef à l'Opéra de Hambourg (1910-1912) . En 1913-1914, on le retrouve à Barmen ; entre 1914 et 1917, à Strasbourg ; et, à partir de 1917, à Cologne, où il est nommé directeur général de la musique (1923-1924) . Il y crée l'Opéra de Erich Wolfgang Korngold « la Ville morte » (1920) et y dirige la 1re représentation allemande de « Kátia Kabanová » de Leoš Janáček. En 1919, il épouse la cantatrice Johanna Geibler (morte en 1956) . Il est ensuite directeur général de la musique à Wiesbaden (1924-1927) et au « Kroll Oper » de Berlin (1927-1931) . Sous son impulsion, cette nouvelle scène acquiert une réputation de qualité et de renouveau qui attire l'attention de l'ensemble du monde musical. Il s'entoure des meilleurs metteurs-en-scène (Ernst Legal, Hans Curjel, Gustav Gründgens) et décorateurs (Théo Otto, Oskar Schlemmer, László Moholy-Nagy) de l'époque et renouvelle les conceptions du répertoire traditionnel tout en l'enrichissant de nombreuses créations mondiales : « Œdipe Roi » (1928) d'Igor Stravinsky, « Neues vom Tage » (Nouvelles du jour, 1929) de Paul Hindemith - ou berlinoises : « Erwartung » d'Arnold Schönberg, « Cardillac » de Paul Hindemith, « De la Maison des morts » de Leoš Janáček. Il signe également lui-même plusieurs mises-en-scène.

Mais cette fabuleuse aventure ne résiste pas aux conséquences de la crise économique, et le « Kroll Oper » ferme ses portes en 1931. Klemperer dirige alors à la « Deutsche Staatsoper » (1931-1933) puis quitte l'Allemagne pour fuir le Nazisme et se fixe aux États-Unis, où il avait donné ses 1ers concerts dès 1926. Il est nommé directeur musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Los Angeles (1933-1939) et assure également la direction de l'Orchestre symphonique de Pittsburgh (1937-1938) . Il rencontre Arnold Schönberg et retravaille la composition avec lui. En 1939, une opération au cerveau le laisse hémiparétique ; souffrant de cyclothymie, il parvient néanmoins à reprendre ses activités en se limitant à une carrière de chef-invité. En 1940, il obtient la nationalité américaine.

De retour en Europe, il accepte la direction musicale de l'Opéra de Budapest (1947-1950) . À partir de 1951, il doit se résoudre à diriger assis : il s'était fracturé la hanche et le col du fémur en débarquant à l'aéroport de Dorval à Montréal. Il traverse des périodes de dépression profonde dont il ne sort que grâce à l'aide de Walter Legge, qui l'attire à Londres pour enregistrer avec le « Philharmonia Orchestra » . En 1955, une page de sa carrière se tourne : Arturo Toscanini a pris sa retraite, Wilhelm Fürtwängler est mort, Bruno Walter ne dirige plus que de façon épisodique. Les figures historiques de la génération précédente ont disparu, et Klemperer accepte le poste de directeur musical à vie du « Philharmonia Orchestra » pour transmettre la grande tradition germanique dont il est à présent le seul détenteur. Sa carrière prend alors un nouvel essor. Il revient à l'Opéra en 1961 en dirigeant chaque saison à « Covent Garden » un ouvrage dont il assure lui-même la mise-en-scène : « Fidelio » (1961) ; « la Flûte enchantée » (1962) ; « Lohengrin » (1963) . Il reçoit la nationalité israélienne en 1970. Il continue à donner des concerts jusqu'en 1972 et meurt à Zürich, le 6 juillet 1973.

Véritable héritier spirituel de Gustav Mahler, dont il avait repris les 2 canons (renouveau et création) , Otto Klemperer a assimilé son influence d'une façon plus directe que Bruno Walter. Ses conceptions au cours de l'entre-2-guerres contrastent singulièrement avec l'approche lente et réfléchie, le sens des dimensions démesurées et la force dramatique qui caractérisent ses ultimes interprétations. Il a beaucoup contribué à faire connaître l'œuvre de Mahler dans le monde entier ; ses conceptions Classiques et épurées constituent un important contrepoids à la tradition exhubérante de Willem Mengelberg. Wieland Wagner voyait en lui une synthèse de la Grèce Classique, de la tradition juive, de la chrétienté médiévale, du Romantisme allemand et du réalisme de notre temps. Il a dirigé en première audition des pages de Paul Hindemith, Alexander Zemlinsky et Arnold Schönberg. Il a lui-même beaucoup composé, mais ne laissait pas exécuter ses œuvres : 6 Symphonies (écrites à partir de 1960) , un Concerto pour violon, 9 Quatuors à cordes (1968-1970) , 5 Opéras, dont « Das Ziel » (1915, révisé en 1970) , une « Missa sacra » (1919) et une centaine de lieder.

Après avoir étudié au Conservatoire de Francfort-sur-le-Main, Otto Klemperer suivit à Berlin l'enseignement de James Kwast (piano) et de Philipp Scharwenka et Hans Pfitzner (composition) . Ayant débuté comme répétiteur de chœurs, il dut son 1er engagement (1906) à Max Reinhardt, qui monta « Orphée aux enfers » de Jacques Offenbach. Autre rencontre capitale, celle de Gustav Mahler, qui le recommanda successivement comme chef d'orchestre du Théâtre allemand de Prague (1907-1910) et du Théâtre de Hambourg (1910-1913) . Klemperer, qui avait dirigé en coulisses le second orchestre à la création berlinoise de la 2e Symphonie dite « Résurrection » , allait devenir un ardent défenseur de l'œuvre de ce Maître, comme en témoignent nombre d'enregistrements et un livre de souvenirs (« Erinnerungen an Gustav Mahler », 1960) . Sa carrière se poursuit à Barmen (1913-1914) , Strasbourg (1914-1917) , Cologne (1917-1924) et Wiesbaden (1924-1927) .

Nommé directeur musical de l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin (1927-1931) , il en fit très rapidement une des Ires scènes lyriques d'Allemagne, accueillant les nouvelles œuvres de Ernst Křenek, Kurt Weill, Arnold Schœnberg, Paul Hindemith et Igor Stravinsky dans des mises-en-scène expressionnistes - politique novatrice fortement encouragée par la République de Weimar, mais qui valut à son auteur l'opprobre des Nationaux-Socialistes bientôt au pouvoir. Il dirigea également le Chœur philharmonique et, de 1931 à 1933, travailla au « Staatsoper » de Berlin. En 1933, Klemperer fut contraint d'émigrer aux États-Unis, où il prit la direction de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Los Angeles (jusqu'en 1940) . Mais plusieurs graves accidents de santé, dont une hémiparésie, allaient interrompre une carrière et on le vit dorénavant diriger assis, jusqu'en 1970. Il fut encore chef de l'Opéra de Budapest (1947-1950) et président du « Philharmonia Orchestra » de Londres (1959) .

Compositeur, il a laissé un Opéra (« Das Ziel ») , plusieurs Symphonies, des œuvres sacrées et des lieder. Interprète, il est entré vivant dans la légende. On a voulu ne voir en lui que le gardien sévère de la grande tradition germanique. C'est méconnaître le novateur fougueux qu'il fut dans sa jeunesse et le lutteur inspiré qu'il devint dans l'adversité, élevant son art à la spiritualité la plus profonde.

Né à Breslau (aujourd'hui, Wrocław, en Pologne) le 14 mai 1885, Otto (Nossan) Klemperer étudia le piano avec James Kwast et la théorie avec Ivan Knorr à la « Musikhochschule » de Francfort-sur-le-Main, à partir de 1901. Puis, il travailla la composition et la direction d'orchestre avec Hans Pfitzner au Conservatoire « Klindworth-Scharwenka » de Berlin. En 1905, il rencontre Gustav Mahler, alors directeur de l'Opéra de Vienne, qui encourage ses débuts. L'an plus tard, il dirige « Orphée aux enfers » de Jacques Offenbach au « Neues Theater » de Berlin dans une production de Max Reinhardt puis est engagé comme chef des chœurs au « Neues Deutsches Theater » (Nouveau Théâtre allemand) de Prague, en 1907. Il gravit rapidement les échelons de la hiérarchie et devient chef permanent.

En 1910, après avoir été l'assistant de Gustav Mahler pour la création de sa 8e Symphonie « des Mille » , Klemperer est nommé, sur la recommandation de celui-ci, 1er chef à l'Opéra de Hambourg (1910-1912) . En 1913-1914, on le retrouve à Barmen ; entre 1914 et 1917, à Strasbourg ; et, à partir de 1917, à Cologne, où il est nommé directeur général de la musique (1923-1924) . Il y crée l'Opéra de Erich Wolfgang Korngold « la Ville morte » (4 décembre 1920) et y dirige, en décembre 1922, la 1re représentation allemande de « Kátia Kabanová » de Leoš Janáček. En 1919, il avait épousé la cantatrice Johanna Geibler (morte en 1956) . Il est ensuite directeur général de la musique à Wiesbaden (1924-1927) et à la « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » de Berlin, plus connue sous le nom de « Kroll Oper » (1927-1931) .

Sous son impulsion, cette nouvelle scène acquiert une réputation de qualité et de renouveau qui attire l'attention de l'ensemble du monde musical. Il s'entoure des meilleurs metteurs-en-scène de l'époque (Ernst Legal, Hans Curjel, Gustav Gründgens, Jürgen Fehling) et décorateurs (Teo Otto, Oskar Schlemmer, László Moholy-Nagy) et renouvelle les conceptions du répertoire traditionnel tout en l'enrichissant de nombreuses créations mondiales. Parmi lesquelles : « Neues vom Tage » (8 juin 1929) de Paul Hindemith. Ou berlinoises : « Œdipus Rex » d'Igor Stravinsky ; « Erwartung » d'Arnold Schönberg ; « Cardillac » de Paul Hindemith ; « De la maison des morts » de Leoš Janáček. Klemperer signe également lui-même plusieurs mises-en-scène.

Mais la fabuleuse aventure du « Kroll Oper » ne résiste pas aux conséquences de la crise économique et aux pressions politiques (l'institution est considérée comme un repère de la « culture bolchévique ») , et le « Kroll Oper » ferme ses portes en 1931. Klemperer dirige alors à la « Deutsche Staatsoper » (1931-1933) puis, en avril 1933, quitte l'Allemagne pour fuir le Nazisme (il est d'origine juive) et se fixe aux États-Unis, où il avait donné ses premiers concerts dès 1926. Il est nommé directeur musical de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Los Angeles (1933-1939) et assure également la direction de l'Orchestre symphonique de Pittsburgh (1937-1938) . Il rencontre Arnold Schönberg et retravaille la composition avec lui. En 1939, une opération au cerveau le laisse hémiparétique ; souffrant de cyclothymie, il parvient néanmoins à reprendre ses activités en se limitant à une carrière de chef-invité. En 1940, il obtient la nationalité américaine.

De retour en Europe après la Seconde Guerre mondiale, Otto Klemperer accepte la direction musicale de l'Opéra de Budapest (1947-1950) . À partir de 1951, il doit se résoudre à diriger assis : il s'était fracturé la hanche et le col du fémur en débarquant à l'aéroport de Dorval à Montréal. Il traverse des périodes de dépression profonde dont il ne sort que grâce à l'aide de Walter Legge, qui l'attire à Londres pour enregistrer avec le « Philharmonia Orchestra » . Il reçoit la nationalité israélienne en 1970. Il continue à donner des concerts jusqu'en 1972 et meurt à Zürich, le 6 juillet 1973.

Éditions Pluriel, Paris (1985) :

Mon premier souvenir de Gustav Mahler remonte fort loin dans le passé, et se situe à Hambourg, vers 1894. Mahler était alors chef d'orchestre au Théâtre municipal. Le chemin qui menait de mon école à la maison traversait la « Grindelallee » , qui conduisait à la partie-ouest de Hambourg. Le domicile de Mahler se trouvait dans le même quartier. Rentrant un jour de l'école, je vis à côté de moi un homme bizarre. Il tenait son chapeau à la main et avait l'air de ne pas pouvoir marcher normalement. Sa démarche était heurtée, il s'arrêtait brusquement et semblait avoir un pied bot. Je l'observai avec une curiosité indicible et pensai : c'est Mahler, le chef d'orchestre du Théâtre municipal. Comment je le savais, je l'ignore encore - peut-être par mes parents. Ils allaient, de temps en temps, au Théâtre municipal et en rapportaient les programmes. Le nom de Mahler y figurait en toute place.

De nombreuses années s'écoulèrent avant que je ne revisse Mahler. En 1905, le chef d'orchestre Oskar Fried exécuta la 2e Symphonie de Mahler. Le succès de cette œuvre fut triomphal - et c'était la même œuvre qui, 10 ans plus tôt environ, avait été violemment éreintée par la presse berlinoise. « Un simulateur de génie. » : telle avait été la teneur générale des critiques. Oskar Fried était le chef de la « Stern'sche Gesangverein » et j'étais son accompagnateur (et, quelques fois, même son remplaçant) . Totalement inconnu, il avait atteint la célébrité grâce à une exécution de « la Légende de Sainte-Élisabeth » de Franz Liszt. La seconde œuvre qu'il monta fut la 2e Symphonie de Mahler. J'eus l'honneur d'y diriger l'Orchestre placé en coulisses. C'est une tâche très difficile, qui exige une attention extrême aux constants changements de mesure. Mahler assistait à la répétition générale. Je courus vers lui et lui demandai si l'Orchestre, placé en coulisses, lui avait plu. Il me répondit : « Non, c'était épouvantable. Beaucoup trop fort. » Je me permis de lui dire que la partition portait l'indication « très bruyant » . « Oui, répondit-il, mais à une grande distance. » Je le laissai dire et demandai aux musiciens de jouer tout doucement (car nous nous trouvions beaucoup trop près) . Comme je l'ai dit, le succès fut triomphal. Mahler dut venir saluer d'innombrables fois et, enfin, il descendit dans la loge des artistes. Lorsqu'il me vit, il tendit immédiatement la main en me disant : « Très bien. » . J'en fus comblé.

À dater de ce jour, je n'eus plus qu'un désir : aller travailler auprès de Mahler, qui était directeur de l'Opéra Impérial de Vienne. Je demandai conseil à Oskar Fried sur la manière dont je pouvais éveiller son intérêt. Il me dit : « Il n'y a qu'une chose au monde qui intéresse Mahler, ce sont ses compositions. » Je me mis donc, au travail, et effectuai une réduction pour piano de la 2e Symphonie (cette réduction n'a jamais été publiée) .

Quelques mois après l'exécution de la 2e Symphonie à laquelle j'ai fait allusion, Mahler dirigea lui-même sa 3e Symphonie, en remplacement d'Arthur Nikisch. On m'attribua, là encore, un modeste emploi : la caisse claire placée derrière la scène. Mais je me vis confier une responsabilité plus importante en obtenant l'autorisation, après une répétition, d'accompagner Mahler, depuis la « Köpenicker Straße » jusqu'à l' « Augsburgger Straße » , où il était invité à déjeuner par Richard Strauß. Nous dûmes prendre le métro aérien qui venait d'être construit, mais cela n'intéressait guère Mahler. Brusquement il me dit : « Vous composez, n'est-ce pas ? » Ne considérant pas mes exercices scolaires comme des œuvres, je fis un signe de dénégation. « Si, si, dit-il en riant, vous composez, je le vois bien. » . La 3e Symphonie remporta, elle aussi, un succès considérable à Berlin, notamment le 1er mouvement.

Cet hiver-là, je fis une petite tournée de concerts avec le violoncelliste Jacques van Lier. Je l'accompagnais au piano et je jouais également en solo. Cette tournée me conduisit 3 fois à Vienne. Oskar Fried me dit qu'il fallait absolument que j'allasse rendre visite à Mahler, que cela lui ferait certainement plaisir. Je suis donc allé le voir. Il m'invita immédiatement à assister le soir même à une représentation de « la Walkyrie » qu'il dirigeait. Malheureusement, j'avais moi-même un concert, mais je pus tout de même venir écouter les 2e et 3e actes. C'était indescriptible, Mahler, qui dirigeait lui-même la mise-en-scène, dominait tout. Je n'avais jamais vu la fin du second acte représenté aussi clairement sur scène. Les trilles des bois, qui introduisent le 3e acte, était d'une violence que je n'aurais jamais crue possible. Au moment du grand passage en mi mineur « Nach dem Tann lenkt sie das taumelnde Ross » (Vers le bois de sapin elle dirige son cheval chancelant) , l'Orchestre sembla s'évanouir. À la fin de l' « Enchantement du feu » , le feu parut se surpasser.

Otto Klemperer, l'héritier malgré lui

Un portrait par Stéphane Friédérich. Revue « Classica » n° 13 (juin 1999) .

La stature en impose : près de 2 mètres de haut, un verbe court mais acide. Otto Klemperer est promis au bel avenir de l'héritier germanique du répertoire Romantique. Quelle ironie pour ce musicien, juif converti, qui n'a eu de cesse de soutenir la musique de son temps !

Otto Klemperer naît à Breslau, le 14 mai 1885. Il grandit dans une famille juive, de bons musiciens amateurs. Sa mère lui donne ses Ires leçons. Dès l'âge de 10 ans, il s'essaie à la composition. Il étudie au Conservatoire de Francfort, puis à Berlin. Son Maître est le compositeur et chef d'orchestre Hans Pfitzner. Klemperer éprouve un mélange d'admiration et de défiance à l'égard de cette forte personnalité. Dans la capitale allemande, il découvre les mises-en-scène de Max Reinhardt qui le fascinent. Ses études se passent sans histoire jusqu'à ce jour de 1906. Il remplace au pied levé le chef d'orchestre Oskar Fried, dans la production de l'Opéra-bouffe de Jacques Offenbach, « Orphée aux enfers » . En quelques heures, une vocation est née.

Les recommandations de Mahler

Un an plus tôt, en 1905, Otto Klemperer dirige l'Orchestre qui est en coulisses dans la 2e Symphonie de Gustav Mahler. C'est la Ire rencontre avec celui qui deviendra l'âme de sa vie d'artiste. Il s'imprègne de la direction d'orchestre du compositeur dont tous les témoins s'accordent à reconnaître le génie. Le jeune musicien avoue :

« Il faut abandonner cette profession si on n'arrive pas à diriger comme cela. »

Klemperer ne sera toutefois jamais aussi proche de Mahler que Bruno Walter ne l'est. Pendant 2 ans, il apprend le travail d'une Maison d'Opéra. En 1907, Mahler intercède pour que son protégé obtienne le poste de chef des chœurs à l'Opéra allemand de Prague. Rapidement, il en devient le chef permanent et se fait remarquer en dirigeant le « Freischütz » de Weber. Klemperer y reste 3 ans. Il dirige avant tout des Opérettes. Un beau jour, le directeur de l'Opéra le licencie. Il prend pour prétexte que le chef d'orchestre est indirectement l'auteur des critiques dont il est l'objet dans la presse ! Une seconde fois, Mahler appuie la nomination de Klemperer, en tant que 1er chef à l'Opéra de Hambourg. Nous sommes en 1910.

Errances et conversion

À Hambourg, les Opérettes ne sont plus d'actualité et Otto Klemperer dirige son 1er Opéra, « Lohengrin » , avec lequel il remporte un immense succès. Souffrant d'une dépression, un mal qui le suivra toute sa vie, il prend une année sabbatique. De retour à son poste, éclate un scandale qui le contraint à démissionner, en 1912. Il a en effet une liaison avec une cantatrice, Elisabeth Schumann, et la réaction du mari est violente. Entre 1913 et 1914, il dirige à Barmen. Durant ce purgatoire, il en profite pour élargir son répertoire. Le scandale oublié, il est nommé à l'Opéra de Strasbourg, alors sous administration Impériale. Il y reste jusqu'en 1917. Il retrouve son ancien professeur, Hans Pfitzner, lequel est aussi médiocre chef d'orchestre qu'orgueilleux. Inévitablement, les 2 hommes se brouillent. Après la guerre, il devient directeur général de la musique, à Cologne, de 1923 à 1924. Il épouse la cantatrice Johanna Geisler, de confession protestante. Klemperer se convertit au catholicisme. Il ne s'agit pas d'une conversion « opportuniste » comme cela fut le cas pour Bruno Walter ou Gustav Mahler face à la montée nazie. Klemperer commet un acte réfléchi. Il avoue avoir été fasciné par le culte catholique et l'impression que lui a laissée la Cathédrale de Strasbourg. À Cologne, il découvre la richesse du répertoire contemporain. Il crée notamment « la Ville Morte » (« Die Tote Stadt ») d'Erich Wolfgang Korngold, en 1920 ; le Concerto pour alto de Paul Hindemith (1927) ; la Suite pour cordes d'Arnold Schönberg ; « Irrelohe » de Franz Schreker ; et il donne des premières allemandes dont « Jenůfa » de Leoš Janáček. Il occupe des fonctions similaires à Wiesbaden, de 1924 à 1927. Dans le souffle de liberté de la jeune République de Weimar, le musicien ne fait pas mystère de ses profondes sympathies pour les mouvements socialistes et communistes. Tout au long des années '20, il est régulièrement invité à diriger à Moscou, à Leningrad. Le Bolchoï se souviendra longtemps d'une production homérique de « Carmen » !

Le « Kroll » de Klemperer ou le bolchévique de la culture

À Berlin, après 1918, coexistent 2 Opéras « traditionnels ». L'idée de bon nombre d'artistes est d'en créer un 3e qui se consacrerait davantage à la musique contemporaine et qui tenterait de rajeunir les mises-en-scène du grand répertoire. Otto Klemperer est appelé à la direction du « Kroll Oper » de Berlin. Sous sa direction, de 1927 à 1931, l'institution devient un des hauts-lieux de la musique en Allemagne. La structure est celle d'un Opéra moderne : il réunit des courants et des esthétiques d'avant-garde. Klemperer impose une cohérence artistique bien différente des autres maisons d'Opéras : il choisit des chanteurs-acteurs, plutôt que des voix pures, il engage de remarquables assistants, dont Alexander von Zemlinsky. Le « Kroll Oper » symbolise pour la bourgeoisie, un repère bolchévique, le Berlin de l'insolence, de la provocation. Klemperer a appris de Gustav Mahler, la patience et l'acceptation de courants qui lui sont parfois étrangers. Il soutient moins l'École de Vienne (Schönberg, Berg, Webern) que les post-Romantiques ou les néo-Classiques. D'ailleurs, il ne comprend pas la musique de Webern qui ne reflète qu'une époque et est donc condamnée à disparaître. Igor Stravinsky, Paul Hindemith, Darius Milhaud et Leoš Janáček le passionnent.

L'indépendant

Nous sommes en 1928, et Otto Klemperer écrit :

« Je suis sur le point d'acheter une voiture et j'ai l'intention d'apprendre la conduite automobile. Jusqu'à présent, je ne me suis guère spécialisé que dans l'inconduite, mais avec le temps, j'arriverai bien à me débarrasser du " in ". »

Au « Kroll Oper », il est seul Maître à bord. Il y crée une multitude de partitions, d'« Œdipe Rex » d'Igor Stravinsky (1928) aux « Nouvelles du jour », et le Concerto pour alto de Paul Hindemith (1929). Il présente, pour la 1re fois, le « Erwartung » d'Arnold Schönberg ; le « Cardillac » de Paul Hindemith ; « la Maison des morts » de Leoš Janáček. Son autoritarisme dérange les metteurs-en-scène, toujours en conflit de pouvoir avec le chef d'orchestre. Il lui arrive de détester des solistes et des chanteurs mais il sait aussi s'en faire de mortels ennemis. En 1928, il demande un nouveau congé sans solde, souffrant d'une nouvelle dépression. Le climat est de plus en plus sulfureux. La plupart des compositeurs dont les œuvres sont créées au « Kroll Oper » sont juifs. Nous sommes en 1931 et l'Allemagne bascule progressivement dans les ténèbres. En 1931, le « Kroll Oper » met la clef sous la porte. Les raisons sont multiples. La programmation, trop avant-gardiste, fait fuir le public qu'il est sensé « éduquer », les subventions sont allouées au compte-goutte et les meilleurs musiciens d'orchestre sont réservés aux nobles institutions. Après cet échec cuisant, Otto Klemperer reçoit la co-direction du « Staatsoper ». De 1931 à 1933, il doit « composer » avec ses concurrents directs, Wilhelm Furtwängler et Erich Kleiber. L'honneur de diriger au « Staatsoper » lui a fait perdre son pouvoir de décision, notamment sur les metteurs-en-scène. Il ne peut le supporter et le conflit avec l'intendant de l'Opéra débouche sur un procès que Klemperer perd. 1933, c'est l'arrivée au pouvoir des Nazis.

L'autre monde et la maladie

Avant de partir pour les États-Unis, et de rejoindre les musiciens tel Kurt Weill qui « ont cédé à la tentation matérialiste de gagner de l'argent dans de médiocres films », selon Klemperer, il dirige, à Vienne, Béla Bartók, soliste de son 2e Concerto pour piano. L'expérience le marque profondément. De 1933 à 1939, il prend la direction de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Los Angeles, qu'il cumule avec celle de l'Orchestre Symphonique de Pittsburgh (1937-1938), dont il dirige les concerts de la création. Il obtient la nationalité américaine en 1940. Arnold Schönberg accepte de lui donner des conseils en composition. Klemperer étudie avec lui les Motets de Jean-Sébastien Bach sans jamais évoquer la musique sérielle. Après avoir dirigé autant d'œuvres en Europe, son regard sur la musique américaine est sans appel. Quant à George Gershwin, le seul compositeur qu'il admire, il se souvient de leur 1re rencontre, alors qu'il allait diriger la « Rhapsody in Blue » :

« Je ne sais pas si vous maîtrisez bien mon style. », lui dit Gershwin.

Et Klemperer réplique aussitôt :

« Je n'en sais rien non plus, mais je m'en suis bien sorti avec Beethoven, alors cela devrait marcher ». (« Écrits et entretiens » avec Peter Hayworth, édition Hachette.)

En 1939, il subit une opération pour une tumeur au cerveau qui le laisse partiellement paralysé. L'Orchestre de Los Angeles rompt sans état d'âme le contrat qui le lie avec son directeur musical. Otto Klemperer replonge dans une dépression. Il compose la plupart de ses œuvres durant cette période. Après guerre, il reprend ses activités de chef-invit, mais il semble qu'il ait fait preuve de comportements extravagants qui dissuadent les Orchestres de l'inviter. Les séquelles de son opération de 1939 sont indélébiles : il en oublie parfois sa propre identité et se retrouve à errer dans les rues. En 1947, on lui propose la direction de l'Opéra de Budapest. 3 ans plus tard, ulcéré par les pressions des Soviétiques, il quitte la Hongrie. La musique de Schönberg, « peu propice à élever les masses », y est prohibée. Il refuse également les concerts en URSS, lorsque ce pays et le Pacte de Varsovie font cause commune contre Israël. Comble de malchance, il fait une chute à l'aéroport Dorval de Montréal, en 1955. Elle accentue alors son infirmité.

La résurrection du « Philharmonia » de Londres

En 1954, Otto Klemperer rencontre Walter Legge, le directeur artistique de la « Columbia », qui a créé 10 ans auparavant l'Orchestre « Philharmonia » de Londres. Le chef titulaire est Herbert von Karajan que Klemperer admire tout en regrettant sa propension à soigner son image (« Quelle est cette soif d'applaudissements ? » dira-t-il, agacé à l'issue d'un concert du chef autrichien) . Il entame une collaboration régulière avec le « Philharmonia » et l'industrie du disque, alors en plein essor. Klemperer est nommé chef à vie, en 1959. À partir de 1961, il dirige également, chaque année, au Covent Garden de Londres. En 1964, Walter Legge provoque la rupture en voulant dissoudre le « Philharmonia » . Klemperer reprend la direction de l'Orchestre qui s'appelle dorénavant le « London New Philharmonia » .

Les paradoxes oubliés

Sa maladie, principalement, a accentué le ralentissement de ses tempos, qu'il faut comparer à ceux, des périodes allemandes et hongroises, qui étaient très rapides. Il n'a pas cessé de composer et il laisse une centaine de lieder, l'Opéra (« Das Ziel ») , des Oratorios, l' Messe, 6 Symphonies, 9 Quatuors à cordes. Il admire Pierre Boulez auquel il reproche déjà de trop diriger :

« Le seul homme de sa génération à être, à la fois, un chef d'orchestre et un musicien remarquable. »

À Londres, Otto Klemperer n'a pas cessé d'être intéressé par la musique de son temps. Or, sa discographie repose, avant tout, sur le grand répertoire Romantique. Il n'aime pas ses enregistrements, à l'exception de ceux consacrés à Gustav Mahler. Le style de Klemperer est l'opposé de ceux de Wilhelm Furtwängler et de Bruno Walter. Il admire Arturo Toscanini, bien qu'il le critique :

« C'est une folie de diriger aussi vite et sans partition. »

En 1970, il accepte la citoyenneté israélienne. À la fin de sa vie, il se sent plus religieux que juif ou catholique. Son répertoire évolue, les quelques Symphonies de Mahler qu'il accepte de diriger sont supplantées par celles d'Anton Bruckner. Ces fresques sonores correspondent à son tempérament austère. Il cesse de diriger en 1972. Otto Klemperer meurt à Zürich, le 6 juillet 1973.

...

Otto Klemperer fut un disciple de Gustav Mahler à Vienne et prit des leçons de composition auprès d'Arnold Schœnberg à Berlin, puis à nouveau pendant la guerre, aux États-Unis. Il est le cousin de Victor Klemperer. Chef à l'Opéra de Strasbourg (dirigé par Hans Pfitzner) puis à l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin, il créa des œuvres d'Arnold Schœnberg, de Paul Hindemith, de Kurt Weill, de Franz Schreker, d'Ernst Křenek et dirigea tous les compositeurs modernes de son époque. Il fut chassé par les Nazis en 1933, en raison de ses origines juives, bien qu'il fut baptisé.

Le monde musical allemand se montrant réticent à le réinstaller à la tête d'une phalange importante dans l'immédiat après-guerre, il dirigea d'abord à Budapest puis à Londres, où il fut mis sous contrat pour la firme « EMI » par Walter Legge. Devenu un « elder statesman » de la musique, surtout après la mort de ses collègues et contemporains Wilhelm Furtwängler, Arturo Toscanini, Erich Kleiber, Wilhelm Mengelberg et Bruno Walter, il devint sur ses vieux jours un invité de marque de nombreux Orchestres, surtout à partir de la fin des années '50. C'est à cette époque que Walter Legge fait connaître Klemperer au monde entier en enregistrant, en une quinzaine d'années, presque tout son répertoire avec l'Orchestre « Philharmonia » de Londres dont il devient le chef principal. À la fin des années '60, une série de concerts triomphaux à Vienne et à Munich (succédant à ceux donnés à Cologne, quelque temps plus tôt) marqua, au moins extérieurement, la réconciliation entre le chef et l'univers culturel dont il fut toujours le représentant. Marqué par l'expérience amère de l'exil, Otto Klemperer s'est détourné du répertoire moderne après 1945 (à l'exception de Gustav Mahler) pour se consacrer au répertoire austro-germanique. On a oublié qu'il avait été, dans sa jeunesse, un chef particulièrement fougueux et avant-gardiste. Cette évolution de style et de répertoire se retrouvera plus tard chez Sergiù Celibidache, qui l'admirait beaucoup, ou encore chez Günter Wand.

Il a laissé, chez « EMI » et « Hungaroton », des enregistrements d'une extraordinaire intensité et puissance de Beethoven, Bruckner, Bach, Mahler, Mozart, Haydn, Brahms et Wagner (Ouvvertures) . Haut de près de 2 mètres, c'était, à tout point de vue, l'un des plus grands chefs de tous les temps. Il était également connu pour son humour acerbe et noir. Très amoindri sur le tard par une série d'infarctus, il n'en continua pas moins à diriger en chaise roulante jusqu'à un âge extrêmement avancé, impressionnant tous les Orchestres par l'expression sévère de son visage à moitié paralysé.

En tant que compositeur, Otto Klemperer a écrit des Symphonies d'inspiration mahlérienne qui n'ont laissé aucune trace dans le répertoire à ce jour. Son enregistrement monumental de la 7e Symphonie de Mahler paru chez « EMI » (malheureusement épuisé) est couplé à un enregistrement de sa propre 2e Symphonie, dont le style savant et l'inspiration spirituelle ne cachent pourtant pas les limites de l'originalité.

« La musique est infinie. Elle est le langage de l'âme. » (Otto Klemperer)

Chef d'orchestre mythique, que l'on range dans les plus grandes figures de l'histoire des chefs légendaires, aux côtés de Gustav Mahler ou de Wilhelm Furtwängler ; Otto Klemperer est né en 1885 et est mort en 1973.

Klemperer, à la fin de sa vie, dirigeait assis de son fauteuil d'immenses Symphonies avec d'immenses Orchestres avec des tempi de plus en plus lent, de la musique de plus en plus suspendue dans le temps. Avant d'être un chef d'orchestre hors d'âge, il fut un jeune homme fougueux, dirigeant la musique contemporaine de son époque. Et avant même d'être ce jeune chef, Klemperer fut un enfant.

« Mes parents avaient réellement appris à se connaître grâce à la musique. Mon père chantait du Schubert, du Löwe, du Mozart, du Schumann et du Brahms ; et ma mère, qui était professeur de piano, l'accompagnait et lui donnait des leçons, car il ne savait pas lire une note et chantait tout à l'oreille. Mon 1er souvenir musical est celui de mon père en train de chanter, en particulier le “ Dichterliebe ”. J’ai toujours aimé Schumann, et aujourd’hui encore, je suis toujours heureux de pouvoir diriger une de ses Symphonies. »

Si Klemperer est né à Breslau dans l’Empire Allemand, qui deviendra l’actuelle Wrocław polonaise, sa famille déménage dès sa petite enfance plus au nord, à Hambourg. Et à Hambourg, se trouve alors un chef d’orchestre compositeur qui va marquer l’histoire, tout autant d’ailleurs que la vie du jeune Klemperer. Ce chef considéré comme un modèle pour Klemperer n’est autre que Gustav Mahler.

« Toscanini était le plus grand chef d’orchestre de sa génération, mais Mahler était 100 fois plus grand. Je veux dire que les exécutions de Toscanini étaient quelquefois contestables, en particulier son Beethoven. Mais Mahler, jamais. Je l’ai entendu plusieurs fois. La Ire fois, ce fut à l’Opéra de Vienne dans le second et le 3e acte de “ la Walkyrie ”, puis lors de concerts à Prague, où il dirigea un certain nombre d’œuvres, dont le prélude des “ Maîtres-chanteurs ”, l’Ouverture de “ la Fiancée vendue ”, et la 7e Symphonie de Beethoven. C’était phénoménal. Je n’avais plus qu’une idée : il fallait abandonner cette profession si on n’arrivait pas à diriger comme cela. »

Otto Klemperer. Une grande figure du XXe siècle va jouer un rôle très important pour Klemperer, c’est le compositeur Arnold Schönberg, qui de 10 ans son aîné, doit, comme lui, fuir l’Allemagne nazi. Il trouvera refuge en Californie. Aux États-Unis, Klemperer fera en sorte d’aider Schönberg, et il ira même jusqu’à étudier avec lui. Ce qui est étonnant quand on pense que Klemperer était déjà un musicien plus qu’accompli, et de renommée internationale. L’authentique attachement et l’admiration que porte Klemperer à Schönberg ne s’explique pas par une adhésion de Klemperer au mouvement dodécaphoniste.

« À mon avis, la grande chose que Schönberg nous a apprise c’est qu’il n’y a pas de différence réelle entre la consonance et la dissonance. L’idée de composer avec 12 notes est tout à fait fascinante. Je m’en suis servi. Ce n’est pas simplement une idée abstraite. Ses adversaires disent toujours : “ Ce n’est pas de la musique, ce sont des mathématiques. ”, ce n’est pas vrai ; cela peut être de la musique. Évidemment, si on ne l’utilise que de façon mathématique, ce n’est pas de la musique. Bien utilisé, ce système peut exprimer les intentions d’un compositeur. Je considère que l’une des dernière œuvres de Schönberg fait partie des pièces les plus puissantes que je connaisse, et elle est intégralement composée selon le système dodécaphonique. Je pense que Schönberg est quelquefois allé un peu loin, par exemple en interdisant de répéter les notes. C’est une règle sévère, que l’on ne peut pas toujours suivre - pour ma part, en tout cas. Mais l’idée de base est merveilleuse. Elle nous a libérés de la tonalité. C’est merveilleux ! »

Dans ses souvenirs, Otto Klemperer ne manque pas d’évoquer les autres grands chefs de son temps. L’admiration infinie qu’il porte à Gustav Mahler, qui fut un réel modèle pour lui. Puis, il y a un chef de sa génération, Wilhelm Furtwängler, et 2 chefs plus âgés que lui : Arturo Toscanini, et l’un des pères des chefs modernes ; et le hongrois Arthur Nikisch qui fut le directeur musical de la Philharmonie de Berlin, comme de l’Orchestre de Boston, ou encore du « London Symphony Orchestra » .

« Nikisch était un exemple de chef d’orchestre qui ne compose pas. C’était vraiment un virtuose. Strauß en pensait le plus grand bien. Mais je crois qu'il était meilleur chef d'orchestre que musicien. Il dirigeait merveilleusement les Symphonies de Schumann, ainsi que Wagner et Strauß. Ses morceaux de bravoure étaient l'Ouverture de " Tannhäuser " et, surtout, la Symphonie " Pathétique " de Tchaïkovsky, qu'il dirigeait de façon prodigieuse : une beauté sonore extrême, avec une grande retenue, et, en même temps, beaucoup de passion. Non, il était admirable. »

Klemperer livre son jugement sur un autre chef, star de sa génération et du XXe siècle, comme lui, il s'est établi en Californie, c'est Leopold Stokowski, qui eut une carrière plus médiatique. Klemperer évoque également 2 chefs plus jeunes que lui, Pierre Boulez et Herbert von Karajan, s'il admire le 1er, il est plus réservé sur le second. L'évocation de Boulez permet aussi à Klemperer de réfléchir sur son propre statut de chef et compositeur.

« J'ai entendu Karajan un jour à Amsterdam. Il a très bien dirigé la 7e de Bruckner. Mais, voyez-vous, au " Concertgebouw ", l'entrée du chef est très éloignée de l'estrade ; il faut qu'il descende un long escalier. Voir Karajan revenir se faire applaudir, les bras ouverts, en faisant des courbettes de tous les côtés, c'était vraiment du théâtre. C'était comique. Je n'ai pas compris pourquoi il s'est cru obligé de faire tout ce cinéma ! C'est un homme compétent, il sait diriger, voilà tout. Je ne comprends pas cette soif d'applaudissements. »

Considéré comme l'un des plus éminents chefs d'orchestre du XXe siècle, Otto Klemperer naît le 14 mai 1885 dans ville de Breslau qui fait alors partie de l'Empire allemand (avant d'être rétrocédé à la Pologne qui la rebaptise Wrocław) . Il débute à l'Opéra de Berlin et gagne l'amitié de Gustav Mahler qui le recommande à l'Opéra de Prague. En poste dans différentes villes (Hambourg, Strasbourg, Cologne, Wiesbaden) , le chef itinérant accomplit un gros travail de défrichage et de promotion des compositeurs contemporains à l'Opéra « Kroll » de Berlin où il dirige des œuvres de Arnold Schœnberg (« Erwartung ») ; Paul Hindemith (« Cardillac ») ; Igor Stravinsky (« Œdipe roi ») ; et Leoš Janáček (« De la Maison des morts ») . Chassé par le régime nazi, en 1933, Otto Klemperer atterrit à Los Angeles où ses choix sont fortement critiqués. Atteint de troubles mentaux et opéré d'une tumeur, il en conservera toute sa vie des séquelles. Son retour en Europe à l'après-guerre débouche sur de multiples collaborations dont la plus fameuse reste l'association avec le « Philharmonia » de Londres et la firme « EMI » pour une série de Symphonies de Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner, Mahler et des Opéras de Mozart et de Wagner. Retiré en Suisse, le chef d'orchestre adopte la nationalité israélienne lors d'une ultime tournée. Il s'éteint le 6 juillet 1973, à l'âge de 88 ans. Outre un legs imposant de chef d'orchestre, Otto Klemperer laisse une œuvre de compositeur d'Opéra et de Symphonies.

Une monumentale biographie en 2 volumes (Volume 1 : 1885-1933 ; Volume 2 : 1933-1973) a été consacré au chef Otto Klemperer par le britannique Peter Heyworth.

Né à Breslau (aujourd'hui Wrocław, en Pologne) le 14 mai 1885, Otto Nossan Klemperer étudie le piano avec James Kwast et la théorie avec Ivan Knorr à la « Musikhochschule » de Francfort-sur-le-Main, à partir de 1901. Puis, il travaille la composition et la direction d'orchestre avec Hans Pfitzner au Conservatoire Klindworth-Scharwenka de Berlin. En 1905, il rencontre Gustav Mahler alors directeur de l'Opéra de Vienne, qui encourage ses débuts. Un an plus tard, il dirige l'Opéra « Orphée aux enfers » de Jacques Offenbach au « Neues Theater » de Berlin dans une production de Max Reinhardt puis il est engagé comme chef des chœurs au « Neues Deutsches Theater » (Nouveau Théâtre allemand) de Prague, en 1907. Il gravit rapidement les échelons de la hiérarchie et devient chef permanent.

En 1910, après avoir été l'assistant de Gustav Mahler pour la création de sa 8e Symphonie (« Des Mille ») , Klemperer est nommé, sur la recommandation de celui-ci, premier chef à l'Opéra de Hambourg (1910-1912) . En 1913-1914, on le retrouve à Barmen, entre 1914 et 1917 à Strasbourg et, à partir de 1917, à Cologne, où il est nommé directeur général de la musique (1923-1924) . Il y crée l'Opéra d'Erich Wolfgang Korngold, « Die Tote Stadt » (La Ville morte) , le 4 décembre 1920 et il y dirige, en décembre 1922, la Ire représentation allemande de « Kátia Kabanová » de Leoš Janáček. En 1919, il avait épousé la cantatrice Johanna Geibler (morte en 1956) . Il est ensuite directeur général de la musique à Wiesbaden (1924-1927) et à la « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » de Berlin, plus connue sous le nom de « Kroll Oper » (1927-1931) .

Sous son impulsion, cette nouvelle scène acquiert une réputation de qualité et de renouveau qui attire l'attention de l'ensemble du monde musical. Il s'entoure des meilleurs metteurs en scène de l'époque (Ernst Legal, Hans Curjel, Gustav Gründgens, Jürgen Fehling) et décorateurs (Teo Otto, Oskar Schlemmer, László Moholy-Nagy) et renouvelle les conceptions du répertoire traditionnel tout en l'enrichissant de nombreuses créations mondiales parmi lesquelles : « Neues vom Tage » (8 juin 1929) de Paul Hindemith. Ou berlinoises : « Œdipus Rex » d'Igor Stravinsky ; « Erwartung » d'Arnold Schönberg ; « Cardillac » de Paul Hindemith ; « De la maison des Morts » de Leoš Janáček. Otto Klemperer signe également, lui-même, plusieurs mises-en-scène.

Bien que converti au catholicisme, Otto Klemperer est forcé de quitter, en 1933, son Allemagne natale pour fuir le régime nazi. Il ira s'installer aux États-Unis où il est rapidement nommé chef d'orchestre du « Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra » .

En 1937, l'Orchestre symphonique de Pittsburgh nomme Otto Klemperer pour réorganiser et étendre l'institution. En seulement 1 saison (soit environ 6 semaines) , le grand chef hausse considérablement le niveau de l'Orchestre. Ce dernier sera également l'initiateur de l'arrivée du jeune Fritz Reiner qui va poursuivre sur la même lancée.

Le monde musical allemand se montrant réticent à le réinstaller à la tête d'une phalange importante dans l'immédiat après-guerre, Otto Klemperer dirigea, d'abord à Budapest, puis à Londres, où il fut pris sous contrat pour la maison d'enregistrement « EMI » par Walter Legge. Devenu un « elder-statesman » de la musique, surtout après la mort de ses collègues et contemporains : Wilhelm Furtwängler, Arturo Toscanini, Erich Kleiber, Wilhelm Mengelberg et Bruno Walter, il devint, sur ses vieux jours, un invité de marque de nombreux Orchestres, surtout à partir de la fin des années 1950. C'est à cette époque que Walter Legge fait connaître Otto Klemperer au monde entier en enregistrant, en une quinzaine d'années, presque tout son répertoire avec l'Orchestre « Philharmonia » de Londres dont il devient le chef principal. À la fin des années 1960, une série de concerts triomphaux à Vienne et à Munich (succédant à ceux donnés à Cologne, quelque temps plus tôt) marqua, au moins extérieurement, la réconciliation entre le chef et l'univers culturel dont il fut toujours le représentant.

Marqué par l'expérience amère de l'exil, Otto Klemperer s'est détourné après 1945 du répertoire moderne (à l'exception de Gustav Mahler) pour se consacrer au répertoire austro-germanique Classique et Romantique. Sa discographie officielle ne comptant presque que des œuvres écrites avant 1918, et ses tempos étant quelquefois d'une lenteur surprenante, mais toujours soutenue sans relâche (le 1er mouvement de la 5e Symphonie de Beethoven avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne, en 1968) , on a oublié qu'il avait été, dans sa jeunesse, un chef particulièrement fougueux et avant-gardiste.

Il a laissé, chez les firmes « EMI » et « Hungaroton », des enregistrements d'une extraordinaire intensité et puissance de Beethoven, d'Anton Bruckner, de Bach, de Gustav Mahler, de Mozart, de Franz-Josef Haydn, de Johannes Brahms et de Richard Wagner. Haut de près de 2 mètres (6 pieds 4 pouces), c'était, à tout point de vue, l'un des plus grands chefs de tous les temps. Il était également connu pour son humour acerbe et noir. Très amoindri sur le tard par une série d'infarctus, il n'en continua pas moins à diriger en chaise roulante jusqu'à un âge extrêmement avancé, impressionnant tous les Orchestres par l'expression sévère de son visage, à moitié paralysé.

En tant que compositeur, Otto Klemperer a écrit des Symphonies d'inspiration mahlérienne qui n'ont laissé aucune trace dans le répertoire. Son enregistrement monumental de la 7e Symphonie de Mahler qui parut chez « EMI » est couplé à un enregistrement de sa propre 2e Symphonie, dont le style savant et l'inspiration spirituelle ne cachent pourtant pas les limites de l'originalité.

The German conductor and composer Otto Klemperer was born on 14 May 1885 in Breslau, Silesia Province, then in the German Empire (now, Wrocław, Poland) and died on 6 July 1973. He was the son of Nathan Klemperer, a native of Prague, Bohemia (today's Czech Republic) . He is widely regarded as one of the leading conductors of the 20th Century.

Klemperer studied music 1st at the « Hoch Conservatory in Frankfurt and, later, at the « Stern » Conservatory in Berlin under James Kwast and Hans Pfitzner. He followed Kwast to 3 institutions and credited him with the whole basis of his musical development. In 1905, he met Gustav Mahler while conducting the off-stage brass at a performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 2, the « Resurrection » . Klemperer also made a piano reduction of this work. The 2 men became friends, and Klemperer became conductor at the German Opera in Prague, in 1907, on Mahler's recommendation. Mahler wrote a short testimonial, recommending Klemperer, on a small card which Klemperer kept for the rest of his life. Later, in 1910, Klemperer assisted Mahler in the premiere of his Symphony No. 8, the « Symphony of a Thousand » .

Klemperer went on to hold a number of positions, in Hamburg (1910-1912) ; in Barmen (1912-1913) ; the Strasbourg Opera (1914-1917) ; the Cologne Opera (1917-1924) ; and the Wiesbaden Opera House (1924-1927) . From 1927 to 1931, he was conductor at the « Kroll » Opera, in Berlin. In this post, he enhanced his reputation as a champion of new music, playing a number of new works, including Leoš Janáček's « From the House of the Dead » , Arnold Schœnberg's « Erwartung » , Igor Stravinsky's « Œdipus rex » , and Paul Hindemith's « Cardillac » .

On March 22, 1920, his wife soprano Johanna Geisler gave birth to their son American actor Werner Klemperer.

In 1933, once the Nazi Party had reached power, Klemperer, who was Jewish, left Germany and moved to the United States. Klemperer had previously converted to Catholicism, but returned to Judaism at the end of his life. In the U.S. , he was appointed Music Director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic. He took the United States citizenship, in 1937. In Los Angeles, he began to concentrate more on the standard works of the Germanic repertoire that would later bring him greatest acclaim, particularly the works of Beethoven, Brahms Bruckner and Mahler, though he gave the Los Angeles premieres of some of fellow Los Angeles resident Arnold Schœnberg's works with the Philharmonic. He also visited other countries, including England and Australia. While the Orchestra responded well to his leadership, Klemperer had a difficult time adjusting to Southern California, a situation exacerbated by repeated manic-depressive episodes, reportedly as a result of severe cyclothymic bipolar disorder. He also found that the dominant musical culture and leading music-critics in the United States were largely out of sympathy with his Weimar modernism and he felt he was not properly valued.

Klemperer hoped for a permanent position as lead conductor in New York or Philadelphia. But, in 1936, he was passed over in both - 1st in Philadelphia, where Eugene Ormandy succeeded Leopold Stokowski at the Philadelphia Orchestra, and then in New York, where Arturo Toscanini's departure left a vacancy at the New York Philharmonic but John Barbirolli and Artur Rodziński were engaged in preference to Klemperer. The New York decision was particularly galling, as Klemperer had been engaged to conduct the 1st 14 weeks of the New York Philharmonic's 1935-1936 season. Klemperer's bitterness at this decision was voiced in a letter he wrote to Arthur Judson, who ran the Orchestra :

« That the Society did not re-engage me is the strongest offense, the sharpest insult to me as artist, which I can imagine. You see, I am no youngster. I have a name and a good name. One could not use me in a most difficult season and then expell me. This non re-engagement will have very bad results not only for me in New York but in the whole world. This non re-engagement is an absolutely unjustified wrong done to me by the Philharmonic Society. »

Then, after completing the 1939 Los Angeles Philharmonic summer season at the Hollywood Bowl, Klemperer was visiting Boston and was diagnosed with a brain tumor ; the subsequent brain surgery to remove « a tumour the size of a small orange » left him partially paralyzed. He went into a depressive state and was placed in institution ; when he escaped, « The New York Times » ran a cover story declaring him missing, and after being found in New Jersey, a picture of him behind bars was printed in the « Herald Tribune » . Though he would occasionally conduct the Philharmonic after that, he lost the post of Music Director. Furthermore, his erratic behavior during manic episodes made him an undesirable guest to American Orchestras, and the late flowering of his career centered in other countries.

After World War II, Klemperer returned to Europe to work at the Budapest Opera (1947-1950) . Finding Communist rule in Hungary increasingly irksome, he became an itinerant conductor, guest conducting the Royal Danish Orchestra, the Montreal Symphony Orchestra, the Cologne Radio Symphony Orchestra, the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra, and the London « Philharmonia » .

In the early 1950's, Klemperer experienced difficulties arising from his U.S. citizenship. American Union policies made it difficult for him to record in Europe, while his left-wing views made him increasingly unpopular with the State Department and the FBI : in 1952, the United States refused to renew his passport. In 1954, Klemperer again returned to Europe, and acquired a German passport.

His career was turned around in 1954 by the London-based producer Walter Legge, who recorded Klemperer in Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner and much else with his « hand-picked » Orchestra, the « Philharmonia » , for the « EMI » label. He became the 1st principal conductor of the « Philharmonia » , in 1959. He settled in Switzerland. Klemperer also worked at the Royal Opera House Covent Garden, sometimes stage-directing as well as conducting, as in a 1963 production of Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » . He also conducted Mozart's « The Magic Flute » there, in 1962.

A severe fall at the Dorval airport during a visit to Montreal, in 1951, forced Klemperer subsequently to conduct seated in a chair. A severe burning accident further paralyzed him, which resulted from his smoking in bed and trying to douse the flames with the contents of a bottle of spirits of camphor nearby. Through Klemperer's problems with his health, the tireless and unwavering support and assistance of Klemperer's daughter Lotte was crucial to his success.

One of his last concert tours was to Jerusalem, a couple of years after the « 6 Day War » , at which time he was awarded an Israeli honorary passport. Klemperer had performed in Palestine before the State of Israel declared its independence, and returned to Jerusalem only in 1970 to conduct the Israeli Broadcasting Authority Symphonic Orchestra in 2 concerts, performing the 6 Brandenburg Concerti of Bach, and Mozart's Symphonies Nos. 39, 40 and 41. During this tour, he took Israeli citizenship. He retired from conducting in 1971.

Otto Klemperer died in Zürich, Switzerland, in 1973, aged 88, and was buried in Zürich's « Israelitischer Friedhof-Oberer Friesenberg ». In his later years, he had become increasingly worried about the influence of Jewish fundamentalism in Israel, and about Israel's foreign policies.

Klemperer was an Honorary Member (HonRAM) of the Royal Academy of Music.

His son, Werner Klemperer, was an actor and became known for his portrayal of Colonel Klink on the American television show « Hogan's Heroes » .

The diarist Victor Klemperer was a cousin ; so were Georg Klemperer and Felix Klemperer, who were famous physicians.

Otto Klemperer's father was a businessman and his mother a piano teacher. When he was 4 years old, the family moved to Hamburg, where he was educated at the « Realgymnasium des Johanneum », subsequently entering the Hoch Conservatory at Frankfurt, in 1901, to study piano with James Kwast and music theory with Iwan Knorr. When Kwast moved to Berlin, during the following year, to teach at the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, Klemperer followed him, studying in addition composition and conducting with Hans Pfitzner. Klemperer directed the off-stage chorus in a performance of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 2 conducted by Oskar Fried, in 1905, at which the composer was present, and went on to make his professional debut, in 1906, substituting for Fried in Max Reinhardt's production of Jacques Offenbach's « Orphée aux enfers », which he conducted for 50 performances.

Having made a piano reduction of the Scherzo from Mahler's Symphony No. 2, Klemperer played this to the composer while on tour in Vienna. Mahler was sufficiently impressed to give him a written recommendation enabling him to obtain the post of chorus Master and conductor at the German Theatre in Prague, in 1907. While working in Prague, Klemperer visited Vienna to assist at the rehearsals of Mahler's later Symphonies and, with Mahler's support, he secured the position of 1st conductor at the Hamburg Opera, in 1910, where he remained until 1912. This was followed by appointments at Bremen (1913-1914) , and Strasbourg, where he assisted Pfitzner (1914-1917) ; he was subsequently appointed chief conductor at Cologne (1917-1924) and Wiesbaden (1924-1927) . After World War I, Klemperer was soon recognised as one of the leading conductors of his generation, developing a reputation for his interpretations of Bruckner and of contemporary music : while at Cologne, he conducted the 1st performances of Erich Wolfgang Korngold's « Die tote Stadt », Franz Schreker's « Irrelohe » and Alexander Zemlinsky's « Der Zwerg » as well as the 1st German performance of Leoš Janáček's « Kát'a Kabanová » . He began to receive many invitations to guest-conduct abroad, visiting Barcelona (1920) ; Rome (1923) ; Moscow (1924) ; Leningrad (1925) ; New York (1926) ; and London (1928) .

In 1923, Klemperer was approached to become chief conductor at the Berlin « Staatsoper », but declined on the grounds that the artistic freedom which he wanted might not be forthcoming. However, 4 years later, in 1927, he accepted the post of chief conductor at the newly-established « Kroll Oper », a division of the « Staatsoper » which was set-up in Berlin to perform new works and repertory Operas in original productions. Although this brave experiment lasted only 4 years, under Klemperer's leadership, it exerted a decisive influence upon the course of 20th Century Opera : works performed there included Paul Hindemith's « Cardillac » , Leoš Janáček's « From the House of the Dead » , Arnold Schönberg's « Erwartung » , Igor Stravinsky's « Œdipus Rex » , and Kurt Weill's « Der Jasager » ; while productions of established Operas, for instance that of Richard Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » , were to exert a strong influence upon young directors such as Wieland Wagner. Klemperer himself was active as a stage director as well as a conductor, creating productions of Mozart's « Don Giovanni » , Beethoven's « Fidelio » and Stravinsky's « Mavra » . Following the closure of the « Kroll » Opera House, in 1931, Klemperer conducted at the Berlin « Staatsoper » until 1933, when he emigrated to the United States.

Between 1933 and 1939, Otto Klemperer was chief conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra, appearing also with the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia Orchestras as well as assisting with major changes at the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, during 1937 and 1938. He was partially incapacitated, in 1939, when he underwent an operation for a brain tumour. This left him semi-paralysed, unable to hold a baton and conducting only infrequently. After the end of World War II, Klemperer returned to Europe, conducting as a guest in France, Italy, Sweden and Switzerland as well as in London, in 1948, appearing here for the 1st time with the Philharmonia Orchestra. Between 1947 and 1950, he was chief conductor at the Budapest Opera, but relinquished this post following political interference in Hungary and a successful tour of Australia in 1950.

During the early 1950's, Klemperer had made several highly-influential recordings for the « Vox » label which clearly demonstrated his stature as a conductor of the traditional repertoire and of the music of Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler, in particular, but the most significant event in his recording career came in 1954, when he signed a contract, negotiated by Walter Legge, to make recordings for « EMI » with the Philharmonia Orchestra : he was to be closely associated with this label and orchestra for the rest of his life (he also made a single recording for « EMI » with the Orchestre National de Radio-France) . Klemperer's « EMI » discography was very large and much of it has remained consistently in the catalogue.

Klemperer was appointed the Philharmonia Orchestra's « principal conductor for life » , in 1959 ; and when, following Walter Legge's decision to disband it, the Orchestra was re-organised as a players' co-operative, in 1964, under the name of the « New Philharmonia Orchestra » , he became its president. Klemperer made his debut at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden, in 1961, conducting and directing « Fidelio » . So great was his success that, after the final performance, the intendant of the Opera House, Sir David Webster, presented him with a laurel wreath with a note saying « You have conquered Covent Garden » which Klemperer carried with him for many years afterwards ; he returned there to conduct legendary productions of « Die Zauberflöte » (1962) and « Lohengrin » (1963) . Despite increasing frailty, not helped by a succession of accidents, Klemperer continued to conduct in public until 1971, often with the most minimal of gestures but with huge personal authority. His laconic sense of humour and international stature were both well epitomised by his comment towards the end of his life :

« I am the last of the Classical school ; when Bruno Walter died, I put my fees up. »

Following his death, his large recorded legacy has resulted in his reputation remaining secure within the pantheon of truly great 20th Century conductors.

As an interpreter, Klemperer was less interested in beauty of sound than in forceful projection, clarity of texture, and a cumulative power that stemmed from an unwavering sense of rhythm. His feeling for musical form and architecture was complete, while his conducting style was noticeably unflamboyant. These characteristics gave his readings of the music of composers such as Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner an epic quality that during Klemperer's lifetime defined for many people the essential character of these composers. In the evocative words of the American critic, Joseph Horowitz :

« Klemperer's most characteristic performances, rigorously projecting outward design, amassed a magisterial poise and weight. »

His interpretations of the music of Gustav Mahler were completely without sentiment, in stark contrast at times to those of another distinguished Mahler assistant, Bruno Walter, raising the interesting question of whether there might be any authentic Mahler « style » of performance.

Klemperer recorded largely out of economic necessity and a marked difference exists between his commercial recordings and recordings of his live performances. Nonetheless, many of his studio recordings are of the 1st rank. Outstanding among them are his 1st monophonic recordings of Beethoven's Symphonies Nos. 3, 5 and 7, made in 1954 ; the 4 Brahms Symphonies ; Bruckner's Symphonies Nos. 4, 6 and 7 ; Mahler's Symphony No. 2 and song-cycle « Das Lied von der Erde » , to name just a few. His powerful readings of Stravinsky's « Symphony in 3 Movements » and of Weill's « Kleine Dreigroschenmusik » , which he commissioned, give some indication of the character of his « Kroll » Opera interpretations. While Klemperer's studio recordings of Operas have considerable power, recordings of contemporaneous live performances, such as those of « Fidelio » and « Der fliegende Holländer » , have greater character and cumulative dramatic impact, as have certain Symphonic performances, notably his apocalyptic reading of Mahler's Symphony No. 2 from the Holland Festival of 1951 with Kathleen Ferrier. Klemperer was also an intermittent composer and his recordings of his Symphony No. 2 and the « Merry Waltz » from his Opera « Das Ziel » reveal, as did his conducting, a musician of great character and individuality.

Otto Klemperer (1885-1973) was a multi-faceted conductor, a Master at interpreting Opera, the « avant-garde » , and the Classic German repertoire. Those musicians who performed under his baton recall his sternness and indomitable spirit, which enabled him to overcome personal and historical challenges.

Otto Klemperer was born on May 14, 1885, in what was then the Silesian city of Breslau during a period when the area was ruled by the Germans. Following the defeat of Nazi Germany, in 1945, Poland received parts of Silesia, including the city of Breslau, whose name has since been changed to Wrocław. Like his birthplace, Klemperer would also be cast adrift by the tides of history.

Klemperer's musical studies brought him 1st to Frankfurt, where he studied at the « Hochschule für Musik », then at the Stern Conservatory in Berlin, where he was a student of the Russian-German composer, Hans Pfitzner. In 1905, he caught the eye of Gustav Mahler and became his « protégé ». 2 years later, Mahler recommended the young Klemperer for the 3rd conductor position at the German National Theatre, in Prague. In 1909, it was again through Mahler's influence that Klemperer received a position as 2nd conductor in Hamburg. In essence, these 2 men (Pfitzner and Mahler) represent the 2 great strains of music that were synthesized by Klemperer. Pfitzner represented the conservative, Romantic and Germanic element, which embodied Klemperer's solid musicianship and his choice of work. Mahler inculcated the young man with the « avant-garde ». When refracted through the prism of Klemperer's Romantic character, this contributed to his unique style. A 3rd influence on Klemperer, although not a direct one, was the 19th Century conductor, Hans von Bülow, who had taught at the Stern Conservatory.

Of Klemperer's indebtedness to von Bülow's technique, David Ewen wrote (in : « The Man with the Baton ») :

« Both Bruno Walter (another “ protégé ” of Mahler and rival of Klemperer) and Otto Klemperer were nurtured and raised upon the traditions of conducting created by Hans von Bülow - and their strength and weakness as conductors are to a great degree those of the school they represent. Like their predecessor, Hans von Bülow, both Walter and Klemperer look upon a musical Masterpiece as a plastic organism which the conductor can shape at his own discretion. Liberty with tempi, with a preponderance of rubato, exaggeration of dynamics, reconstruction of the melodic phrase are occasional intruders into the performances of Klemperer and Walter. »

Yet, Ewen, like many music-critics, did not find these so-called faults insurmountable when appraising Klemperer. He noted the conductor's ability to « feel the heart beat of most works » he conducted. All of these musical influences, were, perhaps, manifestations of something deeper within Klemperer's psyche : he suffered from bipolar disorder, which grew worse over time.

Klemperer's early reputation was made conducting Opera. He moved to Strasbourg, in 1914, at Hans Pfitzner's invitation, where he was appointed 1st conductor and musical director of the Opera House and a professor and the director of the Conservatory, there. In 1916, Klemperer became Strasbourg's general music-director. The next year, he moved to Cologne, whose « avant-garde » tastes suited his own and where, as 1st conductor, he expanded his reputation. Klemperer remained in Cologne for 7 years, leaving to accept an appointment as general musical director in Wiesbaden.

3 years later, in 1927, Klemperer was appointed general musical director of the « Kroll Oper », in Berlin. He served in that capacity until 1931, the year the company went-out of existence. Klemperer also founded the Berlin Philharmonic Choir. His experience at the « Kroll » was legendary and markedly different than his later work, in the United States and Great Britain. This was the heyday of the Weimar Republic. Culturally, Berlin was at its notorious « between the wars » zenith. Under Klemperer, the « Kroll » became one of the most renowned experimental companies in the world. The list of composers whose works were performed reads like a who's who of European modernism : Arnold Schönberg (given a double-bill) ; Igor Stravinsky (a triple-bill) ; Paul Hindemith ; and Kurt Weill, among others.

Klemperer also gave « all-Bach » concerts and, sometimes, mixed Bach with contemporaries such as Hindemith and Weill.

The « Kroll » 's experimentalism scandalized even Weimar Berlin. The company was attacked from both the left (which was ironic because its artistic mission was a socialist connection of art with the workers) and from the right, where the Nazis were gaining strength and becoming bolder with each passing year. Finally, the pressure proved too great and the « Kroll » closed down, in 1931. In « The Mæstro Myth », Norman Lebrecht quotes Klemperer as saying :

« I didn't want an “ avant-garde ” Opera, I just wanted to make good theatre ; just that and nothing else. »

Klemperer remained in the increasingly antagonistic atmosphere of Berlin until the month after Adolf Hitler was named Chancellor of Germany, in 1933. After leaving the « Kroll », he took the position of 2nd conductor at the « Berlin Staatsoper » (Berlin State Opera) . Being a Jewish musician (albeit one who had converted to Christianity) , and a controversial one at that, Klemperer foresaw difficulties with the Nazi regime. Yet, before leaving Germany, he did make a few attempts to appease the government. As John Rockwell points-out in his 1984 « New York Times » review of the 1st volume of Peter Heyworth's 2-volume biography of « Klemperer, the conductor » :

« The man wrote prose poems in praise of the “ New Order ” and even suggested the formation of a Jewish Palatine guard to protect Hitler. »

Both suggestions most likely demonstrated evidence of Klemperer's bipolar disorder. When the « Gestapo » began arresting opponents of the Nazi government, Klemperer fled to Switzerland and eventually made his way to the United States.

In many respects, Klemperer's sojourn in America was the nadir of his life and career. Depression (possibly made worse by unfamiliar surroundings and culture) continued to plague him, and he found the respect that he had garnered in Europe had all but vanished in the New World. He settled almost immediately in Los Angeles, where a thriving community of intellectual refugees had made their homes. This was a city where « serious music » was nothing more than a backdrop to cinema. Klemperer was fortunate enough to be given the opportunity to conduct the Los Angeles Philharmonic, after the departure of Artur Rodzinski for Cleveland.

In addition to his duties at the Los Angeles Philharmonic, Klemperer was a guest-conductor for the New York Philharmonic during the 1934-1935 and 1935-1936 seasons. In 1937, he spent 6 weeks re-organizing the Pittsburgh Symphony. However, his behavior outside the concert-hall became more erratic and the ensuing publicity he received damaged his reputation in the United States. His tenure at the Los Angeles Philharmonic lasted until 1939. Just before the start of the 1939-1940 season, Klemperer was diagnosed with a brain tumor. The surgery and the stroke he suffered afterward ended his career in Los Angeles. Bruno Walter took-over the baton.

The stroke left Klemperer partially paralyzed. Conducting was out of the question. It could only have deepened the torment he experienced during bouts with the depressive phase of his illness. The remainder of his stay in America was a long slide into obscurity. Ironically, as he went about the task of rehabilitating his body (Klemperer, at 6 feet 4 inches had the physical strength to match his will) , rumors of insanity persistently followed him. By the time he was able to again take-up conducting, he was left to promote his own concerts, including one at Carnegie Hall. During the war years, he received little work.

In 1947, Klemperer returned to Europe, 1st to Prague, the location of his 1st conducting post, then on to Budapest for the 1948-1949 and 1949-1950 seasons. He began making recordings during these years. After leaving Budapest, Klemperer moved on to East-Berlin, where he conducted Opera until government interference became too great. Klemperer thereupon returned to the United States, but his woes returned. This was the beginning of the Cold War and Klemperer had spent most of the post-War period in the Eastern Bloc. His passport was confiscated and he found himself under scrutiny by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) . He was rescued from this latest debacle by British record producer, Walter Legge.

Legge scoured Europe and North America during the post-War years in search of the finest available talent - musicians and conductors not already under contract. Klemperer's career was in limbo when Legge offered him a conductor position with the London « Philharmonia » . It proved to be the renaissance of his career.

At that time, London was filled with refugees eager to hear the Classic German repertoire, which Klemperer brought to the « Philharmonia » . The recordings he made with the « Philharmonia » received international praise. Beginning as a guest-conductor, Klemperer was appointed musical director, by 1955. In 1959, he was named the « Philharmonia » 's « principal conductor for life » . It was during this final stage of his career (which lasted until 1972) that the recognizable figure of Klemperer as an indomitable, deliberate, acid-tongued personality gained acceptance among the general public. He was never very tactful, reserving some of his sharpest barbs for colleagues such as Wilhelm Furtwängler, whose work he admired but whose collaboration with the Nazi government he could not abide. The antagonism that Klemperer felt toward Furtwängler, however, was nothing compared to that which he felt toward Herbert von Karajan, who had actually joined the Nazi Party. By the time the War had ended, Klemperer had re-embraced Judaism and someone like Karajan was not merely a rival, but anathema to him.

In these final years, Klemperer made the recordings upon which his posthumous reputation rests. The pace of many of these recordings is slow, critics have conceded, yet, they confirm him as the Master of the German repertoire : Mozart, Beethoven, and Bach. Listening to them, one might never realize that Klemperer had been a harbinger of European modernism in the 1920's and early 1930's. However, he retained a love for contemporary music throughout his life. Almost belying the Classics is his later interest in the work of Karlheinz Stockhausen and Pierre Boulez.

Klemperer was also a composer though, in this area, he did not meet with very much success ; his compositions are seldom, if ever, performed. His total output was 6 Symphonies, 9 String Quartets, and 1 Opera. Klemperer died on July 6, 1973, in Zürich, Switzerland. He was 88 years old.

German conductor Otto Klemperer attended the « Hoch Konservatorium » in Frankfurt-am-Main, studied violin and piano at the « Klindworth-Scharwenka » and « Stern » Conservatories in Berlin, and composition with the German composer Hans Pfitzner. He made his debut in Berlin, in 1905, where he conducted 50 performances of Jacques Offenbach's « Orpheus in the Underworld » , not a work that would now be identified with Klemperer's serious and profoundly personal approach to music.

Shortly afterwards, he visited Gustav Mahler in Vienna and impressed the composer by playing a Scherzo from a Mahler Symphony by memory at the piano. With Mahler's personal recommendation, Klemperer was appointed choir Master and conductor at the German Opera, in Prague. He held this post for 3 years, during which he returned to Vienna to assist in rehearsals for Mahler's later Symphonies. Again with Mahler's help, he became conductor at the Hamburg Opera in 1910. There followed a succession of appointments in Barmen (1913) , Strasbourg (1914-1916) , Cologne (1916-1924) and Wiesbaden (1924-1927) and visits to Barcelona, Rome, the U.S.S.R. , and the U.S. between 1920 and 1936.

In 1927, he was engaged as director of the « Kroll » Opera House in Berlin, where he remained until 1931 when political pressures and financial difficulties forced its closure. In addition to better-known Operas, Klemperer introduced new works which ran counter to the Nazis' idealized view of German culture, such as Arnold Schœnberg's « Die glückliche Hand » and « Erwartung » ; Paul Hindemith's 2 operas, « Cardillac » and « Neues von Tag » ; and Leoš Janáček's « From the House of the Dead » . Indeed, Klemperer was then noted more for his interest in contemporary music than for his interpretations of the mainstream Classical and Romantic repertory on which, in later life, he concentrated almost entirely.

After a highly-successful series of London concerts in 1929, Klemperer returned to Germany in 1931 to conduct the Berlin State Opera. As a Jew, he was in danger of persecution and, though honoured with a Gold Medal for his « outstanding contribution to German culture » , a German newspaper of the time sourly commented « his whole outlook ran counter to German thought and feeling » .

Klemperer was dismissed in 1933 and fled with his family 1st to Austria and later to Switzerland. While there, he was appointed conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra and lived in California from 1935 to 1939 during which he also conducted the New York Philharmonic and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. In 1937, he helped to re-organize the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra, though refused to become its conductor.

Following a brain tumor that left him partially paralyzed, his career faltered. In 1940, Klemperer became a U.S. citizen, but his sufferings were increased by a manic depressive state characterized by recurring cycles of exhilaration and depression. In 1951, an accident at the Montreal Dorval airport forced Klemperer to conduct from a chair. To prove himself competent, he hired an Orchestra to perform a concert of works of his own choice at Carnegie Hall. It was a success but, after an argument with American immigration authorities, Klemperer returned to Europe where he continued conducting in Italy, Sweden, Switzerland, and France.

The peak of Klemperer's career came in 1959 with the « Philharmonia Orchestra » , based in London. When attempts were made to disband the Orchestra in 1964, its members appointed him president, and the Orchestra was reconstituted. As the « New Philharmonia », the group reached new heights in the Beethoven cycles during the early 1960's. In the same period, he conducted at Covent Garden Opera House.

Born of Jewish parentage in Breslau (now Wrocław, in Poland) , Otto Klemperer grew-up in Hamburg, where he studied piano. In 1901, he began formal training, 1st at Frankfurt's « Hoch » Conservatory and then, during 1902-1905, in Berlin. Engaged at the last moment in 1906, he made his debut at the « Neues Theater » for Max Reinhardt's production of Jacques Offenbach's « Orpheus in the Underworld » . On Gustav Mahler's recommendation, he became chorus Master in 1907 and later conductor of the German State Theatre, in Prague. He worked with the Hamburg Opera in 1910-1912 and was chorus Master in Barmen and Straßburg (1914-1917) . He was music-director of the Cologne Opera for 7 years and filled the same post in Wiesbaden during 1924-1927. Out of genuine conviction, he converted to Catholicism while in Cologne.

Despite a manic-depressive disorder that often strained his relationship with supporters, Klemperer emerged as one of Germany's leading conductors. Because of his sympathy for modern music, he declined the post of music-director at Berlin's conservative « Staatsoper » in 1923. But when Carl Becker, Prussia's Cultural Minister, created a branch of the « Staatsoper » to perform new and recent works, Klemperer's selection as director was natural. In 1927, he began his celebrated years as music-director of the « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » , commonly known as the « Kroll Oper » . Although he performed such contemporaries as Paul Hindemith, Igor Stravinsky, and Arnold Schönberg, his renditions of Mozart Operas were famous.

By emulating the Republic, the « Kroll » Opera was soon drawn into the controversies that destroyed the regime. Economic problems and pressure from the Right induced the Opera's closure in July 1931 after only 4 seasons. When Klemperer conducted « Tannhäuser » on 13 February 1933 at the « Staatsoper » , a performance commemorating the 50th anniversary of Richard Wagner's death, it was his last appearance in Germany until after World War II. Although he naively believed that racial persecution in Nazi Germany could be ended by baptizing all the Jews, he emigrated in April 1933 and eventually became conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra.

The Early Years (1885-1907)

Otto Nossan Klemperer was born on May 14, 1885, in the town then known as Breslau, Germany (now Wrocław, in Poland) , the 2nd child and only son of Ida and Nathan Klemperer. (Family trees : Nathan, Ida)

Both parents were musicians. Nathan, endowed with a rich baritone voice, impressive appearance, and intimate acquaintance with the German Lieder repertoire, seemed destined for the concert stage. But, as the younger son of a school-teacher, Abraham, who could only afford to educate his eldest son*, it was as tradesman, not musician, that Nathan earned his livelihood. From his home-town Prague, « the Second Vienna » , he headed west to the trade center Breslau to make his living, where he and his brother Hermann manufactured and sold toys.

Ida was a pianist of breathtaking ability. « She played with such overwhelming fire. » , wrote a young violinist of her performance of a Beethoven Piano Sonata, « that, at moments, she really made me forget my own playing and listen to her interpretation » . In her case, unlike Nathan's, it was not lack of family finances that thwarted any hopes of a professional career. Hamburg had prospered from its status as a major European port ; her own family's fortunes had also flourished. Rather, her gender and station rendered performing for a living unthinkable.

It was at a toy convention, in 1881, when both were in their mid-30's that they finally met, where Nathan was a prize-winning exhibitor and Ida an out-of-towner being shown Breslau's attractions by her sister. Although of diverse backgrounds and temperaments - Ida was as highly-disciplined and as uncompromising in her moral standards as Nathan was congenial and « laissez-faire » - their shared love of music drew them together. That evening, Ida accompanied Nathan in some Schubert Songs. 3 days later, they were married.

They settled in at « Kaiser Wilhelm-Straße » (now, Ul. Powstanców Slakich 3) and had 2 children, in addition to Otto : Regina (« Regi ») , born August 1883 and Marianne, born February 1889.

In October 1889, the family moved to « Bogenstraße » , in western Hamburg, to be near Ida's well-to-do relatives. « In Hamburg, the 1st thing I saw from the train were the round pillars with concert and theatre advertisements » , recalled Klemperer. « They fascinated me, and what a role they have played in my life ! »

Although never financially well-off (Nathan's passions were music and theatre, not business) , the household was rich in other ways. Ida composed music, gave piano lessons, taught her children, and accompanied her husband in songs by Schubert, Löwe, Schumann, and Brahms. Nathan recited Schiller and Gøethe, and staged in-house theatrical performances, in which the children and their friends participated. Visits to the theatre, concerts, and later, the Opera were part of the family routine.

He was especially impressed by the Hamburg premiere of Richard Strauß's « Tod und Verklärung » . « That impressed me tremendously ; the sound of the Orchestra, the whole build-up - I found it wonderful. »

Otto attended the Hamburg « Stiftungsschule » which, under the forward-looking head-Mastership of Otto's relative, Anton Rée, broke with tradition and offered a free education to children of all faiths. He later attended the « Johanneum » . For a gifted student with a culturally-rich home environment like Otto, school held little interest. Only the history courses held his attention. But the walk home provided a unexpected encounter with musical greatness. As he later recounted :

« One day, as I was walking home from school, I saw an odd-looking man beside me. He was holding his hat in his hand and seemed unable to walk properly. He had a jerky gait, halted abruptly from time to time, and appeared to have a club-foot. Regarding him with inordinate curiosity, I told myself :“ That's ' Kapellmeister ' Mahler from the Municipal Theatre ”. » (« Minor Recollections » , Dennis Dobson, London, 1964 ; pages 11-12.)

As to young Otto's early musical instruction, Peter Hayworth relates :

« From quite early, it was decided that Otto should also be a musician. At the age of about 5, his mother started giving him piano lessons and, within a year or so, he could play, as he later put it, “ quite nicely ”. Before long, he was able to share in the musical activities of the household, performing Haydn Symphonies in reductions for 4 hands with his mother and even joining in occasional chamber music. His greatest pleasure, however, was to put a book of poems on the piano and improvise on the ideas that these conjured-up in his mind. » (« Otto Klemperer : His Life and Times » , Volume I : 1885-1933, Cambridge University Press, 1983, page 10.)

By the age of 7 or 8, while standing behind a clarinetist who was performing with a military band at the Zoological Gardens, his perfect pitch and his sight-reading skills enabled him to observe a discrepancy between the notes the man was playing and those notated in his music. Only later, did he discover that the musician was indeed playing a type of clarinet which produced sounds a tone lower than what was written.

At the age of 10 or so, he began studying under Hans Havekoß, under whose instruction he « quickly mastered much of the keyboard literature from Bach to Schumann » . When the 10 year old Otto served as piano accompanist to his father, who sang for the other guests at the hotel where they were staying during a holiday, in the Holstein lakes region, both were assumed to be professionals hired for the purpose.

By the age of 15, his talents were impressive enough to win over the 2 individuals whose opinion mattered most : the musical authority his parents consulted to discover if he had the makings of a great musician, and his mother's cousin Hélène Rée, the patroness of struggling Hamburg talent who volunteered to finance his education and whose generosity he never forgot.

It was decided that an ordinary education would not suffice for so extraordinary a young man. His regular schooling was ended. At 16, after rigorous examination, he was sent to study under the highly-esteemed pianist and professor James Kwast at one of the leading institutes of its kind in Germany, the « Hoch » Conservatory in Frankfurt.

At the « Hoch » Conservatory, in Frankfurt am Main, Otto Klemperer received instruction in theory and composition from Ivan Knorr, and in piano from James Kwast. « To Kwast and Knorr, I owe the whole basis of my musical development » , stated Klemperer. The teenaged Klemperer soon established himself as a pianist of note, performing Beethoven's Sonata in D major in a Conservatory concert and serving as accompanist to the celebrated baritone Julius Stockhausen.

After only 1 year in Frankfurt, Klemperer was off to Berlin. When James Kwast left, in 1902, for the « Klindworth-Scharwenka » Conservatory on the « Potsdamerstraße » , Klemperer followed - a pattern which was repeated in 1905 when Kwast transferred to the Stern Conservatory, also in Berlin.

In Berlin, Klemperer was pronounced a spell-binding pianist who was destined for the concert stage. He also found himself much sought-after as an accompanist, touring with the celebrated Dutch cellist Jacques van Lier and rehearsing the singers of the Stern « Gesangsverein » under the conductorship of Oskar Fried. It was Fried who would introduce Klemperer to opportunities which would steer his career in an unforeseen direction.

In 1905, Fried called upon Klemperer to conduct the off-stage Orchestra in the 1st successful production of Gustav Mahler's 2nd Symphony. Mahler was pleased with the results. A few months later, in 1906, Klemperer was thrust into the position of principal conductor. He'd joined Max Rheinhardt's production of « Orpheus in the Underworld », as chorus Master, again under Fried. When Fried refused to conduct the 3rd performance because of an argument with one of the leads, Rheinhardt asked Klemperer to take-over. The 21 year old student took the podium, which he retained until the end of the season, 50 performances later.

While in Vienna, in 1907, for a performance with cellist Jacques van Lier, Klemperer sought Mahler's help in launching a conducting career. Impressed by Klemperer's piano reduction of his 2nd Symphony, which Klemperer performed for him from memory, as well as by what he had already seen of Klemperer's conducting ability, Mahler wrote-out the following recommendation :

« Gustav Mahler recommends “ Herr ” Klemperer as an outstanding musician who, despite his youth, is already experienced and is predestined for the career of conductor. He vouches for the successful outcome of a probationary appointment and is willing personally to provide further information.. »

The recommendation would soon prove invaluable. Klemperer attended the annual Festival of the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein », in hopes of discovering news of a job opening in this gathering of music professionals. He made such a discovery - but not in the concert halls. At lunch, one day, he found himself seated near 2 men from the German Theatre, in Prague, who were discussing their need for a junior conductor. When he presented himself and Mahler's card, he was sent, at once, to report to the Theatre's director, who hired him on the spot.

Hans von Bülow and Otto Klemperer

A (3rd) influence on Otto Klemperer's artistic development, although not a direct one, was the 19th Century conductor, Hans von Bülow, who had taught at the Stern Conservatory. Of Klemperer's indebtedness to von Bülow's technique, David Ewen wrote (in « The Man with the Baton ») :

« Both Bruno Walter (another “ protégé ” of Gustav Mahler, and rival of Klemperer) and Otto Klemperer were nurtured and raised upon the traditions of conducting created by Hans von Bülow - and their strength and weakness as conductors are to a great degree those of the school they represent. Like their predecessor Hans von Bülow, both Walter and Klemperer look upon a musical Masterpiece as a plastic organism which the conductor can shape at his own discretion. Liberty with tempi, with a preponderance of rubato, exaggeration of dynamics, reconstruction of the melodic phrase are occasional intruders into the performances of Klemperer and Walter. »

Yet, Ewen, like many music-critics, did not find these so-called faults insurmountable when appraising Klemperer. He noted the conductor's ability to feel the heart beat of most works he conducted. All of these musical influences were, perhaps, manifestations of something deeper within Klemperer's psyche : he suffered from bi-polar disorder, which grew worse over time.

Klemperer's early reputation was made conducting Opera. He moved to Strasbourg, in 1914, at Hans Pfitzner's invitation, where he was appointed 1st conductor and musical director of the Opera House and a professor and the director of the Conservatory, there. In 1916, Klemperer became Strasbourg's general music-director. The next year, he moved to Cologne, whose avant-garde tastes suited his own and where, as 1st conductor, he expanded his reputation. Klemperer remained in Cologne for 7 years, leaving to accept an appointment as general musical director in Wiesbaden.

Ernst Bloch's friendship with Otto Klemperer

Although their personal acquaintance did not begin until they were introduced to each other by Wilhelm Furtwängler, in Berlin, in the early 1920's, Otto Klemperer had read and been enthralled by the manuscript of « Geist der Utopie » , as early as 1916 (thanks to his friend and Bloch's former teacher Georg Simmel) . At that stage, the manuscript probably still lacked its apostrophes to Karl Marx. By 1924, and the 1st publication of the essay « On the Mathematical and the Dialectical Character of Music » , Ernst Bloch had evolved his idiosyncratic version of Marxism, and Klemperer was joyfully fulfilling the 1st of his major conducting engagements in the Soviet Union. The revolutionary production of Beethoven's « Fidelio » with which Klemperer opened his « Kroll Oper » , in September 1927, was influenced by his theatre-going in Moscow ; and it was surely he who was responsible for commissioning from Bloch the introductory essay in the programme book. Later that season, Bloch likewise introduced Klemperer's production of Mozart's « Don Giovanni » .

At the Baden-Baden Festival of German Chamber Music, in May 1927, Otto Klemperer (who was accompanied by his future « Dramaturg » at the « Kroll » , Hans Curjel) had been enraptured by Kurt Weill's « Mahagonny, a Songspiel » or scenic cantata to texts by Bertolt Brecht. Bloch was not present at that occasion, but Weill attended the premiere of « Fidelio » , together with his wife, Lotte Lenya, and their friendship with Bloch was consolidated during the following year, after the epoch-making premiere of « The Threepenny Opera » at the « Theater am Schiff-bauerdamm » , in August. October saw the « Kroll » premiere of Igor Stravinsky's « The Soldier's Tale » (« l'Histoire du Soldat ») , directed by Bertolt Brecht's close friend, Jacob Geis, designed by Piscator's discovery, Traugott Müller, and conducted by Otto Klemperer. Bloch's notes on « The Soldier's Tale » and on « Œdipus Rex » (rescued from the previous season's Stravinsky programme) were the basis of his important later essay, « Zeitecho Stravinskij » .

Klemperer's admiration for « The Threepenny Opera » led to the commissioning of the Suite, « Kleine Dreigroschenoper » , which he 1st conducted, in January 1929, at one of the « Kroll Oper » concerts ; Bloch's similar enthusiasm led to his marvellous essay on the « Pirate-Jenny' Song » , which he dedicated to Kurt Weill and Lotte Lenya, and published in January 1929. That same month, Klemperer conducted Jürgen Fehling's radically new production of Richard Wagner « The Flying Dutchman » . No small element in the uproar created by that production in nationalist and proto-Nazi circles was Bloch's introductory and style-defining essay « Rettung Wagners durch Karl May » (Rescue of Wagner through Karl May) , which was included in the 1974 anthology under the later title « Rettung Wagners durch surrealistische Kolportage » (Rescue of Wagner through Surrealistic Penny Dreadfuls) . Bayreuth, it seemed, was about to be stormed by « Peachum » and his beggars.

From « The Threepenny Opera » to « The Flying Dutchman » would, for most musical travellers of the day, have been an inordinately long and dangerous journey ; for Bloch, it was surely no more demanding than the one that had taken him, on numberless youthful occasions, from his family home in the industrial port of « Ludwigshafen » to the old Palatinate capital of Mannheim, on the opposite side of the Rhine. The fairgrounds and circuses and amusement arcades of plebeian « Ludwigshafen » offered the young Bloch delights far removed from the patrician theatres and libraries of Schiller's Mannheim. In music, as in the other arts, his questionable taste was a vital part of his own questioning of taste and the hierarchies it stood for : but it was equally a part of his quest for the Utopian spirit, in whatever guise it might appear. There was no condescension about his tributes to those forms of popular art and Kitsch that reflected a universal truth. The chapter in « Das Prinzip Hoffnung » concerning fairs and circuses, fairy-tales and penny dreadfuls, is entitled « Bessere Luftschlösser » (Better Castles in the Air) .

Bloch's passion for aerial and low-life excursions was one of his many bonds with Walter Benjamin, the outstanding critical mind among his younger German contemporaries and, like Klemperer, an early admirer of « Geist der Utopie » . It was surely thanks to Bloch and his essay on Jacques Offenbach's « Tales of Hoffmann » (written for the 1930 « Kroll Oper » production by Bertolt Brecht's friend and colleague, Ernst Legal) that Benjamin, whose genius was either unresponsive to music or else (in some sense that he never defined) intimidated by it, ventured his only essay on a musical subject - the Offenbach section of his great Karl Kraus study, first published in the programme book for the 1931 « Kroll » production of l'Opéra-bouffe « la Périchole » , in the Kraus version.

The closure of the « Kroll » , at the end of the 1930-1931 season, was rightly seen to be representative of a reactionary trend evident at all levels of German culture and society. For Bloch and Benjamin, as for Brecht, there was no hope of reversing the trend unless Marxist theory was put into action, which meant collective and Party action. The possible consequences of that for intellectuals who were unwilling or unready to repudiate their heritage of bourgeois individualism and morality had already been examined in Brecht's first indisputable Masterpiece for the theatre, « Die Massnahme » (The Measures Taken) , a « Lehrstück » set to music by Hanns Eisler, and first performed in Berlin, in the autumn of 1930, under the baton of Karl Rankl (Klemperer's chorus Master at the « Kroll ») . Functionally ambiguous as it is, « Die Massnahme » examines Leninist theory and practice in terms that cut straight across the two currents in Marxism characterized by Bloch as cold stream and warm stream. The fact that the measures taken are in principle consistent with the new morality of revolution propounded by Lukacs in the post- 1918 era has a direct and curious bearing on the debates with Lukacs in which Bloch, Brecht, and Eisler were engaged during the 1930's. But « Die Massnahme » itself does not figure in Bloch's writings, and is not even mentioned in his 1938 essay on Bertolt Brecht, « Ein Leninist der Schaubühne » , or its important predecessor, « Romane der Wunderlichkeit und montiertes Theater » , which proceeds from Kafka through Proust and Joyce to the Leninist Brecht.

« Die Massnahme » happened to introduce (and, today, throws an inquisitorial light upon) an era in which most of the measures taken were strictly reactionary. The closure of the « Kroll » was representative in that a plausible case could be made for it, in terms understandable to all. Its effect on the flow of Bloch's musical writings was immediate : the only musical essay Bloch was to publish during the 2 years that remained to him, in Germany, dealt with an Opera that Klemperer had taken a close personal interest in - Kurt Weill's « Die Bürgschaft » .

Otto Klemperer and 1933

1933 was not only the year of the Nazi rise to power ; it was also an auspicious year for German musical history. On 13 February 1883, exactly 50 years earlier, that most Germanic of composers, Richard Wagner, had died. As an anti-Semite and nationalist convinced of the supremacy of the Germanic race, Wagner was beloved by the Nazis, and Bayreuth had become an important cultural icon. Just weeks after Hitler came to power, however, on 13 February 1933, one of the leading conductors of Germany, the Jewish Otto Klemperer, gave a performance of Wagner's Opera « Tannhäuser » . The performance was met with outrage, and decried as an insult to the memory of the composer. Years later, one official insisted that it is particularly significant that, as late as 13 February 1933, and after the National-Socialist seizure of power, the Jewish general music director Klemperer had the impudence, on the occasion of the 50th anniversary of Wagner's death, to mount a production of « Tannhäuser » , at the Berlin State Opera, that ranked as a deliberate insult to the great German Master and an affront to all people with decent feelings.

The incident and its repercussions served to hasten Klemperer's departure from Germany, on in April 1933. Since the early days of his career, Klemperer had made a name for himself as a champion of the modernist cause of Stravinsky, Schönberg, and Hindemith. Under his direction, in the late-1920's, the « Kroll Oper » in Berlin became a target of hatred for the increasingly reactionary voices of late Weimar, condemned as a centre of cultural bolshevism. Although himself avowedly apolitical, Otto Klemperer had conducted frequently in the Soviet Union, and his early conversion to Catholicism had little meaning for a race-based ideology like that of Nazi anti-Semitism.

Klemperer was born on 14 May 1885 in Breslau. Although the boy Ist wanted to be an actor rather than a musician, the aid of a wealthy family member allowed him to pursue a musical education. With the support of his parents, he dropped-out of secondary school to study music in Frankfurt, several years later moving to Berlin, to continue his studies at the Conservatory. In 1905, he began a period of study with Hans Pfitzner. At the beginning of the War, in 1914, he received his 1st big break as the temporary replacement for Pfitzner as the Opera director for the city of Strasbourg. By the end of the War, with the defeat of Germany and the drama of the November Revolution, Klemperer, increasingly radicalised, had become a faithful supporter of the new Weimar Republic. He moved to Cologne, and formally converted to Catholicism, in 1919. In the mid- 1920's, he returned to Berlin, a centre of musical innovation in Weimar Germany. It was there that he held probably his most significant post, as conductor of the « Kroll Oper » , where he was a vocal advocate of composers like Ernst Křenek, Kurt Weill and Arnold Schönberg. However, the increasingly conservative atmosphere of Germany, along with the severe economic depression, claimed him as an early victim, and he lost his position at the « Kroll » , in 1931. Instead, he was offered a position working at the Prussian State Opera, where he was conducting when Adolf Hitler came to power.

Despite the response to his production of « Tannhäuser », in early 1933, Klemperer initially did not want to leave Germany, and hoped that his fame and apolitical stance would protect him. In April 1933, however, he fled to Austria, leaving his wife and children behind to follow, when he had secured a permanent residence. Unlike many of his fellow German-Jewish refugees, Klemperer was to establish a successful musical career in exile. Upon arrival in the United States, where he had already toured successfully in the 1920's, he was offered the position of musical director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra. In 1939, he underwent an operation for a brain tumour, which left him with facial paralysis and worsened his emotional problems. He was so incapacitated that he ceased to conduct for several years. After the War, however, he was to resume an impressive international musical career. He became known as one of the best living conductors of the Classical German repertoire, particularly of works of the Viennese school and his early idol, Gustav Mahler. The conductor died in Zürich, in July 1973.

Otto Klemperer by Peter Heyworth

He arrived on the international music scene « like a meteor fallen from heaven ». Today, 40 years after his death, his impact continues to be felt. Ist as revolutionary ground-breaker, later as champion of the Classics from Bach to Gustav Mahler, Otto Klemperer amassed a recording legacy of Masterworks perhaps unmatched by any other conductor, unequalled in their vision, depth, and power. Treasures from conducting's golden age, their enduring popularity is proof that the best never goes out of style.

Otto Klemperer : born on 14 May 1885 in Breslau ; died on 6 July 1973 in Zürich. German conductor and composer of Jewish birth. After studying with Ivan Knorr at the music Conservatory, in Frankfurt am Main, Klemperer followed Kwast to the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, in Berlin, where he also studied composition and conducting with Hans Pfitzner. In 1906, he replaced Oskar Fried at the last moment to conduct Max Reinhardt's production of Jacques Offenbach's « Orphée aux enfers » at the « Neues Theater », in Berlin. The previous year, on the occasion of a performance of Gustav Mahler's « Resurrection Symphony » (No. 2) , in which he directed the off-stage Orchestra, he had Ist encountered the composer who was to exercise a decisive influence on his career. It was on Gustav Mahler's recommendation that Otto Klemperer was appointed chorus Master and, subsequently, conductor at the « Deutsches Landestheater », in Prague, in 1907 (making his debut in Weber's « Der Freischütz ») and, then, at Hamburg from 1910 to 1912. Further appointments followed at Barmen (1913-1914) and Strasbourg (1914-1917) , where he was Hans Pfitzner's deputy, and as musical director at Cologne (1917-1924) and Wiesbaden (1924-1927) .

After 1918, Otto Klemperer rapidly emerged as one of the leading German conductors of his generation. In 1923, he declined an appointment as musical director of the « Berlin Staatsoper » , where he felt he would have had insufficient artistic independence. His sympathy for and authoritative performances of an unusually wide range of contemporary music, as well as a less overtly emotional interpretation of the Classics than had been common among older conductors, made him appear an expression of the New Age. He was, therefore, a natural choice as director when, in 1927, the Prussian Ministry of Culture set-up a branch of the « Berlin Staatsoper » , whose special task was to perform new and recent works and repertory works in a non-traditional manner. This, the « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » , played in the « Kroll Theater » , from which it drew the name by which it is usually known. Klemperer's period there was of crucial significance in his career and the development of Opera, in the Ist half of the 20th Century.

Igor Stravinsky's « Œdipus Rex » and « Mavra » (both produced by Klemperer) , Arnold Schönberg's « Erwartung » 's and « Die glückliche Hand » ; Paul Hindemith's « Cardillac » and « Neues vom Tage » ; Leoš Janáček's « The House of the Dead » and Kurt Weill's « Der Jasager » , as well as the impressive list of new and recent orchestral works given at the « Kroll » concerts, is evidence of both bold experiment and lasting musical values. Although the vocal standards of the « Kroll Oper » were inevitably more modest than those of its parent house on the « Unter den Linden » , the presence of conductors such as Klemperer (who also produced Beethoven's « Fidelio » and Mozart's « Don Giovanni ») , Alexander von Zemlinsky and Fritz Zweig ensured high musical standards ; and designers such as Ewald Dülberg, Oskar Schlemmer and László Moholy-Nagy had a lasting influence on the development of Operatic production, after 1945. In particular, the « Kroll Oper » 's drastically stylized production of « Der fliegende Holländer » (1929) was a decisive forerunner of Wieland Wagner's innovations at the Bayreuth Festival, after it re-opened in 1951.

After the closure of the « Kroll Oper » , Otto Klemperer remained with the « Staatsoper » where, on 13 February 1933, he conducted Richard Wagner's « Tannhäuser » for the 50th anniversary of the composer's death. In April 1933, he emigrated, eventually going to the United States (where he had made his debut, in 1927) . He became conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic (1933-1939) ; conducted the New York Philharmonic and the Philadelphia Orchestra ; and, in 1937-1938, played a part in the re-organization of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra. In 1939, he underwent an operation for a brain tumour, in Boston. His health and stability were so gravely undermined that he did little conducting for some years. His next regular engagement was at the Budapest Opera (1947-1950) , where he conducted an extensive repertory before leaving there because of the Communist regime's restrictive musical policies. In the early 1950's, Klemperer accepted guest engagements, in spite of having suffered further accidents and illnesses. But his reputation in Europe had become largely a matter of hearsay.

In 1954, a contract to conduct and make recordings with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra of London led to his appointment, in 1955, as its principal conductor. At the age of 70, a new chapter in his life opened. By 1954, Wilhelm Furtwängler was dead and Arturo Toscanini retired, and Otto Klemperer came to be generally accepted as the most authoritative interpreter of the Austro-German repertory from Franz-Josef Haydn to Gustav Mahler, a reputation he retained until his retirement from public concert life, in 1972. In 1961, he made his Covent Garden debut, conducting and producing Beethoven's « Fidelio » ; Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » followed, in 1962 ; and Wagner's « Lohengrin » , in 1963. On his death, Otto Klemperer's collection of annotated scores, letters and documents was given to the Royal Art Museum, in London. In 1973, a documentary film « Otto Klemperer's Journey through his Times » , with a soundtrack composed largely of Klemperer reminiscing in German, was made by the Dutch film director, Philo Bregstein.

Klemperer's performances were notable above all for their heroic dimensions and his architectural grasp. The detail revealed by his unfailingly lucid textures (predominant woodwind was a feature of his style) was always subject to his conception of a work, as a whole. Yet, this does justice only to the apollonian aspect of an unusually complex musical temperament. Until his later years, when his tempos became increasingly slow, his performances were also distinguished by a power and intensity that always remained subject to his grasp of structure. His interpretation of Mozart was controversial. Detractors found it too plain and lacking in nimbleness. Admirers praised its simplicity and directness. In Brahms, he tended to emphasize what that composer owed to Beethoven rather than to Robert Schumann. In Bruckner, he realized the Symphonies' monumental « grandeur » to a degree few conductors have equalled. And, in Beethoven, a composer central to his vision, he achieved an uncontested authority. Even the characteristically un-burnished Klemperer sound seemed essentially Beethovenian. But his outstanding achievement was to reveal the full extent of Gustav Mahler's genius, by rescuing his music from the rather sentimental style of interpretation that had been widely accepted.

Otto Klemperer studied composition with his neighbour Arnold Schönberg in Los Angeles, in the mid-1930's. He was a prolific if spasmodic composer. His output includes an Opera, a considerable number of songs (some settings of his own texts) and 9 String Quartets, as well as 6 Symphonies, in a post-Mahlerian style. Not all these works have been performed. Many were extensively revised and a number were destroyed.

Peter Heyworth : « Do you regard yourself as a conductor who happens to compose, or as a composer who has been unjustly neglected ? »

Klemperer : « It's a very difficult question. I can only say a few words. Naturally, I would be glad to be remembered as a conductor and as a composer. But, without wanting to be arrogant, I would only like to be remembered as a good composer. If people find my compositions weak, then it is better not to be remembered. »

Berlin in the 1920's : Conversations with Otto Klemperer and Lotte Lenya

(By Charles Osborne.)

« The gramophone burst into loud, braying music. Most of the people in the room began to dance. They were nearly all young. The boys were in shirt sleeves ; the girls had unhooked their dresses. The atmosphere of the room was heavy with dust and perspiration and cheap scent. An enormous woman elbowed her way through the crowd, carrying a glass of wine in each hand. She wore a pink silk blouse and a very short pleated white skirt ; her feet were jammed into absurdly small high-heeled shoes, out of which bulged pads of silk-stockinged flesh. Her cheeks were waxy pink and her hair dyed tinsel-golden, so that it matched the glitter of the half-dozen bracelets on her powdered arms. She was as curious and sinister as a life-size doll. Like a doll, she had staring China-blue eyes which did not laugh, although her lips were parted in a smile revealing several gold teeth. »

« There was a great deal of experimenting. There were oddities, and occasionally even absurdities, but the common denominator, the characteristic sign of those days, was an unparalleled mental alertness. And the alertness of the giving corresponded to the alertness of the receiving. A passionate general concentration upon cultural life prevailed, eloquently expressed by the large space devoted to art by the daily newspapers, in spite of the political excitement of the times. Musical events naturally aroused public interest to no less an extent. The Philharmonic Concerts led by Wilhelm Furtwängler ; the Bruno Walter Concerts with the Philharmonic Orchestra ; a wealth of choral concerts, chamber music recitals, and concerts by soloists ; the State Opera, deserving of high-praise because of premieres such as that of Alban Berg's " Wozzeck " and Leoš Janáček's " Jenůfa " under Erich Kleiber's baton ; the newly flourishing Municipal Opera under my guidance ; the " Kroll Oper " under Klemperer ; and a number of other institutes matched the achievements of the dramatic stage. »

The 1st paragraph is from Christopher Isherwood's « Mister Norris Changes Trains » ; the 2nd from Bruno Walter's volume of autobiography, « Theme and Variations » . Both refer to the Berlin of the late-1920's and the early-1930's : the immediate pre-Nazi period. It was a time when social and artistic life had a great variety of excitement to offer ; when there was, for instance, as much experimental music to be heard in the concert halls and Opera Houses as there was (and, for that matter, still is) experimental sex to be had, not far from the « Kurfürstendamm » . 2 famous survivors from that musical and theatrical Berlin, of 30 years ago, have been in London this spring : Otto Klemperer, a great force in Berlin Opera of the time, and Lotte Lenya, widow of Kurt Weill whose music, which mirrored its time with such cunning and precision, is coming into its own after a generation of near-neglect.

Doctor Klemperer became the musical director of the « Kroll Oper » in Berlin, in 1927. I asked him if he had been given a free-hand in the choice of works to be produced.

Klemperer : I was not fully free. The Generalintendant, Heinz Tietjen, was my superior, but he nearly always agreed with my suggestions.

Osborne : Which would you say were the most important of the modern Operas you produced there ?

Klemperer : The Stravinsky works - « Œdipus Rex » , « Mavra » , « l'Histoire du Soldat » ; Křenek's 3 1 Act Operas - « Der Diktator » , « Das heimliche Königreich » and « Schwergewicht » , as well as « Das Leben des Orest » ; Hindemith's « Cardillac » , « Neues vom Tage » , and « Hin und Zurück » ; Janáček's « Aus einem Totenhaus » with its libretto from Dostoevsky ; and Schœnberg's « Erwartung » and « Die glückliche Hand » .

Osborne : What was audience response to these works like ? Were the Berliners a progressive and intelligent audience ?

Klemperer : For the most part, yes. Of course, we naturally encountered some opposition.

Osborne : It must be fascinating to look back on such a period of great activity. Not all the novelties of the time have survived. I wonder which works you now consider to be the most likely to endure. « Œdipus Rex » , I suppose that goes without saying. The Janáček « House of the Dead » ?

Klemperer : Yes, both of those. Also, I think, « The Soldier's Tale » , Hindemith's « Cardillac » and Schœnberg's « Erwartung » .

Osborne : Can you tell me anything about Hindemith's « Neues vom Tage » ? I know it was a satire on modern newspapers. I suppose it was a completely topical work, a « Zeitoper » . Could it stand on its own feet today, do you think ?

Klemperer : No, I don't think it would be effective today. It was, as you say, a completely topical work.

Osborne : You also gave regular Symphony concerts in the « Kroll » Opera House. Can you tell me some of the more important new works you performed there ?

Klemperer : Again, Stravinsky : « Apollon Musagète » , « les Noces » , the Piano Concerto, and « Capriccio » with the composer playing the piano part. The « Sinfonietta » of Křenek. A number of Hindemith works : the Concerto Grosso, Violin Concerto, Viola Concerto, Cello Concerto. And the « Sinfonietta » of Hauer.

Osborne : Hauer. Josef Hauer ? He's the atonal theorist and composer who, in a way, preceded Schönberg. He seems to have sunk into obscurity nowadays. Were there, in Berlin at that time, any promising young composers who later disappeared under the Nazis ?

Klemperer : Most of these composers were no longer performed under the Nazi regime.

Osborne : Did you experience, at the « Kroll » , much violent antagonism from the more reactionary, conservative musical forces of the day ?

Klemperer : Yes.

Osborne : The « Kroll » Opera was closed in 1931, I believe. Why did this happen ?

Klemperer : To this day, I don't know the reason why the « Kroll Oper » was closed. There were no financial difficulties, because we got a small subsidy. I suppose I was the reason. The government was afraid of the coming Nazis, who regarded us at the « Kroll » as cultural bolsheviks.

Osborne : So you went to the « Staatsoper » , in 1931. Did you find it very different from the « Kroll » ?

Klemperer : The main difference was that the « Staatsoper » was a repertoire theatre : the « Kroll » was a theatre for every day, with a small repertoire and many repetitions.

Osborne : Did you encounter much State opposition at the « Staatsoper » ?

Klemperer : No, not really.

Osborne : Incidentally, did you play a great deal of Gustav Mahler during your Berlin period ? Was he popular in North Germany ?

Klemperer : Yes. I played many of his Symphonies. Audience reaction was always very favourable.

Osborne : Towards the end of this period, were you at all aware of the imminence of Nazi domination ? Did it feel like the dissolution of an era ?

Klemperer : Naturally, we were aware of the coming Nazi regime. We felt that the great era from 1924 to 1933 was over.

Osborne : What did you think, at that time, of the music of Kurt Weill ?

Klemperer : I admired his work very much. I think, perhaps, the best of his works is the « Dreigroschenoper » . And it came just at the right moment. Lotte Lenya in the Weill Operas is unsurpassed, as singer and actress.

In 1933, Otto Klemperer was presented by von Hindenburg with the Gœthe Medal, for his services to German culture. A few weeks later, he had to leave Germany : his contract with the State Opera had been cancelled without warning, and with no reason given. He made his way to America.

Among the many who left Germany that year were the composer Kurt Weill and his wife Lotte Lenya. They, too, managed to get to America. Weill died there, in 1950. 4 years later, his « Threepenny Opera » was revived in New York, with Lotte Lenya as Jenny, the role she had played in Berlin, in 1928. Born of working-class people in Vienna, she studied ballet in Zürich, gained experience also as an actress, and came to Berlin, in 1923, where she met her future husband.

Osborne : Miss Lenya, it's true, isn't it, that Kurt Weill studied with the composer Busoni in Berlin, between 1921 and 1924 ? Do you remember anything of Busoni ?

Lenya : My 1st memory of Busoni goes back to 1917, when I was studying ballet at the « Stadttheater » , in Zürich. One morning, we were called to rehearsals for Busoni's « Turandot » , which was based on Gozzi's version of the fable. When I arrived, Busoni was already sitting at the piano, and he played throughout the rehearsal. His attitude at the piano was very special. His long, beautiful hands seemed to belong more to the keyboard than to his body. He created a sort of stillness. I only remember one other pianist who made a similar impression on me, and that was Schnabel (whom I heard many times ; once, at a private house, when I remember him saying of some other pianist : « I don't like him, he has such a noisy spiritual life. ») . After his rehearsal was over, Busoni sat down on the floor, which Weill later told me was his favourite relaxing position, and started talking about his Opera. But he was talking to us, the girls, not to the waiting rehearsal-pianist. The music ? Oh dear, I don't remember a thing about it. I never saw Busoni again. When I met Weill, Busoni was suffering his last illness. He died in July 1924, and Weill was very shaken. There had been a deep sympathy between them : I still have 2 of Busoni's autographs, with the warmest dedication to «

dear Kurt Weill » . But I don't think Weill felt Busoni's death as an end. Partly because he had just met Georg Kaiser - and that was a beginning.

Osborne : Did you know Kaiser ?

Lenya : Yes, I knew him very well. I met him for the 1st time in Berlin, 3 or 4 years after the 1st War. By that time, he was one of the key figures in German drama, though he had only achieved fame during the last years of the War, when he was already in his late-1930's. I became great friends with him and his family and, for almost 1 year, I lived with them in Grünheide, which was an hour from Berlin. They used to rent a house, near the edge of a lake. It was an odd, Chas Adams-ish sort of place, but Kaiser was very fond of it because he liked to live outside rather than inside, and he had a mania for boats. One of the reasons why he was always in debt was that, whenever there was any sign of money coming his way, he bought a new boat. There was a weird assortment of paddle boats, sailing boats, rowing boats, sculling boats and so on. Still, it was in one of those boats that I 1st met Kurt Weill. He was coming to discuss « The Protagonist » with Kaiser, and I was sent to row him across the lake from the station. I must add that Kaiser had a passion for music (though, sometimes, I wondered whether it was just a passion for Wagner's « Tristan ») , and one of his best friends was the conductor Fritz Stiedry. I think it was Stiedry who had introduced Weill to Kaiser.

Osborne : « Der Protagonist » was Weill's 1st Opera, wasn't it ? How did it come to be written ? Had Kaiser written a libretto 1st, which Weill wanted to set ?

Klemperer : It was originally a 1 Act play set in Elizabethan England, which Kaiser wrote, in 1921. The 1st collaboration really only amounted to deciding a few cuts with Kaiser. Weill set the text almost as it stood. That's one of the extraordinary things about Kaiser's literary style, it is so condensed that the slower tempo of music is almost an advantage. After « The Protagonist » , Kaiser wrote 2 texts specially for Weill. 1st, the little Comic-Opera, « The Czar » has his photograph taken and, then, the big play with music, « Der Silbersee » .

It's rather ironic that Kaiser, whom Brecht acknowledged as one of the indispensable pioneers of the new drama, and who was the most performed German playwright after Hauptmann, should today be hardly more than a name outside Germany. I am sure that, as soon as a complete edition of Kaiser's plays is published (not one is in print, at the moment, partly thanks to Kaiser's very odd business arrangements) , his remarkable stature will be realized.

Osborne : He was personally rather an odd character, was he ?

Lenya : He was always strangely remote and isolated, the very opposite of Brecht. Although he wrote about 60 plays, he never once went to a rehearsal, or even to a premiere, and he prevented us from going too. (His wife and I used to go secretly to Berlin to see his plays.) He refused to read press reviews : « I remember that, if somebody in ignorance brought a paper to the house to show him, he would pick it up with the tongs and put it into the fire as if it were contagious. He was the most enigmatic and contradictory man I have ever known. He was almost hopelessly generous in giving money, and almost hopelessly ruthless in taking it. He gave his life to the theatre, and he hated the theatre. He dreamt of being an English country squire and Master of an Estate and, yet, he lived a life which swung like a pendulum between “ gut bürgerlich ” and Adlon elegance. »

Osborne : This was the period when late-night political-satirical cabaret flourished in Berlin, I believe ?

Lenya : Yes, indeed. Margo Lion, Rosa Valetti, Kate Kühl, Dolly Haas, Trude Hesterberg, Blandine Ebinger, Claire Waldorf, Liesl Karlstadt, Karl Valentin, Werner Fink and many more besides appeared continually in that kind of cabaret. People often think it was all Left-wing but, of course, much of it was non-Party and purely satirical.

Osborne : Did you ever appear in such shows ?

Lenya : No, I was never in any of the cabarets.

Osborne : Was theatre in Berlin, at that time, politically aware ?

Lenya : Intensely aware. When one thinks of Erwin Piscator's « Theater am Nollendorfplatz » , which was entirely political, and directors like Jessner, Karl Heinz Martin, Jürgen Fehling, all of whom had some kind of political line, it is quite obvious that the serious theatre-goer couldn't escape politics. And, of course, the playwrights (for instance, Kaiser in his « Gas » plays ; Toiler, in all his plays) took advantage of the situation even before Brecht.

Osborne : Was « Dreigroschenoper » , in 1928, the 1st « Zeitoper » to appear ?

Lenya : « Zeitoper » is one of those catchwords which Weill very much distrusted. He was against things which were merely contemporary. Of course, the point about « Dreigroschenoper » is that it generalizes. There were purely contemporary Operas before that : « Jonny spielt auf » , for instance. But what became of them ?

Incidentally, « Dreigroschenoper » did not set-out to be a great artistic statement. It was an in-between work, written in answer to a special request from the producer Ernst Josef Aufricht. Before, it was even begun, Brecht and Weill had already planned the « Mahagonny » Opera.

Osborne : Our English picture of pre-Nazi Berlin is largely drawn from the Berlin stories of Christopher Isherwood. To what extent do you think they give a true and accurate picture of the feeling of that time and place ?

Lenya : It's a funny thing the way people think of Berlin, in those days, as a sexual paradise, or hell. Perhaps, Mister Isherwood's very brilliant novels have something to do with that. But besides the famous corner of the KDW and the well-walked pavements of the « Friedrichstraße » , there were other places and other occupations. People did go to work in the morning and come home in the evening. They did (some of them) fight for the things that matter, and continue to hope for a better life. Somehow, that old picture of Berlin as a sink of iniquity seems in danger of being applied to everything which came-out of it, artistically. Only the other day, I read a description of the « Song of Seeräuber-Jenny » in « Dreigroschenoper » , which stated that it was a song about a whore which it most certainly is not. The only whores in any work of Brecht and Weill (not forgetting the girls in « Mahagonny » , who are just gold-diggers) are the ones in « Dreigroschenoper » . And they come straight-out of your English « Beggar's Opera » . And, by the way, am I not right in thinking that, until recently, some London pavements also knew the sound of those high-boots which were one of the attractions of the old Berlin ?

Osborne : How right you are. You know your Soho. Tell me, did you listen to Classical or modern music in Berlin ? Did you, perhaps, hear a Klemperer performance ?

Lenya : Yes, of course. I don't think there was a production at Klemperer's « Kroll » Opera which we did not go to. Above all, I remember Stravinsky's « Œdipus Rex » , a completely new conception of « Madama Butterfly » , with Jarmila Novotná, who sat on a swing to sing one of her arias, and a wonderful « Fidelio » . We also went to the modern music concerts of the « Novembergruppe » , of which Weill was a member. I also remember going quite often to the Kolisch Quartet whenever they were in Berlin ; and I certainly heard Hindemith in chamber music. For a time, we saw a lot of the Hindemiths but, after we emigrated, we never met them again.

Osborne : What can you tell me about Caspar Neher, and « Die Bürgschaft » ?

Lenya : I think it was one of Weill's happiest collaborations. They had been very close friends, since 1927, and completely understood each other. The work is based on a parable by Herder, the great Classical humanist, and it is about justice in a primitive society and injustice in a totalitarian society. I have a very special love and admiration for his work. For Weill, it was a kind of relief after the restraints of writing for untrained singers, children and the special needs of Brecht. I remember him saying : « Jetzt muß ich mich mal wieder ausmusizieren » , meaning that he wished now to let the music speak-out, as fully as possible.

Osborne : What were the immediate circumstances of your leaving Berlin, in 1932 ?

Lenya : After the « Reichstagsbrand » , the last security was gone for those who had fought for the things that matter and who were the open enemies of the Nazi Party. Weill and I managed to get across the border at the last moment, with the help of Neher.

The great days had come to an end. The prophecy of Brecht's lines in « Mahagonny » were fulfilled :

Denn wie man sich bettet, so liegt man, es deckt einen da keiner zu, und wenn einer tritt, dann bin ich es, und wird einer getreten, dann bist du's !

« Mahagonny » survives triumphantly today as, perhaps, the finest achievement of its period. A monument, a warning, a work of art. The bitter, ironic, tender sound that it makes is the voice of Berlin itself.

Walter Legge and Otto Klemperer

DEATH, who had so often unsuccessfully wrestled with Otto Klemperer, finally overcame him while he slept : only in sleep could Klemperer's adamant will have been broken. Misfortune, accidents, severe illnesses, major operations and often extreme poverty assailed him for a great part of his life but he faced them all inflexibly. No one who saw him interviewed on « BBC » Television, after he had recovered from one of his worst accidents, will forget his answer to John Freeman's question :

« Did you ever think during the months you were in hospital that you might never conduct again ? »

A grim, laconic : « No » .

And, throughout all these batterings of fate, he was, as both Artur Schnabel and, later, his daughter Lotte Klemperer told me, handicapped by cyclothymia, the uncontrollable alternation of euphoric and depressive states, an illness « most frequently found among worthy persons of the upper-social and intellectual classes » . This incurable cyclic fluctuation of his nature was partly responsible for the erratic course of his career.

Otto Klemperer was born in Breslau. Both parents were Jewish ; his father, according to him, was a good amateur singer and an incompetent businessman, his mother a professional piano teacher. When he was 4, the family moved to Hamburg where he had his 1st piano lessons from his mother. He left school at 16 and went, for a year, to the Frankfurt Conservatory, then, to Berlin where he studied conducting and composition with Hans Pfitzner. In 1905, he entered for the Rubinstein competition for pianists : the prize-winner was Wilhelm Backhaus.

In 1905, Max Reinhardt, the great Austrian « régisseur » and, with Richard Strauß and Hugo von Hofmannsthal, co-founder of the Salzburg Festivals, gave Otto Klemperer his 1st engagement as chorus Master and deputy-conductor of Jacques Offenbach's « Orpheus in the Underworld » , in Berlin, at what is now the « Theater am Schiffbauerdamm » . Fortunately for Klemperer, the principal conductor, Oskar Fried, quarrelled with a singer on the 1st night and, from the 2nd performance, Klemperer was in charge.

He had met Gustav Mahler, 2 or 3 times, and having been told that the best way to win that composer's sympathies was to show interest in his music, Klemperer had made a piano reduction of his 2nd Symphony, the Scherzo of which he played to the composer by heart. Mahler was so impressed and flattered that he gave Klemperer a recommendation on his own visiting card, a souvenir Klemperer prized all his life and always carried with him. Mahler's introduction was enough to secure Klemperer his 1st job in an Opera House, a 5 year contract as chorus Master and conductor at the German Opera House, in Prague, a Theatre which, until 1938, had a great tradition and which was the spring-board for several illustrious careers. Karl Muck and Arthur Nikisch had started there and it was an important rung in Georg Szell's ladder. So good was this Theatre's reputation that many Central European singers chose to take their 1st engagements there, rather than in other Opera Houses which paid better. Like Wilhelm Furtwängler starting in Zürich, Otto Klemperer had to conduct « The Merry Widow » , in Prague, where he stayed for 3 years until he was dismissed on suspicion of having influenced a music-critic to disparage the Director. Again, Mahler came to his aid and induced the Hamburg Opera to engage him.

To all accounts, he was happy there, for a while. He conducted « Rigoletto » , « Carmen » and « Martha » for Enrico Caruso, and he frequently spoke of his « Lohengrin » there, as one of the greatest successes of his life. The 1st and 2nd « pages » were 2 young sopranos making their debuts in Hamburg : Elisabeth Schumann and Lotte Lehmann. In spite of some disagreements, even ruptures, these 3 remained friends. Otto Klemperer's daughter, Lotte, was named after Lehmann.

An involvement with a highly-gifted singer led to an unpleasant incident when, during a performance of « Die Fledermaus » , Klemperer was assaulted by the offended husband. Again, he had to leave an engagement before his contract had expired.

Cologne and marriage

The next stages of his career were Barmen (1912) , some steps down from Hamburg, then Straßburg (1914) where he stayed until 1916 when he was appointed to Cologne. In the time I knew him, he never spoke of the Barmen and Straßburg years. In Cologne, he married Johanna Geisler, a soprano in the Cologne company by whom he had 2 children, Werner (the well-known American film and television actor) and Lotte who, for 30 years, smoothed her father's way, cared for him and tended him with super-human patience and devotion, right to the end.

In Cologne, Klemperer started building his reputation as a champion of contemporary music and his fame began to spread beyond the German frontiers. The Berlin Opera offered him a contract as a conductor which he rejected, in favour of the musical directorship of Wiesbaden. It was there, I first heard him, in 1926, on my 1st visit to Germany and to a German Opera House. His performances of « Fidelio » and « Don Giovanni » were revelations, even though the singing was not comparable with much that I had heard at Covent Garden, in the 1924-1925-1926 seasons. 20 years later, I mentioned these Wiesbaden performances to conductor Josef Krips who, at that time, had been engaged in Dortmund. He confirmed my impressions and told me that Klemperer's work at Wiesbaden was so revealing that, whenever he was free, he habitually made the 120 mile journey to hear and study Klemperer's interpretations.

Klemperer's Wiesbaden contract is said to have allowed him 6 months leave each year - a rather unusual arrangement in those days and it seems strange that he, who had been such a strong advocate of the ensemble Opera company and opponent of the repertory Opera system, accepted it. It gave him the opportunity annually to conduct for 6 weeks, in Russia, and to accept other guest engagements abroad. From 1924 to 1936, each year, he went to Russia as guest-conductor and even conducted Bizet's « Carmen » , at the Bolshoi Theatre. In the latter part of his Berlin period, Klemperer, like many of his Jewish intellectual friends, was freely spoken of as a « Salon-Communist » , a term much used at the time for affluent or eminent extreme Left-wingers.

In 1927, Klemperer moved to Berlin to take-over a new Opera House, the « Staatsoper am Platz der Republik » , the « Kroll Oper » , as it was usually called. At that time, Berlin had an incredibly rich musical life. 3 Opera Houses, the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra with Wilhelm Furtwängler as its chief conductor, concerts by the Orchestras of the Opera Houses and innumerable recitals by the greatest instrumentalists and best concert-singers of the period. The most able singers of the time, who could sing in German, were engaged at one or the other of the Opera Houses and great conductors were in abundance : Wilhelm Furtwängler, Bruno Walter, Erich Kleiber, Leo Blech, Georg Szell, Otto Klemperer (and, occasionally, even Richard Strauß) - all conducting Opera - not for occasional visits but, except for Strauß, living and working in Berlin. It was paradise for young musicians avid to learn but torture for them to decide which Opera or concert to hear each day.

The administrative director of all the Berlin State Opera Houses was Heinz Tietjen, a highly-intelligent, unscrupulous operator. His skill at playing artists off each against the others was proverbial and hated, but he achieved the diplomatic miracle of holding his position 1st, under the Weimar Republic, then, under the Nazi regime and, finally, played a leading role in Germany's musical life after World War II. He was also a brilliant producer and an able conductor who was virtually dictator of Berlin's Operatic life and director of the Bayreuth Festivals, from 1931 until they ceased late in the War. He was the Talleyrand of German musical life.

The theatre Klemperer took-over with a 10 year contract (the « Kroll Oper ») was a new venture. It was large, rather uncomfortable and acoustically harsh. The declared policy was to provide Opera for a large public, at low prices. Klemperer chose Operas which, with few exceptions, were not in the repertoires of the other Theatres and he put into practice his ideas on modernization of production. I saw the much discussed « Der fliegende Holländer » , in modern dress, with Moje Forbach as Senta wearing a coarse woollen blue pull-over and a rough tweed skirt. Fritz Krenn (Ochs at Covent Garden, in 1938) sang Rocco. To my eyes, the revolutionary sets were anachronisms, ugly and contradictory to the music. The « Fidelio » scenery, probably influenced by Adolphe Appia or early Bauhaus ideas, was cold and rectilinear. Rosa Pauly, at that time, an untidy but intense singer, sang Leonore. The repertoire was not really suited to the public it was supposed to attract and, apart from the few standard favourites which were mostly produced against the music and subject, little of the novel repertoire Klemperer introduced has stood the test of time. The era of the producers who blight the world's Opera Houses today seems to have been Klemperer's innovation. At his concerts with his Opera House Orchestra, he did much Igor Stravinsky, and less Paul Hindemith.

After 3 years, the « Kroll Oper » venture closed and Klemperer, unwillingly, was transferred to the « Unter den Linden Theater » , then Berlin's principal Opera House. I went to the dress-rehearsal of a new « Der Rosenkavalier » production : a charmless, insensitive performance from Klemperer. Lotte Lehmann was the Marschallin. That glorious artist who instinctively poured-out warm radiance and impulsive femininity was not the most accurate of singers. Having been stopped and corrected by Klemperer, 2 or 3 times, she lost patience, walked down to the foot lights and said to him :

« Don't keep on interrupting me ! I'm only singing a few performances here, then I'm off to sing it at Covent Garden, then at the Chicago Opera. »

Klemperer's reply was a typically laconic question :

« The Strauß or the Lehmann version ? »

Many years after World War II, Lehmann and he met in the Hyde-Park Hotel. His ironic humour came-out - much to Lehmann's amusement.

Klemperer : What are you doing in London ?

Lehmann : Giving Master classes. They are a great success.

Klemperer : I had hoped you were now learning the parts you used to sing.

On February 12th, 1933, Klemperer conducted his last performance for many years of Opera, in Germany, a few weeks after he had been awarded the Goethe Medal for his services to German art and less than a fortnight after Adolf Hitler had taken power. Klemperer was not to conduct Opera again, until 14 years later.

Already in the 1920's, Klemperer had begun to give concerts outside Germany. He went to New York, for the 1st time in 1926. In 1927, the Royal Philharmonic Society invited him to conduct a concert in London, on January 26th, 1928, but broke-off negotiations because he inflexibly insisted that his programme should consist of Beethoven's 3rd and 5th Symphonies, and nothing else. However, his London debut was not to be long delayed. On Artur Schnabel's recommendation, Mrs. Courtauld invited him to London and he made his debut at the Queen's Hall, in 1929. He was well over 40 years old. The programme was what violinist Jascha Heifetz, many years later, described as poison to the box-office - Arnold Schœnberg's orchestration of Bach's E-flat Prelude and Fugue, and Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony (its 1st performance in Britain, I believe) but the « Courtauld - Malcolm Sargent » concerts were fully subscribed, even over-subscribed. The press reception was cool (as far as I remember, the only critic who sensed Klemperer's qualities was Walter J. Turner) and there was mutual dislike between the Orchestra and the conductor. But Klemperer returned, in 1930, and, with the same Orchestra, gave a revealing performance of Beethoven's 9th with an incredibly exuberant Finale which brought the audience shouting to its feet. London did not hear him again until after the War.

Early 78's RPM Records

It was during his Berlin period that Klemperer made his 1st recordings, mostly for « Polydor » , but there were 3 works for « Electrola » published in London on the « HMV » black label, which I treasured for years : Johannes Brahms' « Academic Festival Overture » , the « Tristan » Prelude with Richard Wagner's own concert ending (on 4 10-inch sides !) and, above all, a glowing, sensual performance of « Salome's 7 Veil Dance » . Richard Strauß and Otto Klemperer collectors, please note !

Within 2 weeks of Adolf Hitler's accession to power, Klemperer left for Zürich. At 1st, things did not go too badly for him. His wife, who followed him with the children, had smuggled-out some money in a cake (Jews were not allowed to take money out of Germany) and he conducted some concerts. Through a chance acquaintance in Italy, he was invited to take-over the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra which was looking for a resident conductor. This also involved open-air concerts in the Hollywood Bowl which he must have hated. However, he accepted and, in 1935, he moved his family to California and eventually became an American citizen. He must have felt quite at home there because, according to Gottfried Reinhardt's book, the cream of Berlin's Jewish Left-wing intellectuals (philosophers, historians, doctors, lawyers) had found their ways to California. From 1934 to 1936, he conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra for a few weeks and, in 1936, he took-over the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra from Arturo Toscanini, for 3 months. At about this time, he was invited to choose the musicians for the foundation of the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra.

The « Big 5 » of conductors : This photograph was taken in 1929, during the Berlin Festival, at a reception given for Toscanini as musical director of La Scala of Milan with which company he gave a series of incomparable performances. It shows the Musical Directors of the 3 Berlin State Opera Houses - Erich Kleiber (« Staatsoper Unter den Linden ») , Bruno Walter (« Stadtische Oper ») , Otto Klemperer (« Kroll Oper ») , and Wilhelm Furtwängler, director of the Berlin Philharmonic. It also shows how tall and handsome Klemperer was at that time.

It seems that he was in poor health and worrying financial circumstances, in the years immediately before the War. He was habitually reticent about this period. In 1939, he had a major operation for a brain-tumour believed to have been the result of falling from the podium during a rehearsal in Leipzig, several years earlier. The operation left him partially paralysed and, for many years, he was unable to conduct standing-up. This operation and the long convalescence had drained his financial reserves and, for the greater part of the War, he had very little work. He was a discounted, if not forgotten, man and his daughter Lotte worked in a factory to bring in some money.

The Return to Europe

In desperation, he returned to Europe, in 1946, and found himself not only well-remembered but in demand. Particularly, because the Americans, French, British and Russians had decided that every distinguished Central European musician who had performed in German occupied Europe during the War was, ipso-facto, a Nazi whose rehabilitation must be delayed until they had been cleared by denazification boards.

In Stockholm, Klemperer had the good fortune to meet Aladhr Todt, the husband of Annie Fischer. They were living there, as refugees from Hungary. Todt was one of the wisest and most cultivated of men, and certainly the gentlest I have known. He was, so Hungarians tell me, one of their best writers. He had been a vigorous proselytiser of Béla Bartók, a friend of Ernst von Dohnányi and Zoltán Kodály and a distinguished critic in Budapest. Soon, Todt was invited back to Budapest as director of the Opera there and, on taking-up this appointment, he invited Otto Klemperer to become his principal conductor. It was a stormy period ; part of the time, Klemperer was in his euphoric state. Disputes and temperamental outbursts were frequent but, to all accounts, he made wonderful music. He conducted Mozart - DaPonte Operas (« Die Entführung aus dem Serail » and « Die Zauberflöte ») , Beethoven's « Fidelio » , Richard Wagner's « Tannhäuser » , « Lohengrin » and « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg » , as well as some Italian Operas, and many concerts. But, yet again, the engagement ended in disputes although Klemperer remained friendly with the Todts.

Klemperer was still an itinerant musician. He conducted in Vienna, one performance of « The Marriage of Figaro » and an orchestral concert in Salzburg, in 1947, and should have conducted the world-premiere of von Einem's Opera « Danton's Tadeusz » . But after 1 or 2 rehearsals, Ferenc Fricsay, then unknown outside Budapest, was suddenly called in to take-over. These performances launched Fricsay on his brilliant but short international conducting career.

In 1948, Otto Klemperer conducted in Buenos Aires, and Bizet's « Carmen » at the « Komische Oper » , in East-Berlin. Felsenstein was the producer and spent so much time in preparing the 1st 3 Acts that Klemperer had to remind him that his own contract was expiring in a couple of weeks. The last Act was quickly put together and Klemperer conducted a few performances. In the summer of 1949, he toured Australia.

It was Richard Austin who first brought Klemperer back to London, at the end of the 1940's. Austin was trying to resurrect the spirit and organization of the pre-War « Courtauld - Malcolm Sargent » concerts, under the name of « The New-Era Concert Society » , at Royal Albert Hall, for which he engaged my « Philharmonia » Orchestra and several distinguished European conductors ; among them, Klemperer. I went with composer William Walton to hear him conduct a programme which, if I remember rightly, was a Bach Suite, a Stravinsky Symphony and the Eroica Symphony. It was an unhappy occasion. My Orchestra seemed unable to understand Klemperer's beat, the Stravinsky was new to them. Walton and I left at the interval.

In 1951, the « Philharmonia » Orchestra was invited to give 2 concerts, as part of the Festival of Britain. I had engaged the pianist Artur Schnabel, as soloist, for both of them and wanted George Szell to conduct, but he was not free, so, in Schnabel's suite at the Hyde-Park Hotel, the 3 of us discussed possible alternatives. Both Schnabel and Szell urged me to invite Klemperer because he is still capable of marvellous performances and it would help him. So, I engaged Klemperer.

As it turned-out, Schnabel was too ill to play. Pianist Solomon was engaged as soloist for 1 concert, Dame Myra Hess for the other. I was not in London at the time of the rehearsals of the 1st concert but a crisis occurred before the 2nd when Klemperer, without warning, refused to conduct Elgar's « Enigma Variations » and threatened to cancel the concert, unless he could substitute Mozart's « Jupiter » Symphony for the Elgar. My incomparable and imperturbable assistant, Jane Withers, telephoned me and I agreed to let him have his own way ; I would fly back, as quickly as possible. It was not until well after the interval of the 2nd concert that I reached the Festival Hall in time to hear the last movement of the « Jupiter » : powerful, incredibly transparent and the structure marvelously revealed. Marie Wilson, then playing in the 1st violins of the « Philharmonia » , came-off the platform with tears streaming down her face, put her hands on my shoulders and said :

« I feel such a bitch taking money from you for the privilege of playing a concert like this one ! »

This time, the public and critics understood what they had heard and on those 2 evenings. Klemperer laid the foundation stone of what was to be the longest, the most successful, the last, and I hope, the happiest epoch of his career.

But there were still many hurdles to be overcome. A day or 2 after the 2nd concert, he and his wife came to dinner at my house. Conversation was easy and I had ordered a car to take them home at 10:30 PM. The car arrived but, in spite of his wife's prompting, he refused to leave :

« Now that I've found someone to talk, you want to drag me away. Lie down on that sofa and go to sleep. »

His wife obeyed. The car waited and we talked until half past 4 in the morning. I had to tell him that I must start work at 9h30 that morning. He woke his wife and they trundled-off to the car. 4 hours later, the telephone beside my bed woke me. It was Klemperer :

« Since you turned me out of your house while I was in the middle of a sentence, I want to finish now what I was saying. »

He talked for 5 minutes and finished with :

« And now, it's time you went to your work. »

Klemperer's reported recollections of the conversation of that evening differ from mine. I did suggest, as I have said earlier in this article, that the untimely collapse of the « Kroll Oper » was probably in part due to a misjudgement of what that type of public would like. But the fascinating and revealing part of the conversation came when I asked him why he had stopped including so much contemporary music in his programmes. Klemperer, who was then 65, said he had decided that he had so much to think about and clarify in the great German Classics, from Bach to Bruckner, that he intended, henceforth, to concentrate on them. Except for very minor differences of opinion, he and his daughter Lotte turned to me for advice and help for the next 13 years and I soon put him on the road to a very substantial annual income for the rest of his life.

The public and the critical reaction to the 2 Festival Hall concerts made it clear to me that Otto Klemperer had begun to establish himself with the London public and that his approach to the Classical repertoire was to the taste of the time. He represented, for the refugees which then made-up a substantial part of London audiences, a father figure and a nostalgic symbol of happier days, in Berlin. I urged « EMI » to let me make an exclusive recording contract with Otto Klemperer and told them that, whether they agreed or not, I intended to engage him for several « Philharmonia » Orchestra concerts. They agreed, reluctantly.

A contract with « EMI »

I met Otto Klemperer in Salzburg, that summer ; he was shabby, depressed and reluctant to sign a contract with the British « Columbia Graphophone » Company because he felt a moral obligation to George H. de Mendelssohn-Bartholdy of the « Vox » company, for whom he had made several records in Vienna, including the grave and powerful performance of the « Missa solemnis » . That autumn, Klemperer slipped on ice at Dorval Montreal International airport, broke a hip and was in hospital for the best part of a year. I find a slip inserted in the programme of the « Philharmonia » Concert Society concert, of October 21st, 1951, regretting that « owing to his unfortunate accident Doctor Klemperer will be unable to conduct the Society's concerts in January and February 1952 » . However, he signed his 1st contract with « Columbia » , on May 10th, 1952. We were soon in further trouble. As a naturalized American subject, Klemperer had to return to the United States at specified intervals, otherwise, his American citizenship would be revoked. In August 1952, he wrote me saying that Petrillo, the Cæsar of the American Federation of Musicians, of which Klemperer had to be a member, had refused permission for him or any other American member of that union to record in Europe.

A reply, drafted by « EMI » 's legal department, but which I had to sign, threatened him with an actionable breach of contract. The storm slowly abated and, in July 1953, at his wish, I signed another letter terminating his contract.

In the spring of 1954, I went to Milano to see him, his wife and daughter. He conducted a late afternoon concert with a poor Orchestra (apart from a wonderful 1st oboe) in the « Teatro Nuovo » , a low-roofed, depressing hall. Although Klemperer had conducted a Beethoven cycle at La Scala, in 1935, given concerts there in 1946 and 1947, and conducted « Die Zauberflöte » 4 times with an all Italian cast (except Lipp as Astraflammante) , the audience was small and apathetic. But the performance of Mozart's A major Symphony (the No. 29) was so enchanting that this and the « Jupiter » Symphony were the 1st Mozart Symphonies he recorded for me.

That evening, the Klemperers had dinner with me. Sensing that there were serious matters to be discussed. I took them to a quiet restaurant, which specialized in chicken roasted on the spit. Klemperer ordered 2 boiled eggs in a glass, and a glass of milk. They put their problems to me. To retain his American passport, he had (according to the McCarran Act) to return frequently (I believe it was once a year) to the United States. In America, he could not earn enough to live on. If he gave-up his American passport. He could reclaim his German nationality and, probably, get the pension due to him for his years as a conductor in Germany. What did I think would be best for them ? I told them frankly, I could not myself nor did I believe « EMI » would guarantee him a minimum annual income but I felt confident that, from concerts with my Orchestra and royalties from recordings, he could soon count on £ 2,000 a year. I considered they would be wise to stay in Europe. I would do all I could to help him. The next morning, his daughter telephoned me that they had decided to follow my advice. Soon, they settled in Zürich which was his home until he died.

In the meantime, we had made a new exclusive contract for recording for « Columbia » . The 1st sessions in the Kingsway Hall, on October 5th and 6th, 1954, went splendidly. I had supervised and produced : Sir Thomas Beecham's recordings, since the early 1930's ; Felix Weingartner's, since 1938 ; Herbert von Karajan's, Rafael Kubelik's and Josef Krips', since 1946 ; Karl Böhm's and, even, Wilhelm Furtwängler's, since 1947. And I found them all, not only amenable but grateful, for suggestions, open to discussion and criticisms. I felt no reason to change my technique for Otto Klemperer, in spite of his physical size, his grim silences and Old Testamental severity. It worked.

On the morning of the 3rd day, October 7th, black clouds loomed. To set Klemperer's mind at rest that « Columbia » (European « EMI ») was not basically against good contemporary music and, incidentally, to please Dennis Brain who had begged to record the Hindemith Horn Concerto with Klemperer, we started on that work. Within an hour, I sensed on the horizon another of the storms that had plagued Klemperer's career. At the interval, Dennis came to me and said :

« Guv'nor, I can't risk it with that old man ; he's got no rhythm and he can't or won't accompany me. » (Dennis sometimes enjoyed the sport of hurring.)

Lotte Klemperer, fearing yet another crisis in her beloved father's embattled career, was deathly pale although she had not heard Brain's plaint. Tension grew. At the end of the session, Dennis (the gentlest of men) refused even to come to the evening session - he was not going to blow his lips to shreds for something that could never be published. I told him I would phone him in the afternoon. I could feel that the Orchestra was on Dennis's side. I went home, drank a strong Martini and refused lunch.

That afternoon, at about 3 o'clock, Lotte Klemperer arrived unannounced at my office, still paler, not yet knowing that Dennis Brain had refused to go on, but all too aware of the impending danger and fearful that yet another break might put us all back to square one. To save everybody's face, I changed the programme for that evening to another Paul Hindemith work, which I knew Klemperer admired : « Nobilissima Visione » . Lotte telephoned her father who agreed and, when she had left, I called Dennis that he must come to the evening session and behave as if nothing had happened. Faces and honour were saved that afternoon.

« Nobilissima Visione » was new to the Orchestra but we completed it in 2 gratefully relaxed sessions and, as a coupling, we recorded the « Saint-Antoni Variations » . From the moment I asked Otto Klemperer to insist that, in the statement of the theme, the contra-bassoon should play much louder, a musical rapport was established between us which was to last for many years. We then recorded the « Jupiter » Symphony and the Mozart A major Symphony (No. 29) , 2 works which we both particularly loved and which he did incomparably. That batch of work was completed with his recording of the 4 Bach Suites - today's pedants prefer to find his performance old fashioned, but their clarity and integrity will command respect, probably reverence, in years to come. Klemperer mistrusted musicologists :

« They know nothing about music but all about “ ology ”. »

Fashions of style, in musical performance, are variable and, as much a matter of vogue as the length of women's skirts, the location of their waists or men's hair styles. We finished that year's recording with all the 4 Overtures Beethoven wrote for « Fidelio » .

Before the end of this batch of work, Klemperer and the Orchestra had, so to speak, fused. He was always at the Hall early and sat on his rostrum watching each player's arrival with a baleful eye. He worked carefully, stopped rarely and used few but explicit words. He usually played a whole movement through, then, rehearsed all his wants in detail. Slowly, he thawed a little and, over the years, we made a good collection of his caustic witticisms. The 1st, I think, was when the sub-principal 1st violin looked repeatedly and pointedly at his wrist-watch because Klemperer was rehearsing 1 minute or 2 over-time. Klemperer, at 1st, feigned to ignore this. Then, stopped the Orchestra, leaned over to the player and asked mock-solicitously :

« Is it still going ? » , and continued rehearsing.

Karajan's visit

Klemperer's recording history, from then on, is history if not yet, legend. In October 1955, we recorded Beethoven's « Eroica » , 7th and 5th Symphonies, in that order. The slow movement of the « Eroica » was so profoundly moving, so different from anything I had ever heard, that I telephoned Karajan and tried to explain to him the miracle Klemperer had achieved in this movement. Karajan said :

« Put it on next season and I will come over specially to hear it. »

He came and, deeply moved, went down to the Artists' room to thank the old man.

Klemperer : « “ Herr ” von Karajan, what are you doing here ? »

Karajan : « I have come only to thank you and to say that I hope I shall live to conduct the “ Marcia Funebre ” as well as you have done it. Good night. »

By now, Klemperer had passed his 70th birthday. But, for a man who had suffered major illnesses, he was working with extraordinary vigour, and although, the hearing of one ear was impaired, I do not believe orchestral players noticed it. We were in the middle of recording the Brahms Symphonies when he quietly telephoned me one morning to say that his wife, to whom he was devoted, had died in Munich during the night. He was sorry to have to cancel some sessions but he would fly back immediately after the funeral.

One year in the 1950's, his daughter telephoned me to say that he had been rushed into hospital with a perforated appendix and undergone an emergency operation. When he had recovered from that, he had to undergo another major operation but, this too, went well and the giant was soon back at work.

The « Philharmonia » Chorus

Ever since Karajan had conducted Beethoven's 9th Symphony at his 2nd London concert, in the late-1940's, with the « BBC » Chorus, which sang deplorably to his ears and mine, I had planned to have my own « Philharmonia » Chorus to match the quality of the « Philharmonia » Orchestra. The one man in England capable of training such a chorus, Herbert Bardgett, was tied-up with the Huddersfield Chorus and various similar but small bodies in the North and could not undertake a weekly visit to London. The problem obsessed me for years. Klemperer said I would never solve it.

Suddenly, at lunch with my wife in a restaurant above Lucerne in August 1956, I found the only possible solution ; I would cable Wilhelm Pitz whose work I knew well from Bayreuth inviting him to Lucerne to discuss an interesting project. He came within 2 days and agreed to audition possible singers ; if we could get a minimum of 200 good young voices, all amateurs (I set low-age limits) , I would establish the « Philharmonia » Chorus and he should be its chorus Master, flying from Aachen once a week, for at least 1 rehearsal, with 2 months holiday for the chorus while Wilhelm Pitz was in Bayreuth. We started the auditions in September and, to our mutual astonishment, found nearly all we needed. We were a bit short on real tenors and deep contraltos when we started, but the 9th went into rehearsal and, after a year's intensive work, Klemperer conducted the 9th Symphony with my « Philharmonia » Orchestra and Chorus singing in impeccable German (2 performances) , as the climax of the 1st of his London Beethoven Festivals (1957) . It was recorded that November. A distinguished conductor who was staying with me, at the time, listened to the 1st pressings of the choral sections and muttered :

« Unfortunately, too good. »

Klemperer, Pitz, the Chorus and I were very proud.

In the summer of 1958, I went to Zürich for the 1st public exhibition of works of art from the incredible Buehrle collection. To my surprise, Lotte Klemperer was waiting for me outside my hotel. She was drawn and pale. Hastily, she explained that her father had a sudden recurrence of his euphoric state. She evidently knew, from experience, that these periods could last a long time and, perhaps, endanger his work.

Tragedy again

That autumn, Klemperer was to conduct concerts at the Leeds Festival. A couple of days before he was due to arrive, Lotte telephoned me to say that he had bronchitis and would have to cancel Leeds, but he would be well in time for the London concerts, one miscellaneous programme and a Beethoven Festival due to start in the last week of October. Daily telephone calls to Zürich were re-assuring ; the patient was recovering normally. Early one morning, shortly before he was due in London, there was a telephone call from his daughter ; against doctors' orders, her father had been secretly smoking in bed during the night, set the bed clothes on fire and, in an effort to quench the flames, doused himself with the nearest liquid which happened to be a large bottle of spirits of camphor. Awakened by the smell of burning and camphor, she had run to his room and managed to put out the flames but not before her father was terribly burned. He had been rushed into hospital and the situation was grave. The best doctors in Zürich were in attendance but his life was in danger.

Lotte was as brave as her father, who was soon talking of fulfilling all his London engagements. The doctors insisted that I must be the person to break it to him that, for the 1st few concerts, deputies would have to be found, but that I must give him to believe he would be able to conduct the later concerts. It was a chilling experience to have to lie to this huge, fearless and determined old man. Now helpless, bandaged and prostrate, knowing perfectly well that, even if he recovered, he had months of suffering ahead. I asked Karajan and Böhm if they would take-over but neither was free any of those dates. Eventually, André Cluytens agreed to conduct the 1st concert. And Carlo Maria Giulini, the 1st concert of the Beethoven cycle. The greatest help came from Eduard van Beinum, a man I greatly admired but had never met nor invited to conduct my Orchestra. He re-arranged his Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » schedule so that he would, if needed, conduct nearly all the concerts but he could not, in any case, take over the 2 performances of the 9th. Between the concerts, I frequently flew to Zürich to re-assure Klemperer that he would soon be well again.

The doctors insisted that he must not know he would not be able to conduct the 9th ; they feared he might suffer a relapse. Eventually, about 2 weeks before the rehearsals for the 9th, were due to begin. I had to break it to him that I must engage someone to stand in, just in case he did not feel well enough to conduct. Would he choose with me from the list of available conductors ? Slowly, I read out the 11 names to each one ; he replied either with a mock pitying or a scornful « No » , once or twice with a weak but strident laugh. At the end of this depressing litany, he said :

« I have the solution, engage Hindemith ! »

I explained gently that much as I admired a lot of Paul Hindemith's music, and liked him enormously as a man, I could not do that to the « Philharmonia » audiences. I had heard Hindemith conduct the 9th twice - twice too often for me. Klemperer replied that either Hindemith had been in bad conducting form or I, in bad listening form. In any case, it would be interesting for the London public to hear how a great composer of the 20th Century conducted the music of a great composer of the 19th Century. Seeing my reluctance, Klemperer, ill as he was, put on a virtuoso performance which convinced me, in retrospect, that he could have been a great ham-actor. He appealed to me half-tearfully as « the only friend I have, you who have helped me so much, not to refuse what may be the last favour I ask of you » . He would not like me to have that on my conscience for the rest of my life. I capitulated and, still against my better judgement, engaged Hindemith.

I had to go to New York but I told Jane Withers to telephone me after Hindemith's 1st concert, as soon as she had collected the opinions of the few people whose judgement I relied on. They were chilling. I was back in London to hear the 2nd performance but crept-out of my box shamefully, in the middle of the slow movement. A few days later, I was in Zürich to see Klemperer. He was obviously much better and, rarely for him, quietly genial.

Klemperer : « My friend and colleague Hindemith had bad criticisms for the 9th, in London. »

Legge : « How do you know ? You've always said you never read criticisms of your own concert or anyone else's. »

Klemperer : « When a man is as ill as I am, he reads anything - even musical criticism. »

Legge : « It's your fault ; you insisted I ... »

Klemperer : « ... should engage him. I'll never take your advice about artists again. »

« You have been in the musical profession long enough to know that gloating over the misfortunes of colleagues is the only joy left in life. »

He was evidently on the mend. At least, I was richer by one new Klemperer story.

A month later, Peter Diamond beamed to me that he had a good new Klemperer story - against me. He had recently seen the old man who had said to him :

« You know, “ Herr ” Diamond, that I have only one real friend in the world - and he's not a Jew and he's not German ... he's English ... Legge ! Do you know what he did to remind the London public how I conduct Beethoven ? He engaged Paul Hindemith. Think of it, Hindemith ! to conduct the 9th Symphony ! »

My troubles were not yet over. For the spring of 1959, I had announced that Klemperer would conduct a Mozart cycle of 3 concerts ; a Brahms cycle of 4 concerts ; 2 miscellaneous programmes ; and, finally, the complete « Saint-Matthew Passion » with the cast that eventually recorded it and sang it at the Festival Hall with him, a couple of years later. I had to find other conductors for all these concerts, except the « Saint-Matthew Passion » which was postponed.

Harmonious 13 years

I knew Klemperer personally, only from 1951 until the spring of 1964, and, for 10 years, supervised every recording he made, except a couple of sessions of the Mozart Horn Concertos with Alan Civil. It was a harmonious cooperation and, except on 2 occasions (both of them at recordings of Concertos) , we got on well together. We frequently argued, mostly about tempi and balance of texture, but almost invariably came to agreement without more than parry and thrust.

He preferred to record, whenever possible, whole movements at a stretch and was reluctant to repeat even short passages to edit into a complete take, however necessary they might be - mostly because of untidy chording or because, as Sir Henry Wood was wont to say :

« This ensemble ain't together, gentlemen ! »

Klemperer's main preoccupations were with form and with clarity of musical structure. Everything thematic had to be in high-relief. In general, he favoured a big sound and he rarely asked for pianissimi such as Toscanini, Furtwängler, and Karajan insisted on. The only 2 memorable exceptions to this were the opening of the slow movement of the « Eroica » and the cello and bass « unisono » in the last movement of the 9th. He had little interest in sensuous beauty of sound, either in orchestral playing or in voices. Musicianship, rhythm, solidity of sound, steady tempi, accuracy of note-values and clarity of texture were all he asked. Tenderness and sentiment, elegance, grace and charm seem to have been left-out from his musical make-up, nor did he admire them in other conductors ; he was all intellectual power and granite will. In front of Orchestras, he had a strong force of suggestion and an almost hypnotic ability to get-out of them what he wanted, even though, in the years we worked together, the partial paralysis somewhat limited what he might have expressed with his exceptionally beautiful hands.

His wit was ironical and mocking, often cruel. He usually greeted the news of a distinguished colleague's death with :

« So. We are having quite a good year. »

The one time they met, Maria Callas got the better of him. She went with me to a Klemperer concert and, at the end, I took her down to meet him.

Klemperer : « I have heard you twice. “ Norma ”, very good. “ Iphigénie ”, horrible. »

Callas (smiling) : « Thank you, Mæstro. »

Klemperer : « But I am sure “ Herr ” Legge will agree to invite you to sing at a concert here with me. What would you like to sing ? »

Callas (wreathed in smiles) : « The arias from “ Iphigénie ”, Mæstro. »

From 1955 onwards, I had been sending Wieland Wagner each new Klemperer record as soon as it was published, hoping we could together devise some way of getting Klemperer to conduct in Bayreuth. There was, of course, the difficulty for the physically handicapped Klemperer to clamber-up the steep steps to the rostrum in Bayreuth's orchestral pit but we projected a performance of the 9th to open a Bayreuth Festival with Klemperer conducting the « Philharmonia » Orchestra. Unfortunately, the Bayreuth musicians refused to play for the Festival, unless, they played the 9th.

Some years later, Peter Diamond, at that time director of the Holland Festival, engaged Klemperer to conduct, and Wieland Wagner to produce « Tristan und Isolde » . That was in 1959. In defiance of his doctor's orders, Klemperer, not fully recovered from his burns, still having skin grafts to repair his wounds, went to Holland to prepare « Tristan » . He was running a high-temperature and, after a few days, Lotte telephoned me to go over to Holland immediately to induce her father to give-up « Tristan » . By the time I arrived, he had sensed he could not go on. Lotte and Otto Klemperer, Wieland and I lunched together. Klemperer ate little and seemed to be asleep. Wieland whispered to me across the table that he had something important to discuss. Klemperer, immediately alert, suspiciously insisted on knowing what we were going to talk about. Wieland hedged at 1st but, to placate Klemperer, admitted he wanted to discuss with me possible cuts (not for Holland but for Bayreuth) , in the 2nd Act of « Tristan » :

« König Marke's long solo, from the dramatic point of view, holds up the action. »

Klemperer protested :

« What do I hear ? Wagner's grand-son wants to make cuts in his grandfather's work ? Horrible ! Wait, I have the solution ! Marke sings his 1st bar : “ Thatest Du es wirklich ? ” (Did you really do it ?) to “ Tristan ”. Now, make the cut you want. Marke sings : You fool ! I have to do it, you don't ! Curtain ! »

Klemperer left for a long convalescence, a few days later.

By the end of that August, he had sufficiently recovered to conduct the « Philharmonia » Orchestra at the Lucerne Festival. The euphoric phase had not yet spent itself during his long illness though, perhaps, it may have helped him through it, even saved his life. We were all so glad that he was restored to physical health that, at the 1st rehearsal in front of the whole Orchestra, I invited him to become its Principal Conductor for life, which he accepted.

« Don Giovanni »

I was now near realizing a long cherished project for Klemperer to record and, afterwards, give 2 concert performances of « Don Giovanni », in October that year. I had collected a jewelled cast of great singers : even for Masetto, the young Piero Cappuccilli, now the supreme Italian baritone, was engaged. After 2 days recording, Klemperer suddenly ran a high-temperature and his London doctor insisted that he should cancel the recording and the concerts. I was left with the cast contracted for the recording and the concerts which were already nearly sold-out, 3 weeks ahead, but no conductor. I appealed to Carlo Maria Giulini who hardly knew the Opera but agreed to take-over.

Heinrich Schmidt, from the Vienna Opera, and Antonio Tonini, from La Scala (my invariable and invaluable musical assistants) and I had all lived with this Opera more than half our lives. We promised Giulini that, as a team and with that cast, we would help him produce a great « Don Giovanni ». 4 or 5 days before the end of the recording, Giulini, who had hoped to be released from a broadcast in Holland, learned that the Dutch refused to change the dates : he would be unable to conduct the concert performances but he could finish the recording, except many of the recitatives. Fortunately, Colin Davis, who had helped me out during the Mozart cycle that spring, was free and he took-over the concerts with great success. I am happy to believe that these concerts born of many crises successfully launched him on his career.

The 1959-1960 season then continued without mishap. Klemperer was well enough to fulfill all his further engagements to audiences, happily welcoming him after his long illness. That season included the Mozart and Brahms cycles which deputies had conducted for him the previous season. The same summer, he went with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra to the Vienna Festival to conduct a Beethoven cycle. I believe this was the greatest success he ever enjoyed in Vienna where, more than 50 years earlier, he had aspired to be a member of Gustav Mahler's musical staff.

In 1960, Herbert Graf invited Otto Klemperer to conduct « Fidelio », at the Zürich Opera. Lotfi Mansouri produced, Sena Jurinac was the Leonore. For Klemperer, it was a triumph but, thanks to his acrimonious rows with the Orchestra, they refused to play with him again.

He had his recompense in 1961 when he produced and conducted « Fidelio », at Covent Garden, his debut there at the age of 76 ! Finding a scenic designer to his taste had already given the Covent Garden staff many headaches. His ideas had changed since the « Kroll Oper » « Fidelio » and it was evident he wanted more conventional, nearly naturalistic sets, so I suggested Hainer Hill whose Richard Strauß' « Elektra » scenery, in the East-Berlin Opera, had impressed me. I showed Klemperer a photograph of it and Hill was engaged. This series of performances were and still are considered a major peak in Covent Garden's post-War history. We agreed to record the Opera, in 1962, but I insisted on an entirely different cast, except for John Vickers. We were both stubborn but I won. And with Christa Ludwig (who had never sung the part) , John Vickers, Walter Berry, Ingeborg Hallstein, Gerhard Unger and Franz Crass, we achieved what I consider Otto Klemperer's best Operatic recording.

« Die Zauberflöte » performances were less distinguished. Klemperer insisted on having a relation of an old Berlin friend as designer and the man produced sets which looked to me like a provincial monumental mason's junk yard. His 3rd Covent Garden production was « Lohengrin » with Régine Crespin, Rita Gorr, Sándor Konya and others. This was in 1963. He conducted « Fidelio » again, at Covent Garden, in 1970.

The pipe-smoker

In private life, he was usually quiet, stern and unostentatious. He had no interest in luxury and ate sparingly. At times, usually when he was in his euphoric state, he smoked a great deal. Then, he often dropped lighted cigarettes or matches still burning on to the floor or blew sparks from his pipe like an old-fashioned railway-engine. In the depressive state, he studied and re-studied the works he had known for more than half a Century, always seeking new truths, searching for the inner-most recesses of the composer's mind and intentions. He was a man of few words but, with people he liked, he had good manners and, for a few flowers, a little present or some extra attention to his comfort, he would invariably telephone to express his thanks.

Although he had been a Roman Catholic for many years, before I knew him, his Jewishness was a leitmotif of his thought ; although he always crossed himself half furtively before going on to the stage, at every concert. I once asked him if he was convinced that Gustav Mahler was a better composer than Anton Bruckner.

Klemperer : « Of course not. »

Legge : « Then, why do you play more Mahler than Bruckner ? »

Klemperer : « Because Mahler was a Jew, and because he got me my 1st jobs. »

Yet, after he conducted Mahler 4th, for the 1st time in London, I asked him why, considering that both he and Bruno Walter had been close to Mahler, their interpretations of his music were so different. He dismissed the question with :

« Walter's Mahler is too Jewish for me. »

But the only present Klemperer gave me was an anthology of Jewish humour. Haftel, the leader and business manager of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra told me the following story : Klemperer had a sister living in Israel and visited her, at least twice. He was offended that he had not, on either occasion, been invited to conduct the Israel Philharmonic and he asked Haftel to call on him. The nub of the short meeting was :

Klemperer : « Mister Haftel, I am on my 2nd visit to Israel, I am a well-known Jewish artist and you have never invited me to conduct your Orchestra. Why ? »

Haftel : « Doctor Klemperer, you have chosen to be received into the Roman Catholic Church so, for us, you are a heretic. »

Klemperer : « But my colleague conductor, Doctor Serge Koussevitsky, is also a Jew who was baptised and he has not only conducted your Orchestra here, he has also toured with it in the United States. »

Haftel : « Yes, but Doctor Koussevitsky conducted without fee. »

Klemperer : « I am still Jewish enough, not to do that. »

Like several German Jews I have known, Otto Klemperer was more German than most Germans. Unfortunately, I never heard him conduct « Die Meistersinger » . But his broad tempi and the weight, as well as the clarity of the counterpoint in his recordings of the Overture, and the heavy-footed accents and the solid lumpishness of his « Dance of the Apprentices » , for me at least, came nearer to what must have been Richard Wagner's own concept, than any other performances I have heard. Wieland Wagner was of the same opinion.

This is neither the time nor the place to discuss the reasons for my decisions to resign from « EMI » and, before the year's notice of my departure had elapsed, to suspend the activities of both the « Philharmonia » Orchestra and Chorus. I must, however, say that a recently published statement implying that the dissolution of the Orchestra was decided upon without Klemperer knowing before hand is simply untrue. 2 or 3 days before I invited the Orchestra's committee to meet me, I sent Klemperer a copy of the statement, I intended to circulate to the Press, for his approval. Jane Withers, the Managing Director of the Orchestra, telephoned Lotte Klemperer to ask if her father wished for any alterations. No suggestions or alterations were made.

I still had important recordings planned with Klemperer. Händel's « Messiah » we started, but did not finish together. I had intended that my last great Operatic recording for « EMI » (the Verdi's « Requiem » with Carlo Maria Giulini was to follow later) should be « Die Zauberflöte » with a matchless cast. The Thomas Beecham version of this work had been my 1st great Operatic recording production, in 1937-1938, and it has not yet been equalled. Without preliminary warning, Klemperer informed me that he would not allow me to attend any rehearsal. He knew perfectly well that I had worked intensively, sometimes for weeks, with singers before such important recordings. I could not and would not involve myself in and take the responsibility for such an important and expensive undertaking without having personally supervised the rehearsals, least of all with a conductor whose hearing was, by then, more evidently impaired. That was the end of our association.

« Immer war Undank Legges Lohn. » (Ingratitude was always Legge's wage.) A pun paraphrase on Loge's famous remark in « Das Rheingold » .

Klemperer is reported to have said, after he came to dinner at my house, that I was a very dangerous man. 3 years later, in Milan, I had launched him on the last and longest stage of his career, the one by which he will be best remembered. And I had put him, for the 1st time in his long life, on a road which was to provide him and now, for many years to come, his children with a safe and substantial income. I had also induced the West German Government to award him their highest order for distinguished civilians.

Now, he is dead and I ask myself what his posthumous reputation and influence will be. No one convincingly attempts to adopt his slow tempi and none his austere sound-palette : I hope no one will attempt to copy his slow-motion soundtracks of the skeletons of Mozart's Da Ponte Operas. Toscanini's brilliance and intensity, and the early Stokowski's intoxicating sonorities have been models for half a Century of younger conductors. Wilhelm Furtwängler, much disputed in his lifetime, is now the idol and the ideal for that generation of young men (now nearing their 40's) who were stars before they were 30 and still have to find their personal styles, valid for themselves and the public.

A great man has gone from us. He was a lone giant in a period of great contemporaries, born between 1885 and 1900. When the best conductors of my generation are dead, the world may have to do without men of Klemperer's quality and devotion to music who have made music live for us.

Otto Klemperer talks to Alan Blyth

« The Gramophone » (May 1978) .

Otto Klemperer is 85, on May 14. Already part of musical history, he remains very much a man of today, willing to attend a performance of Karlheinz Stockhausen's « Gruppen » - and enjoy it. Indeed, when he gave me one of his very rare interviews, he was as eager to discuss the future as the past, Pierre Boulez as much as Gustav Mahler. He has known vicissitudes (and not merely the physical ones of recent years) and lived to laugh at them and to bask in a well-deserved Indian Summer of reputation.

His career began at the German National Theatre, in Prague, where he became a conductor on Gustav Mahler's recommendation and his 1st recollection was of performances of « Pélleas et Mélisande » there, under Angelo Neumann, and the quite extraordinary impression Claude Debussy's new sounds had made on him, then. Mahler himself was, it almost goes without saying, another seminal influence both as a man and as a musician. He was so kind and helpful to young people, although to the older generation he often seemed bad-tempered, and that's why they hated him. He was strong and upright in his convictions - perhaps, the only man in Vienna, at that time, who couldn't be bribed. It was absolutely the fashion, at that time, to send a critic a few hundred Marks, in order to get a good review.

Mahler, like Klemperer, always had his ears open to new music :

« You know, it's no use saying this or that piece is a bad noise, 1stly because it is untrue, 2ndly because the young are always right as Mahler said. He acknowledged this grudgingly when he heard what Arnold Schönberg was writing. He said :“ Why shall I go on composing if this is the future of music - I cannot understand it. ” , and yet, he helped Schönberg financially. »

After Prague, Klemperer spent his galley years at Hamburg (where he attended the 1st performance of « Pierrot lunaire ») , Strasbourg, Cologne and Wiesbaden conducting repertory opera and he has a healthy disrespect for the system, at any rate, as it was then practised : How can performances be of a high-standard if you give every day another opera, without proper rehearsal, without serious meaning. That's why he still cherishes the memory of his next period, spent at the legendary « Kroll Theater » , in Berlin :

« My hatred of the repertory system was an urgent reason for me to go to the “ Kroll ”. There, we gave only 10 Operas in 9 months, repeating the performances very often. Here, Opera and drama were truly united : We were supported, you see, by what was called the “ Freie Volksbühne ”. This workers' organisation took seats for about 120 performances in the year and gave us a guaranteed income. These block-bookings meant that we could afford a good repertory and it included Paul Hindemith's Operas, “ Cardillac ” and “ Neues vom Tage ” ; Arnold Schönberg's “ Erwartung ” and “ Glückliche Hand ” ; Leoš Janáček's “ From the House of the Dead ” ; and Igor Stravinsky's “ Œdipus Rex ” (its 1st staging) and “ The Soldier's Tale ” , in a double bill. This last was like the old Greek theatre ; 1st, something serious, then, something funny. Mind you, I think “ Erwartung ” played to the emptiest house I've ever seen. Of course, we did repertory works too (“ Don Giovanni ”, “ Fidelio ”, “ Holländer ”) but we did them as real music dramas. »

But this 1st great achievement of Otto Klemperer's life was destroyed by circumstances beyond his control. The reactionary climate in Berlin caused the closing of the « Kroll Oper » , in 1931, and with it the end of the adventurous Symphonic concerts he was giving there too. He moved to the less congenial State Opera. Then, with the arrival of the Nazis, in 1933, his contract was cancelled abruptly and this most European of men was forced to emigrate to America :

« We could only be thankful to the Americans who gave us bread and work. And it was a country without concentration camps - that was enough. But I could not say I was really happy in a country where money played such an important part in the arts, where one had constantly to be conducting works like “ Scheherazade ”, where someone with some power and connections could suggest leaving-out the last movement of the “ Pathétique ”, because the 3rd movement made such a good ending ! America has a different atmosphere musically speaking (or it did, then) and the Orchestras, good as they were technically speaking, did not play with the warmth I was accustomed to. I was born in Europe and I'm acclimatised to European culture. If you would ask me : Would you go back ? I would answer : No. »

He and his daughter, Lotte, have a further (and very good) reason for bitterness over America in the way, as naturalised citizens, they were deprived of their passports for being abroad too much after the War. In 1947, they went to Budapest for 3 years where Klemperer was musical director of the Opera :

« That was a very good time. I was allowed to do exactly what I wanted without any interference from the Communist regime. It was only when they began to hinder me, in 1950, that I left. »

During that time, he conducted as well in Australia and Canada before incurring the hip accident that kept him incapacitated for 1 year :

« I remember myself, the London concerts promised that had to be cancelled then. I remember too (and how incredible it now seems) , a Beethoven programme, in 1954, at the Festival Hall when there were many empty seats. All that changed, as did his fortunes generally, when he became chief conductor, then president, of the “ Philharmonia ” Orchestra. Their relationship has been a long and happy one : They are all wonderful players and readers, and their good behaviour at rehearsals is always a pleasure. They are emphatically not slaves. »

I asked him why he so much prefers having his 2nd violins on his right :

« They play a big role in Symphonic music. They are very seldom in unison with the 1sts and, therefore, they must be independent. On the other hand, I think it is important for the cellos and basses to be together, rather than about as far separated as can be.

Another unmistakable feature of an Otto Klemperer performance is the clean articulation of the strings :

« It is most important for a conductor to indicate the bowing and dynamic marks he wants in the parts. I do this in my score and, then, the “ Philharmonia ” librarian transfers these to all the parts. To conduct from old parts is really a punishment. For “ Figaro ”, if I'd used the Covent Garden ones, I would have had to sort-out at least 10 different sets of markings. Fortunately, I was able to get a new set from the publishers, Breitkopf, in Leipzig. My old friend, the composer Paul Dessau arranged this for me, so I was able to start from the beginning. »

He volunteered another crucial piece of information about his conducting habit :

« It's very important always to observe the pauses, to keep the precise measure of every phrase. This is like breath to a human being, and you must let the music breathe when it asks for it, not only when it is at its last gasp. »

He sang an example from Mozart to emphasise his meaning. And I heard further evidence of both these points by listening to the « Figaro » recording. Time and again, for instance, in « Venite ingmocchiatevi » and the 2nd Act « Terzetto » , there are instrumental figures often lost in other performances :

« I believe that all but the last articulation should be achieved at the final rehearsal, and that the conductor must exert his influence on the players without them noticing it. And I always say that it's the Orchestra that makes the music, not the conductor. The beat must be light and relaxed. Too much demonstration on the part of the conductor only gives hectic results. Of course, at the performance, we are all on the sea in a little boat and the slightest accident can upset it. That's why I often find the final rehearsal more interesting than the actual performance. »

These days, he finds the strain of recording very tiring, yet, at 85, his enthusiasm to put on disc many more interpretations is only held in check by his daughter's understandable concern for his continuing good health. Works he has in mind are « Così fan Tutte », « Œdipus Rex », « The Barber of Baghdad », Bruckner's 2nd Symphony, Mahler's 6th. He has only been restrained with difficulty from tackling the 8th, and he bantered amiably with Lotte while I was there, about whether or not he would conduct again in the Opera House. He would like to direct Berg's « Wozzeck » in the theatre, for instance.

He was undoubtedly enlivened for his revival of Beethoven's « Fidelio », at Covent Garden last season, by the presence of Anja Silja, and his concert performance and recording of « Holländer » with her as Senta was, he tells me, the 1st he had given of the work since 1928 :

« She is a great dramatic artist - her Leonore was quite free of the usual sentimentality. »

Perhaps, that is why he is also such a great admirer of Pierre Boulez. He regularly goes to Boulez's rehearsals and performances :

« He's an absolutely 1st class conductor with an enormous talent in Haydn and Mozart, as well as in Debussy and the modern repertory. »

Klemperer does not see himself conducting more of the Second Viennese School :

« But remember that I conducted Anton Webern before Igor Stravinsky called him the greatest composer of the Century. »

Then, with a twinkle in his eye, he adds :

« You know, Stravinsky, today, is very old. »

He explains the popularity of Mahler, thus :

« I think after 2 World Wars, one feels more the uncertainty, the questioning enshrined in his music. We understand its schizophrenia. I remember conducting a performance of the 2nd Symphony with the New York Philharmonic, in 1936. At the performance, it was an enormous success with those few who attended but, next morning, the critics attacked Mahler and the Orchestra manager told me that he had lost $ 5,000, adding : " You see, I advised you not to conduct it. " »

I saw Klemperer a couple of days after the showing of Ken Russell's « BBC » TV film on Richard Strauß. His disdainful comment was to knock his head with his forefinger to indicate how crazy he thought it had been :

« It was scandalous and, by the end, everyone must have been taking Strauß's part. »

Not that Klemperer himself sees Strauß through rose-tinted glasses. He told me of an occasion, in 1932, when his wife sang in Strauß's « Intermezzo » at a small-town, near Garmisch. The composer attended and Klemperer asked Strauß if he could visit him to gain his advice about conducting « Heldenleben » and « Rosenkavalier » :

« When I eventually went to see him, Strauß, at one point, asked me : “ What will happen if all the Jewish conductors are dismissed ? ” I replied : “ Everything will go on as before. ” Strauß's wife interjected in anger : “ I tell you, Doctor Klemperer, if the Nazis try to do anything to you, I'll show them. ” To which the composer wryly added : “ That would be just the moment to take the part of a Jew. ” I laughed-off his remark. »

I also remember the story of Klaus Mann, son of Thomas, who had the 1st interview with Richard Strauß after the War but did not let on who he was. He asked the composer whether he had ever thought of leaving Germany. Back came the reply :

« No, why should I ? Here, there are 50 Opera Houses ; in most other countries, only 1 or 2. My income would be diminished. »

But these remarks didn't annoy me nearly as much as something he said to me after the 1st World War when we met at « Sils-Maria » , in the Engadine. We went for a walk together and he told me that he couldn't conduct Beethoven unless he had a programme before him :

« What programme ? » , I asked.

« Well, the slow movement of the 5th Symphony, I think of as the Farewell to the Beloved. Then, the trumpets call the man away to higher goals and the final phrase actually fits the word “ Lebewohl ” (Farewell) . »

Here, Klemperer hummed the phrase :

« That really offended me ! »

As for Strauß's music :

« I like everything, up to “ Salome ”. The rest I find impossible with the exception of “ Metamorphosen ”. When I was at Cologne, I had often to conduct “ Die Frau ohne Schatten ” and, I must say, I found it a most ugly Opera. »

In spite of his reputation as a rather austere conductor, he is a great admirer of much lighter music, especially the works of Jacques Offenbach :

« At the “ Kroll ”, we did “ la Périhole ”. That's a really delightful score. So, is “ Orpheus in the Underworld ” and “ la Belle Hélène ”. Those who called him “ The Mozart of the Boulevards ” were not much mistaken. »

Finally, we discussed the retouching of Beethoven's and Schumann's scores :

« This is a very personal question. I do, today, make very slight alterations. It's my own responsibility and I do it because I feel it's right for me. That was exactly how Gustav Mahler felt about his re-orchestrations but, now, his versions of Schumann's Symphonies can be bought and are often given. That's exactly what he didn't want to happen. »

Klemperer's work as a composer should not be forgotten as we celebrate his 85th birthday. « EMI » are bringing-out a record (this month) of his 2nd Symphony and 7th Quartet to mark the occasion and, simultaneously, Peters are publishing the miniature scores of both works. The sessions for the Symphony, like all Klemperer's recordings, were supervised by Mister Grubb, who is the veteran conductor's dedicated right-hand man in the studio and who has also recently been concerned with the refurbishing of Klemperer's recordings of the 9 Beethoven Symphonies. Mister Grubb has a storehouse of Klemperer humour. He remembers during the sessions for « Figaro » wanting to make another take of the opening Figaro - Susanna duet. Klemperer had been quite satisfied with it, but Grubb had his way - not, however, before Klemperer had addressed the singers and Orchestra as follows :

« I am delighted with the duet ; you're delighted too. So is Mister Grubb - in fact, he's so delighted, he would like to hear it again ! »

I went to a recording session at Kingsway Hall while Klemperer was last in London and Mister Grubb, as ever, was in charge, listening in a play-back room with the conductor to the last movement of Bruckner's 9th Symphony - a single take as Klemperer always likes each movement to be. The magnificence of the performance, the stately, noble, inward quality of the interpretation were apparent in every bar of the composer's final Symphonic testament as interpreted by one of his greatest champions. There were some minute blemishes of ensemble ; so Klemperer and the « New Philharmonia » Orchestra played it through, once again - this time with still more intensity.

Klemperer's gestures were, as ever, few and far between but each one had its own special significance, such as the hand held vibrating to the heart at one of the most deeply felt climaxes, or the familiarly expressive arm and hand raised appealingly, urgently for still more warmth and richness from the strings. These are all that the Orchestra needs from its President. The players (as Klemperer himself again insisted) produce the sound and, by now, they know almost by instinct what he wants from them. The results they produce between them are unique today in the world of recording.

His devoted daughter, Lotte, his constant companion and helpmate, who relieves his life of petty burdens so he can concentrate entirely on his music, does not care as much as her father for Bruckner - and says as much. I comment :

« Shame on you. Klemperer, in the mock-anger he loves to employ, says : “ Scandalous, I call it. ” Looking at her affectionately. »

His other companion is his pipe :

« Ernst Bloch (the philosopher, not the composer) advised me to take-up pipe-smoking because of its relaxing qualities and, I must say, I find it my best medicament. »

Lotte is less certain, commenting :

« It keeps the invisible menders in business. »

Let's hope it also keeps Klemperer in continuing good health for many years to come so that, among other things, he can add (as he so obviously wants to) to that treasure house of recordings we already have.

Behind every great conductor

(By Norman Lebrecht.)

I wonder whether any young woman today would do what Lotte did, and give-up her life for the sake of her father and his art. Lotte was the only daughter of Otto Klemperer, the conductor who, more than any other, made Berlin a by-word for musical modernism in the 1920's, and London a benchmark for orchestral excellence in the 1960's.

He could not have achieved these transformations unaided. Klemperer suffered from a severe form of cyclothymic illness which, in manic phases, provoked arrest and disgrace, and in depressive mood, brought him close to self-destruction. Without a responsible relative in constant attendance, Klemperer could not have fulfilled his invaluable musical duties. Even now, 30 years after his death, every British Orchestra contains players whose standards were set by Klemperer, and whose eyes glisten at the mention of his name.

The 1st to look after him was his long-suffering wife, Johanna - long-suffering because, when Klemperer was on a high, he was beset by satyriasis, recklessly pursuing every woman within arm's reach. Gustav Mahler's daughter, Anna, once found herself chased by him around a dining table. Knowing that he had been close to both her parents, she breathlessly sought to preserve dignity and friendship.

She gasped :

« Doctor Klemperer, in Bach's B minor mass, rehearsal figure 48, is that top-note F or F-sharp ? »

Klemperer stopped as if stunned and delivered a magisterial analysis of the work. Music was the only interest that could override his furious compulsions.

Johanna saw him through the glory years at Berlin's « Kroll Oper » , where he presented popular Classics in radical reconstructions, along with new Operas by Kurt Weill and Leoš Janáček, to an audience comprised of factory and office workers. What Klemperer did at the « Kroll » remains a utopian model for 21st Century Opera Houses. It was, inevitably, anathema to the Nazis.

The family left Germany a month after Adolf Hitler seized power. Lotte was 9 and a comfort to her father in the bewilderment of exile. An orchestral administrator in Los Angeles said :

« Doctor Klemperer, you and I have become such good friends that, from now on, I'm gonna call you Otto. »

« You may call, but I will not come. » , growled Klemperer.

In 1939, he underwent surgery for a brain tumour and emerged with one side of his face paralysed, his tongue atrophied and his behaviour even more erratic. Johanna refused to commit him to a mental institution, but Klemperer walked-out on her, saying he needed a year's freedom. He went careering around the country with the wife of the Utah Symphony Orchestra music-director, Maurice Abravanel, leaving a trail of unpaid bills. Reported missing, on the front page of the « New York Times » , he was arrested and displayed in the next day's papers behind bars. Released on bail, he faced a mob of reporters, with Lotte acting as mediator and interpreter. She was 17 and had already been thrust into her life's mission.

Most American Orchestras, scandalised by Klemperer's conduct, crossed him off their books. After a concert in Los Angeles, he went walk-about and was found beaten-up in a gutter. A 1947 tour of Europe was peppered with madcap incidents, winding-up in Budapest where Klemperer took charge of the State Opera and Lotte flirted with communism until they were nudged-out.

Back in America, he was black-listed for serving on the wrong side of the « Iron Curtain » and refused a passport extension. In November 1954, he was holed-up, flat-broke, in a fleapit New York hotel when a young agent, chancing his luck, asked him to conduct a concert in Portland, Oregon. Klemperer balked at travelling 3,000 miles for a single gig, but Lotte and the agent fell « half in love » and she persuaded her father to take the date. It marked a turning point in post-War musical destiny.

In Portland, Klemperer ripped an epochal Beethoven 7th out of the unbelieving fingers of provincial musicians, most of whom had never played it before. The agent, Ronald Wilford, made his name overnight and went on to become the mightiest commercial force in musical America. Klemperer was given a passport and flew to London, where the producer Walter Legge wanted him to conduct the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, « EMI » 's recording band.

In a city awash with Orchestras that played just about as well as required and seldom better, Klemperer fired the « Philharmonia » with an un-English excess of aspiration and self-belief. He conceived each work as a structural integrity, revealing its contours from the opening bars and giving musicians and listeners alike an extraordinary confidence in their comprehension of the work. Every concert seemed to have been programmed as an act of human necessity. At the end of his inaugural Beethoven cycle, the jubilation was so exuberant that the London County Council commissioned a bust of Klemperer, from Jacob Epstein, for the Royal Festival Hall, where it stands to this day.

He continued to court disaster, suffering near-fatal burns when his pipe caught fire in bed and he tried to extinguish it with a whisky flask. In the public eye, he was brutally forthright, never more so than on John Freeman's « Face To Face » television programme. With London musicians, he was alternately rough-tongued and paternal, handing-out cigarettes to the ones who pleased him. When Legge disbanded the « Philharmonia » , in 1964, Klemperer gave his allegiance to the players, investing them with his own rugged independence and securing the Orchestra's survival.

None of this could have come about without Lotte's devotion. Her tongue could be as rough as his when dealing with the fixers of the record industry, but she had the charm and wit to ease most vicissitudes, never presuming to control his life. One morning, bringing the old man his breakfast tray, she found him in bed with a young woman :

« This is my daughter, Lotte, and you what did you say your name was ? » , grunted Klemperer by way of introduction.

To feminists, Lotte's must appear a wasted life, a voluntary form of child sacrifice that post-modern times have made redundant. She died, aged 79 (July 30, 2003) , at her home outside Zürich, unknown beyond the backstage of concert halls and with few tributes to mark her passing.

Intellectual, attractive and formidably capable, Lotte could have made a very different life for herself. When I asked once whether she had ever considered it, she politely ignored my impertinence.

She had made a calculated career choice to be her father's helper, a role that was no less valid in her eyes than the heady ascent of women politicians, artists and CEO's. In 1954, Lotte wrote that her parents' plight had « made me resentful, furious and ... ambitious » . By facilitating her father's fulfilment, her achievement will resonate for ever on record and in our concert life.

Revival and Acclaim in London

Walter Legge scoured Europe and North America during the post-War years, in search of the finest available talent - musicians and conductors not already under contract. Klemperer's career was in limbo when Legge offered him a conductor position with the London « Philharmonia » Orchestra. It proved to be the renaissance of his career.

At that time, London was filled with refugees eager to hear the Classic German repertoire, which Klemperer brought to the « Philharmonia » . The recordings he made with the « Philharmonia » received international praise. Beginning as a guest-conductor, Klemperer was appointed musical director, by 1955. In 1959, he was named the « Philharmonia » 's principal conductor for life. It was during this final stage of his career (which lasted until 1972) that the recognizable figure of Klemperer as an indomitable, deliberate, acid-tongued personality gained acceptance among the general public. He was never very tactful, reserving some of his sharpest barbs for colleagues such as Wilhelm Furtwängler whose work he admired but whose collaboration with the Nazi government he could not abide. The antagonism that Klemperer felt toward Furtwängler, however, was nothing compared to that which he felt toward Herbert von Karajan, who had actually joined the Nazi Party. By the time the War had ended, Klemperer had embraced Judaism and someone like Karajan was not merely a rival, but anathema to him.

In these final years, Klemperer made the recordings upon which his posthumous reputation rests. The pace of many of these recordings is slow, critics have conceded, yet, they confirm him as the Master of the German repertoire : Mozart, Beethoven and Bach. Listening to them, one might never realize that Klemperer had been a harbinger of European modernism, in the 1920's and early 1930's. However, he retained a love for contemporary music throughout his life. Almost belying the Classics is his later interest in the work of Karlheinz Stockhausen (« Gruppen ») and Pierre Boulez. Klemperer was also a composer, though in this area, he did not meet with very much success ; his compositions are seldom, if ever, performed. His total output was 6 Symphonies, 9 String Quartets, and 1 Opera (« Das Ziel ») . Klemperer died on July 6, 1973, in Zürich, Switzerland. He was 88 years old.

« New York Times » Obituary (July 8, 1973)

Otto Klemperer - Conductor Dead at 88. Obituary by Paul L. Montgomery.

Otto Klemperer, one of the Century's great Masters of the German musical repertory, died Friday at his home, in Zürich, according to wire services. He was 88 years old.

The exacting conductor, who conquered a brain tumor and Nazi exile in a full lifetime of music, had been in retirement for nearly 1 year. His health began to fail rapidly, several weeks ago.

His daughter, Lotte, and his son, Werner, the film and television actor, were with him at his death. They said their father would be buried Tuesday in Zürich's Jewish Cemetery.

Mister Klemperer, in a life that spanned the waning days of 19th Century post-Romanticism and the most severe of 20th Century atonalities, had 2 distinct careers in music.

In his 1st career, in Germany, before the Nazis came to power in 1933, he was one of the best-known and most vigorous interpreters of his generation, a gaunt giant of a man who presided over his Orchestras like a soaring eagle. Then, there came a period of exile, illness and severe mental strain. An operation for a brain tumor, in 1939, left him partly paralyzed and unsure of gait, and other accidents followed. His infrequent appearances were with 2nd-flight Orchestras, his career in eclipse.

In the middle- 1950's, in the 7th decade of his life, he again began to make heralded appearances, being hailed as Arturo Toscanini's heir as the world's leading conductor of the German Romantics. Through a fierce effort of will, the old man, his aquiline face twisted into a mask, his massive stature bowed, had found a new place at the top.

In his last years, Mister Klemperer, at the head of his « Philharmonia » Orchestra, was known as a rock of integrity and moral authority in his conducting. His measured tempos and inspired literalness, his iron insistence on correct performance, brought new meanings to his readings of Beethoven, Bruckner, Mahler and others.

Mister Klemperer's conducting was marked by a strict observance of the text. He was never interested in obvious or flashy effects, and was always in complete command of the Orchestra. He had a wonderful sense of orchestral balance, and tried, with all his power, to communicate the central essence of the music.

His interpretations could be austere, but they were never dull. They had an uncompromising kind of musical honesty unparalleled in his generation.

Otto Klemperer was born on May 14, 1885, in Breslau, Germany (now, Wrocław, Poland) . His father, a merchant, and his mother were both musically inclined. His mother gave him his 1st piano lessons at the age of 4, and he grew to love both the piano and the violin.

He was regarded by the Nazis as a leading exponent of « culture-bolshevism » because of his dedication to new music and contemporary staging techniques in the Opera.

In 1933, only a few years after he had received the Gæthe Medal from President Hindenburg for his contributions to « the advancement of German culture » , he was discharged from his post at the State Opera in Berlin. Subsequently, all his property was confiscated and a warrant was issued for his arrest.

Mister Klemperer was a world-famous conductor when he returned to the United States, in 1934, an exile. He led Orchestras in New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh and was director of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra for 6 years.

Mister Klemperer, in addition to conducting, was also a composer. Among his works, all rooted in tonality, were several Symphonies, 1 Violin Concerto, 9 String Quartets, 1 Opera, 1 Mass and many songs. None of his works achieved wide acclaim.

In his work with Orchestras, Mister Klemperer was known as a stern task-Master with a fierce temper. William Steinberg, now director of the Pittsburgh Symphony and Mister Klemperer's assistant in Europe, for a time, recalled that, once, in a rehearsal, he forgot momentarily the appropriate tempos in a portion of « Lohengrin » . The conductor did not speak to him for a month, Mister Steinberg said.

At 16, already a gawky giant (he was 6 feet 5 inches tall) , he went to Berlin to study piano under Kwast Scharwenka and composition under Hans Pfitzner. He was a brilliant and hard working pupil but grew nervous as a performer, and decided to divert his career to conducting and composing.

His debut as a conductor was in 1906, in Max Reinhardt's production of « Orpheus in the Underworld » . Gustav Mahler was impressed by the young man's work, and recommended him for a job at the German Theatre, in Prague. Later, again on Mahler's recommendation, he went to the Hamburg Opera Company and Opera Orchestras, in Bremen and Strasbourg.

In 1917, Mister Klemperer went to Cologne, where he began conducting Symphony Orchestras as well as Opera. In 1924, he returned to Berlin as Opera conductor of the « Berlin Volksoper » and, in 1927, went on to head the « Kroll Oper » under a Government grant.

In 1919, while in Cologne, Mister Klemperer met and married Johanna (Jennie) Geisler, a soprano in the Opera. He was converted from Judaism to Roman Catholicism for the marriage.

The conductor's 1st appearance in New York was on January 15, 1926, when he was guest-conductor of the New York Symphony Orchestra, for 2 months. In his time here, he introduced Mahler's 9th Symphony and Leoš Janáček's « Sinfonietta » .

Mister Klemperer's tenure at the « Kroll Oper » , which ended in 1931, was the high-point of his career until then. Although he paid close attention to the Classics, he lost no opportunity to perform the new work of composers like Stravinsky, Hindemith and Schœnberg.

In 1939, Mister Klemperer underwent an operation for a brain tumor, which left him partly paralyzed on his right side. His appearances in the months after were painful and unsuccessful. In 1941, after he left a mental sanatorium in Rye, New York, the police there sent-out an alarm for him, describing him as « dangerous and insane » .

Mister Klemperer was found 2 days later in Morristown, New Jersey, and appeared composed. A doctor who examined him said he was « temperamental and unstrung » but not dangerous, and he was released.

The conductor's subsequent appearances were few and often involved minor musical organizations. In 1946, he left the United States for Budapest, where he was appointed musical director of the Opera House.

With the help of recordings, his career again appeared on the ascendant but, in 1951, while arriving for an appearance in Montreal, he fell on the ice while getting-off the plane at Dorval airport and broke his hip. Until 1955, when he found he could stand again, his conducting was done from a wheel chair.

Mister Klemperer's rebirth as a world-renowned artist came with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra, in London, which he led for 14 years and became conductor of for life. With the introduction of long-playing records (LPs) , he came into great demand as a conductor, specializing in the German Classics.

The English public, and the critics, regarded him with reverence. In 1967, at a memorable performance of Mahler's 9th Symphony, the audience stood in silence as he made his way to the podium. The only other conductor it had stood for was Toscanini, when he made his last appearance in Britain after World War II.

Mister Klemperer's wife died in 1956 and, thereafter, he was devotedly looked after by his daughter, Lotte. In 1970, in an emotional appearance in Israel, he requested immigrant status from the Government. Though he lived in Switzerland for the later part of his life, he held both West German and Israeli citizenship.

Powerful and Severe Musician : An Appraisal

(By Harold C. Schonberg.)

In his last days, Otto Klemperer on the podium was a sight that commanded awe, pity and terror. All but crippled, this massive man would slowly make his way to the front, seat himself, look at the Orchestra with the permanent scowl that a brain operation had left him, and commence beating time with huge fists.

As he looked, so he conducted. He was not a man to go in for frills, or for any kind of superficial effect. His tempos always tended to be slow and, toward the end, they seemed to crawl. Yet, such was his authority that he could hold the music together, and audiences responded with almost a kind of religious communion.

Oblivious to everything but the shape of a phrase and the construction of a piece of music, Klemperer throughout his life represented the German school of music-making at its most monolithic and severe.

He was the last surviving representative of that school. It was, in his case, a school that, in his youth, was represented by Gustav Mahler, Karl Muck and Richard Strauß, and it extended through such conductors as Felix Weingartner, Leo Blech, Bruno Walter and Wilhelm Furtwängler. All of these conductors represented a tradition that had its roots in the 19th Century, a tradition of high-seriousness tinged with a metaphysical approach towards music ; a tradition of making music as honestly, as scrupulously, and as un-ostentatiously as possible.

But, if the German tradition was paramount in Klemperer's approach, his intellectual background was wide enough to encompass the entire ethic of the Western world. The late Wieland Wagner once summed-up Klemperer :

« Classical Greece, Jewish tradition, medieval Christendom, German Romanticism, the realism of our own time, make Klemperer the conductor a unique artistic phenomenon. »

The great Mahler himself was so impressed by the work of the young Klemperer that he recommended him as conductor of the German Theatre in Prague, in 1907. Klemperer followed the normal routine of young German conductors, advancing from Opera House to Opera House. Where he differed from many German conductors of the day was in his interest in contemporary music.

Those who remember the recent Klemperer, the exponent of Beethoven, Brahms and Mahler, forget that, from 1927 to 1931, he made the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin, a center of avant-garde activity. He introduced or revived major works by Schoenberg, Janáček, Hindemith, Stravinsky and Křenek. In addition to his Operatic duties, he conducted many concerts of Symphonic music, at which he also introduced major works of the 20th Century.

Later, he was content to specialize in the music of Bach through Mahler and Bruckner. Fortunately, he has left a large series of recording that attest to his monumental approach. Listening to his Beethoven and Brahms series, any music-lover immediately finds himself in a rarefied world of sound.

Few conductors have had an equivalent ability to bring-out the sheer, unvarnished power of the music. Where Toscanini had that incredible linear drive and objectivity, where Furtwängler represented an opposite pole of tempo fluctuation, Klemperer was broad, direct and massive, yet, possessed of a musical sensitivity that could illuminate detail, as well as the whole.

Many stories are told about him. This tremendous man scared orchestral players. He expected a supreme effort from them, and he had the physical authority to exact instant obedience. Seldom did he pass-out compliments. When he did, it was a red-letter day for the players.

One story about him has him saying « Good ! » to a player who had turned an especially felicitous phrase. The Orchestra, astounded, broke into applause. Klemperer never had complimented anybody previously.

« It was not that good. » , Klemperer then growled.

Otto Klemperer remembered

(« EMI » producer Peter Andry paid tribute back in August 1973.)

Otto Klemperer enjoyed a remarkable « Indian Summer » thanks to his work with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra (whose principal conductor he was, from 1959 until his death in 1973) and the numerous recordings they made together for « EMI » (including the Beethoven Symphonies, Piano Concertos and « Fidelio » , Mozart and Wagner Operas, and Symphonies by the great composers including Mahler, Mozart, Schubert, Brahms, Bruckner and Schumann) . This week marks the anniversary of his death (he died on July 6, 1973, aged 88) . In the August 1973 issue, the « EMI » producer, Peter Andry, recalled his 1st encounter with the conductor and their subsequent working relationship.

I 1st met Otto Klemperer in Melbourne, some 22 years ago. He had come-out there after repeated invitations from the Australian Broadcasting Commission ; and, to complete the « coup » that year, they had managed to persuade Elisabeth Schwarzkopf to join their concert season. What a line-up of talent !

On a blazing hot morning, we, in the Orchestra (I was a raw recruit to help to strengthen the large group of flute players required for Mahler) , waited with anticipation until the huge man, looking rather unfriendly and detached, lifted his gnarled hands to start the rehearsal.

What happened after that was an experience that no players who have worked under Klemperer will forget. It was rather like being picked-up by the scruff of the neck and willed by that penetrating gaze to play, to act-out a drama tightly controlled and led by that giant who, with no rostrum, stood there before us.

He never became any more friendly ; rather it was the opposite - our meagre talents seemed increasingly to displease him. However, the concerts he gave were all a huge success and, somehow, they managed to persuade him to unbend into a kind of quizzical acceptance of the adulation so eagerly given by audiences who had been transported by him into a new world of music hitherto unglirnsed and, even then, hardly understood. But all who came to those concerts knew that they had been in the presence of a Master of his craft who had given them great music-making.

And my last glimpse of Klemperer after those concerts was on an occasion typical of him. At the end of the final performance, after 4 frenzied recalls to the platform, he simply put on his black overcoat, lit his pipe, and came back to dismiss not only the Orchestra, but the wildly applauding audience.

Some 15 years later, when recording with him here, in London, I was able to remind him of a little episode during rehearsals for those concerts. Knowing that a particularly difficult passage was looming ahead for the flutes, he sidled up to stand in front of us, stopped the Orchestra, and looked quizzically at me. I froze with terror. He pointed at the reasonably good-looking lady flautist next to me, and asked, in that heavy accent that sounded like broken glass and which is so beloved of Klemperer imitators :

« Is she your girl-friend ? »

« No, sir. » , I replied with some embarrassment.

« No ? Why not, then ? » , he demanded, and retreated to the front of the Orchestra obviously disgusted with my lack of chivalry.

Little did I think, in those far-off days, that later, for 10 long years, my work in the recording studio would bring me so very close to the thoughts, mannerisms and innermost core of the musician and human being Otto Klemperer, until the day, early in July, when Suvi Grubb and I stood on the edge of that raw gash in the earth in the cemetery, in Zürich, where we said farewell to him.

As we stood there, many thoughts and memories and pictures swept through my mind. Foremost was the greatness that infused all his interpretations of music ; but, at the same time, I realized how often it seemed impossible for him to draw-out everything that he knew and felt, as, clawing at the air, he tried to control ensemble that often would not be controlled because he simply lacked the physical means to hold it.

He seemed so often to be fighting his way out of that huge and, in his latter years, ungainly body. In order to make sure that he did not come to harm, we used literally to stuff him into the car after his recording sessions ; and my task, at either Kingsway Hall or Abbey Road, would be to press his head down hard so that he would not be hurt as he struggled into the car. To me it seemed, somehow, irreverent. He accepted it as natural.

Physical disabilities he tended to ignore : he was concerned with other things, schedules for the « Missa solemnis » or « Don Giovanni » .

Implacable in his impatience with shoddy work, he was nevertheless mindful of little things. Many times, early in the morning, my telephone would shrill to startle our entire family awake :

« Herr Andry ? »

« Guten morgen, Herr Doktor. » , I would mumble sleepily.

« Thank you for the flowers - they were very nice. Goodbye. »

All of us who value what Klemperer gave us must also value and be grateful for the love, care and attention in these last years of his daughter Lotte, who has devoted so much of her life to her father, preserving him for all of us where, perhaps, other children in the same circumstances might well have done less. She has a lot of her father's character, his sternness, intellect, humour and quick grasp of facts and ideas. She it was who, for year after year, coped with the organisation needed to transport and support Klemperer on his visits to London for concerts and recording sessions - the nurses, wheelchairs, attendants and aides galore needed just to get him into position to begin music-making.

And, then, Suvi Raj Grubb and I would be left with the old man, who in spite of everything insisted on himself turning every page of the score when listening to playbacks of sections of recorded tape. He sat there, impassive. Was he really listening, did something escape him ? The answer is yes, because, above all, he was concentrating on the overall result, the total concept of the work as a whole.

Like so many other great musicians, the actual technicalities of recording were sometimes beyond his understanding. I have never ceased to be amazed at how many of the great musicians with whom I have worked, men of intellect with an immense grasp of things musical (and often financial as well !) , either could not or would not understand the simplest request that would result in a better recording. Tape-editors, who have to cut and match tapes often at impossibly difficult points in the score, have had to spend hours trying to make a perfect join for Beecham or Klemperer, when just a few seconds extra, played before or after the section to be repeated by the Orchestra, would have made the job so much easier. But ask them to repeat 1 bar or 2 because of some fault or other which could be well-covered by a few seconds of playing time and, immediately, they would replay the entire movement. We, in the control room, often asked ourselves whether this was just perversity, or a greater insight into the music than our own.

With Otto Klemperer, one could not know. Things for him were never simple or direct, but always slow, painstaking and deliberate.

Among the happiest times, I remember spending with him were in Paris when, after our recording sessions in London, he conducted Mahler's Symphony No. 9 to a typically smart and noisy Parisian audience. But, as soon as this stark and deeply moving music took hold of them, their chatter and rustling were quickly silenced, and Klemperer and the Orchestra had a success with them such as I have rarely witnessed.

Klemperer was, once more, captivated by Paris. He could relax into a teasing jocularity and, at the age of 82, he had Lotte extremely worried by declaring that he had decided to come to Paris to live. Zürich, he declared, was by comparison dull and parochial.

For Klemperer's enjoyment of his stay, Peter de Jongh of « Pathé-Marconi » had managed to hire a large and comfortable limousine with an extrovert and loquacious driver who appeared to be one of the last of the White Russian emigres and a man of great personality and charm. Klemperer had a special affection for « chauffeurs », and this one made his stay a complete success. In the car, we all toured Paris in the spring sunlight, ending with a happy meal in a fine restaurant, happy in spite of Klemperer's often gloomy predictions of the coming of a new War or the resurgence of German militarism.

In his later days, I noticed in him a growing asceticism, a kind of consolidation of all essential things and the discarding of the trivia of life. A picture, I recall vividly, is of his commanding presence in the simple drawing-room of his Zürich home where, for hours, he would sit bolt upright either studying the Bible, composing, or listening with concentration to the broadcast news bulletins. Yet, none of us who knew him closely will ever be able to forget his earlier flashes of dry wit, and the host of amusing tales, both by him and about him, which were a total contradiction of the immense seriousness of purpose which informed all his life and work. Perhaps, in those very contradictions, lay the secret of his greatness. He was a man and an artist who, larger both physically and mentally than most men, was able to draw into his earthly life a vast range of experiences.

When, in 1967, we were reading through the 1st movement of Mahler's 9th Symphony with the « New Philharmonia » Orchestra, before starting to record, his daughter asked him to explain the meaning of the marking in the score « wie ein schwerer Kondukt », heavy and ponderous music which leads into that final section so reminiscent of the « Abschied », in « Das Lied von der Erde ». Slowly and carefully, Klemperer showed us the meaning, and gave a detailed comment on that point, in the music used to depict a funeral cortege.

And it was that music which was in my mind when, following his coffin, we came to his last resting-place :

« Vale », dear Master.

Otto Klemperer studied in Frankfurt and Berlin and, on the recommendation of Gustav Mahler, was made conductor of the German National Theatre in Prague, in 1907. Between 1910 and 1927, he conducted Opera at Hamburg, Barmen, Straßburg, Cologne, and Wiesbaden. In 1927, he became director of the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin, where he expanded the repertory to include works by Paul Hindemith, Ernst Křenek, and Igor Stravinsky. He was conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra (1933-1939) and of the Budapest Opera (1947-1950) . In his later years, he was especially known for his interpretations of the Symphonies of Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, and Gustav Mahler, as well as for his updated versions of core repertory, such as Beethoven's Opera « Fidelio » (1805 ; revised versions in 1806 and 1814) . At age 70, Klemperer began one of the most acclaimed periods of his career, as music-director (1955-1971) of the « Philharmonia / New Philharmonia » Orchestra in London, with which he made many recordings for the « EMI » label. His own compositions include an Opera (« Das Ziel » , 1915 ; revised in 1970) , 9 String Quartets, 6 Symphonies, 17 pieces for voice and orchestra, and lieder.

Otto Klemperer is less well-known as a composer but, like other famous conductors such as Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Bruno Walter and Igor Markevich, he wrote a number of pieces, including 6 Symphonies (only the 1st 2 were published) , 1 Mass, 9 String Quartets, many lieder and the Opera « Das Ziel » . He tried, at times, to get his works performed, as he had hopes of being remembered as a composer as well as a conductor, but had little success. They have generally fallen into neglect since his death, although some Symphonic works have received the occasional commercial recording.

4 String Quartets and a selection of piano pieces and songs have been recorded in 2 limited edition (CD box-sets) .

Many listeners associate Klemperer with slow tempos, but recorded evidence now available on compact disc shows that, in earlier years, his tempi could be quite a bit faster ; the late recordings give a misleading impression. For example, one of Klemperer's most noted performances was of Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, the « Eroica » .

Eric Grunin's « Eroica Project » contains tempo data on 363 recordings of the work from 1924 to 2007, and includes 10 by Klemperer - some recorded in the studio, most from broadcasts of live concerts. The earliest Klemperer performance on tape was recorded in concert in « Köln » , in 1954 (when he was 69 years old) ; the last was in London with the « New Philharmonia » Orchestra, in 1970 (when he was 85 years old) . The passing years show a clear trend with respect to tempo: as Klemperer aged, he took slower tempi. In 1954, his 1st movement lasts 15:18 from beginning to end ; in 1970, it lasts 18:41. In 1954, the main tempo of the 1st movement was about 135 beats per minute ; in 1970, it had slowed to about 110 beats per minute. In 1954, the « Eroica » 2nd movement, « Marcha Funebre » had a timing of 14:35 ; in 1970, it had slowed to 18:51. Similar slowings took place in the other movements. Around 1954, Herbert von Karajan flew especially to hear Klemperer conduct a performance of the « Eroica » , and later, he said to him :

« I have come only to thank you, and say that I hope I shall live to conduct the Funeral March as well as you have done. »

Regardless of tempo, Otto Klemperer's performances often maintain great intensity, and are richly detailed. Eric Grunin, in a commentary on the « opinions » page of his « Eroica Project » , notes :

« The massiveness of the 1st movement of the " Eroica " is real, but is not its main claim on our attention. That honour goes to its astonishing story (structure) , and what is to me most unique about Klemperer is that his understanding of the structure remains unchanged no matter what his tempo. »

Similar, if less extreme, reductions in tempi can be noted in many other works for which Klemperer left multiple recordings, at least in recordings from when he was in his late-70's and his 80's. For example :

Mozart : Symphony No. 38 « Prague » , another Klemperer specialty. In his concert recording from December 1950 (when he was 65 years old) with the « RIAS » Berlin Orchestra, the timings are :

1st movement : 09:45 (with repeat timing omitted ; the performance actually does take the repeat) ; 2nd movement : 7:45 ; and 3rd movement : 5:24.

The 1962 « Prague » is not notably slow ; rather, the 1950 recording is much faster than most recordings of the work, even by « historically informed » conductors.

In his studio March, 1962 « EMI » recording of the same work with the « Philharmonia » (recorded when he was 77 years old) , the timings are notably slower :

1st movement : 10:53 (no repeat was taken) ; 2nd movement : 8:58 ; and 3rd movement : 6:01.

Bruckner : Symphony No. 4, « Romantic » (Robert Haas edition with emendations) .

A 1947 concert recording with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » Orchestra has timings of :

1st movement : 14:03 ; 2nd movement : 12:58 ; 3rd movement : 10:11 ; and 4th movement : 17:48.

The 1963 « EMI » studio recording with the « Philharmonia » has timings of :

1st movement : 16:09 ; 2nd movement : 14:00 ; 3rd movement : 11.48 ; and 4th movement : 19:01.

Again, the 1963 is not a notably slow performance, but the 1947 was quick.

The March 1951 « Vox Turnabout » recording with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra was even quicker :

1st movement : 13:26 ; 2nd movement : 11:56 ; 3rd movement : 9:22 ; and 4th movement : 16:30.

Mahler : Symphony No. 7, « Nachtlid » (Song of the Night) recorded for « EMI » , in 1968 :

« Thus, as you listen to this performance, it seems to enclose you within its own world of evocative sound, a world that echoes the world we may know, but remains a world transformed by imagination, remote, and complete within itself. »

1st movement : 27:43 ; 2nd movement : 22:06 ; 3rd movement : 10:27 ; 4th movement : 15:41 ; and 5th movement : 24:15.

Klemperer's Finale is particularly slow-paced at 24:15, where the average timing is approx. 17:30.

Compare Klemperer's Finale with Sir Georg Solti for « Decca » (1971) at 16:29 ; James Levine for « RCA » (1982) at 17:45 ; Claudio Abbado for « DG » (2002) also at 17:45 and Michaël Tilson Thomas' 2005 performance with the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra at 18:05.

Otto Klemperer's views on music can be found in a collection (« Musicians on Music ») edited by Martin Anderson.

Otto Klemperer's conducting career covered nearly 3 quarters of the 20th Century. Although he was not chiefly a man of words, he wrote frequently on music during the course of his long life, and the writings assembled in this book date from 1906 until 1971. Klemperer writes here about musicians he knew and worked with, dwelling with especial interest and respect on Gustav Mahler, who was a formative influence on the young Klemperer. He writes on composers from Bach and Beethoven to Schönberg and Zemlinsky, on colleagues from Thomas Beecham and Arturo Toscanini to Ewald Dülberg and Max Reinhardt. He documents his own career, discussing his conducting, his battle to save the Kroll Opera in Berlin, his period at Los Angeles, his return to Germany, his compositions, and much more.

« Klemperer on Music » also includes a complete list of Klemperer's own compositions, in print for the 1st time ever. Much of « Klemperer on Music » appears for the 1st time in English, some of it for the 1st time in any language.

A kaleidoscopic, fast-paced and well-researched film about one of the 20th Century's great visionary conductors. Director Philo Bregstein introduces us to Otto Klemperer's colleagues on the European art, music and intellectual scene and conveys a vivid sense of the tumultuous times in which Klemperer lived. A « protégé » of Gustav Mahler, Otto Klemperer produced everything from Classic Symphonies to avant-garde Operas inspired by the « Bauhaus » school. Fleeing Adolf Hitler, in 1933, he became a guest-conductor on 4 continents over the next 30 years, despite suffering from a brain tumor and stroke at the height of his career. In Budapest, after the War, the Communist Party repressed his preference for Arnold Schönberg ; but he was also driven from the United States because of MacCarthyism. This avant-garde artist of Jewish origin, this man without a country, continued to conduct and record until the age of 86. A rare selection of archival films include Klemperer conducting Bizet's « Carmen » in East-Berlin, in 1949, and a 1964 « BBC » film of Beethoven's 9th Symphony.

Reviews

It's so extraordinary, this music. Timeless as truth, immediate as revelation ; of breadth and scope that defies all boundaries, transcends one's grasp, yet, as intimate as an unvoiced prayer. From its innermost depths, it unfolds before you in layer upon layer of un-compromised clarity, like a treasure unearthed, like a mystery revealed. And something inside of you responds, from that overlooked realm that dwells beneath thought, where hopes go to die until stirred to life by music. You're moved, you're stunned, you're awed, you're exultant.

Perhaps, you're also determined to discover more about this great Otto Klemperer whose interpretation can affect you so powerfully and profoundly. But you have no intention of tackling a 2 Volume biography, even a critically acclaimed and insightfully written one, and encyclopedias bore you. What to do ? Do you wait for the movie ?

Well, wait no more. There is an Otto Klemperer movie - a television documentary re-edited by film-makers determined to disprove the notion that documentaries must be dull. « Otto Klemperer's Long Journey through His Times » crams the entire epic saga of a life that spanned 88 years, 4 continents, 2 World Wars, and any number of heart-breaking reversals and magnificent triumphs (this life that provided enough material to fill books, dissertations, essays, articles, and reviews galore) into 96 minutes. That's including the sections devoted to the many composers with whom he was closely associated (among them, Gustav Mahler, Igor Stravinsky, Paul Hindemith, Arnold Schönberg, and Richard Strauß), as well as the scenes of Klemperer in rehearsal and performance, which supplement the biographical commentary. The commentary itself is provided by people who worked with Klemperer in every stage of his career from his Strasbourg years on, including Hans Curjel of the « Kroll » and Peter Heyworth of the London « Philharmonia / New Philharmonia » period, and by Klemperer himself, who proves a most congenial story-teller.

This is intense viewing, a visual and aural onslaught of riches, an award-winning inundation of treasures. Klemperer's history, music history, world history, inextricably intertwined, lavishly illustrated, enthrallingly narrated, richly accompanied by Klemperer's music, unfurl before you at breakneck speed. Plan to be glued to the screen. Plan in an intermission - you'll need one. And do not expect to take everything in the 1st or even the 2nd time through.

Klemperer lived and made music through 2 World Wars to become a great interpreter of Brahms, Beethoven, Bach and Wagner. Yet, he was also a visionary of new music, who was deeply influenced by Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith and Igor Stravinsky. Attacked by the Nazis, he emigrated to the United States, only to be persecuted, a decade later, during McCarthy era witch-hunts.

Rare archival material, including Klemperer conducting during the 1930's and 1940's, together with interviews with Klemperer and his colleagues and associates, places Klemperer against the rich backdrop of intellectual Europe of the 20th Century.

« Otto Klemperer's Long Journey through His Times » takes the viewer on a revealing journey through 8 decades and across 4 continents, in a unique look at an extraordinary artist.

Philo Bregstein's remarkable film is nothing less than a survey of the life of a legendary musician and human being.

Review by critic Eleanor Mannikka Rovi :

This is an excellent, updated version of a 1973 documentary on the great German conductor Otto Klemperer whose life spanned 2 World Wars and the vagaries of communism against capitalism. Klemperer also fully absorbed his environment, musical or otherwise, and assessed it accurately. In addition to interviews with the German conductor and his colleagues, director Philo Bregstein uses historical footage to provide a needed background that further highlights the conductor's achievements. In the late-1930's, Klemperer came to the United States to escape Nazi persecution and suffered a stroke ; he was diagnosed as having a brain tumor. After World War II, he went to live in Budapest and worked at the Opera, there. During the post-War years, communism was pushing Social-Realism in art, literature, and music, and Klemperer's love of composers like Arnold Schœnberg, Igor Stravinsky and Gustav Mahler ran against the grain. Repression drove Klemperer to the United States again, just in time to be persecuted during the MacCarthy era. The last years of his life were spent in West Germany, where he died at the age of 88, in 1974. For anyone interested in the history of modern music, as well as modern history, this is a very informative documentary.

Review by critic Marilyn Ferdinand :

Last night, I went in search of something to watch that wasn't a feature film. Rather quickly, I laid hands on an old « Facets » video, a documentary about the great 20th Century German conductor Otto Klemperer. The combination of cultural history and glorious music seemed ideal, so that's what I watched.

As it happens, today is the anniversary of Otto Klemperer's birth, a fact I learned from Carl Grapentine, the morning host for WFMT FM, Chicago's Classical radio station. Klemperer (father of Colonel Klink : Werner Klemperer) would have shocked Grapentine as being too old for a conductor he witnessed in action. Klemperer lived to be 88, so just about any older adult who listened to Classical music stood a chance of being able to see him conduct.

Otto Klemperer's long and tumultuous life threw a bit of a wrench into my plans for a leisurely evening in front of the television screen. You just don't loll around when a man talks about meeting Gustav Mahler and having him listening over his shoulder and correcting a score note written many years ago, discussing Jewish and Christian concepts of the divine with Sigmund Freud, or hanging-out in Los Angeles with fellow refugees Igor Stravinsky, Arnold Schœnberg, Bruno Walter, and Albert Einstein. I had to stop surfing around on my lap-top and really pay attention - and I'm very glad I did.

The documentary begins with Klemperer conducting under the opening credits and segues to the aged Maestro rehearsing an Orchestra. We will return to his rehearsals throughout this mainly chronological film, watching Klemperer's seated form exert minimal movement to guide the musicians, sing measures of the score to show where he wants emphases to be, and scold one unfortunate violinist for not playing as instructed.

The story begins in Breslau, where Otto Klemperer was born and given his 1st musical lessons by his mother, a talented pianist. He began his musical studies in Frankfurt, though he wanted to become an actor. It was only when a theatrical production he was involved with lost its conductor that he was quickly seated at the podium. This, he said, thrilled him immensely - he just a music student and conducting an orchestra ! This moment, I imagine, sealed his fate.

He went on to Berlin to continue his music education at the Stern Conservatory, where composer Hans Pfitzner, a musician in the Romantic tradition, was his instructor. He mentions sitting in a park one day and watching a man walk slowly past. The man had a slight limp, and Klemperer realized that he was Gustav Mahler. I'm not certain how it happened, perhaps through Hans Pfitzner, but Klemperer and Mahler became acquainted. It was during this acquaintance that he received the score correction I mentioned earlier. Klemperer became enamored of modern music through Mahler's influence, and it was Mahler whose recommendations secured Klemperer positions at the German National Theatre, in Prague and in Hamburg. He continued to knock around Germany in the 1910's, accepting positions in Straßbourg, Cologne, and Wiesbaden.

He conducted quite a bit of Opera, thereby putting his actory ambitions into service in working with the production designers and singers on staging. His harsh musical opening and stark staging of Richard Wagner's « The Flying Dutchman » borrowed Bertolt Brecht's technique of epic alienation, angering conservative audiences, particularly, the fledgling Nazis who favored heroic-Romantic stagings of Richard Wagner. His « Fidelio » removed the pleasantries of the traditional staging, putting the chorus of political prisoners in this, Beethoven's only Opera, in chains rather than allowing them to walk freely.

In 1927, Klemperer made his biggest mark, as music-director of the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin, championing the modernist works of Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schœnberg, Paul Hindemith, Igor Stravinsky, and even Kurt Weill. The documentary gives us an excerpt of Klemperer conducting Kurt Weill's « Kleine Dreigroschenmusik » (Suite from « The Threepenny Opera ») .

Throughout this cinematic resume, Otto Klemperer continuously comments on the social conditions around him, particularly the rise of the Nazis and the growing threat to the Jews of Europe. He remarks that, after World War I, when Germans saw their troops come home spiffy and bedecked with flowers, it was hard to imagine they had actually lost the War ; the blame was, of course, placed on the Jewish bankers. Klemperer had contact with some of the great thinkers of his day, including Marxist philosopher Ernst Bloch, whose musical content for « The Spirit of Utopia » (1918) , he reviewed. When Klemperer, a Jew, learned that the Nazis had arrested a Jewish professor of his acquaintance (« Where is he ? Nobody knows. ») , he determined to leave Germany. He journeyed to Austria, Switzerland, France, and was invited to Los Angeles by a wealthy patron of the conductorless Los Angeles Philharmonic. In the film, he makes fun of the fat-cat society matrons who were his new Masters ; accounts of how he turned the rag-tag musicians into a world-class Orchestra show that the scorn was not mutual. And he agonized that all he could do was sit in exile while the Jews of Europe were being exterminated.

In 1939, a brain tumor left him semi-paralyzed and virtually unemployable. His career resurrection came as the chief conductor of the Budapest Opera (1947-1950) . In 1959, he was appointed Principal conductor for life of London's « Philharmonia » Orchestra by its founder, Walter Legge. When Legge decided to disband the Orchestra, it re-organized as the « New Philharmonia » under musician management, with Klemperer at its head.

Klemperer was devoted to the composer above all things and lived the philosophy of rehearse, rehearse, rehearse ; he did something unheard of among penny-pinching Opera companies - he rehearsed once with the Orchestra alone and, then, with Orchestra and singers. He studied scores as religious scholars study the Bible or the Koran ; when he couldn't get work conducting, this became his overriding preoccupation. Unlike the intensity of Arturo Toscanini or the Romanticism of Wilhelm Furtwängler, he conducted without adding his own flourishes, and many of his recordings are considered authoritative - the composer's cut if we put it in cinematic terms. His tempos tended to be slow (though I fancy nobody conducted a slower Mahler than Leonard Bernstein) and exact, which didn't always please either his musicians or his audiences.

Yet, it's very clear from this documentary that he was an emotional person who felt each note, and the excerpts to which we are treated sound just fine to my admittedly untrained ear. Among the musical excerpts in the film are the London « New Philharmonia » Orchestra playing Beethoven's « King Stephen » Overture, Mozart's Serenade KV 575, and Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 2, « Resurrection » ; the Amsterdam « Concertgebouw » playing Arnold Schönberg's « Verklärte Nacht » ; footage of the Berlin « Komische Oper » 's production of George Bizet's « Carmen » ; and the « Berlin Staatskapelle » performing the Overture to Jacques Offenbach's Opera, « la Belle Hélène » , as well as « Salome's Dance » from Richard Strauß' Opera, « Salome » .

Many of his professional collaborators were interviewed for this film, including conductor Paul Dessau, who worked under Otto Klemperer at the Cologne Opera ; Hans Curjel, who was Klemperer's dramaturg at the « Berlin Kroll Oper » ; Natalia Saz, a Russian theatre and Opera director, whose good-hearted indifference to the male chauvinism of Western Opera Houses is delightfully expressed ; and French composer-conductor Pierre Boulez, who was flabbergasted that Klemperer wanted to watch him rehearse. Moje Forbach, the soprano who sang Senta in Klemperer's production of « The Flying Dutchman » at the « Kroll Oper » gave insight into Klemperer's matter-of-fact stage directions :

« You will go here and then you will move here. »

It was clear she was enchanted with Klemperer, testament perhaps to his reputation as a womanizer, a reputation that is not even alluded to, here. Instead, we get the adoring reminiscences of his daughter Lotte, who also pays tribute to her mother, mezzo-soprano Johanna (Geisler) Klemperer. All agreed on Klemperer's imposing height.

I commend Bregstein for digging-up footage of some of Klemperer's less accessible works, and think the use of photos interspersed with short talking-head interviews and voice-overs moved well. The sheer breadth of Klemperer's life and career poses a challenge to anyone who wants to recount them, yet, I didn't feel overwhelmed by the material Bregstein presented. I think the documentary should have given some background on his recordings (one is left with the impression that, when Klemperer couldn't conduct, he wasn't doing anything ; it may be hard to take in how revolutionary Klemperer really was in his time) shattering the Romantic movement with a head-long rush into modernism.

Reviews

« This is a proper book, immaculately researched and lucidly written, a warts-and-all biography that none the less abides by the rule that, whatever a great man's foibles, he deserves, in the final analysis, to be judged by the strongest links in his chain. In Klemperer's case, some links, some chain. » (Richard Osborne, « Gramophone »)

« Superb and meticulously researched. It is a powerful and sobering tale, told with lucidity and force. » (« The Sunday Times »)

« Mister Heyworth tells Klemperer's heroic and tragic story with a fitting sense of drama and full human understanding and sympathy. It is difficult to see how any musical biography could be done better, and impossible to see how this particular one could. » (Bernard Levin, « The Observer »)

« This fine and detailed study leaves us in no doubt as to Klemperer's heroic stature. » (« The Guardian »)

« He could not have hoped for a more devoted and percipient chronicler than Peter Heyworth. Always alive to the broader political and cultural context, Heyworth's biography is a landmark contribution to the story of musical life in our Century. It would be hard to imagine a fairer assessment of the conductor ; here, we have the triumphs and disasters, the idiosyncrasies and even some of the elusive greatness of Klemperer's conducting. »

(Patrick Carnegie, « The Times Literary Supplement »)

« One of the finest accounts of a musician ever written. Heyworth's prose is unaffected and precise, his scholarship impeccable, his judgements fair and humane. » (Michaël Kennedy, « The Sunday Telegraph »)

« Klemperer's dramatic story, full of wrenching reverses, is told with a wealth of absorbing detail, and there is a wonderfully complete discography. » (« Publishers Weekly »)

« Those who have never heard Klemperer, or even of him, will enjoy and be enlightened by this book. » (« New Republic »)

« Biographies of conductors do not generally have much impact outside the immediate musical circle, but the 1st volume of Peter Heyworth's life of Otto Klemperer, published in 1983, was an exception. This was because the man's life encompassed far more than waving a wand before an Orchestra. In the 1920's, Otto Klemperer was the guiding spirit behind Berlin's " Kroll Oper ", a breeding ground for ideas about Opera staging and scenery that were still powerful in the 1970's. But more than that was the large figure of the conductor himself. In addition, Klemperer's recordings produced, in his later years, continue to sell and to serve as an interpretive alternative in this era of the dozen available recordings of every core Classical work. »

(Excerpt of Patrick J. Smith's review of Volume 2, which appeared in the February 17, 1997 issue of « Opera News » .)

« Inevitably, as time passes, the art of Otto Klemperer is identified in the memories of those who heard him with caricatures of the qualities that happened to distinguish it, at the end of his career. In London, where, between 1955 and 1972, that career was played to its close, Klemperer is recalled as a grand, old-style, Continental man of music, who presided over ponderously literal readings of the German and Viennese Classics. People speak of his performances as if they were the over-mighty monuments of a defunct religion, mausoleums in orchestral sound for the burial and commemoration of Europe's greatest musical dead, unfriendly, lugubrious places from which one emerged into the fresh night air, spiritually chastened but physically chilled. Accordingly, weight, breadth, depth, architecture and austerity are now seen as the canonical attributes of the Klemperer interpretation. And slowness.

The slowness of the later Klemperer was, indeed, shocking. No one who experienced it has forgotten it. Perhaps few, however, have remembered the 60 years of intellectual development and personal struggle which lay behind those super-cooled, Stygian tempi. By explaining the earlier development of Klemperer's art, Peter Heyworth's biography places the notorious aspects of its last phase in a proper perspective, and restores balance to a reputation which has become, in England at any rate, lop-sided. It teaches us, for example, that Klemperer's tempi were not always slow ; moreover, that the slowness of the later tempi was not a symptom of senility or geriatric motor deficiency, but the last expression of one of the Century's most unorthodox and subversive musical temperaments. Like his radically un-Romantic readings of the 1920's (criticised for being too fast) , Klemperer's later interpretations cut across prevailing idioms, compelling audiences to wake-up and listen. At a time of creeping « cliché » in the performance of the standard orchestral repertoire, slowness was one of the ways Klemperer rescued music from glibness and triviality. Lotte Klemperer, Otto's daughter, does not recall ever having seen her father look at himself in a mirror. It never crossed his mind, she supposes, to keep a diary. Self-regard was no evident part of his nature. In a conductor that must be remarkable. »

(Nicholas Spice, « London Review of Books »)

« Peter Heyworth, the music-critic of “ The Observer ” of London, has given us a richly detailed, historically acute, esthetically insightful biography of the conductor Otto Klemperer. It is so rich, in fact, that at nearly 500 pages, Mister Heyworth has only got through half the story, the 2nd part will not be coming for many years. Such sober attention is normally lavished on composers, not mere re-creators. But Mister Heyworth justifies every page. He certifies Klemperer's own importance as the quintessential practitioner of “ objective ”, post-Romantic conducting, and he provides a lucid history of music and musical politics in the 20th Century.

One might fear that the really lively material would await the 2nd Volume. It was only after 1933, when Klemperer had fled Nazi Germany, that the drama of his life insofar as most of his latter-day admirers know it really began. It was then that he became conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic, in the heart of the Southern California German cultural community in exile ; that he had surgery for a brain tumor and was forced to prove his sanity by fleeing a mental institution and promoting his own concerts ; that he slipped further and further into obscurity, conducting in East-Berlin and Budapest, and that, finally, he was welcomed into the pantheon of the Master conductors by the British musical community in the 1950's and 1960's. Klemperer died in Zürich, in 1973.

Mister Heyworth's young Klemperer seems a far cry from the stern, grim, rock-silent guardian of German musical tradition that he later became. Klemperer was a disciple of Gustav Mahler, a champion of the avant-garde, a leftist and a sometimes manic philanderer. Mister Heyworth details, in all its melodramatic complexity, one Comic-Opera, nearly tragic affair with the recently married soprano Elisabeth Schumann, in 1912.

But Klemperer was no dashing, happily amoral “ Don Giovanni ”. He was a brooding, tortured, painfully earnest young German-Jewish provincial struggling to make his way in the Central European cultural and political world. His Romantic and sexual outbursts, which occurred simultaneously with his intermittent spasms of composing, are explained by Mister Heyworth as the products of an increasingly severe manic-depressive syndrome that plagued him all his life.

The explanation is a convincing one, although it sometimes too partly excuses the conductor's moral lapses. Having swept Elisabeth Schumann away from her husband, for instance, he quickly cooled toward her. And, in 1933, in a pitiful effort to retain his already compromised position in Germany, he wrote prose poems in praise of the New-Order and even suggested the formation of a Jewish Palatine guard to protect Adolf Hitler.

What makes Mister Heyworth's treatment of these failings so admirable is his scrupulous fairness, as well as the firmness with which he places Klemperer within the larger cultural and social context of the late-19th and 20th Centuries. Mister Heyworth is brilliant in sketching the complex world of pre-Weimar Germany : the clashes between musical progressives like Gustav Mahler and conservatives like Hans Pfitzner, and the ethnic confrontations between French and Czechoslovak majorities and the ruling German minorities in Straßbourg and Prague, the texture and substance of small-town German Operatic life.

This book is fine, too, in tracing strictly musical questions : the growing isolation of composers in the 20th Century ; the evolution of conducting style from Romanticism to a less sentimental sternness and the particulars of specific Klemperer interpretations over the years. Mister Heyworth seems to have read every review and memoir, explored every archive, talked to every survivor with even a wisp of memory of the way things were 50 and more years ago.

His study is at its very best, however, in the description of the “ Kroll Oper ” , in Berlin, which Klemperer helped found and which he led over its entire existence, from 1927 to 1931. Mister Heyworth offers the most comprehensive account yet of this seminal Opera company, which served as the primary inspiration for Walter Felsenstein, Wieland Wagner and nearly all modernist Operatic innovation in the half-Century since. And what makes the Heyworth portrayal so valuable is his refusal to whitewash or sentimentalize the “ Kroll ” 's many artistic failures and conceptual confusions.

The “ Kroll ” was the keystone in Socialist attempts to reform German Operatic life. House policy was a forced marriage of the avant-garde in composition and production with the working class. Klemperer and Alexander von Zemlinsky and Fritz Zweig conducted ; there were premieres by Igor Stravinsky, Arnold Schönberg, Paul Hindemith and Leoš Janáček ; the designers included Oskar Schlemmer and László Moholy-Nagy, and the subscription audience was drawn from the Socialist-linked “ Volksbühne ” organization.

Unfortunately, and almost inevitably, while the “ Kroll ” became the darling of Leftist intellectuals, it had no success at all convincing workers that what they really wanted was not “ la Bohème ” with stars, but 12 tone music and Cubist “ Fidelios ”. At the end, the company had lost nearly all the political allies who might have been able to save it.

This book could have been better copy-edited and proof-read ; there are insignificant errors and in-elegancies, here and there. But the overall prose style is as deft and direct as the scholarship is reliable and imaginative. On to Volume 2 - but, even if for some reason, it never gets written, this volume alone will stand as one of the most informative, readable musical biographies ever written. »

Childhood

Otto Klemperer was about 9 years old when he 1st saw the man who was to be the central inspiration of his entire life as a musician :

« I remember as though it were yesterday, seeing Mahler on the street when I was quite small. I was on my way to school. Without anyone pointing him out to me, I knew it was him. At that time, he had a habit of pulling strange faces, which made a tremendous impression on me. I ran along shyly after him for about 10 minutes and stared at him as though he were a deep-sea monster. »

The school boy also noticed that his hero held his hat in his hand and walked with a jerky gait, as though he had a club-foot. After that initial encounter, he frequently saw Mahler who, since 1891, had been 1st Conductor at the Hamburg « Stadt Theater » and had lived in the west of the city close to the « Grindelallee » . 2 years before his arrival, the boy's parents had settled nearby. Otto Klemperer's father, Nathan, was a newcomer to Hamburg. Like all his recorded ancestors, he had been born in the Prague ghetto. The family name had originally been « Klopfer » , which was derived from « Schulklopfer » , the synagogue official whose task was to wake members of the Jewish community for early service and its children for school. In 1787, however, as part of the reforming Emperor Joseph II's attempts to integrate the Jews into Christian society, the head of each family was obliged to assume a family name and every member of it also take a 1st name. Hence Otto's great-great-grandfather, who had been born « Gumpel the Klopfer » in 1758, died in 1803 as Markus Klemperer.

Otto Klemperer never knew his paternal grandparents. His grandmother died young, having given birth to 9 children of whom 4 died in infancy. His grandfather Abraham (1809-1887) was an austere, ascetic character - qualities that, after skipping a generation, were to stamp the grandson. A portrait, now lost, showed a dark face with black eyes and compressed lips. Abraham Klemperer is described as a teacher, versed in the Talmud. However, he gained his living, it cannot have amounted to much, for his 2nd son, Nathan, who was born in 1846 and was to be Otto's father, started work as an errand boy at a Jewish trading house, at the age of only 11, before he had even finished elementary school.

That premature end to his formal education can hardly have been in accordance with Nathan's own wishes. Even as a boy, he revealed a passion for the theatre and for music and, while still a penniless apprentice, managed to attend performances of Schiller in the gallery. But his own artistic ambitions were to remain thwarted. His pious father refused to countenance a career as an actor, which was still not considered a respectable occupation. And, when he began to reveal an attractive baritone voice, his own unwillingness to become a cantor barred the only form of professional training open to him. Thus, he never learnt to read music and was not, and never was to be, in business. But, in 1864, at the age of 18, he left Prague for Germany to earn a living as a commercial traveller in Silesia. At night, in lonely hotel rooms, he was able to make-up for some of the short-comings of his education by avid reading. After 5 years of this peripatetic existence, he finally settled, in 1869, in the provincial capital of Breslau, where, he and a younger brother, Hermann, opened a small shop that sold haberdashery and toys. The frequency with which the business moved its premises suggests that it was never very firmly established. The brothers also manufactured dolls and, at the exhibition of Silesian handicrafts and industry that was held in Breslau, between May and October 1881, they received a diploma of honour for their products. It was at this exhibition that Nathan Klemperer met his future wife, Ida Nathan, who had come from Hamburg to visit a married sister. Fräulein Nathan was a talented pianist and, on the evening after they had met, she accompanied Nathan Klemperer in some Schubert songs. Although they were both in their early 1830's, it seems to have been a love match. 3 days later, they were engaged, and, on 28 December 1881, they were married in Hamburg. They were, in some ways, a strange couple. Ida Nathan, who was born in 1849, came from a background very different from that of the orthodox and impecunious Klemperer.

A student in Berlin

At the end of August 1901, Ida Klemperer took her son to Frankfurt. He was already enormously tall, a feature that was emphasised by his thinness, long arms and clumsy movements. The Hoch Conservatory, housed in a handsome new building in the style of a Roman « palazzo », was at the height of its reputation. There, he sat an examination and was accepted by what, at the time, was one of the leading institutes of its kind in Germany and, thus, in the world. James Kwast proved to be a splendid musician (he also composed) and an admirable teacher. There were also theory and composition classes under Ivan Knorr. « To Kwast and Knorr », Otto Klemperer later stated :

« I owe the whole basis of my musical development. »

The regime was demanding. For 8 hours daily, he practised the piano, a further hour was devoted both to the violin and to theoretical exercises. His progress must have been rapid for, in December 1901, he was singled-out to play Beethoven's Sonata in D major, Opus 10, No. 3, at a Conservatory concert and, in the new year, he was the soloist in a performance of Robert Schumann's Piano Concerto.

Life in Frankfurt delighted him. He had an attic room to himself in the apartment of a retired piano teacher, where practising presented no problem, and, above all, he was free. The city had a good Opera House and Orchestra and, as a student, he had access to cheap tickets. For the 1st time, he heard « The Ring » and was swept-off his feet by it. Here, was a new world and, for a while, he became an avid Wagnerian though, in the course of his piano studies that passion ebbed, as he became increasingly drawn to Johannes Brahms. There were other excitements. He was given Edvard Grieg's Piano Concerto to play and even that sounded modern to ears that had been exclusively reared on the Classics. He heard Eugène d'Albert perform the Beethoven's « Emperor » Concerto, and Paderewski was another pianist who left a lasting memory. But the deepest impression at Frankfurt was made by Julius Stockhausen. Although in his mid-70's, the celebrated baritone, who was particularly renowned for his interpretation of Brahms's Lieder, still gave private classes. Among his pupils was Otto Klemperer's violin teacher, August Leimer, who was probably instrumental in securing for Klemperer the privilege of acting as accompanist. When the great man held-up his phrasing as a model to his class, the young pianist flushed with pleasure. It was also at the Hoch Conservatory that he met a fellow pupil, the pianist Lonny Epstein, who was to remain a close friend until her death, in 1965. Indeed, had not a love-affair with the pupil obliged James Kwast to give-up his position, there is no reason to suppose that Klemperer would not have completed his studies in provincial Frankfurt. In that case, his career might have turned-out very differently. But when, in 1902, James Kwast moved to the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory in Berlin, Otto Klemperer and a number of other pupils opted to follow him. Nathan Klemperer came to Frankfurt and family permission was given for a move in the autumn.

After the impressive Frankfurt institution, the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, modestly housed in the « Postdamerstraße », seemed something of a come-down. Nonetheless, the tuition was good. Klemperer joined the theory class given by Philipp Scharwenka and worked on orchestration and score-reading under Wilhelm Berger. For a while, he persisted with violin instruction and was even persuaded to join a conducting class. When his turn came to take the baton, he experienced so little difficulty that the instructor told him that he had no need of lessons in stick technique. But, for the time being, at any rate, his piano studies under James Kwast continued to be his main concern, and evidence of the attention his playing was beginning to attract was no long in appearing in the musical press.

On 24 June 1904, the « Allgemeine Musikzeitung », whose editor, Otto Leßmann, taught musical history at the Klindworth-Scharwenka establishment (doubtless a reason why its house events were so assiduously covered in that journal), announced that Klemperer had been awarded its piano prize of 200 Marks for a performance of Bach's Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue. On 17 March 1905, the same periodical commented favourably on his accompaniment of the Dutch cellist, Jacques van Lier, in a performance of Tchaïkovsky's « Variations on a Rococo Theme ». 14 days later, yet another review of an event at the Conservatory described him as « konzertreif ». In fact, he had already made his 1st recorded professional appearance, 2 months earlier, when, on 10 January 1905, he had accompanied Leßmann's daughter, Eva, in a group of songs at the « Berlin Singakademie ».

Thus, at this stage of his career, Klemperer still seemed destined to be a concert pianist. Although his fingers were considered too large and thick, he was already a formidable technician and a fellow-student, Ilse Fromm, has paid tribute to the extraordinary sense of musical equilibrium that already marked his performance of the « Hammerklavier » Sonata by Beethoven. In 1905, while he was at the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, James Kwast entered him for the Rubinstein prize, in Paris. This was a major international competition, for which the bashful young Klemperer considered himself inadequately equipped. Founded by Anton Rubinstein, in 1890, it offered substantial prizes for composers, as well as pianists, and took place every 5th year and, each time, in a different city. In Paris, in August 1905, the winner was the 21 year old Wilhelm Backhaus. Béla Bartók, who offered what eventually became his Rhapsody for piano and orchestra, Opus 1, received a mention for composition but no award as a pianist. About Klemperer, opinions were divided. That is not wholly surprising as 2 movements of one of Rubinstein's own Piano Concertos (which were obligatory for all candidates) were hardly calculated to show-off his talents to best advantage. A month later, however, he entered for the Mendelssohn Prize, in Berlin, at that time, the foremost competition in Germany and, on this occasion, was commended by a jury that included Joseph Joachim for his performance of the « Hammerklavier » Sonata, a work that was certainly more to his taste.

But nervousness hindered progress. When performing in public, Otto Klemperer's hands grew wet with tension and his playing was considered, by James Kwast and others, to be less impressive than it was in private. Even so, by the time of his 1st year at the Stern Conservatory, to which he transferred in 1905, he had come to be regarded as a Classical pianist of exceptional promise, while the future of another pupil, Edwin Fisher, was, at that time, thought to lie in conducting. Heinz Tiessen, the composer, who also entered the Stern Conservatory, in autumn 1905, later recalled the young Klemperer as already spell-binding. At the public examinations, at the end of the school year, his account of the Schubert-Liszt « Wanderer-Phantasie » was described as absolutely mature and the term ended with a special commendation.

Berlin naturally offered a far wider range of musical activities than more historically important but smaller cities, such as Frankfurt and Hamburg. Richard Strauß, still only in his late-30's, had, since 1898, been 1st Conductor at the august Court Opera « Unter den Linden » and, in April 1907, Klemperer had an opportunity to savour his fresh and lively approach to Mozart in a performance of « Don Giovanni » that took place at the « Kroll Theater », with which Klemperer's own name was to be so momentously connected a generation later. He would also have been able to attend the concerts that Richard Strauß gave with the « Berlin Tokünstler Orchester », a body the composer had himself set-up, in 1901, for the performance of contemporary works. The conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra was Arthur Nikisch, the star Mæstro of his day, whom the young Klemperer found a better conductor than he was a musician. But he was enthralled by Nikisch's interpretations of the Romantics and, in particular, by the beauty of sound and controlled passion he brought to Tchaïkovsky's « Symphonie Pathétique ». Though already in his 70's, Joseph Joachim was still active as director of the « Musikhochschule » and, as a moving spirit in chamber music. As a student, Klemperer was able to attend the rehearsals his Quartet always held in the « Hochschule », on the mornings of its concerts. On these occasions, Klemperer was impressed by the passionate playing of an old man who had had intimate connections with Brahms and was generally regarded as a pillar of Classicism.

Yet, the gawky, shy young provincial, who walked around with an abstracted look, as though he always had something on his mind, was not 1st much drawn to the German capital. It was, indeed, in many ways an unattractive place at the turn of the Century. In the 30 odd years that had passed since Bismarck had proclaimed the 2nd German Empire at Versailles, Berlin had been transformed beyond recognition. During that period, a sober, strait-laced small city, imbued with Prussian virtues of discipline and restraint and dominated by officials and soldiers, had become a strident metropolis. Huge industries had arisen in the east and north. In the west, beyond the Tiergarten, a prodigious property boom had conjured into existence vast new suburbs with the « Kurfürstendamm » as their main axis. Here, lived the new middle-classes that had flocked to the city in their hundreds of thousands to seek their fortune during the « Gründerjahre » .

Berlin was the « parvenu » among the capitals of Europe and it set-out to do, on a bigger and better scale, everything that had been achieved elsewhere and, above all in Paris, which until the French defeat of 1870 had been regarded as the great city par excellence. A vast cathedral, an even vaster Parliament were built. A 1st-class museum was put together by Wilhelm Bode with truly American energy. Great arteries were opened-up. Roads were broader, pavements more spacious, rooms larger and voices louder than anywhere in Europe. In a term of praise much favoured at the time, Berlin was « kolossal » .

At the Stern Conservatory, Otto Klemperer naturally continued his piano studies under James Kwast. But he also joined Hans Pfitzner's classes for conducting and for composition. Pfitzner, who was still in his mid-30's, was already regarded as one of the outstanding German composers of the rising generation. Indeed, as the composer of 2 Operas, « Der arme Heinrich » (1895) and « Die Rose vom Liebesgarten » (1901) , both of which had enjoyed more recognition than Richard Strauß's earliest essays in this field (« Guntram » and « Feuersnot ») , Pfitzner had claims to be considered the most Operatic composer to have emerged in Germany, since the death of Richard Wagner, at any rate until Richard Strauß swept the board with « Salome » , only a few weeks after Klemperer had joined Pfitzner's class.

Klemperer studied with Hans Pfitzner for 2 years. His Master (as he later referred to him) was not an enthusiastic teacher ; anything that stood in the way of composing was regarded with resentment. His conducting classes took an odd form. One pupil would play the piano (when it was Klemperer's turn, the irascible Pfitzner constantly complained that he played too loudly) , another would conduct, while Pfitzner, who had some talent for this sort of thing, would himself sing all the roles. Whether Klemperer's technique much profited is doubtful. But, as he himself later admitted, he learnt a good deal about the Wagner Operas to which these strange sessions were mainly devoted. Even more important, a warm relationship sprang-up between Master and pupil that, for a number of years, survived difference of temperament and conflicting musical sympathies.

Pfitzner's composition class soon fired Otto Klemperer's hitherto dormant creative ambitions. He had already written contrapuntal exercises and elementary essays in vocal Symphony. Now, a deep love of Johannes Brahms that had developed with growing insight into his piano works led him to compose instrumental music. A piano Trio was performed at the Stern Conservatory and James Kwast himself was sufficiently impressed to offer to take it into his repertory. But Klemperer declined, on the grounds that the work was too dependent on Brahmsian harmony and melody to stand on its own feet. He reacted in a similar way when, in 1907, Karl Muck, to whom he had played a concert Overture, offered to perform it in Boston. Once again, Klemperer got cold feet. It was a curious reaction for a young musician with ambitions to compose and on the point of what might have proved a small breakthrough. But, as later events were amply to confirm, Klemperer's attitude to his own compositions varied with his psychological condition.

Nonetheless, they served to bring him into contact with a musician of far wider perspectives than any he had hitherto encountered and one who was eventually to exercise a deep influence on his own musical attitudes. Ferruccio Busoni had been living in Berlin, since 1894, torn between the demands of his career as a virtuoso and a desire to compose. A refugee from the limitations of Italian musical life, he had been drawn to the homeland of the great Classical Masters, from Bach to Beethoven, but had created sharply against the Wagnerian aesthetic that still dominated German musical life. In this and in much else, he stood at an opposite extreme from his future adversary, Hans Pfitzner, who remained entirely incarcerated within the German Romantic tradition. In contrast, Ferruccio Busoni who, in the orchestral concerts, he had started to promote in 1902, had been among the 1st to bring to Berlin new French works, notably by Claude Debussy and Maurice Ravel, was already seeking a way-out of what he regarded as the impasse confronting post-Wagnerian music.

A musician of such intellectual curiosity, who served as an anti-body within the complacent ranks of the German musical establishment, inevitably came to exercise a growing fascination on the young and, by the early years of the 20th Century, his flat on the « Augsburgstraße » had become a meeting place. Busoni generously made himself available to students, free of charge on 1 afternoon a week, and it was, perhaps, on one of these occasions that Otto Klemperer performed his own Overture. By Klemperer's own account, Ferruccio Busoni was more impressed by his playing than by his composition. For his future development, it was to prove important that, while still a student, he had come within the orbit of 2 such outstanding, yet, sharply contrasted musicians as Busoni and Pfitzner.

But, in 1905, an event had already occurred that was to lead Otto Klemperer's career in a different direction. While he was still at the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, Philipp Scharwenka had recommended him as accompanist to Oskar Fried, a former pupil, who had recently been appointed conductor of the « Stern Gesangsverein ». Fried's 1st concert, on 20 March 1905, was a performance of Franz Liszt's Oratorio « Saint-Elisabeth ». Earlier, he had travelled to Vienna to seek advice of Gustav Mahler, who was performing the same work. Mahler seems to have taken to him, as he agreed to attend the final rehearsals for a performance of his 2nd Symphony, that Fried was to conduct that autumn. The young student who had been engaged to accompany rehearsals, thus, found himself conducting the off-stage Orchestra that figures in the work's last movement, in the presence of the composer.

At this point of his life, Otto Klemperer was, by no means, a devotee of Gustav Mahler's music. In the previous season, he heard Arthur Nikisch conduct the 5th Symphony and had not been impressed. But an encounter with the composer himself was to change the entire course of his career. The 1st rehearsal that Mahler attended did not go well. But on the following day, largely as Klemperer later suggested, due to the advice the composer had given him, Oskar Fried established a firmer grip on the score. When, however Klemperer diffidently enquired whether the off-stage band had been to his satisfaction, Mahler abruptly told him that it had been far too loud. Klemperer protested that the music was marked « sehr schmettern » (blaring) . But from a distance, replied Mahler. As it was physically impossible to play from the remoteness that Mahler clearly had in mind, Klemperer told his musicians to play softly. The performance on 8 November 1905 was the work's 1st unqualified success in Berlin and the composer was greeted with tumultuous applause. In the green room, afterwards, he caught sight of the enormously lanky youth who had been in charge of the off-stage band. He went over, shook his hand and said :

« Very good. »

The young man glowed with pride. He had been able to spend a little time in the great man's company. After the final rehearsal, Mahler was invited to dine with Richard Strauß. As he did not know the way, Otto Klemperer offered to accompany him on a recently completed line of the city's underground railway. To his disappointment, Mahler evinced no interest in this technical marvel. Instead, he abruptly asked his young companion whether he composed. Klemperer was far too bashful to admit that he did. But Mahler laughed :

« No, no, I can see that you do. »

Although Berlin's musical life was, by no means, uneventful in the early years of the 20th Century, the real excitement lay in the spoken theatre, where the young Max Reinhardt was making a name for himself. At the small « Neues Theater am Schiffbauerdamm » , where, 40 years later, Bertolt Brecht was to launch his no less epoch-making « Berliner Ensemble » , Reinhardt, who was still in his early 30's, had in a series of productions (such as Maurice Maeterlinck's « Pelléas et Mélisande » ; Oscar Wilde's « Salome » ; and, above all, the 1st of his many celebrated stagings of William Shakespeare's « A Midsummer Night's Dream ») shaken to its very foundations the decorative naturalism that had dominated German theatre in the 2nd half of the 19th Century. Later, he proved to be less of a revolutionary than he had at 1st seemed. But the stir created by his early productions was immense and, as a student with a particularly lively interest in the theatre, Otto Klemperer saw most of them.

Early, in 1906, he received a letter from Oskar Fried. Max Reinhardt was planning to stage Jacques Offenbach's « Orpheus in the Underworld » with a cast of actors as his final production at the « Neues Theater » , before moving to the larger « Deutsches Theater » . He wanted to hear the music, which he did not know. Would Klemperer, therefore, accompany Fried, who would sing. Max Reinhardt's associate, Felix Holländer, later recalled a pale, thin, immensely tall young man, who appeared and was afterwards engaged as chorus Master and deputy to Fried, who was to conduct. After the audition, Reinhardt asked how long it would take to prepare the chorus.

« About 2 weeks. » , Klemperer brashly answered.

« Sie sind wohl noch sehr jung. » (You really are still very young.) was the withering reply.

It was only then that it dawned on the young musician that the chorus would have to sing by heart.

Rehearsals were lengthy, but Klemperer, at once, felt at home in the world of the theatre, where he found himself working with figures as famous as Tilla Durieux, Georg Engels and the great Alexander Moissi, who was playing the role of Pluto - still, it seems, with a trace of a foreign accent. Klemperer later recalled his signing voice as wonderfully expressive. He had, however, to learn that, unlike singers, actors were not accustomed to looking to conductors for their cues. In the course of those 1st weeks with Max Reinhardt, he also gained more fundamental insights that were to shape his entire approach to Opera, in later years.

« My 1st impression of musical theatre was of a performance musically and scenically prepared down to the smallest detail. The great practical value of a series of performances (of a single production) was already, then, absolutely clear to me. My path led me to repertory Opera where - in the sharpest contrast to serial theatre (" Serientheater ") - 40 to 60 standing productions, inevitably performed with virtually no rehearsal, were given 20 years as an Operatic conductor have taught me that this sort of repertory Opera is an impossibility. »

At that early stage of his career, however, Otto Klemperer had no notions of the thorny path through the thickets of repertory Opera in the German provinces that lay ahead of him.

The production opened on 13 May 1906 amid great excitement, for Jacques Offenbach performed and sung by actors was an event without precedent in Berlin. But on the 2nd night, the choleric conductor Oskar Fried had a « contre-temps » with a female lead singer and left the podium. Max Rheinhardt asked Klemperer to take-over. The 21 year old student took the baton, which he retained until the end of the season, 50 performances later.

Gustav Mahler's production of Gluck's « Iphigenia in Aulis » was a development of the style in which he and Alfred Roller had approached Mozart's « Don Giovanni » , in the previous season. On that occasion, the stage had been dominated, on either side, by 2 massive and permanent towers which had enabled the Opera's frequent changes of scene to be made with a minimum of delay, an innovation that represented a decisive break with the naturalism still dominant in Opera, in early years of the 20th Century. As Alfred Roller later recalled, Gustav Mahler had welcomed a stage on which everything is only intimated. To that extent, his epoch-making productions of « Don Giovanni » and « Iphigenia in Aulis » reveal parallels to the « Stilbühne » that was, in the process of emerging in the spoken theatre, under the impact of the ideas of Adolphe Appia and Gordon Graig.

Mahler believed that, in every performance, the work has to be reborn. His overriding concern was to achieve unity between the music and its visual manifestation on stage and, in this respect, he was a true successor of Richard Wagner. But he went beyond Wagner in his belief that Modern art must serve the stage must extend to costumes, props, everything that can revitalize a work of Art and, to his extent, he did much to lay the foundations of 20th Century Operatic production. Yet, it would probably be a mistake to suppose that he had any theoretical preoccupations about staging. Indeed, Alfred Roller subsequently asserted that the subject bored Mahler. As his favourite phrase « Steht alles in der Partitur. » (It is all in the score.) suggests, his concern was, 1st and foremost, with the music and it is significant that, according to Roller, he only gave his consent to his collaborator's design for Mozart's « Don Giovanni » , after a long reflection, had convinced him of their relevance to the work's musical shape. And if he, nonetheless, attached more importance to staging than did any of his contemporaries in the field of Opera, that did not mean that he was willing to abdicate his own powers to any producer other than himself. Because it was Mahler, the practical man of the theatre, rather than theorists such as Adolphe Appia and Gordon Craig, who was to provide the central inspiration of his approach to Opera, differences were later to open-up between Otto Klemperer and some of the more radical producers and designers who surrounded him at the « Kroll Oper » , in the late-1920's.

On his 3rd visit to Vienna with the celebrated Dutch cellist, Jacques van Lier, Otto Klemperer, armed with his reduction for piano of the 2nd Symphony, presented himself to Mahler in his office in the Opera House, where he sat down and played the Scherzo movement without the music score. Mahler was impressed and moved that anyone should know his music by heart. He asked why a musician who was so formidable a pianist should want to be a conductor. Otto Klemperer insisted that it was now his ambition. Mahler was already aware that his own days in Vienna were numbered and the Court Opera did not, in any case, engage untried and unpaid staff. As he was unwilling to provide a written recommendation, he first sent Klemperer to see Rainer Simons, the director of the « Volksoper ». When, however, the young man returned from that interview empty handed, Mahler took a visiting card and wrote on it :

« Gustav Mahler recommends “ Herr ” Klemperer as an outstanding musician who, despite his youth, is already experienced and is pre-destinated for a career of conductor. He vouches for the successful outcome of a probationary appointment and is willing personally to provide further information. »

That card was eventually to unlock every door. Klemperer kept it, and later a copy of it, in his wallet until his own death, 67 years later.

Back in Berlin, the following day, he had the precious card photographed and sent a copy to every major Opera House in Germany. The few that replied offered only unpaid posts, which he could not afford to accept and would, in any case, have been willing to take only under Mahler himself. Now that his studies had come to an end and the need to earn a living had become pressing, he found temporary work as an assistant to Artur Bodansky at a small-scale season of popular Opera at the « Lortzing Theater », in Berlin.

That engagement finished on the 31st of May. At the end of June, on the off-chance that some opening would present itself, Otto Klemperer decided to attend the annual Festival of the « Allgemeiner Deutscher Musikverein », a meeting ground for the entire profession which was that year being held in Dresden. There, he heard Ernst Schuch conducting Richard Strauß's most recent Opera, « Salome », and the Rosé Quartet giving the 1st performance in Germany of Arnold Schönberg's String Quartet No. 1, Opus 7, an event that rent the audience into sharply opposing factions. But no prospect of a job emerged. At the very end of the Festival, while lunching alone, Otto Klemperer overheard a conversation at a nearby table, where 2 men were discussing a vacancy for a junior conductor at the German Theatre, in Prague :

« I would like to have stood-up and shouted :“ Here he is. ”, but I didn't dare. »

After the men had left, Klemperer asked who they were. The waiter told him that one was the well-known Prague critic Richard Batka, who was also, at that time, serving as musical adviser to the German Theatre during the illness of its director, Angelo Neumann. After consulting Hans Pfitzner, who was also in Dresden, he discovered that he had already left the station.

« In the waiting room, I found this Doctor Batka and gave him Mahler's card. He said :“ Go to Marienbad right away. Angelo Neumann, the director of the Prague Theatre, is there. Tell him I sent you. ” I travelled 3rd class through the night, from Dresden to Marienbad. In the morning, I presented myself to Neumann, who was in bed - he was suffering badly from prostate trouble. (Neumann was, in fact, plagued with kidney stones.) I had a big package of compositions under my arm, as I felt that, somehow, I had to introduce myself musically. These didn't interest him at all, but Mahler's recommendation did a great deal. In his rather theatrical way, he said :“ I now offer you the position I offered 20 years ago to Nikisch (in fact, it was 30 years earlier) . You will come to Prague in the middle of August as chorus Master and conductor. What do you want to conduct ? ” No one had said that to me before ! I said :“ Carmen ” and, perhaps,“ Rigoletto ” and “ Der Freischütz ”. He said :“ Bravo. ” And the conversation seemed to be at an end. I said :“ Mister Neumann, I must have that in writing. ” ,“ You don't need that with me. ”, he replied.“ No, no ; if you don't put it in writing, I won't come. ” He then gave me a piece of paper. I was engaged for 5 years, at a salary that certainly wasn't high. »

Apprenticeship in Prague

Prague was the city of 2 cultures and relations between them were far more relaxed in the early years of the 20th Century. The predominantly Czech-speaking capital of the Austrian kingdom of Bohemia and Moravia contained a substantial German minority of some 40,000 inhabitants, which represented about 1/10 of the city's total population. German culture was no newcomer to Bohemia. Prague had been an integral part of the Holy Roman Empire, since the Middle-Ages. Its University (founded in 1348) was the oldest in the German-speaking world and the German « Ständetheater », where « Don Giovanni » had had its 1st performance, in 1787, had remained the city's sole Opera House, until 1861. But, with the rise of Czech national consciousness and an influx of Czech peasantry, drawn by industrialisation into a city that had hitherto been substantially German, the German-speaking inhabitants had in the course of the 2nd half of the 19th century become a minority, consisting largely of an Austrian aristocracy and officialdom and a middle-class that was more than half Jewish. The wealth and influence of that minority still outweighed its lack of numbers but, as the scales tipped increasingly against it, it had started to place new emphasis on a sense of national identity it had hitherto taken for granted. The German Opera House, to which Otto Klemperer had been appointed, had come to play a crucial role in the maintenance of that sense of identity. As an article that subsequently appeared on Angelo Neumann's death explained :

« The German Theatre, in Prague, is more than a theatre ... it is a political factor ... , the focal point of our society, it is our “ Volkshaus ” and salon, the brace that holds together the various components of German Prague and the place where each of us is made most keenly aware of the greatness of German culture. »

When Angelo Neumann was appointed director of the German Opera House in Prague, in 1885, he was already a well-known figure. A Jew, born in Vienna, in 1838, he had been an undistinguished baritone at the Court Opera of his native city, from 1862 to 1876, when what was described as an infection of his vocal cords led him to seek lush pastures. In 1876, he became Opera director at the Leipzig City Theatre, where he rapidly made his mark as an impresario of exceptional energy. In the same year as Angelo Neumann arrived in Leipzig, Richard Wagner had been left deeply in debt by the performances of « The Ring » that had opened his new « Bayreuth Festspielhaus » that summer. Neumann, who had met Wagner when he had sung the role of the Herald in a production of « Lohengrin » , that the composer had himself staged in Vienna, in 1875, saw his opportunity. He persuaded Wagner to rent-out the entire scenery and costumes and, in 1878, mounted in Leipzig the 1st complete « Ring » to be seen outside Bayreuth. Having thus demonstrated that the vast Tetralogy could be staged outside the « Festspielhaus » that Wagner had built specially to house it, he proceeded to take the entire production to Berlin and London, where it was seen in 1882. He then toured it in Germany, Austria, the Low-Countries and Italy and, finally, in 1889, visited Saint-Petersburg and Moscow. These tours made Angelo Neumann a celebrity. Wagnerians complained bitterly of the cuts he imposed and of other deficiencies in the performances, but the royalties the earlier ventures earned enabled Richard Wagner to compose the Opera « Parsifal », in the comfort his creative powers required.

In 1882, Angelo Neumann left Leipzig and, after 3 years in Bremen, moved to Prague. He arrived at a difficult moment for the German Theatre. In 1881, the Czechs had opened an imposing National Theatre as an expression of their growing sense of cultural identity. Thenceforth, a substantial part of the Czech majority deserted the German Theatre. But the German minority was determined to reply in kind and a new theatre, which was already in construction on Neumann's arrival, was opened in 1888. Henceforth, the 2 institutions were rivals ; comparatively, few German works were performed at the National Theatre, no Czech works whatever, at the New German Theatre.

The New German Theatre was the property of a committee. It was supported principally by the German-speaking community, although the provincial government also provided a subsidy, as it did for the Czech National Theatre. Like many municipal Opera Houses of the period, as opposed to Court Operas, it was leased to a director who was free to pocket any profits as long as his artistic policy met the approval of the committee. Thus, to all practical purposes, the German Theatre was a privately run venture.

It says much of Angelo Neumann's abilities that, with the backing of a population that was the equivalent of no more than a small-town, he was able to establish a company that was not only able to face the competition of the National Theatre, but was widely regarded as the equal of Opera Houses in Frankfurt, Leipzig and Breslau, all cities with a population of some 400,000 people, and was even able to undertake guest performances, in Berlin. To achieve this, he had to persuade the German-speaking minority to support its theatre with subsidies that amounted to more than 4 times per head those paid by the inhabitants of most purely German cities, at that time. He was, thus, more dependent on public taste.

In fact, his own artistic leanings were well-matched to those of his public and his time. In spite of his Wagnerian connections, he had no conception whatever of Wagnerian « Gesamtkunstwerk ». He was essentially a representative of an earlier period. He had eaten with Hector Berlioz ; he had witnessed Meyerbeer, Charles Gounod and Giuseppe Verdi in rehearsal ; and his knowledge of old-style, pre-Wagnerian Opera was wide. His taste was basically Meyerbeerian : stars and spectacle were his recipe for a full-house and ensemble took a low priority. Producers remained unknown in this theatre, until 1906 ; until that date, programmes contained a note that « Der Direktor führt die gesamte Regie. » (The director assumes responsibility for all matters of production.) . Angelo Neumann ran an entirely personal regime, controlling every detail in his theatre. Under his leadership, the German Theatre never developed an artistic identity. It remained a « Betrieb » - a business enterprise.

Yet, Neumann had artistic discernment of a sort. In 1887, he established a series of Philharmonic concerts and, in 1899, he inaugurated the Spring Festival that has since remained a feature of the city's musical life. He had a sharp nose for talent and, particularly, for young conductors, if only because his association with Richard Wagner's music had led him to appreciate their growing importance as Orchestras increased in size. The young Otto Klemperer was, by no means, his 1st catch. In Leipzig, he had enlisted the 23 year old Arthur Nikisch. In Prague, one of his 1st steps had been to engage the 25 year old Gustav Mahler and, in succeeding years, he acquired young men of the calibre of Karl Muck, Leo Blech, Franz Schalk and Artur Bodansky, all of whom were later to make large reputations.

But by the time the young Klemperer arrived, in August 1907, Angelo Neumann's regime, which had earlier proved so successful according to its lights, had begun to attract criticism. Partly, this was the result of advancing age and declining health. The director's self-importance had waxed with the years. In his earlier days, an approachable and open-minded man, he had grown increasingly despotic. To those who accepted his rule, he could be a benevolent patriarch, but any expression of dissent was increasingly liable to be taken as a personal affront. Klemperer was to experience both sides of his personality.

For example, after a Klemperer concert, the « Prager Tablatt » described the performance as an oasis in a desert, but the next morning, Klemperer was summoned by Angelo Neumann. His playing had been satisfactory, but his shirt was a disgrace. Neumann must have had a soft spot for the young man, for he told him to have 6 shirts made at his (Neumann's) expense.

Unsatisfactory working conditions and a meagre repertory were not the only difficulties Otto Klemperer encountered during his 1st season, in Prague. One of the 1st duties was to prepare the fanfares for a revival of Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » that was to take place on 27 September. As the theatre declined to engage the trumpeters for the additional rehearsal that he considered necessary, he paid their fee himself and summoned them to rehearse at his quarters on « Diviřtrábe ». This, they did with such gusto that a posse of outraged burghers soon gathered in the street with the result that Klemperer had to seek accommodation elsewhere. Eventually, he settled in the « Přstrossgasse » (today, « Ulice Anny Letenské ») on the « Königliche Weinberge », as the section behind the National Museum and the German Theatre was then called, and he continued to live there during the 3 seasons he was to remain in Prague.

He had, of course, relatives in the city from which the Klemperers stemmed and in which his father had been born. But, though he visited his uncle Philipp, he had little contact with them. Even as a young man, Otto Klemperer did not make friends easily. In Prague, he grew close to only 2 men. Ferdinand Onno was that rare creature, an actor who was both erudite and well-versed in music. And Artur Bodansky, under whom Klemperer had already worked in Berlin, during the spring prior to their simultaneous engagement by Angelo Neumann, was 1st Conductor at the German Theatre. Although he was 8 years older than Klemperer, the 2 musicians were linked by a common devotion to Gustav Mahler, for whom Bodansky left for America, in 1915, their home, 1st in Prague and, later, in Mannheim, provided Klemperer with a refuge to which he frequently resorted.

Following the example of the Vienna Court Opera, the German Theatre did not, at this period, print the name of the conductor on its programmes, so that such reviews as appeared in the daily press provide the only clue to Klemperer's activities. But posters for the Philharmonic concert of 11 March 1908 announced that the programme would open with his Overture for Large Orchestra. At the least moment, the performance was cancelled owing to the composer's illness, though it is not clear why it should not have been given in his absence. Had he again had last minute doubts about a work he had earlier offered to Karl Muck and subsequently withdrawn ?

That question remains unanswered. But it is significant that, like everything he had composed up to this moment in his life, the score has not survived. Later, in 1908, an event occurred that was to prove crucial to Otto Klemperer's attitude to his own compositions. On 28 September, he attended the Austrian premiere of Claude Debussy's « Pelléas et Mélisande » at the German Theatre and its enormous impact on him may well have led him to destroy everything he had hitherto written. Only after this 1st encounter with Debussy's whole-tone harmony did Klemperer begin to compose music for which, as he put it more than 60 years later :

« I would stand-up today. »

2 songs that are all that remain of the compositions that date from his years in Prague were both written in the wake of this experience.

Illness may, nonetheless, have played a part in the withdrawal of his Overture, as the poster had claimed. That spring, he developed an infection of the thyroid glands that necessitated an operation from which he only recovered slowly. The surgeon recommended that he should recuperate in a sunny climate, but, as he had no money, Klemperer returned to work. Angelo Neumann was, however, so shocked by the young man's appearance that he sent him for a month to a sanatorium outside Merano, and footed the bill. Once again, he had shown his benevolence to his new chorus Master and, though the coming seasons were to bring tensions, Otto Klemperer never forgot the old man's kindness.

In May, restored to health, he was back in Prague for a concert that Gustav Mahler conducted on 23 May to open the exhibition that had been mounted in celebration of the 60th anniversary of the Emperor Franz-Josef to the throne. This was the 1st and last occasion on which Klemperer heard Mahler conduct a Classical concert programme ; it included Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 and the prelude to « Tristan und Isolde » , and he was overwhelmed by the experience :

« I could only get to a rehearsal, but my one reaction afterwards was that one should abandon the profession if one could not conduct as Mahler did. In the Beethoven, he took the 2nd part of the “ allegretto ” at a slightly livelier pace than the main portion. It sounded like a new work. I have never heard the climax of the “ Tristan ” prelude (which he naturally conducted without any increase of tempo) played with such emotional impact and the same applied to the march in “ Die Meistersinger ”. Everything was absolutely natural. You felt that it could not be better and could not be otherwise. »

Otto Klemperer spent part of his summer vacation with his younger sister, Marianne, on Sylt, the island resort off the German North Sea coast. He had not long returned to Prague when there was another and even more enthralling encounter with his hero. Mahler had been so delighted with the playing of the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, at his concert in May, that he had agreed to return to Prague, in August, so as to give with it the 1st performance of his Symphony No. 7. Klemperer attended every rehearsal he could. A Viennese critic who had come to Prague, for the occasion, later recalled a lanky youth who had shadowed Mahler and even begun to ape his hero's mannerisms. But the great man was not displeased by his disciples's attentions. On 22 August, he wrote to his wife Alma :

« The last days very agreeable. The Orchestra good and willing. I am constantly surrounded by a staff of young (and very nice) people, among them Bodansky and Klemperer, who has made a magnificent reduction for 2 hands of the 2nd Symphony. »

Klemperer has also left an account of the preparation for the premiere, which extended over several weeks, as Mahler had some 2 dozen rehearsals :

« Each day, after rehearsal, he used to take the entire orchestral (material) home with him for revision, polishing and retouching. We, young musicians, Bruno Walter, Bodansky, von Keussler and myself, would gladly have helped, but he would not ear it. We usually spent the evenings with him, at his hotel. He was relaxed and extremely amusing, holding forth uninhibitedly about his successor in Vienna. Weingartner, the man in question, had made such enormous cuts in “ Die Walküre ” that patrons of the 4th gallery had hissed and booed.

Mahler also spoke, at length, about Hugo Wolf, whom he did not like at all. Young puppy that I was, I had the impudence to contradict him and to assert that the “ Mörke Gebet ” was very fine. Mahler shot me an angry glance. All I could say was : “ With all respect, that's only my opinion. ” »

The new season mercifully brought an occasional release from Operatic routine. There were opportunities to accompany singers of the calibre of Julia Culp, Margarete Siems, Vittorio Arimondi and Felix von Kraus. Artur Bondansky was to conduct Beethoven's 9th Symphony and Klemperer was entrusted with the preparation of the chorus. To one young member, the impression was still alive, almost 60 years later :

« An immensely tall figure rose-up with the most beautiful head I had ever seen. Klemperer had a high-voice that squeaked when he was excited and he was always excited. But the old rehearsal piano sounded under his huge fingers and from the 1st moment we followed him, enthralled. »

But within the theatre, Klemperer found himself condemned to conducting an unending succession of ill-prepared « Spielopern » . Ambroise Thomas's « Mignon » was followed by Albert Lortzing's « Der Waffenschmied » ; by Wilhelm Kienzl's « Der Evangelimann » ; by Viktor Nessler's « Der Trompeter von Säckingen » . It was doubtless better than the almost unvaried diet of Operetta he had endured in his 1st season, and the critics began to praise his growing ability to hold these ramshackle evenings together. But they remained a far cry from the perspectives opened-up during the intoxicating hours with Gustav Mahler. Klemperer felt increasingly despondent and frustrated.

On 3 December 1908, he wrote in despair to Hans Pfitzner. That autumn, his former teacher had taken-up his duties as head of the Strasbourg Conservatory and director of the city's concerts. Klemperer asked whether a job could be found for him at the theatre. His letter was full of the anguish of a young idealist confronted, for the 1st time in his life, with the harsh realities of repertory Opera :

« I am writing to ask you a great favour. Would you ask “ Herr Direktor ” Wilhelmi whether he would take me from Prague even if I am in breach of contract. I don't dare to write that myself to him in a false light. It is only an action of despair on my part, as I am well on the way towards losing all pleasure in my vocation because of the inartistic conditions here which are ruining me in every respect. »

No position in Strasbourg was available, and Pfitzner seems to have tried to comfort Klemperer who, on 29 January 1909, wrote to thank him for his extremely kind advice. But, in that letter, it is apparent that the cause of his despair lay deeper than the deficiencies of Angelo Neumann's regime :

« Please don't be angry on account of my long silence. That it has taken so long to reply is due to an indisposition that has already been tormenting me for about 3 months. I am suffering from a nervous depression which plagues me and has certainly been brought about by the sad artistic conditions in the theatre. »

This was the 1st acute manifestation of the manic-depressive rack, on which he was to be stretched until the very end of his life. It was a condition that was often to make him disconcertingly unpredictable to those (and they remained on overwhelming majority of his acquaintances) who were unaware of his affliction. In depression, Otto Klemperer was withdrawn and impenetrable. He set a wall between himself and the outside world and the deeper his melancholy, the more he shunned human companionship. In such periods, he suffered from intense anxiety, night-sweats and stomach pains. Tablets had little effect on his chronic sleeplessness. He became obsessively neat, puritanical in his attitudes, careful (even mean) with money, and so intensely self-critical that, at moments, he came even to doubt his own abilities.

In manic phases, these characteristics swung to an opposite pole. He grew hectically active, talkative and gregarious. It is to periods such as these that most of the many anecdotes about him relate. When high, his attention was easily distracted, he tend to spend irresponsibly, his eroticism was heightened, and many attempt to restrain him was liable to give rise to frightened rages. In such phases, he was also accident-prone, in so far as mania tended to deprive him of a healthy awareness of danger, just as in depression he saw it at every corner.

These changes did not, of course, occur abruptly. Acute phases built-up and dispersed gradually. Shafts of sobriety and self-awareness would occur in the most intense manic periods. Conversely, in depression, the clouds would sometimes lift momentarily. Thus, the gradations in Klemperer's psychological condition were often hard to determine, even for those close to him. Nor did the acute phases of his malady constitute his entire life : between extremes, themselves of varying intensity, he enjoyed lengthy periods of relative calmness.

After his depression phase, he felt more confident of his future with Angelo Neumann. As a result, he was less eager to work directly under a character as notoriously irascible and dogmatic as his old teacher, many of whose views on repertory and production were far removed from his own. He was, in any case, still unclear how he could free himself from his contract with Neumann, as he explained in his letter of 11 August, to Hans Pfitzner :

« So far, as my coming is concerned, at the moment, it is impossible to say anything decisive. It is just as unclear to me as it was a year ago, how I should free myself. On the contrary, now that Bodansky has left, Neumann places still more confidence in me. He (Neumann) has the theatre, until 1912, and my contract last until then. He probably won't be appointed director again and so, in these last years, he wants to save any money he can scrape together. He has me at a dirt-cheap price and, for that reason, he holds on to me. In December, I offered to break my contract, but Wilhelmi turned it down. So that is not a possibility. I can't behave like Bodansky, who left in a very abrupt way, because I'm indebted to Neumann for his splendid behaviour during my illness. If at all possible, give me advance notice of a decision, and please let me know the last day for acceptance. »

Nothing more was to come of Strasbourg, until 1914, when Otto Klemperer's caution at the prospect of working under Hans Pfitzner was to prove well-justified.

As 2nd Conductor, a position to which he had been formally appointed, in August 1909, Klemperer was naturally allotted a share of the more substantial works in the repertory at Prague. His 1st task was a new production of Gioachino Rossini's Opera « William Tell ». The 24 year old musician still had a tendency to take himself « avec grand sérieux ». At a rehearsal of the Overture, he conducted the opening Andante with such portentousness that Neumann called-out impatiently :

« Much too slow ! »

The young conductor felt affronted and answered :

« I take it differently. »

Years later, when he recalled the incident, he laughed at his earlier self-esteem and agreed that Angelo Neumann had been quite right. The criticism seems to have « porté fruit ». At any rate, on the day after the premiere (10 September), « Bohemia » noted that the Overture had been played with real bravura, while the « Prager Tagblatt » praised its rhythmic verve.

Such activities were far removed from the succession of Operettas and « Spieloper » that had so lowered his spirits in the previous seasons. But his continuing dissatisfaction with the rough and tumble of repertory theatre is evident in a letter his mother wrote to her elder daughter, « Regi » Elbogen, on 21 November 1909 :

« Otto is over-burdened, so that he has no pleasure in his work. He ought to rest for 3 weeks, as he has even more to do over Christmas, but that monster Neumann only starts to look after his employees when they are on their backs. He exploits Otto in a wretched way. Well, at the moment, Otto is bound by his contract, but that he won't stay for his full 5 years is as clear as daylight (“ steht mir bombenfest ”) . »

Ida Klemperer's prophecy was to be fulfilled more rapidly than she can have supposed. During the autumn of 1909, complaints in the press about the repertory and the standards of the German Theatre had been growing sharper. In particular, Felix Adler, the critic of « Bohemia » launched an increasingly savage assault on Angelo Neumann's regime, while singling-out Otto Klemperer for praise. On 5 December, a guest-conductor, who, in accordance with the usual formula, was billed as appearing « auf » (with a view to) Engagement, took-over a performance of Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » .

In the following morning's number of « Bohemia » , Felix Adler asked with feigned innocence what had happened to necessitate a new engagement in a theatre that already boasted 4 conductors. He must have been well-aware that relations between Neumann and Klemperer had finally reached breaking point. In his later years, a hot-tempered man, Angelo Neumann had become increasingly enraged by the combination of Adler's attacks on himself and praise of his 2nd Conductor. He knew that Klemperer and Adler were friendly and, leaping to the conclusion that the articles had been inspired by his young « Kapellmeister » (and, at any rate, indirectly, he may not have been entirely wrong) , he presented Klemperer with an ultimatum : either he ceased to see Adler, or he would be dismissed. Klemperer naturally refused to give any such undertaking and was accordingly fired with effect from the end of the season.

Significantly, he did not turn to Hans Pfitzner with whom, only 3 months earlier, he had been in correspondence about a position in Strasbourg, but to Gustav Mahler, who was that winter conducting in New York. Mahler's response was prompt and effective. To Hamburg, he sent a 2 word telegram :

« Klemperer zugreifen. » (Grab Klemperer.)

To Ferdinand Gregori, then Intendant in Mannheim, he wrote :

« I recommend “ Herr ” Klemperer with pleasure. He has all the characteristics that go to make a great conductor. He is admittedly still very young, but he has a future and I am convinced that you could not make a better choice. »

That was high-praise from so exacting a musician and it is hardly surprising that both Hamburg and Mannheim offered positions. Klemperer opted for Hamburg. It was, after all, his home-town, his parents and young sister were living there, and the prospect of working under Gustav Brecher, another former « répétiteur » under Gustav Mahler, in Vienna, proved a greater attraction than a position under Artur Bodansky, in Mannheim. On 11 January 1910, Klemperer sent a telegram to his joyful parents announcing that a contract had been signed. He was delighted to receive a letter of welcome from Brecher, shortly after his appointment had been announced.

Meanwhile, the season continued to run its course. It was symptomatic of Angelo Neumann's taste, in his declining years, that Julius Stern's « Narciss Rameau » , the only contemporary Opera that Otto Klemperer was allotted during his stint in Prague (on 26 January 1910) , should have been dismissed even by one of the more accommodating critics, as a nullity. But, during his last months in Prague, he conducted, for the 1st time in his career, works as substantial as Giacomo Meyerbeer's « les Huguenots » ; Richard Wagner's « Der fliegende Holländer » ; and Georges Bizet's « Carmen » . All these tasks, very much to his taste, and, in the reviews they evoked there, are clear indications that a sense of musical identity was beginning to emerge.

The season ended with a final humiliation for Neumann's theatre in its role as a guardian of German culture, in a predominantly Slav city. In January 1909, Richard Strauß's « Elektra » had had a triumphant 1st performance, in Dresden. To those with ears, it was the most important new German Opera, since the death of Richard Wagner. But Angelo Neumann became involved in a wrangle with the publishers over performing fees and, finally, announced that he would not stage it. The Czech national Theatre leapt into the breach and, on 25 April 1910, mounted a production that greatly impressed Otto Klemperer. Neumann was reduced to inviting the Dresden Opera to perform a work in German, in the Spring Festival, 9 days later. It was a ignominious close to what was to prove his last complete season, which ended on 31 May.

On that day, Felix Adler wrote a farewell tribute to Klemperer in Bohemia :

« Today, Otto Klemperer ends his present engagement. To have been able to follow the growth of his rich talent from its earliest beginnings to complete maturity has been a particular pleasure. Klemperer came to Prague as a graduate of the Berlin Stern Conservatory and he leaves it as a conductor of character and individuality. He has not developed according to any model. He has had to find everything that he has become from within himself. As a result, his performances have acquired a character of their own. Instead of handed-down traditions, something new and good has emerged in the Operas he has conducted. Such conductors are rare and awake opposition. Otto Klemperer can take pride in having, in most cases, overcome these difficulties and, where he did not succeed in doing so, he indicated with energy what he wanted. Thus, performances of “ Lohengrin ” and “ Der fliegende Holländer ”, which he conducted with inspiration and idealism, as well as of Italian and French Operas, provided an abundance of stimulus. Under his direction, the ensemble and the Orchestra have been stretched to the limits of their abilities. Had he been used as he deserved to be, the Theatre would have gained richly. Now, the Hamburg City Opera will benefit from his gifts. »

It was a remarkable tribute to a musician who had, only 2 weeks earlier, celebrated his 24th birthday.

Early Career

Klemperer's musical studies brought him 1st to Frankfurt, where he studied at the « Hochschule für Musik », then, at the Stern Conservatory in Berlin, where he was a student of the Russian-German composer, Hans Pfitzner. In 1905, he caught the eye of Gustav Mahler and became his « protégé ». 2 years later, Mahler recommended the young Klemperer for the 3rd conductor position at the German National Theatre, in Prague. In 1909, it was again through Mahler's influence that Klemperer received a position as 2nd conductor in Hamburg. In essence, these 2 men (Hans Pfitzner and Gustav Mahler) represent the 2 great strains of music that were synthesized by Klemperer. Pfitzner represented the conservative, Romantic and Germanic element, which embodied Klemperer's solid musicianship and his choice of work. Mahler inculcated the young man with the avant-garde. When refracted through the prism of Klemperer's Romantic character, this contributed to his unique style.

Hamburg : « Himmelhoch jauchzend, zu Tode betrübt. »

« Exulting unto the Heavens, sad unto Death. » A phrase Otto Klemperer later used to describe his manic-depressive syndrome.

On his way home, Otto Klemperer broke his journey in Berlin. There, he visited his cousin, Georg, who told him that, as he was about to begin a career in Germany, the time had come for him to leave the Jewish community, as Gustav Mahler had done, 13 years earlier, when the prospect had arisen of a Viennese engagement. For Georg, as for many Jews who, in the years following emancipation, had risen to prominent positions in Christian society, Jewish faith was a mere relic of the ghetto mentality that Jews of his standing had discarded. With that trust in progress, a characteristic of men of science in the 19th Century, he believed that assimilation must follow emancipation and tolerance, as day follows night. He himself had long since become a Lutheran, had married a Christian and was in the process of bringing-up his children in such ignorance of their Jewish heritage that his eldest son was not even aware that his grand-father, who was still alive, was a Rabbi.

Otto Klemperer was, at that time, no more attached to the Jewish faith than was his cousin, Georg, whom he admired and respected. But the implication that it could be sloughed-off like a suit of old clothes made him uncomfortable. Predictably, his father, whose ties to the Jewish faith were still close, was outraged at the advice Georg had given. What Ida thought is not recorded : more Liberal than her husband, she may well have attached greater importance to her son's musical career than to his religious denomination. For some weeks, Otto Klemperer took no action. Then, on 16 July, he wrote to the official body that supervised such matters for permission to leave the Jewish community. This was duly granted. Significantly, he took no steps to join the Lutheran or any other church. Perhaps, a subconscious awareness of the (as yet) dormant religious nature of his down character prevented him from adopting a creed for reasons of convenience.

In the middle of June, Otto Klemperer travelled to Munich. 2 events drew him there. His visit coincided with a Richard Strauß week at the Opera where, on 24 June, he heard Edyth Walker sing the title role in « Salome » under the composer's direction. Her performance, Klemperer wrote to his elder sister, on 6 July, was better than the work itself. The other was more compelling : towards the end of June, rehearsals for the 1st performance of Gustav Mahler's 8th Symphony were about to begin. As the composer entered the hall, he was delighted to find Oskar Fried and Otto Klemperer waiting for him. As 2 years earlier in Prague, evenings were spent with Mahler in his hotel where, among other issues, Mahler defended his practice of making retouchings in Classical works, such as Beethoven's « Pastoral » Symphony. Turning to Klemperer, he said :

« At 1st, of course, you will conduct the work as it is written. But later on, you will see that some instrumental retouching has to be done. »

Again, Klemperer was amazed at the countless small instrumental alterations that the composer made during rehearsals :

« He always wanted more clarity, more sound, more dynamic contrast. At one point during rehearsals, he turned to us and said : “ If, after my death, something doesn't sound right, then change it. You have not only a right but a duty to do so. ” »

Klemperer was also struck by the intensity of sound Mahler was able to draw from his forces at the entries of « Veni, creator spiritus » without any apparent outward effort. The impact of the music on Klemperer was immense :

« To be frank, it was not until then that I understood Mahler's music well enough to realize what a great composer he was. »

So enthralled was he with what he heard that he wrote, as he told his sister, a really detailed article on it. Yet, it was a work that he was destined never to conduct himself.

Early in July, Mahler left Munich for Toblach, in South Tyrol, where he was to spend his last summer holiday. This is probably the occasion on which he invited Klemperer to visit him there. That Mahler thought highly of his young disciple's musical abilities is apparent from his repeated efforts to foster his career. That there was also a more personal link is clear from the fact that, on more than one occasion, he told Klemperer how much he was reminded by him of his younger brother, also called Otto, who had committed suicide but whom Mahler always described as more talented than himself. Klemperer was later to regret that he did not accept the invitation to Toblach. Instead, he travelled to Mannheim, where he stayed for a few days with the Bodanskys. He was at, this period, again composing, a sure sign that his spirits were high. 2 of a cycle of 4 songs that he later orchestrated (« Ständchen » and « Empfindungen beim Wiedersehen einer viel geliebten Stadt ») date from this summer, as does, a Ballad to be scored for large orchestra that, like so many of his compositions, did not survive an ensuing depression. By the middle of July, he was back in Hamburg, but, after renting a room on the « Rothenbaumchaussee », Klemperer, again, went to stay with the Bodanskys, who, by this time, were on holiday on the « Starnberger See ». From there, it was a short journey to Munich, where he was able to attend more rehearsals of the new Mahler Symphony. By this time, an extraordinary assembly of musical figures was beginning to gather for the 1st performance. But Klemperer could not stay for the great event, as his own rehearsals in Hamburg were due to begin on 25 August. He was never to see Mahler again.

As the Opera House of Germany's 2nd largest city and biggest port, the « Hamburg Stadttheater » was a more substantial undertaking than the German Theatre, in Prague. But, in other ways, it bore disconcerting resemblances to the theatre Klemperer had just left, for it was one of the few remaining privately owned civic theatres in Germany, still leased to a director, who, like Angelo Neumann, was at liberty to retain any profits he made. In this, the « Stadttheater » reflected the mercantile traditions of Hamburg. The great Court Operas of Central Europe were the offspring of absolutism, of reigning princes who had made little distinction between private and public funds and had spent as much on theatres as they felt inclined. In contrast, « Hanseatic Hamburg » had, for Centuries, been governed by its merchants, who were concerned to keep public expenditure to a minimum and regarded a subsidized theatre with suspicion. In this, the city followed Anglo-Saxon rather than Central European traditions, and it is not mere chance that, in 1910, conditions at the « Stadttheater » bore a disturbing similarity to those at Covent Garden, in London. But there was one substantial difference. Whereas, at the Royal Opera House, Thomas Beecham was able to limit his activities to a relatively brief international season, the « Stadttheater » was obliged to provide repertory Opera, for 10 months of the year. The strain of doing so was already beginning to tell.

Its director, Max Bachur, had originally joined the theatre as an accountant and he ran it primarily as a business. Whereas Angelo Neumann, for all his failings in his later years, had earlier proved himself an imaginative impresario, Bachur, who was already in his mid-60's when Otto Klemperer joined the staff, seems to have had limited artistic insight. His main means of attracting a public were the engagement of famous guest artists (in 1906, he had inaugurated an annual visit by Enrico Caruso) and a succession of trivial novelties. The theatre's standards had fallen badly. Like in Prague, it had no Musical Director on its staff. By 1910, Max Bachur himself had reached the conclusion that it could no longer be run as a purely private undertaking. He had accordingly drafted a memorandum to the Senate, requesting a public subsidy. When that request was rejected within a few months of Klemperer's arrival, Bachur gave his resignation. Thus, in Hamburg, Klemperer again found himself part of a regime on its last legs.

On 3 September, Klemperer made his debut with Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin ». That he chose to do so, in a work with which he was already familiar, is characteristic of the caution he was always to show on crucial occasions. From the start, he caught the attention of the Opera House by refusing to raise his baton until there was complete silence ; and, having caught it, he held it throughout an evening of triumph such as few young and unknown conductors have experienced. In the « Hamburger Nachrichten » (on 5 September) , Ferdinand Pfohl wrote of a meteor fallen from Heaven. In the « Hamburger Fremdenblatt » , on the same day, Heinrich Chevalley described Otto Klemperer as :

« A musician of the utmost sensibility, of thrilling temperament and natural dramatic instinct, who follows the music-drama with an inner attention that guarantees a close integration between stage and Orchestra. He knows how to give an act ; as a musician, he misses no detail in the score.

Pfohl was particularly enthusiastic about the Prelude :

« How shatteringly Klemperer built-up to the great climax. The brass theme was really overwhelming and came with all the majesty and brilliance of an opening in the Heavens. At this point, as though carried away by an irresistible impulse, the conductor leapt to his feet and hurled cues at the brass with bold, uninhibited gestures. »

Both Chevalley and Pfohl had experienced the Gustav Mahler's era in Hamburg ; indeed, Pfohl had known Mahler since they had been students together in Leipzig. Both men were immediately struck by the new conductor's resemblance to his great predecessor. In Klemperer's refusal to begin until there was complete silence, Pfohl saw something of Gustav Mahler's « prachvolle Rücksichtslosigkeit » (magnificent ruthlessness) , Chevalley took his concern with expression rather than form to be characteristically Mahlerian.

There were, of course, reservations. Klemperer's taste for dynamic nuances was felt to be exaggerated. Pfohl pointed to deficiencies of technique that had almost caused a derailment. Chevalley observed that Klemperer conducted with a complete lack of concern about his appearance. And, in fact, his movements were not attractive ; there were moments when one wished that this unmannerly conductor might enjoy the protection of a hidden Orchestra. More than one critic felt that there was something disconcertingly untamed about this wild young man. Pfohl went even further :

« Here, was more than a Hoffmanesque conceit, for there was, indeed, something disturbingly expressionistic about the burning black eyes in a white face, the strange high-pitched voice, the gangling gait and enormous height. »

But the evening was a triumph and the applause, as Pfohl put it, was like a storm at sea.

Klemperer was not allowed to rest on his laurels. A junior conductor had to be ready to conduct a different work on most nights of the week and Charles Gounod's « Faust » and Georges Bizet's « Carmen » followed Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin », on 3 successive evenings. In « Carmen », in particular, his manner of conducting again drew comment :

« “ Herr ” Klemperer, again, offered a little piece of theatre in itself. At moments, he towered-up as though his limbs were impelled by a spring ; at moments, he sank back into himself ; at moments, he used his baton as a lance with which he stabbed at the favoured musicians. That, in choral scenes, “ Herr ” Klemperer also invoked the use of his feet to drum the beat into the ladies and gentlemen on the stage can hardly be reckoned an attraction. In a few years, he will smile at this noisy expenditure of energy. »

As in Prague, his tempi in « Carmen » were found to be slow, but there was praise for the delicacy, colour and expressiveness of the orchestral playing. Even, if not on the level of his « Lohengrin », it was clearly a far from routine performance. Testing through the 3 evenings had been, they had, at a stroke, established Klemperer in Hamburg. Their impact was well summarized by Robert Müller-Hartmann in the « Allgemeine Musikzeitung » of 7 October :

« The “ Hamburg Stadttheater ” has a young conductor, who through ability and character has from the beginning awoken an exceptional response. Musically armed to the teeth, he entered the lists with prodigious passion and triumphed over all resisters on the stage and in the audience. The score, thrilling as sound and rhythm, is in his head ; the sense is always directed towards the whole. His gestures are often unwieldy and wildly ecstatic, but they leave nothing to be desired in clarity, and what one must excuse as youthfulness has the appeal of spontaneity and honesty. »

Otto Klemperer had won fame in his home-town and outwardly he, for a while, assumed the role of a rising star. A photograph, taken at this time, shows him in an uncharacteristically artistic pose, such as he subsequently came to abhor, with the aquiline profile and powerful hands displayed to best advantage. For the only time in his life, he had letter paper embossed with his name and address, a practice he scorned in later years.

But such outer marks of confidence were no more than a mask. To his dismay, he began to realize that success would bind him more closely than ever to the treadmill of repertory Opera. Even the eulogies he had received served only to heighten a sense of oppression. How, he asked his colleague, Fritz Stiedry, in a letter written on 9 September, immediately in the wake of his triumphs, could he hope to fulfil the expectations he had aroused ? Hamburg, he wrote, offered only 2 consolations. The Orchestra was willing and well trained (one notices that Mahler was here) , and relations with his senior colleague, Gustav Brecher, were cordial :

« He is happy that I am here and, together, we want to see what can be achieved. »

There were other encounters of a more personal nature. At the stage door, Klemperer was so struck by the appearance of a girl that he asked who she was. Her name, he learnt, was Elisabeth Schumann, a young soprano who had joined the theatre the previous season but had yet to make much impact. She sang the 1st Page in his opening « Lohengrin » and, 6 days later, was the Aennchen in a performance of « Der Freischütz » that he conducted on 9 September. But he was too over-burdened and, perhaps also, too low in spirits, to give attention even to such an exceptionally attractive girl. The girls, however, had eyes on him. Among them was another young soprano, also destined to make a great career, who had only just arrived in Hamburg.

During rehearsals, tenor Enrico Caruso allowed himself to be told that he was dragging. Caruso must also have been impressed by the young conductor Otto Klemperer. After he had left, Klemperer learnt that, in view of the approval that the visitor had expressed, he would not be required to repay an advance that he had received on his salary.

But the privilege of providing an orchestral accompaniment for the greatest tenor of his time had an unhappy side-effect. Although he had obtained 3 clear days in order to travel to Munich for the 1st performance of Gustav Mahler's new Symphony, on 12 September, Klemperer had been too exhausted by the strains of his 1st week in his new position to do so. There was, however, a chance that, in October, Mahler would sail to New York either from Hamburg or Bremerhaven, 80 miles away. On 30 September, Klemperer wrote to ask Oskar Fried for the date and place of Mahler's embarkation :

« As I would so much like to speak to him beforehand. »

Mahler, in fact, left from Bremen, on 18 October, the very evening on which Klemperer had to conduct a performance of Friedrich von Flotow's « Martha », with Caruso. It is, therefore, unlikely that he was able to travel to Bremerhaven. In which case, he missed a last opportunity to bid farewell to the man and musician he revered above all others. 7 months later, Gustav Mahler was dead.

As a junior conductor on the staff of a large Opera House, Otto Klemperer found himself allotted a seemingly unending series of ill-prepared repertory performances. Only at the end of November was he entrusted with a new production of a double-bill, consisting of Jacques Offenbach's « Fortunio's Lied » and a recent work by the 25 year old Eduard Künneke called « Robins Ende ». Klemperer conducted with what Pfohl described as the finest understanding of the intimate delights of Classical Offenbach. But, in spite of a cast that included both Elisabeth Schumann and Lotte Lehmann in small « Hosenrollen », the Hamburg critics savaged « Robins Ende », which Max Lowengard dismissed as a bad, protracted joke with pretentious and noisy music.

Frustrating though such duties were to an idealistic young musician, they cannot have been as unprofitable as he himself supposed at the time. For all its limitations, repertory Opera provided a hard but effective schooling, and Klemperer still had much to learn. In a revival of Ambroise Thomas's « Mignon », on 8 November, a lapse of memory on stage caused confusion in the Orchestra and Pfohl's comment is revealing :

« “ Herr Kapellmeister ” Klemperer appeared nonplussed by this unexpected turn of events. In a few years, he will learn to confront incidents such as this with the assurance and presence of mind he lacks today. »

He also had to learn, as he later came to delight in doing, to make the best of conditions that were less than perfect. As Heinrich Chevalley wrote after his initial « Lohengrin » , he would come to accept the fact that there was no point in demanding things that in our conditions must miscarry.

But it was precisely those conditions that revolted Klemperer's idealistic character. As in Prague, 2 years earlier, he felt trapped in a system that made it impossible for him to achieve what he felt to lie within his powers and he was appalled by the countless artistic compromises it involved. Shortly after Enrico Caruso's visit, he again began to grow depressed and, as the season proceeded, his gloom deepened. With it came an increasing sense of inadequacy. He began to believe that he was not up to the job. And there may even have been an element of truth in this belief ; in low spirits, he was less likely to show the resilience and resourcefulness necessary to pilot a series of ill-prepared performances, more likely to fuss excessively over detail. A vicious circle had set in : unfavourable conditions fostered depression ; and depression made him less able to cope with the conditions.

His melancholy deepened to a point where he so seriously considered abandoning his vocation that he wrote to a friendly book-seller, in Prague, to enquire if he would accept him as an apprentice. Fortunately, the book-seller declined to take his enquiry seriously. Finally, Klemperer's elder sister, « Regi » , who was on a visit from Berlin, persuaded him to consult a specialist in nervous complaints, who promptly ordered 4 weeks of total rest in hospital. During the month of January 1911, Otto Klemperer did not conduct.

On his return to duty, in early February, the « Stadttheater » treated him with consideration. Previously, he had conducted anything, up to 15 performances a month. In February and March, that number was reduced to 11, so that there were frequently 2 clear days between performances. But he was no better. The depression was as intense as ever and, with it, went the attendant symptoms of anxiety, night sweats, lack of appetite and inability to sleep that were always to afflict him during such periods. His family observed his condition with deepening concern ; Ida Klemperer must have perceived, the cause of her son's suffering lay deeper than mere difficulty in adjusting to the conditions of repertory Opera. Nathan Klemperer left for Berlin to consult the family oracle, Georg. Georg's response was prompt and generous : he would provide money to enable his cousin to take a year's leave ; if, at the end of that period, he was no better, he should go ahead with his intention of abandoning his career as a conductor. On 31 March, Otto Klemperer conducted a new production of Léo Delibes's « Lakmé » . 2 days later, he made what was to be his last appearance at the « Stadttheater » for 18 months.

At this point, Klemperer himself went to Berlin to consult his cousin, as he was later to do in so many critical moments in his life. Georg recommended that he spend a few weeks at a clinic at Königstein, in the Taunus mountains north-west of Frankfurt, which was run by Doctor Oskar Kohnstamm, whom he knew well. It was a shrewd choice, for Königstein was to become a retreat and refuge, to which Klemperer frequently returned in periods of stress. The sanatorium, which was situated on a small hill some 30 minutes' walk from the town, had come into existence, more or less by chance. Kohnstamm, who had become his career as an Internist (specialist for internal disorders) , had early discovered himself to possess a talent for treating mental distress, and, in particular, for reactivating depressed patients at a time when psychoanalysis was in its infancy and chemico-therapy did not exist. He had started by taking patients into his own house and, by 1906, had achieved such success that he had been able to build his own sanatorium, to which a further wing was added in 1912.

Nonetheless, the sanatorium remained small in scale, for the essence of Kohnstamm's treatment lay in the personal attention he gave to each of his patients. Although, he practised and published papers on hypnosis, his approach was essentially empirical and depended, in large part, on the direct influence he was able to exert. By the time Klemperer became his patient, he had already established something of a reputation for his skill in treating artists. But the sanatorium was not just a refuge for the rich and famous. Those who could it were charged heavily, others paid little. Königstein was run on idealistic principles. « Edel sei der mensch, hülfreich und gut. » , a Gøethe quotation that might have come out of Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » , was inscribed over its entrance.

At 1st, Doctor Kohnstamm told Otto Klemperer that he should regard his illness as the psychological equivalent of growing pains. That was true to the extent that a manic-depressive temperament often 1st reveals itself in youth, as it had done in Klemperer's case. But the implication that he would grow-out of it was to prove sadly unfounded : though there were to be lengthy periods of relative calm, he continued, until his death at the age of 88, to alternate between highs and lows of varying intensity. Whether Kohnstamm himself came to the conclusion, later reached by psychiatrists, that his illness was primarily endogenous (that is, not caused by outward circumstances) is uncertain. But he set about re-activating his patient with considerable success.

In the case of depression, Kohnstamm attached particular importance to a strict daily routine that was intended to make it difficult for patients to lapse into the inertia that often accompanies despair. In the morning, there was compulsory gardening, even for those who had never lifted a hoe. After lunch, a pause for sleep was followed by an afternoon walk, which sometimes took the form of an excursion. Bedtime was early ; there was no smoking or drinking. Crucial to this routine were meals, which were taken communally at a long table, together with the staff. Each morning, Doctor Kohnstamm, himself, personally supervised the seating, and Klemperer, whose bad table manners had attracted unfavourable comment, was often put next to « Frau » Kohnstamm, in the vain expectation that this might bring about an improvement.

From this rigid daily order, Otto Klemperer acquired a discipline that was to stand him in good stead whenever depression threatened to immobilize him. But Kohnstamm was to martinet. He had in abundance the kindness and patience required in the handling of manic-depressives ; and, in the case of artists and intellectuals, he recognised the value of inner stimulation. Early on, he referred his patient to the sanatorium's library, where, to his delight, Klemperer 1st encountered Theodor Fontane's « Effi Briest » (1894) . Kohnstamm also attached importance to learning poetry by heart, and, in particular, he drew Klemperer's attention to lines from Gøethe's « Faust » , Part 2, that described the depressive phase of his affliction. In an attempt to re-stimulate Klemperer's interest in music, he invited him to hear Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » , in Frankfurt. At 1st, Klemperer refused. But Kohnstamm, who was no Freudian and did not hesitate to use direct influence when that seemed indicated, insisted, and Klemperer went. Within 5 weeks, he had resumed his piano playing and Doctor Kohnstamm set aside a room where he could practice undisturbed. A very warm relationship sprang-up from between the doctor and the patient.

On 18 May, Gustav Mahler died at the age of only 50. Otto Klemperer read the news in the paper and the sudden loss of the man who more than any other had been his mentor and inspiration came as such a shock that, for a while, it seemed as though he were about to relapse into the depression from which he had been emerging. By the summer, he was well enough to leave Königstein. A year's leave was still considered advisable and the question arose of where he was to spend it. He had written to Hans Pfitzner from the sanatorium, explaining his troubles, and Pfitzner had been understanding. Now that Mahler was dead, the presence of his old teacher in Strasbourg, where he was completing his 2nd year as director of the Opera, doubtless played a large part in Klemperer's decision to base himself there. In Strasbourg, he could attend rehearsals, he had an Opera library at his disposal, and, although relations were not particularly intimate, Hans Pfitzner was a man with whom he could discuss musical issues. Strasbourg proved to have another advantage : in Robert Wollenberg, director of the University's psychiatric clinic, Klemperer found a sympathetic medical counsellor, who shared Georg Klemperer's opinion that a prolonged rest from the stresses of theatrical life was essential to his well-being. Wollenberg was also close to Pfitzner and deeply involved in the city's musical life. During the coming year, and later during his period at the Strasbourg Opera, Klemperer was to be frequent guest-conductor in his hospitable home.

With a view to improving his French, Otto Klemperer took lodgings with a French-speaking family in Schiltigheim, on the outskirts of Strasbourg. His room was furnished with no more than a bed, a piano, a table and a chair, and he imposed on himself a regime almost as severe as that at Doctor Kohnstamm's sanatorium. In the morning, he studied in depth Operas (that means going into the work - not just looking at it) , he did not know, above all Richard Wagner's « Ring » , but also works by Mozart and Richard Strauß, none of whose music he had, yet, had an opportunity to conduct. He worked methodically and slowly, first with a vocal reduction, and only when he had mastered that turned to an orchestral score. At meal times, there was French conversation, in the afternoon, walking or (in summer) swimming. Klemperer also hired a viola so as to try out bowings ; and with the intention, which he never realized, of translating the libretto of Mozart's « Don Giovanni » , he embarked on learning Italian. He also attended lectures on esthetics, at the University. The year of retreat, that had been enforced on him, was to play a crucial part in his development. As he himself later put it, with characteristic terseness, one learns a lot when one is alone. Depressions, such as he suffered, in 1911, forced Otto Klemperer in on himself, but, in spite of the deep unhappiness they brought, they contributed much to a growing depth of musical insight.

In the middle of July, when his spirits were already beginning to revive, he went on a short holiday in south Germany. There, he chanced to read an enthusiastic account in the « Frankfurter Zeitung » of a production of Gluck's « Orphée et Eurydice » at the summer « Théâtre du Jorat » at Mézières, a village some 15 miles north-east of Lausanne. Because acceptable performances of the work were rare in Germany, he decided, on the spur of the moment, to travel overnight, and, on 16 July, he arrived in time to attend a performance that did much to open his eyes to the possibility of musical theatre.

A more agreeable memory of Munich was provided by performances of Mozart's « Le nozze di Figaro » and « Così fan Tutte », which Richard Strauß conducted at the « Residenztheater », in the course of the Summer Festival. Otto Klemperer was particularly impressed by Strauß's conducting technique :

« He only made very small movements, but their effect was enormous. His control of the Orchestra was absolute. He accompanied the recitatives himself on a harpsichord and made delightful little embellishments. »

To Klemperer, Richard Strauß seemed to have a new approach to Mozart.

Strauß was at the pinnacle of his fame when Klemperer went to visit him in Garmisch, in August or September 1911. In his Opera « Elektra » (1909) , he had revealed an unexpected kinship to the new movement of expressionism that was beginning to make itself in literature and painting. If in « Der Rosenkavalier » , which in the previous January had enjoyed a triumphant 1st performance in Dresden and was in the process of sweeping the Opera Houses of the world, he seemed, under the influence of Hugo von Hofmannsthal's cultural nostalgia, to have retreated from this radical position, he had in doing so provided the German Operatic repertory with its most successful new score since Richard Wagner.

Inevitably, the conversation turned to Gustav Mahler, who had died less than 3 months earlier. Strauß, who greatly admired Mahler, commented on his obsession with redemption. That, he said, was a concept that meant nothing to him :

« I don't know what I'm supposed to be redeemed from. »

Nothing could more graphically illustrate the psychological gulf that separated the 2 greatest composer-conductors of their time, one a questing metaphysician, the other a man of robust horse sense.

Clearly, so earth-bound a character could never fill the gap that Gustav Mahler had left in Klemperer's life. But, at that time at any rate, the young conductor regarded Strauß's towering personality with awe. Strauß, for his part, seems to have been impressed by his young visitor for, a few weeks later, they met again at the annual « Tonkünstlerfest », in Heidelberg, which that year was dedicated to the centenary of Franz Liszt's birth. On 24 October, Klemperer heard Richard Strauß conduct the Symphonic poem « Tasso » and, then, accompany Ferruccio Busoni in a performance of the Piano Concerto No. 2 in A major. Busoni, Klemperer wrote in an undated letter to his parents, had played unbelievably (« unerhört ») well. The next morning, he continued :

« I fetched (Strauß) from his hotel and we went walking in the lovely Neckar valley. He advised me to look, as soon as possible, for a job at a large Court Theatre (Munich or, better still, Berlin) and, for the time being, not to attach importance to a big position. (I am still far from mature enough for that) . I would, however, be extremely advantageous for me, as a conductor, to work with a 1st-class Orchestra, like, for instance, that in Berlin. I told him that, particularly for me, a few years of Prussian drill would be beneficial ; as a young man, he had also been just as wild and idealistic in his demands as I am.

Then, we ate together and, after the meal, I played him my orchestral songs in the hotel. He read the score and was absolutely charming. The 1st and last songs he liked very much, although the last he found very Mahlerian, but, as he said, laid-out in a masterly way. The 2 middle-songs were too “outré” for him. Anyway, at the end, he said that he would recommend the songs for performance at the next “Tonkünstlerfest”. You can imagine how pleased I was at his interest, because, the final resort, he is the most important German musician for the moment. »

In the last 3 words of that letter indicate that Klemperer already felt an immanent reserve towards a composer who was capable of storming imaginative heights but also of lapsing into the rankest pathos, Strauß's advice suggests that he, for his part, considered that the ardent, idealistic young musician who had sought him out would benefit from a few years' routine in a 1st-class Opera House.

On 20 November, Gustav Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » had its 1st performance in Munich under Bruno Walter, and Klemperer travelled overnight, from Strasbourg, to hear it. To his surprise, the work made relatively little impact on him. That, as he explained in a cautiously worded letter to Mahler's widow, Alma, he attributed to his own slowness at grasping new scores. But, perhaps, he implied, the performance under Bruno Walter also had something to do with it :

« If only we could have heard the work once under Mahler. »

Klemperer spent the afternoon before the concert with Alma Mahler and, from the tone of his reply to a letter she had written to him within a day or 2 of that meeting, it is clear that a very warm relationship had sprung into existence. During the following 3 weeks, Klemperer wrote several times to Alma, but the arrival on 7 December of a money order for the substantial sum of 2,000 Austrian Crowns came as a complete surprise. 3 days later, Klemperer explained to his parents what had occurred :

« You know that I was recently with “ Frau ” Mahler in Munich and she was extremely kind to me. Then, on Thursday, there arrived a money order for 2,000 “ Kronen ” from Vienna with a letter enclosed in which she wrote more or less the following :“ I had laughingly told her in Munich about my debts. She had told all that to a woman friend who is very rich and loves her (“ Frau ” Mahler) very much. This friend had spontaneously sent her 2,000 “ Kronen ” for me. She only asked me not to use the money to pay my debts but go to a nice, mild climate and stay there for as long as the stupid money lasted.

Nothing that I can tell you about the letter can give you the remotest idea of how marvellously kind it is. At 1st, I was almost shocked and wanted to send the money back. But now, I shall keep it with a happy heart, from by whom, or better, through whom, would I prefer to be helped in this way than Mahler's wife ? I will make things much easier for me ; among others things, I shall be able to start the new engagement (in Hamburg) without an advance. No one must know anything about this. When I see you again, perhaps I'll show you the letters from Frau Mahler, which are so moving (“ schön ”) . On Friday, I had another one. »

Otto Klemperer and Alma Mahler continued to correspond during that winter. Alma's letters have not survived. From Klemperer's it is, however, evident that he had come to regard her as a confidante to whom he could open his heart as he did to few people outside his immediate family circle.

Early in November, the concert that Klemperer and Ilse Fromm had planned to give in Hamburg was announced for 30 January 1912. As this was to be the 1st time he would conduct an Orchestra in a concert-hall, the programme became a matter of anxious deliberation. From the start, Klemperer was clear that the 2nd half of the programme should consist of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 4, which had not been heard in Hamburg, with Eva Lessman as the soloist in the last movement. But what works should the 1st half include ? Like so many inexperienced young artists, Klemperer and Ilse Fromm, at 1st, tried to cram too much on the plate : Ilse fromm was to play both a Bach and a Beethoven Concerto. It was Ida Klemperer who brought a sense of reality to their deliberations. 3 major works, she insisted, was one too many. Klemperer saw the wisdom of his mother's advice and, on 3 december, he wrote to tell Ilse Fromm that one of the Concertos must go. It was finally agreed that the 1st half should consist of Beethoven's « Weihe des Hauses » Overture and Bach's D minor Piano Concerto. Yet, even this reduced programme caused him, as he wrote to Oskar Fried (20 december) , « not a little anxiety » .

It remains a mystery how Klemperer was able to afford to hire the large « Hamburg Musikhalle » for a programme that required additional strings and was, by no means, popular by the standards of the day ; in the early years of the 20th Century, Bach's instrumental music was relatively rarely performed, while the Mahler Symphony was a lengthy and still little-known modern work. The engagement of the leader of the Hamburg Opera Orchestra and the number of rehearsals that Klemperer insisted on must also have been added to the expenses. Did the generous « Tante Hélène » , once again, dip into her capacious purse ? Or did some other friend enable Klemperer to mount this costly undertaking ?

There was laughter when, on the night, Klemperer sat to conduct. He did so, as he subsequently explained to Alma Mahler, simply because, owing to his great height, he was embarrassed to stand. But to a conventionally minded provincial public, it seemed eccentric and the critics inevitably made much of it. In the « Hamburger Nachrichten » of 1 February, Ferdinand Pfohl wrote :

« “ Herr ” Klemperer enriched the concert-hall with a new feature. He appeared, a towering figure (whose) exceptional height, for a moment, aroused horror. Then, he sank into a chair and, there, he sat and conducted. But his chair transformed itself into a mystical steed, on which he performed a fantastic ride. It recalled the scene with the flying horse in “ Don Quixote ”, in which the horse does not move but carries its rider into the clouds. Klemperer really made the motions of riding : he curbed, subdued, whipped and spurred. O charm of the unusual ! »

There was general criticism of a conducting technique that Pfohl described as both violent and awkward. In the « Hamburger Fremdenblatt » of the same date, Heinrich Chevalley rebuked Klemperer for a mixture of pedantry and gratuitous vehemence.

« The help that “ Herr ” Klemperer gives with his baton, the way in which he indicates absolutely self-evident entries is almost offensive to an Orchestra of any standing, and the exaltation with which he used his baton in a Bach Concerto makes one fear that, when he eventually conducts “ Tristan ”, those within reach will be in danger of their lives. This outward animation which, in the main stems from a laudable desire for absolute clarity and definition, is accompanied by many negative effects on the orchestral sound. In so far as Klemperer over-anxiously and over-eagerly watches over an individual thematic entry, this entry is unavoidably accentuated strongly, so that the ear loses contact with the general development. Something hard, angular and academic crept into the performance of Beethoven's Overture, « Die Weihe des Hauses » , which nonetheless had a wonderful plasticity and was shaped with Classical monumentality. »

« Whatever one may say against the surplus energy that bursts in a elemental manner out of Klemperer, whatever one may find to reproach in individual aspects of what he does, one must unreservedly salute his fiery spirit and unequalled musical conscientiousness. There is here, unmistakably, a great conductor (“ Dirigent großen Stiles ”) in the making. It is equally unmistakable that Klemperer is able to impose his intentions to the Orchestra. Our Philharmonic Orchestra has rarely produced a piano such as it did yesterday ; and, from his mentor and Master, Gustav Mahler, Klemperer has learnt how, with a sudden movement, to seize the entire Orchestra and make it flash. Whether admiration will later grow into love for his innermost musical being, whether warmth of heart will eventually shine-out of him and his art only the future can determine. As things stand, Klemperer remains the only hope for our Opera, and, from the course of this evening, we can be certain that these expectations will not be disappointed. »

The « Musikhalle » was, inevitably, far from full, but Klemperer gained much from his 1st orchestral concert. To a greater extent than was possible in the Opera House, he had succeeded in impressing on his audience a sense of his musical individuality. He had shown that, for all the demands he had made, he had it in him to win an Orchestra's unstinted support. But he, himself, was far from content. On 7 February, he wrote to Alma Mahler :

« I wasn't really satisfied with myself in the rehearsals. I felt that my gestures were not sufficiently relevant. To rehearse well is the hardest thing of all. We both know who knew how to do that. »

In the middle of January, a couple of weeks before his orchestral concert, Otto Klemperer had accompanied Eva Leßmann in recitals, in Munich and Prague, and, on 8 February, they repeated the concert in Hamburg. Their programme, which consisted of songs by Gustav Mahler, Hans Pfitzner, Oskar Fried and Klemperer himself, bore the stamp of his personal loyalties.

Letter of Otto Klemperer to Arthur Bodansky :

« When I was with you in Vienna (in January) , I was already not so lively as I am when I'm well, but I didn't want to give way to this frame of mind. When I returned here, after the (Hamburg) concert, it was really bad. I work, I mean I learn works that I don't know, with such frightful difficulty that I feel that there isn't enough time in the whole existence for me ever to become an accomplished conductor. I don't know what is going to become of me. It's probably a lack of ability or of energy and confidence (which is a form of ability) . Please don't be angry about this dreadful letter. I am certainly not worthy to have such a friend as yourself. Of course, there's no question of composing. Travelling or going away to recuperate would, I think, be pointless, as I only find some peace when I study to make good my lack of knowledge of so many works. Again, I beg you to forgive this letter. I could not write otherwise. »

Hardly had he penned this self-revelatory letter than he began to regret it. From Mannheim, where he had gone in early May to attend the rehearsals for 2 Mahler concerts that Artur Bodansky was conducting on the 1st anniversary of the composer's death, he wrote anxiously to Alma, who had not replied (probably because she had been in Paris) :

« I hope that, through mischance, the letter has not landed in hands other than yours. It was in all conscience written solely and exclusively for your eyes. Perhaps, it would have been better if it had been left unwritten. I couldn't have written other than I did, and I thought that to you I could write exactly as I felt without any reserve. I feel that I may have told you more about myself than you wanted to know. In that case, please forget it and don't be hangry. »

That was the last of a series of notably unreserved letters that Klemperer wrote during the 6 months following his encounter with Alma Mahler in Munich, in November 1911. They must have met when they were both in Mannheim for Arthur Bodansky's Mahler concerts, on 10 and 11 May. But, thereafter, their correspondence ceased as abruptly as it had begun. At some point, Alma, never bashful in her approaches to the opposite sex, made an advance. Klemperer was deeply shocked : for him, she remained 1st and foremost the widow of the revered Gustav Mahler. He seems to have repelled her with a prudery characteristic of him in depression, and their friendship accordingly cooled.

After his visit to Mannheim, Klemperer returned to Königstein's clinic. Doctor Kohnstamm told him that, in spite of his fears, he would be well enough to return to Hamburg for the coming season and, early in July, he travelled north to prepare for what he later referred to as his year of destiny.

Shipwreck

In autumn 1912, the « Hamburg Stadttheater » came under new management. Much was expected of Hans Loewenfeld, the new director, who, unlike his predecessor, was an artist as well as an administrator. Still in his 30's, he had studied composition and musical theory, and, in Leipzig, where he had been Opera director since 1908, had attracted attention with a series of productions of Richard Strauß's Operas and with staging of Mozart's « Die Zauberflöte » , which was notable for its departure from the customary monumental approach and freedom from naturalistic excess. An intelligent fellow-practionner later described it as having brought the production of Opera a good step forward. Loewenfeld was no world-shaker. But he promised to be a man who would bring the old-fashioned « Hamburg Stadttheater » into an age in which the public was no longer satisfied with vocal virtuosity alone, but was coming to attach importance also to the way in which a work was performed and staged. Such a director was likely to be more sympathetic than his predecessor to the ideals of a radically minded young conductor.

Other factors were less favourable. Gustav Brecher had left for Cologne and been succeeded by Felix Weingartner, who though a distinguished conductor was not a man of the theatre. Both the Orchestra and chorus left a good deal to be desired, and the theatre itself was antiquated (a motion to rebuild it had gone before the Senate, in October 1911) . But the gravest limitation remained the fact that the « Stadttheater » received no public subsidies, so that Loewenfeld was as dependent as his predecessor on the box-office. As Heinrich Chevalley noted, at the start of the new season, it was the system, not the man, that was at fault.

Nonetheless, Loewenfeld's plans were more enterprising than those that greeted Otto Klemperer when he had 1st arrived at the « Stadttheater » , 2 years earlier. In 1910, the novelties had been the rankest trivialities. For the season of 1912-1913, Loewenfeld had announced Richard Strauß's « Ariadne auf Naxos » , even before it had had its 1st performance in Stuttgart, in October of that year ; Engelbert Humperdinck's « Königskinder » , which had only won recognition since its revised version had had its 1st performance in New York, in 1910 ; and « Der Schneemann » , a pantomime that had been composed at the age of 11 by the Viennese « Wunderkind » , Erich Wolfgang Korngold. The general repertory was also more substantial than it had been, so that Klemperer was now largely spared trivial novelties and « Spielopern » . This also reflected a material change in his own position in the theatre. In 1910, he had been no more than a junior conductor. Now, he was listed immediately after Felix Weingartner, in the musical hierarchy. Clearly, his achievements in the earlier season had not gone unremarked. The auspices for 1912-1913, the season which was to witness the shipwreck of his career, were promising.

On his return to Hamburg, in early July, Klemperer rented a room in « Groß Flottbek » , a leafy suburb with large, spacious villas on the estuary of the river Elbe, beyond Altona. Feeling a need to be on his own, he enjoyed living in surroundings that were still quite countryfied and, yet, near enough to the city for him to return home at midday. There, his depression lifted ; writing on 23 August to his sister « Regi » Elbogen, he expressed a sense of contentment quite absent from letters written earlier that year. His opening Opera was Beethoven's « Fidelio » , a work he had not previously conducted, and he set about preparing it with his customary intensity. Singers were invited to « Flottbek » to study their roles and, among them, was Elisabeth Schumann, who was to sing the character of Marzelline. Although Klemperer had been struck by her appearance 2 years earlier, he had been too depressed to pay attention to any woman and, in the meantime, Elisabeth Schumann had married Walther Puritz, a young Hamburg architect. Now, as his spirits rose, he became aware of her abundant charm and warmth, the crystalline beauty of her young voice and the unaffected freshness of her musical responses. In the course of incessant rehearsals, the shy, recessive Klemperer opened-up to her as a human being and she, too, began to fall under his spell. As the weeks passed, their relationship grew increasingly intense.

The new season opened on 30 August with Verdi's « Aida » , staged by Hans Loewenfeld and conducted by Felix Weingartner, with a cast that included Lucille Marcel, Otilie Metzger and Heinrich Hensel, all singers of repute. After so splendid an inauguration of the new regime, the performance of Beethoven's « Fidelio » , which Klemperer conducted on the following day, inevitably came as something of an anti-climax. With the exception of Elisabeth Schumann's Marzelline, the cast was undistinguished. The strongest impression of the evening, wrote Heinrich Chevalley, came from the conducting :

« The whole way in which he animated (“ beseelte ”) the work, enlivened tempi in relationship to the stage and accentuated orchestral expression as the dramatic situation demanded, again revealed Klemperer as one of the most talented disciples of the Mahlerian school and a conductor whose prime principle is to achieve an intimate fusion of drama and music. »

« Not only do his topics possess intrinsic historical interest ; additionally, Klemperer's own impact on the history of performance has been so strong that his views acquire historic importance in their own right. » (Arthur Jacobs, « The Musical Times »)

Berlin Modernist

3 years later, in 1927, Klemperer was appointed general musical director of the « Kroll Oper » , in Berlin. He served in that capacity until 1931, the year the company went-out of existence. Klemperer also founded the Berlin Philharmonic Choir. His experience at the « Kroll » was legendary and markedly different than his later work in the United States and Great Britain. This was the heyday of the Weimar Republic. Culturally, Berlin was at its notorious between-the-Wars zenith. Under Klemperer, the « Kroll » became one of the most renowned experimental companies in the world. The list of composers whose works were performed reads like a who's who of European modernism : Arnold Schoenberg (given a double-bill) , Igor Stravinsky (a triple-bill) , Paul Hindemith and Kurt Weill, among others. Klemperer also gave all-Bach concerts and, sometimes, mixed Bach with contemporaries, such as Paul Hindemith and Kurt Weill.

The « Kroll » 's experimentalism scandalized even Weimar's Berlin. The company was attacked from both the Left (which was ironic because its artistic mission was a socialist connection of art with the workers) and from the Right, where the Nazis were gaining strength and becoming bolder with each passing year. Finally, the pressure proved too great and the « Kroll » closed down, in 1931. In « The Mæstro Myth » , Norman Lebrecht quotes Klemperer as saying :

« I didn't want an avant-garde Opera, I just wanted to make good theatre - just that and nothing else. »

Klemperer remained in the increasingly antagonistic atmosphere of Berlin until the month after Adolf Hitler was named Chancellor of Germany, in 1933. After leaving the « Kroll » , he took the position of 2nd conductor at the « Staatsoper » (State Opera) . Being a Jewish musician (albeit one who had converted to Christianity) , and a controversial one at that, Klemperer foresaw difficulties with the Nazi regime. Yet, before leaving Germany, he did make a few attempts to appease the government. As John Rockwell points-out in his 1984 « New York Times » review of the 1st volume of Peter Heyworth's 2 Volume biography of Otto Klemperer, the conductor « wrote prose poems in praise of the New-Order and even suggested the formation of a Jewish Palestine guard to protect Hitler » . Both suggestions most likely demonstrated evidence of Klemperer's bi-polar disorder. When the « Gestapo » began arresting opponents of the Nazi government, Klemperer fled to Switzerland and, eventually, made his way to the United States.

Conducting the Los Angeles Philharmonic

In many respects, Klemperer's sojourn in America was the nadir of his life and career. Depression (possibly made worse by unfamiliar surroundings and culture) continued to plague him, and he found the respect that he had garnered in Europe had all but vanished in the New World. He settled almost immediately in Los Angeles, where a thriving community of intellectual refugees had made their homes. This was a city where serious music was nothing more than a backdrop to cinema. Klemperer was fortunate enough to be given the opportunity to conduct the Los Angeles Philharmonic after the departure of conductor Artur Rodzinski for the Cleveland Orchestra.

In addition to his duties at the Los Angeles Philharmonic, Klemperer was a guest-conductor for the New York Philharmonic during the 1934-1935 and 1935-1936 seasons. In 1937, the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra engaged renowned conductor Otto Klemperer to re-organize and expand the Orchestra. A born-teacher, he is credited with turning the ensemble, in just 6 weeks, into a power of international level. He is also responsible for the nomination of a young Fritz Reiner, as his successor. However, his behavior outside the concert-hall became more erratic and the ensuing publicity he received damaged his reputation in the United States. His tenure at the Los Angeles Philharmonic lasted until 1939. Just before the start of the 1939-1940 season, Klemperer was diagnosed with a brain tumor. The surgery and the stroke he suffered afterward ended his career in Los Angeles. Conductor Bruno Walter took-over the baton.

The stroke left Klemperer partially paralyzed . Conducting was out of the question. It could only have deepened the torment he experienced during bouts with the depressive phase of his illness. The remainder of his stay in America was a long slide into obscurity. Ironically, as he went about the task of rehabilitating his body (Klemperer, at 6 feet 4 inches had the physical strength to match his will) , rumors of insanity persistently followed him. By the time he was able to again take-up conducting, he was left to promote his own concerts, including one at Carnegie Hall. During the War years, he received little work.

In 1947, Otto Klemperer returned to Europe. First to Prague, the location of his first conducting post, then on to the Budapest Opera House, for the 1948-1949 and 1949-1950 seasons. He began making recordings during these years. « Otto Klemperer mellszobra » (The Bust of Otto Klemperer) by artist-sculptor, Anna Mahler (1984) .

The bust was sculpted by Anna Mahler (daughter of Gustav Mahler) , in 1984, also a renowned Chief-conductor at the Budapest Opera House, at an earlier period, and one of the most important figures of 20th Century Classical music.

Interrupted Melody : Otto Klemperer, « Lohengrin » , and Budapest

(By Andrew Farkas.)

Every recording of a live performance inherently carries a special significance. It captures the fleeting moment, preserves the work of interpreters giving their creative best (one hopes), and enables listeners to discover, enjoy, assess, hear, or re-hear the performance. Clearly, the historic value of a live Operatic recording depends on the quality of the voices and on the work of the conductor, chorus, and Orchestra. Going beyond the obvious, some occasions take on a special dimension because of the presence of one or more famous participants and, once in a while, for capturing something unusual.

The live recording of the complete Hungarian State Opera production of Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » conducted by Otto Klemperer, in the autumn of 1948, has enough distinguishing marks to elevate it above the ordinary. What give it special importance are the contribution, artistry, and (one has to admit) shenanigans of its conductor. The number of Klemperer's complete Opera recordings (studio or live) are few, and apart from « BBC » broadcasts of a Covent Garden « Fidelio » and a Royal Festival Hall concert of « Der fliegende Holländer », the broadcasts preserved in the Hungarian capital city of Budapest are the only surviving examples of what this Mæstro could do in the Opera House with Beethoven, Offenbach, Mozart, and Wagner. Even among them, his only complete « Lohengrinis » an unusual musical document.

Artistically footloose in post-War Europe, Otto Klemperer had no set plans about where to turn next. By sheer coincidence, an unusual opportunity came his way through the Hungarian music-critic and musicologist Aladár Tóth. They 1st met in 1933, soon after Klemperer was forced to flee Germany, within months after the Nazi take-over. Klemperer conducted the 3 year old Budapest Concert Orchestra, both in Budapest and Vienna. In the Austrian capital, his soloist was Béla Bartók, performing his recently completed 2nd Piano Concerto. Tóth interviewed him and, according to his report, Klemperer, looking for an artistic home, hinted that he would gladly take-over the Orchestra on a permanent basis even without remuneration. Nothing came of the idea, but his performances with the Concert Orchestra laid the foundation of Tóth's high-esteem for his abilities.

Tóth and his wife, the pianist Annie Fischer, had weathered the War years, in Sweden. They renewed their acquaintance when Klemperer gave a concert in Stockholm, in March 1946. The Bach, Mozart, and Beethoven program « had proved to me anew », wrote Tóth, « that the true genius through his trials reaches new heights in his art. Because, if that was possible, Klemperer's inner artistic freedom had grown, its deep humanity and elemental force had grown even more powerful since his illness ». Soon after, Tóth returned to Hungary and, as a politically acceptable and respected man of music, was appointed director of the Hungarian State Opera House. His 1st objective was to attract guest-conductors of international stature, and he invited Fritz Busch, Bruno Walter, and, remembering the Stockholm concert, Otto Klemperer. Due to other commitments, of the 3 conductors, only Klemperer was in a position to accept the invitation. Initially engaged for a dozen performances, the offer was renewed and extended, and in the end Klemperer remained as the principal guest-conductor of the Hungarian Opera House for 3 years.

After leaving Budapest, Otto Klemperer moved on to East-Berlin, where he conducted Opera until government interference became too great. Klemperer thereupon returned to the United States, but his woes returned. This was the beginning of the Cold War and Klemperer had spent most of the post-War period in the Eastern Bloc. His passport was confiscated and he found himself under scrutiny by the Federal Bureau of Investigation. He was rescued from this latest debacle by British record producer, Walter Legge.

Otto Klemperer and the « Philharmonia » Orchestra

In 1954, following the death of Wilhelm Furtwängler, Herbert von Karajan was elected music-director of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and, subsequently, curtailed his work with the « Philharmonia ». Needing to find a new conductor for the Orchestra, Walter Legge turned to Otto Klemperer, whose career was flagging at the time. Klemperer's name became closely linked with the Orchestra during an « Indian Summer » of celebrated recordings. In 1959, he was named music-director for life.

On 10 March 1964, Walter Legge announced that he was going to disband the « Philharmonia » Orchestra. At a recording session with Klemperer, a meeting was convened where those present unanimously agreed that they would not allow the Orchestra to be disbanded. Klemperer gave his immediate support and, on 17 March 1964, the members of the Orchestra elected their own governing body and adopted the name « New Philharmonia » Orchestra. The inaugural concert of the « New Philharmonia » under its own auspices took place on 27 October 1964. It was a performance of Beethoven's Symphony No. 9, conducted by Klemperer, who was now honorary president of the Orchestra. From 1966 until 1972, the chairman of the Orchestra was the principal flautist, Gareth Morris.

Otto Klemperer and Mozart

Recordings of the Mozart - Da Ponte Operas recently crossed my desk. 2 of them are long out of print and the remaining, « Don Giovanni », is hard to find. These were recorded in London, in the early 1970's, toward the end of the extraordinary life and career of their conductor, Otto Klemperer. Today, they are considered old hat, unfashionable.

Otto Klemperer (1885-1973) was a German with a self-destructive streak fueled by bi-polar disorder. In his manic moods, he would take-off, wander the earth, set himself on fire, sleep around, alienate musicians on and off the stage and, generally, be uncontrollable. His condition worsened after surgery for a brain tumor left half of his face paralyzed. He was quite the ladies man : his elopement with the married « prima donna » Elisabeth Schumann scandalized Germany, 80 years ago. He had a long suffering wife and 2 children. Klemperer's daughter, Lotte, spent her life taking care of Papa ; without her, he might have been institutionalized, much less been able to work.

Werner and Lotte have since died. (Klemperer also founded the « Kroll Oper » , one of Europe's most important companies in Berlin, in the 1920's : here, he introduced new Operas by Stravinsky, Schönberg, Hindemith, Weill and Janáček. I would have loved to have experienced the « Kroll Oper » .

Klemperer came into a golden period, in the early days of stereo, when he made a large number of recordings with the magnificent « Philharmonia » Orchestra, in London. Most of these are now available on CD ; everything from Bach's B minor Mass to Symphonies of Anton Bruckner and orchestral works of Richard Strauß. Klemperer's style is large, just short of ponderous, and intensely dramatic. His Bach and Mozart can sound overwhelming to today's ears. Repeated listening will reveal as much orchestral detail as today's historically informed performances. Klemperer can be thought simply slow. Even his son Werner Klemperer told me :

« Father's " Così fan Tutte " really is very slow. »

Yes, maybe it is. The fizz and wit in all of « Marriage of Figaro », « Don Giovanni » and « Così fan Tutte » are harder to find in Klemperer's recordings. I just obtained these recordings and cannot stop listening to them. Finding a balance between joy and sorrow is a terrible burden, and is critical, especially in « Così fan Tutte ». I expect Klemperer did not understand casual listening. He was working for audiences who listened over and over, who paid attention, and who allowed his performances to really get under the skin. The « Così fan Tutte » has an exquisite cast : the soprano Margaret Price (Fiordiligi) sings with a warmth and a glow recalling Eleanor Steber, Teresa Berganza, Lucia Popp, and the wonderful « tenore di grazia » Luigi Alva, and Geraint Evans all sing for the beauty of their own voices and they allow Klemperer's loving approach to the music to tell the story. This is a case of « just sing » but what singing ! This « Così » sounds to me both Romantic and sad, but never slow.

The « Marriage of Figaro » is on the heavy side even for me. The irony and, yes, some of the cruelty is more forward in this approach. I can still marvel at the simple beauty of the Finale (« Contessa, perdono ») but, for the 1st time, we get the hint that all will not end well. Another great cast, especially one of my favourite artists, the soprano Elisabeth Soederstroem (Countess) , Geraint Evans (Figaro) , Reri Grist (Susanna) and Gabriel Bacquier (Conte) . There is a lovely story told about these « EMI » recording sessions. The 1st scene, with Susanna and Figaro had just been recorded. Klemperer lit is pipe and was content. The recording producer, Suvi Raj Grubb asked that the scene be repeated.

Klemperer was surprised :

« Vy repeat ?! Miss Grist, are you satisfied ? »

« Yes, Mæstro. » , replied Reri Grist.

« And Mister Evans, are you pleased ? »

« I am, Mæstro. »

Klemperer then turned to the Orchestra, and said :

« I too am pleased, but since Mister Grubb is not pleased, we will do it again. »

Otto Klemperer (1885-1973) was a towering figure among 20th Century conductors. However, as Peter Heyworth makes clear in his masterly and detailed biographical study, « Otto Klemperer, his life and times » , Volume 1 : 1885-1933 ; Volume 2 : 1933-1973, Cambridge (1983, 1996) , Klemperer was a complex man, bedevilled by depressive mood swings. In later life, he was celebrated especially for his interpretations of the Austro-German Classics. However, Heyworth chronicles in great detail the huge support which Klemperer gave to new music in the earlier years of his career. This was particularly true of his time at the head of Opera Houses in Cologne (1917-1924) ; Wiesbaden (1924-1927) ; and Berlin (« Kroll Oper » , 1927-1931) . Happily, some of the items on this pair of CDs illustrate those sympathies.

The Austro-German repertoire is represented by a pair of Mozart Symphonies and one by Beethoven. I'm afraid I've never warmed much to Klemperer's Mozart which, on record at least, has seemed to me often to be gruff and to be short on the grace, wit and charm which are so important in Mozart. However, I'm pleased to say that the 2 Mozart performances, here, are good ones. The Orchestra at Klemperer's disposal for these recordings was the one which Ferenc Fricsay had taken-over, in 1948, and, perhaps, his stylish training can be detected in the background. However, in pointing this out, I do not mean to detract from Klemperer at all. In the « Prague » , the introduction to the 1st movement is well-phrased and the main Allegro is sprightly (the exposition repeat is observed) . The Andante seemed just a trifle too leisurely to me but the phrasing is graceful, especially in the 1st violins, and there's some good work from the wind principals too. The exposition repeat is omitted. The Presto Finale fizzles along very nicely and, all in all this is a stylish and surprisingly genial reading of the work.

The little G minor Symphony emanates from the same sessions. The 1st movement is reasonably light though the recorded sound is a bit muddy, especially affecting the horns, I found. However, there's ample dramatic fire in the performance. Overall, this seemed to me to be on a par with that of the « Prague » though there are some untidy bits such as the anxious moment for the horns in the Finale (disc 2, track 4 : 32 sec) .

Just over 7 years later, Klemperer returned to this Orchestra, by now renamed, when the live recording of Beethoven's 2nd Symphony took place. The introduction to the 1st movement has breadth and « grandeur » and there is drive and vigour in the main Allegro. I've heard more extrovert accounts of this movement but, on his own terms, Klemperer is very convincing. His conception of the Larghetto is very spacious - some may find it too leisurely. The Scherzo has a rugged wit to it. Here, I'd prefer more sparkle (Klemperer is a bit too forceful for my taste) but the performance is of a piece with his view of the Symphony as a whole. The Finale is purposeful and strong. The Orchestra plays powerfully for him and with commitment. The notes relate that the other work in the concert was the « Eroica » Symphony. It seemed to me that, here, Klemperer related the 2nd Symphony very closely to its successor. His is not, by any means, the only way with this Symphony, and I can imagine some listeners finding it too forbidding and humourless. However, in its own way, the reading is impressive and it certainly does not lack integrity. The many admirers of Klemperer in Beethoven (among whom I count myself, albeit not uncritically) will want to hear this live appendage to his celebrated « Philharmonia » cycle, completed not long before this performance.

Klemperer was selective in the works of Richard Strauß that he performed though he did record several of that composer's works with the « Philharmonia » . In this performance of « Till » , he doesn't project, to my ears at least, a portrait of a « merry » prankster. Instead, the malevolent side of practical joking is brought-out, I feel. This is a portrayal of a sardonic, rather cynical joker and when Till gets his comeuppance it's hard not to feel he has got his just desserts. This is very different from the sort of performance you'd hear from, say Rudolf Kempe, but it's a perfectly valid view, I think and certainly the performance, which is well-played, is biting and sharply observed.

Stravinsky's is not the 1st name that comes to mind when we think of Klemperer but, in fact, the conductor programmed works by Stravinsky throughout his career though, as with Richard Strauß, he was selective in his choice. He actually made a studio recording of « Pulcinella » with the « Philharmonia » , in 1963 (a performance which I have not heard ; it was re-issued by « Testament » not long ago) .

The 4 movements from Kurt Weill's Suite are a very different matter. These short pieces give us a flavour of what Klemperer must have been like during his iconoclastic time at the « Kroll Oper » when he flirted with artistic and political danger, on a regular basis. The « Ballad of Mack the Knife » (disc 1, track 14) may be a shade deliberate but Klemperer and his players invest it with a tangible air of sleazy menace. This authentic ambience is carried on in the other 3 extracts. The music is presented with sharp vigour and there's a real sense of something racy and dangerous. Inevitably, the recorded sound is a touch primitive (but pretty remarkable for its age) but this actually suits the primary colours of Weill's scoring rather well. I would almost go so far as to say that, as a document, this is the most important item in the collection. It was Klemperer's last recording before leaving Germany to go into exile and my only regret is that the whole suite wasn't set down.

Janáček was also a composer championed by Klemperer, in his early career, and he performed several of the Operas, in the 1920's. As Alan Sanders points-out in his notes, he gave the German premiere of the « Sinfonietta », in 1926, followed by the American premiere, in 1927 (and, in between, he gave the 1st performance in Berlin in the composer's presence) . The initial impression made by this performance was not favourable for the opening fanfares are slow, well below the metronome mark, and sound lugubrious (disc 2, track 9) . There's no sense of extrovert joy. Later, however, I came to believe that, in fact, Klemperer's as a rather dark view of the work. The 2nd movement is slightly below the usual speed but, here, the biting accents compensate. The 3rd movement is basically good though the prestissimo, at cue 11 in the score (track 11 : 3 min 49 sec) , is not fast enough to make its full effect and, for some reason, the repeat of this section is ignored.

In general, the last movement is powerfully done. I suspect the music must have been fairly unfamiliar to the players and, at times, the strain shows (e.g. , the clarinet intonation at track 13 : 2 min 45 sec) . For the most part, however, they cope with the ferocious demands which Janáček makes of them. When the opening brass fanfares return (track 13 : 3 min 35 sec) , it's at the same ponderous tempo that we encountered at the outset (though, in fact, the score indicates a very slightly faster speed of 92 minims compared with 72 minims, at the beginning) . There's a rather clumsy gear change, at cue 12 (track 13 : 5 min 11 sec) , when Klemperer slows even more for the Maestoso and rather catches his players on the hop. However, I must admit that the broad tempo does give a certain « grandeur » to the closing pages. This wouldn't be a 1st choice recording by any means but it's an interesting, darker view of this marvellous work. It has good things in it and is worth hearing.

As might be expected, the sound quality varies in this collection since the recordings are from several sources. However, the sound is generally satisfactory. Alan Sanders provides notes which, as usual from this source, are interesting and informative. I was a little surprised to find 1 or 2 inconsistencies, however. He says that the Mozart recordings « may » have been made in the « Jesus-Christus-Kirche » . « EMI » seems certain, however, and the discography to Heyworth's biography (Volume 2, page 401) seems to support them, for it clearly gives that as the venue for the recording of the 25th Symphony. It seems pretty likely, therefore, that the recording of the « Prague » took place in the same venue. On the other hand, I suspect « EMI » are wrong to give the same recording date for both the Strauß and Janáček performances. Mister Sanders says that the Strauß took place on 25 October 1954 and the Janáček, in 1956. Since he quotes the full programmes for both concerts, I suspect he's done his homework and his is the correct version. These may seem small, pedantic points but they indicate sloppy sub-editing for an important historical series.

This is an uneven compilation and I don't really think it shows Klemperer at his trenchant best. Having said that, it contains much that is of interest and it is valuable to hear Klemperer in some repertoire which played an important part in his career but which did not feature strongly in his commercial recordings. Eyebrows have already been raised at 1 or 2 of the names counted by « EMI » as « Great Conductors of the 20th Century » but, surely, Klemperer's place in that pantheon is his by right. He was a major figure in the musical life of the last Century. This issue is a most useful supplement to his more obvious recorded legacy. Whether you agreed with him or not, Otto Klemperer always had something to say about the music he conducted and that is true of this set, which is well worth investigating.

Gramophone Review

Bach / Händel / Cherubini / Gluck / Rameau - « New Philharmonia » Orchestra / « Philharmonia » Orchestra / Otto Klemperer (« Testament » / 2 CD, December, 2006) .

Bach : 4 Orchestral Suites, BWV 1066-69.

Cherubini : « Anacréon » Overture.

Gluck : « Iphigénie en Aulide » Overture.

Händel : 12 Concerti grossi, Opus 6 HWV319-30, No. 4 in A minor, HWV 322.

Rameau : « Pièces de clavecin - Gavotte avec 6 doubles » .

Some years ago, I received a call from the then producer of « BBC Radio 3 » 's « Record Review » , Arthur Johnson, asking me if I would do Bach's 4 Orchestral Suites in « Building a Library » . « You're winding me up. » I said. « I'm not a Bach specialist. I shall probably choose Otto Klemperer, and cause mayhem. That's rather what I'm hoping. » was this far from humourless Scotsman's amused reply. In the event, I caused modified mayhem, in scholarly circles at least, by choosing the marvellous « HMV » recording Menuhin made with the Bach Festival Chamber Orchestra, in 1960, with a little-noticed « Erato » recording by the then far-from-famous John Eliot Gardiner as runner-up. Klemperer was nowhere in the reckoning, largely because, in the mid-1980's, the wrong Klemperer version (his 1969 « New Philharmonia » remake) was in the catalogues. Had this grand and challenging 1954 recording been available, I might well have been able to implement Arthur's Machiavellian fantasy.

Anyone familiar with Klemperer's career, or Peter Heyworth's version of it in his 2 Volume biography, will know that, in Berlin in the 1920's, Klemperer was one of the pioneers of the « Neue Sachlichkeit » , the New Objectivity, in the performance of the Masterworks of the Baroque and Classical periods. Indeed, Bach's Suite No. 3 in D was the work with which he chose to open a pioneering series of subscription concerts at Berlin's « Kroll Oper » , in September 1927. By the end of a texturally severe, yet, fervent account of the Overture, it was clear to those present that a revolution was afoot. The distinguished musicologist, Alfred Einstein, was one of the 1st to declare Klemperer's Bach « un-academic but right » : the « fugato » firmly propelled, the « gavotte » fiery, the « bourrées » properly burlesque, the famous « Air » unemphatic to the point of coolness.

I quote that review (in Heyworth's lucid summary) because it stands as a pretty good description of what we have here in these ferociously grand 1954 recordings, with the important rider that the « Air » , though cool by the standards of a Wilhelm Furtwängler or Bruno Walter, is profoundly affecting. The violinist, Max Strub, would remember Klemperer directing this particular movement virtually without gesture, yet, with such deep inner concentration that, by the end, he was dripping with sweat. It is, indeed, a deeply affecting performance, tender and forgiving, sorrow bowing its head before a greater good, a wider dispensation. Klemperer's Händel (his 1956 recording of the Concerto Grosso in A minor, Opus 6) is also very forgiving, but, then, Händel is a more forgiving composer than Bach.

The 1954 recording shows Klemperer, newly signed by Walter Legge, and the « Philharmonia » at their vital, eloquent best. This was a halcyon age for the Orchestra, the winds in particular. Earlier that same summer, they had played like Saints on famous Karajan recordings of Mozart's « Così fan Tutte » and Strauß's « Ariadne auf Naxos » ; and, here, they are besporting themselves in Bach, like gods on Olympus. Strangely, there are no solo credits, not even in the Suite No. 2 in B minor where the solo flute playing (Gareth Morris, presumably) has great pathos and wit.

As an old man, Klemperer paid tribute to the Baroque with his own charmingly spare orchestration of Rameau's « Gavotte avec 6 doubles » from Book 3 of his « Pièces de clavecin » . There are echoes here of Richard Strauß's stylish reworkings of music by François Couperin and Jean-Baptiste Lully, just as the towering 1963 recording of the Overture to Gluck's « Iphigénie en Aulide » clearly harks back to the legendary production of the Opera Klemperer heard Mahler conduct in Vienna, in 1907 (so perfect as to defy description) .

New to the catalogues is Klemperer's 1960 recording of the Overture to Cherubini's « Anacréon » . This was made in a single end-of-session take, but never published due to an intrusive studio noise (which the computer has now spirited away) , right at the end. It is a performance of mind-blowing power, fervent as you have never heard this piece before. The horn halloos in the coda (8'26''ff) are alone worth the price of the 2 CDs.

Apart from a touch of peak distortion, in 1 or 2 of the trumpet-saturated climaxes in Suite No. 3, all the recordings come-up wonderfully well. To anyone lucky enough to have heard Klemperer in the concert-hall or Opera House, in these years, the set will bring memories flooding back. To younger collectors, those whose ears are still open to the power of great music-making, it might just prove to be a revelation of what great conducting is all about.

Bruckner Symphonies, Box-Set (2012)

Otto Klemperer, considered an old guard in Beethoven, Brahms and Bruckner in the last Century, appeared to be left-out in the recent onslaught of budget re-issues. His partial cycle of Bruckner Symphonies, from No. 4 to No. 9, recorded with the « Philharmonia » and, later, « New Philharmonia » Orchestra was greeted with acclaim in the British press, ever since its 1st members appeared in the early 1960's. In recent years, it was difficult to obtain these CDs as many were out of print. Some of them were re-issued in Japan, branded as using fancy techniques or material, e.g. , HQCD, SHM-CD, and charged a high-price.

Otto Klemperer died in 1973 and so, next year (2012) , will be 40 years since his death. It appears that « EMI » has planned for some Anniversary re-issues. Here comes a no frills box-set of these 6 Bruckner Symphonies, in October («

EMI » 4042962) . It will be a good opportunity for those young enough not to be familiar with his art and recordings to get to know him. It will be a rewarding journey I'm sure.

He has had more than his fair share of the vicissitudes of life and health, and the very fact that he could still conduct from the podium and make some wonderful music, in his late years, is a testament to his inner mental strength, to which I pay great respect.

These recordings occupy a place in my heart and on my shelf that I just want to keep for a long, long time. From time to time, I will listen to them again, with admiration and awe.

Head of Otto Klemperer by Nigel Konstam (1982) , Number 5 of 6 in a series. On a wooden plinth. This is the 2nd bust of Klemperer done by Nigel Konstam - the 1st, smaller than this one, is signed by both conductor and sculptor.

Sculptor Nigel Konstam said that Klemperer liked it very much :

« Perhaps because of its Mephistophelean character. »

Klemperer's Operatic Career

(February 1961)

As so many articles about Otto Klemperer have appeared both in the musical and national press during the last 2 or 3 years, we thought that instead of publishing, yet, another one in our « People » series, we would try to document as fully as possible this famous conductor's work in Opera, most of which probably is virtually unknown to the musical public in this country. To supplement the information which the Editor of « OPERA » was able to compile from his own personal archives, we wrote to the Opera Houses abroad in which Klemperer was active between 1907 and 1933, and, again, in 1947-1950. We must thank the directors of the Strasbourg, Cologne, Berlin, Hamburg and Budapest theatres for their co-operation, and also our Czechoslovakian correspondent, Pavel Eckstein, for the information he was able to send about Klemperer's 1st Operatic engagement in Prague. In addition, we are grateful to the BBC. for permission to reproduce part of John Freeman's television interview with Klemperer in « Face to Face » on January 8, 1961.

Otto Klemperer was born in Breslau, Germany (now, Wrocław, Poland) , on May 14, 1885. He was brought-up in Hamburg, where he received his 1st musical training from his mother ; he, then, went to the « Frankfurt Hochschule » and completed his studies in Berlin, where his teachers included Hans Pfitzner. In 1906, he met Gustav Mahler in Berlin and, after making a piano reduction of the composer's 2nd Symphony, obtained from him a recommendation which, he hoped, would procure him a conducting post in one of the German theatres. Klemperer has recalled that he sent copies of Mahler's recommendation to several theatres ; most did not even bother to reply, and a few offered him the post of an unpaid assistant. In 1907, Klemperer was in Dresden for a music conference and, in a « café » , he overheard 2 men discussing a vacancy that existed in Prague for a young conductor. He found-out from the waiter the names of the 2 men ; one was Richard Batka, a musicologist from Prague and friend of Klemperer's teacher, Hans Pfitzner. Klemperer managed to see him just as he was on the point of leaving Dresden, and showed him Mahler's recommendation ; Batka advised him to go to Marienbad to see Angelo Neumann, the great impresario who, at that time, was the manager of the « Neues Deutsches Theater » , in Prague. Neumann offered the young Klemperer an engagement as Chorus Master and conductor. In August 1907, he began rehearsing the chorus of « Madama Butterfly » and, soon after, he conducted his 1st « Der Freischütz » .

The Deutsches National Theatre in Prague had a great tradition : it was there that Anton Seidl, Gustav Mahler and Artur Nikisch began their careers. At the same time as Klemperer went to Prague, Artur Bodanzky and Alfred Piccaver were beginning their engagements there too. One of the 1st works that Klemperer conducted in Prague was « Lohengrin » , for which, according to Richard Rosenheim's « Die Geschichte der Deutschen Bühnen in Prag » , he rehearsed the wind-section of the Orchestra in his flat on Divis Street - much to the annoyance of neighbours. However, the performance of « Lohengrin » was hailed by the critics as being unlike any other of the same Opera heard in Prague. During Klemperer's 1st season, there was an Orchestra strike, and Klemperer accompanied a performance of an Operetta called, « Das Waschermadel » , on the piano. Among the works Klemperer conducted, during his 3 years in Prague, were « Madama Butterfly » (with Marguerite Siems, the 1st Marschallin, in the title-role) ; « Ernani » ; « Don Giovanni » ; and « Il Barbiere di Siviglia » . The company, in addition to Siems, included several other singers who later went to Dresden : Helena Forti, Elise von Catopol and Georg Zottmayr.

In September 1910, Klemperer went to Hamburg as 1st conductor jointly with Gustav Brecher, under Max Bachur as Intendant. The 1st Opera he conducted there was « Lohengrin » , on September 3, 1910, with Katherina Fleischer-Edel, Ottilie Metzger-Lattermann, Alois Pennarini and Max Dawison in the cast. During October of that year, he conducted for Enrico Caruso's guest appearances in « Rigoletto » , « Martha » and « Carmen » and, in the following month, was responsible for the new production of Jacques Offenbach's « La Chanson de Fortunio » with Elisabeth Schumann ; this was given in a double-bill with Kunnecke's « Robins Ende » (premiere) . Later, in the same season, he conducted a new production of « Lakmé » with Anny Hindermann in the title-role and Elisabeth Schumann, also in the cast.

In 1912, Felix Weingartner joined him as one of the conductors at Hamburg, with Hans Löwenfeld as Intendant. During the 1912-1913 season, Klemperer conducted his 1st complete « Ring » cycle (20-28 September) with Edyth Walker, Lotte Lehmann, Heinrich Hensel, Pennarini, Max Lohfing and Max Dawison, in the cast ; he also conducted his 1st « Rosenkavalier » with Winternitz, Lehmann (Octavian) , Schumann and Lohfing ; and « Les Huguenots » with Hedwig Francillo-Kaufmann. Other works he directed during his Hamburg period were « Faust » , « Mignon » , « Madama Butterfly » , « La Traviata » , « Der Freischütz » , « Il Barbiere di Siviglia » , « Der fliegende Holländer » , « La Bohême » , « Aida » , « Pagliacci » , « Fidelio » , « Tannhäuser » and « Le Nozze di Figaro » . After a season at Barmen-Elberfeld, Klemperer was engaged as 1st conductor at the « Stadttheater » in Strasbourg where his old teacher, Hans Pfitzner, was « Generalmusikdirektor » . Owing to the outbreak of War, in August 1914, the season did not open until January 10, 1915 ; the Opera chosen was « Fidelio » and Klemperer was the conductor. The success of this production was enormous, and the critics were unanimous in predicting a great future for the young conductor. Klemperer remained at Strasbourg, until the end of the 1917 season. He was not conscripted into the army and, in order to look older at this time, he grew a beard. It is recorded in the Strasbourg archives that, during a performance of « Tannhäuser » which he was conducting, the chorus was singing so badly that he climbed on to the conductor's seat and berated them in the middle of the Opera - much to the audience's surprise. During his 3 years in Strasbourg, Klemperer widened his Operatic repertory. « Die Meistersinger » , « Tristan und Isolde » , « Ariadne auf Naxos » , « Le Prophète » , « Die Königin von Saba » , « Fra Diavolo » , « Otello » , « Violanta » (Korngold) and « Die Fledermaus » were among the works he conducted.

In 1917, came Klemperer's 1st musical directorship. This was at the Cologne Opera, a position he held until 1924. There, his wife Johanna Klemperer sang the title role in « Carmen » , Marietta in Korngold's « Die tote Stadt » (world-premiere) and other roles under her husband's baton. During his period at Cologne, Klemperer conducted the world-premiere of Korngold's « Die Tote Stadt » ; the 1st performance in Germany of « Katya Kabanova » ; the 1st local performance of 3 operas by Franz Schreker (« Der Schatzgrüber » , « Der ferne Klang » and « Irrelohe ») ; Walter Braunfels's « Die Vogel » ; a revival of « Euryanthe » ; and the 1st Cologne production of « Boris Godunov » . The company included the young Friedrich Schorr, Schorr's wife Anna Schaller, Fritz Kraus, Karl Renner. Wanda Aschel and Wilhelm Gombert. Klemperer's colleagues as conductors included Hans Hermann Wetzler and Paul Dessau.

In 1924, Klemperer was asked to go to Berlin, but he refused the invitation and, instead, went to Wiesbaden as « Generalmusikdirektor » for 3 years. The Wiesbaden Theatre was not a particularly adventurous one, and, apart from a Busoni double-bill of « Turandot » and « Arlecchino » , Klemperer seems to have been unable to persuade the authorities to accept much in the way of novelties. The names of the singers at Wiesbaden, at this period, contain a few that may be known to our readers : the tenors Martin Kremer and Eyvind Laholm and the soprano Anny van Kruyswyk (still singing at Munich) .

It was on September 29, 1927, that Klemperer conducted for the 1st time at the Berlin State Opera, but this was a Symphony concert. At this time, the Berlin State Opera had 2 homes, the « Oper Unter den Linden » , with Erich Kleiber as its « Generalmusikdirektor » , assisted by Leo Blech ; and the « Oper am Platz der Republik » , known also as the « Kroll Oper » , with Klemperer as « Generalmusikdirektor » , assisted by Georg Szell, Alexander Zemlinsky and Fritz Zweig (later, Karl Rankl succeeded Szell) . There was also a 3rd Berlin Opera House at this time, the « Stadtische Oper » , with Bruno Walter as « Generalmusikdirektor » . Heinz Tietjen was the Intendant of all 3 theatres !

During the next 4 seasons, Klemperer made his theatre into one of the most vital and controversial Opera Houses in Europe. In addition to the standard repertory, he introduced many new works to the Berlin public, and engaged leading designers and producers in the German theatre. He, himself, produced (as well as conducted) 5 operas :

« Fidelio » (1927) ; « Don Giovanni » (1928) ; « Œdipus Rex » (1928) ; « Mavra » (1928) ; and « Falstaff »

(1931) .

The other Operas he conducted in Berlin were :

1928 : « Cardillac » (Hindemith) ; « The Soldier's Tale » (Stravinsky) ; and Křenek's triple-bill : « Schwergewicht » , « Der Diktator » , « Das geheime Königreich » .

1929 : « Der fliegende Holländer » (Wagner) ; the premiere of « Neues von Tage » (Hindemith) ; « Salome » (Strauß) ; « Die Zauberflöte » (Mozart) .

1930 : « Das Leben des Orest » (Křenek) ; « Die glückliche Hand » (Schœnberg) ; « Hin und Zurück » (Hindemith) ; « Le Nozze di Figaro » (Mozart) .

1931 : « Madama Butterfly » (Puccini) ; « Così fan tutte » (Mozart) .

1932 : « Der Rovenkavalier » (Strauß) .

1933 : « Tannhäuser » (Wagner) .

These last 2 Operas were at the « Oper Unter den Linden » , where Klemperer remained for 2 seasons, after the « Kroll Oper » had been closed-down, in 1931, following intense criticism and opposition from the extremists in various political Parties. In February 1933, Klemperer conducted his last new production in Berlin, « Tannhäuser » ; Adolf Hitler was present. It was not long before this conductor of Jewish birth who had championed so much contemporary music had to flee from Germany.

Klemperer's company at the « Kroll Oper » included many famous singers. To mention a few : Rose Pauly, Jarmila Novotna, Anny Helm, Irene Eisinger, Kate Heidersbach, Marcel Wittrisch, Willi Domgraf Fassbänder, Fritz Krenn, Herbert Janssen and Friedrich Schorr.

14 years were to pass before Klemperer, again, conducted in an Opera House. This was on November 13, 1947, when he directed a performance of « Der Rosenkavalier » at the Budapest State Opera with Mihály Székely as Baron Ochs. This was the 1st of 15 Operas he conducted in the Hungarian capital, between 1947 and June 1950. « Der Rosenkavalier » was followed, 2 days later, by « Otello » ; then, in January 1948, came the 1st of a long series of « Don Giovanni » , 1st with Paul Schœffler as the Don, and Erich Kunz as Leporello ; and, then, with Alexander Sved as the Don and Székely as Leporello ; « Lohengrin » (with József Simándy in the title-role ; Andreas Böhm as Telramund ; Ella de Nemethy and Piroska Tutsek, as Ortrud) ; « Die Entführung aus dem Serail » (with Székely and Endre Koréh as Osmin) ; « Le Nozze di Figaro » ; « Die Zauberflöte » ; « Così fan tutte » ; and « Die Fledermaus » , all followed during his 1st Budapest season. Then, during 1948-1949, he conducted « Die Meistersinger » (with Andreas Böhm as Sachs) ; « Tannhäuser » and « Fidelio » ; and, during his 3rd and final season, « The Fair at Sorochyntsi » (Mussorgsky) ; « Les Contes d'Hoffmann » ; and « La Traviata » . Now, on February 24, 1961, Klemperer will conduct his 1st Operatic performance in a London theatre, the long-awaited « Fidelio » at Covent Garden. Some of his characteristic attitudes are revealed in the following excerpts from his recent BBC television interview with John Freeman :

FREEMAN : And when did you 1st decide that you'd like to be a conductor ?

KLEMPERER : Always. I decided always, but I had a very amusing occasion in 1906. Max Reinhardt gave « Orpheus in the Underworld » of Offenbach, and he engaged Oskar Fried (at that time, a very famous conductor) to conduct it. And there was some trouble between him and the 1st singer, and I conducted it for 50 evenings. I was very proud. Then, it was decided that I became a conductor.

FREEMAN : And how old were you then - about 21 ?

KLEMPERER : 21, yes.

FREEMAN : And that was your 1st actual experience at conducting ?

KLEMPERER : That was my ... No, there was some experience in the Conservatory, but only in minor things. And, then, my greatest impression at that time was the conductor Mahler. I heard him conduct in Vienna the « Walküre » and « Iphigenia in Aulis » at a concert - it was wonderful, it was very, very great. Today, we speak always of the enormous greatness of Toscanini - I assure you Mahler was much greater.

FREEMAN : Since your brain tumour and your fractured hip, and your burning, you have been slightly physically handicapped. Now, has this been a great disadvantage to you in conducting ?

KLEMPERER : Not at all !

FREEMAN : For instance, you never hold a baton nowadays.

KLEMPERER : No, I did it also before these accidents, but it is just the same. A man can conduct with the hand, and mostly one conducts with the eyes. You see, and sitting, my goodness, in the Opera, the conductors are always sitting, and the concert does not have it, but it's just the same. One doesn't conduct with the leg. One conducts with the arms and the eyes. That's the most important.

FREEMAN : What is sometimes said about you, by other people, is that you go to a concert and, then, walk-out in the middle of it. Is that true ?

KLEMPERER : Yes.

FREEMAN : Why do you do it ?

KLEMPERER : Because it doesn't please me. In « Covent Garden » , I heard « Sonnambula » . I thought it was terrible. For me, Bellini is a great composer, but « Norma » is a greater work than « Sonnambula » , and so I went out in the 1st Act.

Otto Klemperer (gebürtig Otto Nossan Klemperer ; geboren 14. Mai 1885 in Breslau ; gestorben 6. Juli 1973 in Zürich) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Komponist. Er gilt als einer der großen Dirigenten des 20. Jahrhunderts.

Klemperer wurde im schlesischen Breslau geboren. Sein am Doktor Hoch's Konservatorium in Frankfurt am Main begonnenes Studium setzte er in Berlin am Stern'schen Konservatorium bei James Kwast (Klavier) und Hans Pfitzner (Komposition und Orchesterleitung) fort. Als er 1905 bei Gustav Mahlers 2. Sinfonie unter Oskar Fried das Fernorchester dirigieren durfte, traf er den Komponisten persönlich. Die beiden wurden Freunde, und Klemperer bekam 1907 auf Empfehlung Mahlers die Stelle des Chorleiters, später eines Kapellmeisters am deutschen Landestheater in Prag. 1910 assistierte er Mahler bei der Uraufführung von dessen 8. Sinfonie.

In seiner weiteren Laufbahn kam er an das Stadt-Theater Hamburg (1910-1912) und das Stadt-Theater Barmen (1912-1913) . Von 1914 bis 1917 war er Pfitzners Stellvertreter am Stadttheater in Straßburg und Chefdirigent der Straßburger Philharmoniker. Danach folgte eine Tätigkeit als Kapellmeister, später als Generalmusikdirektor an der Kölner Oper (1917-1924) .

Durch den katholischen Geistlichen Franz Xaver Münch, mit dem er freundschaftlich verbunden war, fand er 1918 Kontakt zur Abtei Maria Laach und konvertierte 1919 zum Katholizismus. In Köln heiratete er 1919 die Sängerin Johanna Geisler.

Von 1924 bis 1927 wirkte Klemperer als Generalmusikdirektor in Wiesbaden, seine schönste Zeit, wie er später bekundete. Danach leitete er bis 1931 die Kroll Oper in Berlin. Klemperer wurde berühmt für seine Aufführungen zeitgenössischer Werke, wie zum Beispiel Arnold Schœnbergs Die glückliche Hand, Leoš Janáčeks Oper Aus einem Totenhaus, Igor Strawinskys Œdipus Rex und Paul Hindemiths Cardillac.

Klemperer hatte sich durch seine aufsehenerregenden Aufführungen in der Zeitspanne zwischen dem Ende des Ersten Weltkrieges und der Machtergreifung Hitlers 1933 einen Ruf als einer der ganz großen Dirigenten des Deutschen Reichs erworben.

1933 wurde Klemperer als « Kulturbolschewist » bezeichnet und mit einem Aufführungsverbot belegt. Noch im gleichen Jahr emigrierte er in die USA, wo er Dirigent beim Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra wurde. Im Lexikon der Juden in der Musik (1940) wurde er mit folgender Aussage verfemt : « Seine Hauptaufgabe sah Klemperer in der bewussten Entstellung deutscher Meisterwerke. » . Während seiner Zeit in Amerika konzentrierte er sich vor allem auf die Werke der deutschen Klassiker und Romantiker wie Beethoven, Brahms, Bruckner oder Mahler.

Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs kehrte er zurück nach Europa und wurde musikalischer Leiter der « Staatsoper » in Budapest (1947-1950) . Nachdem er noch drei Jahre unter anderem beim Montreal Symphony Orchestra tätig war, ließ er sich 1954 in der Schweiz nieder und arbeitete hauptsächlich mit dem Philharmonia Orchestra London, wo er 1959 den Posten als Chefdirigent auf Lebenszeit erhielt.

In der Budapester Oper gelangen ihm denkwürdige Operaufführungen, es kam aber auch zu einem der für Klemperer typischen Skandale : Am Ende der Gralserzählung in einer Aufführung des Lohengrin am 24. Oktober 1948 applaudierte das begeisterte Publikum heftigst der überragenden Darbietung von Jozsef Simandy, um ein da capo zu erzwingen. Klemperer, der den musikalischen Fluss unterbrochen sah, reagierte verärgert, nachdem das Publikum immer noch nicht mit dem tosenden Applaus enden wollte, indem er sein Dirigat abbrach, sich umdrehte und ins Publikum rief : « Frechheit » und darauf den Orchestergraben verließ. Das Publikum rief « Otto, Otto » , kurz darauf kam er wieder und dirigierte die Oper zu Ende.

Das Dokument ist heute noch auf einer CD der Firma Grammofono 2000 und bei ARCHIPHON erhältlich.

Obwohl Klemperer weniger als Komponist bekannt wurde, schrieb er doch eine Vielzahl eigener Werke, darunter sechs Sinfonien, eine Messe, neun Streichquartette, ungefähr 100 Lieder und eine Oper mit dem Titel Das Ziel.

Eine CD-Produktion gibt es von seinen Sinfonien Nr. 1 und Nr. 2 sowie von vier sinfonischen Werken (Merry Waltz, Marcia funebre, Recollections, Scherzo) , gespielt von der Staatsphilharmonie Rheinland-Pfalz unter der Leitung von Alun Francis (cpo CD : 999 987-2) .

In seinem späteren Leben litt Klemperer an einer partiellen Lähmung, die wohl noch von einer Operation im Jahre 1939 herrührte, als man ihn wegen eines Tumors im Kopf behandelte. Außerdem war er an der bipolaren Störung (manisch-depressive Erkrankung) erkrankt, wegen der er zeitweise in klinischer Behandlung war. Trotzdem blieb er bis ins Jahr 1971 tätig. In seinen letzten Jahren ist er « kürzlich zum Glauben der Väter zurückgekehrt, besucht fleißig den Tempel und hält die Riten » . Nach 1971 zog er sich aus der Öffentlichkeit zurück, bis er 1973 in Zürich starb. Er wurde dort auf dem Israelitischen Friedhof Oberer Friesenberg beerdigt.

Seine Tochter Lotte (1923-2003) war für ihn bis zuletzt als Managerin, Sekretärin und Betreuerin tätig. Sein Sohn Werner (1920-2000) war als Schauspieler in Hollywood hauptsächlich bekannt für seine Rolle des Oberst Wilhelm Klink in der Sitcom Ein Käfig voller Helden (« Hogan's Heroes ») .

1924 : Le chef Oskar Fried dirige le 1er enregistrement de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1883, éditée par Gutmann (1885) , avec l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Berlin (étiquette « Polydor » : 78 tours ; étiquette « Music & Arts » , CD : 1231) .

The widely awaited 1st CD transfer of these recordings (of which the Bruckner 7th was the work's recording premiere) . Previous volumes were acclaimed in « Gramophone » , « ARG » , « Fanfare » , « Musica » , « Diapason » . Volume I won the coveted German Record Critics Association's quarterly prize for best historical recording.

We have here an inscription of a towering piece recorded in late acoustic days.

This was the 1st recording of the Symphony to have been made, in Berlin in around 1924. Clearly, the usual limitations and compromises in acoustic recordings of the Symphonic repertoire are present here in a most dramatic way. Such a powerful and vast Symphony is hardly going to sit comfortably in the acoustic funnel and the orchestral shrinkages and bass boosting offer a necessarily compromised view. Still, Fried was something of a dab hand at these undertakings, as his contemporaneous recording of Gustav Mahler's 2nd Symphony.

The performance preserves a reading of fluidity and relatively speedy intent, one saturated with a degree of metrical coming and going (not least, in the Scherzo) which shows how elastic was Fried's conception. The principal flute comes through unexpectedly well (it would be interesting to know the orchestral seating plan for this recording) though the lower-brass tends to congeal in the balance. The violin tone is rather thin - again, one wonders how many 1sts and 2nds were crammed into the studio. So, there is something of a sonic imbalance in the recording, but once one absorbs this, the performance exerts a very particular power of its own. The slow movement is moving, and free of the cymbal crash, whilst the Scherzo is a study in contrasts. The Finale is direct and avid. One senses throughout a vital and controlling hand at work - unsparing, un sentimental, powerfully Symphonic in conception (of course) but unwilling to make one special compromise to the 78 rpm process, which is that I was not aware of any side end rallentandi. In many discs of the period, one notices the slowing down for a side change ; it's a feature of the system, though often taken to be executant indulgence or eccentricity. Not here. What I did notice though was the side changes themselves. This must have been a tricky matter to deal with but (for example) it's obvious that side changes occur at 9:24 and 13:46 in the 1st movement.

Les derniers projets d'Otto Klemperer

In his 87th year, conductor Otto Klemperer was keen to remain an active music-maker. He had just overridden « EMI » 's choice of Fiordiligi in his new « Così fan tutte » recording (he wanted, and got, Margaret Price) , approved Lorin Maazel as guest-conductor of the New Philharmonia, and was keen to be present at player auditions. For 1971-1972, he planned his 1st ever performances of Mahler's 8th and Mendelssohn's « Die erste Walpurgisnacht » and told « EMI » that he wished to record the Verdi « Requiem » , Weber's « Euryanthe » , Sibelius's 4th and Offenbach's « Orpheus in the Underworld » . After a deal of negotiation (and some intrigue with Deutsche Grammophon) sessions for Beethoven's « Große Fuge » , Mozart's « Serenata Notturna » , Brahms's « Saint-Antony Variations » and a complete Mozart « Entführung aus dem Serail » were agreed. And, yet, according to Otto Freudenthal, the Swedish-born pianist and composer who assisted closely in (and played for some of) Klemperer's musical activities : « He was not interested in recordings ; he had no feeling for that at all. Recording sessions were just rehearsals for concerts. » . 1971 proved a busy year. « Così » was recorded and performed. Klemperer began learning Hebrew, advised Rafael Kubelik not to become music-director of the Metropolitan Opera (he did, but only for 6 months) , conducted Mahler in London (the « Resurrection » Symphony for the 60th anniversary of the composer's death) and Bach and Mozart in Jerusalem, and (according to Freudenthal) was " always working on the score of his opera « Das Ziel » ". (Plans to record it were eventually shelved at Klemperer's own request) . In September, he came to London and recorded Haydn's « Oxford » Symphony (he had never performed the work « live » and was nervous, but sessions went smoothly) and Mozart's K. 375 Serenade. An ensemble of young players from the « New Philharmonia » performed his String Quartet n° 7.

Oskar Fried

Le chef d'orchestre et compositeur allemand, naturalisé russe, Oskar Fried est né le 10 août 1871 à Berlin et est mort le 5 juillet 1941 à Moscou.

Fried est le fils d'un commerçant juif. Il occupe les emplois de clown de cirque, de garçon d'écurie et de dresseur de chiens avant d'étudier la composition avec Iwan Knorr et Engelbert Humperdinck à Francfort en 1891-1892. Il étudie plus tard à Düsseldorf la peinture et l'histoire de l'art. Après un passage à Paris, il retourne à Berlin en 1898 pour étudier le contrepoint avec Xaver Scharwenka. La représentation de son œuvre « Das trunkene Lied » pour chœur et orchestre est favorablement accueillie par le public, et lui vaut d'être nommé, en 1904, à la tête de la Société chorale de Berlin. Il est le 1er chef à avoir enregistré une Symphonie de Gustav Mahler (la 2e) en 1924. 1er chef étranger invité à diriger en Russie après la Révolution d'Octobre, Fried quitte son pays après l'arrivée d'Adolf Hitler au pouvoir et devient citoyen soviétique en 1940.

À 15 ans, Oskar Fried est membre d'une troupe de musiciens ambulants. En 1889, il est corniste d'un orchestre de musique légère à Francfort et rencontre le compositeur Engelbert Humperdinck. Influencé par le wagnérisme, il travaille la composition. De 1894 à 1897, il suit un apprentissage assez bohème, fréquentant peintres et écrivains à Düsseldorf, Munich et Paris. En 1898, il se fixe à Berlin, où il joue un rôle grandissant : de 1904 à 1910, il dirige la Société chorale « Stern » et, dès 1905, l'Orchestre des « Nouveaux Concerts » . De 1907 à 1910, il est aussi chef de l'importante « Société des amis de la musique » de Berlin et, à partir de 1908, du « Blüthnerorchester » . Lié avec Gustav Mahler, il dirige toutes ses Symphonies. Entre 1920 et 1930, il enregistre de nombreux 78 tours, dont la 2e Symphonie dite « Résurrection » et « l'Oiseau de feu » de Stravinski. Face au Nazisme, il choisit d'émigrer en U.R.S.S. , où il est nommé, en 1934, chef de l'Orchestre de Tbilissi. Il acquiert le passeport russe en 1940, dirige l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio de Moscou et, enfin, l'Orchestre d'État de l'U.R.S.S. On lui doit de nombreuses compositions, parmi lesquelles une « Nuit transfigurée » pour 2 chanteurs et orchestre, qui connut le succès en 1901.

The German conductor and composer Oskar Fried was born on August 1, 1871, in Berlin and died on July 5, 1941, in Moscow. An admirer of Gustav Mahler, Fried was the 1st conductor to record a Mahler Symphony (the 2nd) . Fried also held the distinction of being the 1st foreign conductor to perform in Russia after the Bolshevik Revolution. He eventually left his homeland to work in the Soviet Union after the political rise of Adolf Hitler's Nazi Party, and became a Soviet citizen in 1940.

The son of a Jewish shop-keeper, Fried worked as a circus clown, a stable boy and a dog trainer. After a poor education as a wind player, in Nowawes near Potsdam, Fried moved in 1889 to Frankfurt, where he received his 1st important engagement as a horn player in the « Palmgarten » Orchestra. He soon became a member of the Orchestra of the « Opernhaus ». Fried studied composition, in 1891-1892, at the Hoch Conservatory with Iwan Knorr ; and, as private student in Frankfurt with composer Engelbert Humperdinck. He later moved to Düsseldorf to study painting and Art history. After a spell in Paris, he returned to Berlin, in 1898, to study counterpoint with Xaver Scharwenka.

The performance of his composition « Das trunkene Lied » (The Drunken Song) for chorus and orchestra brought Fried his 1st public success and led to his appointment, in 1904, as the conductor of a Berlin Choral Society.

Oskar Fried 1st met Gustav Mahler, in 1905. The meeting resulted in an invitation to conduct Mahler's « Resurrection » Symphony in Berlin, in November 1905 (Otto Klemperer led the off-stage band during this performance) . The next year, he introduced Russia to Mahler's music when he performed the same work in Saint-Petersburg. From 1907 to 1910, he directed a Choral Society known as the « Sternscher Gesangverein » in Berlin. In 1913, Fried conducted the Berlin Philharmonic in the 2nd performance of Mahler's 9th Symphony.

In 1922, Oskar Fried went to the USSR as the 1st foreign conductor invited to perform after the Russian Revolution, and was greeted by Lenin on the station platform. In 1924, he made the 1st recording of any Mahler Symphony, the 2nd, with the « Berlin Staatskapelle » in a performance that has been praised as « remarkably successful » and a « highly-adventurous undertaking for an acoustic recording » which required « careful planning and experimentation » . That same year, he also made the 1st recording of any complete Bruckner Symphony : his 7th.

In November 1927, at the invitation of the « BBC » programme planner and his own former student Edward Clark, he made his British conducting debut, in a program of Weber, Brahms and Liszt in London.

Driven from Germany by the anti-Semitism of the Nazi regime, in 1934, he emigrated to the Georgian city of Tbilisi in the Soviet Union. He conducted the Tbilisi Opera and, later, the Moscow Radio Symphony Orchestra, eventually becoming a Soviet citizen.

Oskar Fried was an important German conductor in the pre-War years of the 20th Century and a composer of considerable interest. Although he later claimed he was from a poor family, Fried attended an elite boarding school whose head-master hired-out his students as town musicians. At 1st, he played the drum, but later taught himself how to play the horn. In 1889, he went to Frankfurt and, despite his lack of formal training, became horn player in the Opera orchestra there. After that, he had a succession of other orchestral jobs and, in the meantime, his interest in composition grew, nurtured under the watchful eye of composer Engelbert Humperdinck.

In 1904, Fried enjoyed a major premiere when Karl Muck conducted the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra and the chorus of the « Wagnerverein » in Fried's « Das trunkene Lied ». This favourable response the work received attracted a great deal of notice. Fried set Richard Dehmel's poem « Verklärte Nacht » for solo voices and orchestra ; the same poem being the inspiration for a famous work for string instruments by Arnold Schönberg. As a composer, Fried's major field was the Lied. He showed a progress from solid tonality to a more unstable harmonic organization, but then shifted toward a newer sort of use of diatonic triads over long-held pedals. Fried's initial successes as a composer led to him being invited to conduct ; he debuted, in 1904, with Franz Liszt's « Die Legende von der heiligen Elisabeth », under the watchful eye of Gustav Mahler, who became a close friend. In 1905, Fried led the « Neuen Konzerte » in Berlin. In 1907, he was named conductor of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde ». In 1908, he led the « Blüthnerorchester ». In 1913, Fried gave-up composition in favor of conducting.

Fried was known for championing the music of Mahler, and was said to have retained Mahler's interpretive style. Fried was one of the few conductors of his time who included all of Mahler's completed Symphonies in his repertory. He also was interested in the new music of his time and conducted works of Claude Debussy, Jean Sibelius, Frederick Delius, Richard Strauß, Igor Stravinsky and Alexander Scriabin. In 1934, after the Nazis took power in Germany, Fried emigrated to the Soviet Union where he was appointed conductor of the Tbilisi Opera House in Soviet Georgia. Later, he became chief conductor of the All-Union Radio Orchestra, in Moscow. Oskar Fried took Soviet citizenship in 1940, but died the following year.

Oskar Fried made his American debut with the old New York Symphony, in 1928, and the « New York Times » didn't come. He also had the ill luck to be overlooked by editors of several important encyclopedias. But Fried survived oversights of this sort and like the great blue cars of a vintage « Wagons Lits Express » he will always have his fans, with excellent reason. Otto Klemperer no less tosses him a nice bouquet in his « Minor Recollections » :

« He was a brilliant conductor, an extremely gifted composer, and a most original personality. »

Yes, I don't think any of the other conductors in this article ever worked as a circus clown.

Fried was, as Lewis Carroll might have put it, originaler than many : his dangerously nuanced Moscow recording of Berlioz' « Symphonie Fantastique » from 1937 is possibly the most weirdly wonderful performance in this set. If it were going through Airport Customs they'd have to invent a new category : « Tons to Declare ». And, heavens, the Internal Security people would collapse in a heap. It's not quite acceptable by the rather dainty standards of interpretive etiquette of the mid- 20th Century (and I have to say the present era, too : some jacket notes-smiths cowering under a terrible super ego still feel they must condemn that nasty dragon « interpretation ») but this « Fantastique à la Soviétique » amounts in fact to a highly-appropriate response to the literary content of a very literary Symphony, perhaps the ideal response. In it, we hear the edgy, insolent, accent-oriented Fried who might at times be mistaken for Willem Mengelberg.

Now, Fried was a conductor who knew all there is to know about elegance and line but who, like the Mengelberg we will meet shortly, understood how music can be a metaphor for the « volatile mess » (was it Paul Theroux who said that ?) which is life. An « Eroica » or a Brahms 1st as well as a « Fantastique » can run into good luck, bad luck, ecstasies, barriers along its way. This means succeeding passages in a Fried performance can change flavor felicitously rather than run together like scarcely distinguishable elements on a lunch counter plate.

And Fried, in his penchant for intense and instant detail, the FedEx messengers so to speak of fluctuating fortune, has what Lisa Zeidner writing in the « Times Book Review » about James Salter's fiction has called a skill in « composing revelations from the ephemera of moments ». The happier moments are like finding a coin in the street, receiving an unexpected postcard from a dear friend, walking innocently into an epiphany. And there's the cinematic parallel too : in a review by Anthony Oliver Scott of a lyrically intense coming-of-age film he writes about how « tight close-ups and abrupt shifts in perspective » bring the viewer into « a private world that's a little scary » - well, he could be talking about some Oskar Fried performances.

Now, a bit of chapter-and-verse : Beethoven in the introduction of his 2nd Symphony asks for Adagio molto and, at the same time, a somewhat speedier eighth note = 84 ; Fried, in his 1924 Berlin recording, sides with the notion of Adagio molto, thinking too of what might be argued is the lazy legato and the looking-searchingly-into-infinity of the composer's opening bars, seizing therefore on a tempo of only 8th = 60. The result is gripping and, dare one say it, right. And when Fried encounters the cascading 30 seconds and up-stepping staccato arpeggiations commencing at bar 12, music that obviously doesn't want to dawdle, he simply shifts, under cover of the composer's change of texture, to 8th = 88. Off he goes. And right again ! Is Beethoven still thinking in his tousled head adagio molto ?

Very interesting is the delightful « problem » of tempo in the slow movement of Beethoven's 2nd, a larghetto containing a succession of themes with quite different personalities, all saddled with the rather hyper-metronome marking 8th = 92. Invoking his theory-of-evolution if you will (you'll find a brotherly echo in Mengelberg a few pages along in this article) , Fried terraces upward from approximately 8th = 58 (for the sweetly cantabile opening theme, which seems a response to or solution for the Symphony's questioning opening I movement back) , 8th = 72 (for the perky lifting-its-petticoats tune at measure 32) , and 8th = 80 (for the fluid and frilly theme at measure 47) .

And if we consult our old friend Felix Weingartner about this « evolution » ? Well, he simply doesn't mention such changes of tempo. He does think 92 8ths to the minute is too fast as the movement's core tempo, he suggests instead 84. On to Beethoven's 9th, 2nd movement, bar 17, POW ! At the 3rd fugal entrance of this Scherzo's bouncy lead tune, Fried tosses in a healthy accent, utterly gratuitous but enlivening. An energy has risen. Here's a conductor thinking in terms of impressions as much as patterns. And with the da capo of the Scherzo after the Trio, Fried ups his tempo a notch, from 126 beats to 132 (the composer suggests 116) , because the music for him isn't a machine prized for its regularity in dispensing perfectly-formed notes in black and white as if they were Coke bottles or candy bars, but has a life. But Benjamin Britten, as a young man, heard Fried conduct the 9th in London and wrote a friend that the Scherzo was too fast. Me, I think the shift in tempo in the da capo is even more interesting than Fried's not altogether irrational response to Beethoven's call in this Scherzo for molto vivace !

Oskar Fried's 1923 Brahms 1st Symphony lives on a high-wire, the introduction combining deep reflection with brave impetuosity, the attendant Allegro coming on brisk and balletic, the lyric 2nd subject easing slower and slower but the closing theme a finger-wagging wake-up call, tension in the development multiplying almost out of sight with a wild alternation of tempo before the recapitulation then, in a state of greater agitation, the closing theme returns really angry. Yes, the music evolves - from, relatively speaking, the amoeba of simplicity to the ape of Mrs. Woolf's hubbub. And more to come : after a tearful slow movement and a nervous intermezzo, Fried attacks the ominous introduction to Brahms' Finale in combat gear, almost magnetizing his listeners out of their chairs 2 measures before the famous and hopeful horn solo, delivering the curling little previews of said tune in flutes and lower woodwind with Brahms' sforzandi so screechingly huge. Can the fascinatingly labile Fried top this ? Well, the grand tune of Brahms' Finale he launches at a noble 120 beats to the minute, only to fly at the music's subsequent animato to a record 168. Hubbubical indeed. Then, in Fried's landmark Tchaikovsky « Pathétique » with the old Royal Philharmonic (how many of us grew-up on this recording !), his raising of the timpani's tattoo from piano to mezzo-forte in the mid-section of the 5/4 movement creates a cardio-musical wonder, a heartbeat evoking great pile-ups of inexorability.

Oskar Fried was born in Berlin and most of his career was centered there, much of it taken-up with the performance of new music : Arnold Schœnberg was a « plat du jour », Igor Stravinsky a high-priority, he didn't frown on Frederick Delius. Nor was he restricted to the heights, there's a Fried recording of Rimsky-Korsakoff's ornate, sinuous « Scheherazade ». Mahler had a prominent place in Fried's career and there's documentation via an acoustic 1923 recording of the 2nd Symphony, a swinging and ardent performance employing 8 or 9 Mephistopheles in the bass viols. A performance, this, in which the menace and the longing are wonderfully effective, in which the long slowings and speedings of the composer's directive-heavy score, an operating manual if ever there was one, are warmly embraced but with Fried's own particular ammunition (as when, at number 11 deep in the 1st movement development, the martial repetitions of a dire choralic variation on the 2nd theme of the Symphony's opening page lug forward the music's thread at considerably less than the prescribed Tempo I. The high-stepping accumulation of a fearsome « pesante » (Fried hasn't failed to notice the inverted « v » accents on virtually every note) makes the subsequent flight of a lyrical flute at number 13 all the airier by contrast.

But the Fried recording to put at the top of your desert island pile is that « Fantastique » with the USSR State Symphony. The blaze ignited in his visionary interpretation is something else, an hallucinatory blaze suggesting the ravings of a drug addict under the influence, and it's a perfect fit for the published program of Hector Berlioz' music which introduces « a young musician of abnormal sensitivity and perfervid imagination » who « poisons himself with opium in a paroxysm of amorous despair the narcotic dose, too feeble to cause death, plunges him into a heavy sleep accompanied by the weirdest visions » .

Now, you violins, violas, oboes, will you please be paroxysmatic ? Why yes, all in a day's work, it can be done. But many conductors forget the « Fantastique » 's « program » and its socially unacceptable, maybe concert-unacceptable behavior. Not Fried. To borrow a phrase from Richard Strauß' admirable librettist Hugo von Hofmannsthal, he heads straight for the music's « psychical texture » .

We wait no time at all in his « R-rated » performance for the atmosphere to arrive : measure 1 of the introductory largo and tip-toeing triplet 8ths in the wind are chiming with a mystic half-sweet lilt. Measure 3, muted violins whisper a motif that has about it a certain foot-dragging quality and Fried underscores our hero's « weariness of soul » with a sad and fluctuant tempo a mere 16 or 20 points below the score's 8th = 56 ! Not only is the tempo of this much-dotted theme fascinatingly subnormal but Fried opens a not inconsiderable crack between the unslurred 1st note and the stragglers that follow, the effect of this ominous fissure being to question the protagonist's ability to clear his head sufficiently to move on.

Then, Fried pops one of his trademark firecrackers in the form of a stabbing little sforzando on the 1st note of measure 7, just after a long pause. Berlioz' marking under this note is a decrescendo « 2nd half of a hairpin » suggesting the need for a reasonably forceful sound to make a decrescendo from - well, the mark could be an overgrown accent sign ! Whatever the case, many conductors ignore this signal, missing the chance for a paroxysmatic exclamation from an orchestra which, metaphorically at least, has taken to the needle. Another twinge, a more violent one, at the start of Berlioz' crescendo 2 measures later, then the misty-eyed Moscow violins tingle at the top of their ascending phrase, dropping-off to expose dumbly rocking cellos. The effect is one of profound desperation and emptiness, a kind of orchestral sewage.

And so on, Fried lurching forward in a contorted tempo rubato - one could write a book about this performance. As the ever-delightful Professor Tovey recalls, Mendelssohn declared that what he found so Philistine in Berlioz was that « with all the effort to go stark mad he never once succeeds » . Except that, guided by Fried, he manages to come dangerously close.

Oskar Fried was the 1st foreign conductor to visit Soviet Russia after the smoke of Lenin's Revolution had cleared sufficiently to permit a cultural exchange so to speak ; and when, in 1934, life in Nazi Germany became quite impractical he emigrated to the USSR. There his work continued, until he died 4 years after his incroyable « Fantastique » , under mysterious circumstances (suicide ?) , just as the Nazis launched their attack on the Eastern front.

Oskar Fried's 1928 recording of Richard Wagner's « Faust » Overture, perhaps the most gooseflesh-producing ever, and, from the tail end of the acoustic era 3 years earlier, a compact, structure-clarifying performance providing a 1st class ticket through Richard Strauß' « Alpine Symphony » , that mountaineers' answer to Beethoven's « Pastoral » . And there's more from Weimar Berlin, a Fantasia on « Hänsel und Gretel » , for instance, which is wreathed in a child-like innocence, molto grazioso. The 1928 « Euryanthe » Overture sets-off in a fiery and festive rush, the beefy conviction of this superb performance suggesting at the outset Pierre Monteux' San Francisco broadcast of this ever-engaging comfort music, but Fried is brisker, and sweeter, in the central nocturne.

From the same year and Orchestra comes a Liszt « les Préludes » existing in another space. If the « Euryanthe » is all about completing the journey without delay, Fried in Liszt's set of variations tells us how important it is to pick flowers along the way. 3 lumps of nostalgia in the Symphonic cup are our reward when the cellos melt into their expressive cantando after the big maestoso early on. An expansive performance this, with a story-telling quality. And speedy it is when essential.

Oskar Fried's acoustic version of a Stravinsky « Firebird » Suite is not to be confused with an electrical re-do in which the gliding basses of the opening are considerably plummier and the several added cymbal crashes in the Finale must have raised an army of eyebrows over the years. What comes through especially well in « Firebird One » is the crazy rain shower of orchestral tootliness as the prince tries to catch the titular bird in the Suite's 2nd movement. And vivid indeed are those lost souls, the nubile and eligible maidens under the demon's spell who engage so wistfully in the sonic equivalent of silent screen sorrows in the « Ronde des Princesses » .

The « Infernal Dance » sounds like a New Year's Party gone a bit wrong. And how about those pre-Gershwin-esque taxi horns Stravinsky must have been hearing as he nailed to music paper the terrible « Katschei » .

A student of Gustav Mahler and a pioneer interpreter of new music, Oskar Fried (1871-1941) was dubbed by the late Otto Klemperer (never generous with praise toward colleagues) « a brilliant conductor and an extremely gifted composer » . He was a « house » conductor at « DGG » assigned premiere recordings of Mahler's 2nd Symphony, Bruckner's 7th Symphony, Strauß' « Alpine Symphony » , and Beethoven's « Eroica Symphony » .

...

If today Oskar Fried is the only one of Mahler's 4 pupils who is barely remembered, it is not because he lacked talent or failed to work hard. Rather, unlike his colleague Willem Mengelberg, Fried was not granted the life-long leadership of a single important Orchestra and the possibility of spreading his name and fame throughout the world by means of commercial and broadcast recordings.

And unlike Bruno Walter and the younger Otto Klemperer who left behind numerous hi-fi and stereo recordings, Fried did not live long enough after his flight from Nazi Germany to the USSR (where he died, in 1941) to be able to adequately convey to posterity most of his repertoire. Yet, enough survives from Fried's recorded legacy, begun in the acoustic era for « DGG » , to give us an idea of his unique artistry even with the reduction of orchestral forces and occasional re-orchestration necessitated by the primitive recording process available to him. This collection features 2 acoustic and 2 electrical recordings. Apart from the Weber Overture, 3 featured works come from composers who, in 1871, Fried's birth year, were still alive and in the cases of Humperdinck and Strauß, actually his contemporaries whom he knew well and whose works he frequently played. Especially, Engelbert Humperdinck was very close to Oskar Fried during the conductor's entire lifespan : Fried became the composition student of Humperdinck, in 1890, in Frankfurt and, in this capacity, prepared the piano reduction as well as the orchestral fantasy heard here of Humperdinck's Opera « Hänsel und Gretel » , premiered not long before by Richard Strauß in Weimar. The acoustical recording of Strauß' « Alpine Symphony » represents the 1st appearance of the work on records, and is a fast, yet, highly-expressive reading.

More often than not, broadcasts and live performances of artists who made many studio recordings represent them as possessing qualities and characteristics distinctly different from those of an editor's air-brushed and reassembled studio portrait. But, in Milstein's case, the live performances seem equally flattering, if not more so. At the very least, they reveal the injustice of dismissing him as simply a violinist's violinist. He had, in his lyre, a string for every occasion, even if he reserved the use of that lyre for music (and occasions) of his choosing. But though he may not have been a man for quite all seasons, all seasons flattered him.

Oskar Fried (geboren 10. August 1871 in Berlin ; gestorben 5. Juli 1941 in Moskau) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Komponist.

Oskar Fried wurde 1871 als Sohn des jüdischen Kaufmannes Jérôme Fried in Berlin geboren. Er erhielt Violinunterricht beim älteren Bruder, spielte wohl auch Joseph Joachim vor. Die Gymnasialausbildung musste Fried 1880 aufgrund materieller Notlage der Familie abbrechen. Stattdessen erlernte er das Hornspiel in der Stadtpfeiferei von Nowawes bei Potsdam. Als etwa Vierzehnjähriger gab Fried den Dienst in der Stadtpfeiferei auf und führte einige Jahre lang ein abenteuerliches Wanderleben, das ihn kreuz und quer durch Europa führte - als fahrender Musikant, der bei Tanzfesten und Hochzeiten aufspielte, und eine Zeit lang sogar als Hunde-Dompteur, Clown und Stallbursche bei einem Zirkus.

1889 wurde Fried Hornist im Palmengartenorchester in Frankfurt am Main, sammelte hier auch erste Dirigiererfahrungen und erhielt alsbald eine Stelle im Frankfurter Opernorchester. In Frankfurt studierte er 1891-1892 zwei Semester bei Iwan Knorr am Hoch'schen Konservatorium und war rund drei Jahre Privatschüler und Assistent von Engelbert Humperdinck, der ihn mit den Werken Wagners bekannt machte. Aus dieser Zeit datieren erste Kompositionen (Lieder ; Adagio und Scherzo für Blasinstrumente ; Orchester-Fantasie über Themen aus « Hänsel und Gretel ») . Nach den Frankfurter Jahren ging Fried (über den genauen Zeitpunkt sind die Quellen uneins : nach Paul Bekker 1892, nach anderen Angaben 1894) für kurze Zeit nach Düsseldorf, wo er sich zeitweise als Maler versuchte, um sich sodann in München niederzulassen. Hier fand er Kontakt zur literarischen Moderne (Frank Wedekind, Knut Hamsun, Otto Julius Bierbaum) und wurde vom Dirigenten Hermann Levi gefördert (Uraufführung der Fantasie über Themen aus « Hänsel und Gretel ») .

1895 entstand die Oper « Die vernarrte Prinzess » (nach Otto Julius Bierbaum) , die wegen Rechtsstreitigkeiten nie aufgeführt wurde. Aufgrund einer Wette ging der Bohémien Fried (nur ausgestattet mit knappsten finanziellen Mitteln) 1896 nach Paris, wo er zeitweise bittere Not litt.

1898 kehrte er nach Deutschland zurück und ließ sich in Werder (Havel) nieder. Seinen Lebensunterhalt verdiente er als Hundezüchter. Gleichzeitig trieb er musikalische Studien (Kontrapunkt bei Philipp Scharwenka) und komponierte.

1899 heiratete er Gusti Rathgeber, die ehemalige Frau Otto Julius Bierbaums.

1900 erwarb er ein Haus in Berlin-Nikolassee, wo er bis zu seiner Emigration 1934 lebte.

1901 entstand die « Verklärte Nacht » (Richard Dehmel) für Mezzosopran, Tenor und Orchester, 1903 « Das trunkene Lied » (Friedrich Nietzsche) für Soli, Chor und Orchester. Die Uraufführung des « Trunkenen Liedes » am 15. April 1904 mit den Berliner Philharmonikern und dem Wagner-Verein unter Karl Muck errang einen sensationellen Erfolg und machte Fried über Nacht bekannt. Im selben Jahr komponierte er das « Erntelied » (Richard Dehmel) für Männerchor und Orchester und wurde nach dem Erfolg eines Konzertes mit Liszts « Legende von der Heiligen Elisabeth » Dirigent des Sternschen Gesangsvereins.

1905 begegnete er Gustav Mahler aus Anlass der Erstaufführung des « Trunkenen Liedes » in Wien (6. März, Dirigent : Franz Schalk) . Im selben Jahr übernahm Fried die Leitung der Neuen Konzerte mit den Berliner Philharmonikern und dirigierte am 8. November mit großem Erfolg eine Aufführung von Mahlers 2. Sinfonie, die auch den Komponisten tief beeindruckte. Fried und Mahler waren seither freundschaftlich verbunden.

Am 8. Oktober 1906 dirigierte Fried die Berliner Erstaufführung von Mahlers 6. Sinfonie mit den Berliner Philharmonikern. Ihr sollten die Erstaufführungen der 7. Sinfonie (17. Januar 1910) , von « Das Lied von der Erde » (18. Oktober 1912) und die deutsche Erstaufführung der 9. Sinfonie (4. Februar 1913) folgen.

1907 übernahm Fried die Leitung der Konzerte der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Berlin mit den Philharmonikern.

1908 wurde ihm die Leitung des Blüthner-Orchesters übertragen.

1910 führte er im Oktober in einem Konzert der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde Arnold Schönbergs « Pelleas und Melisande » auf - die erste Aufführung eines großen Schönberg-Werkes außerhalb Wiens.

1912 trat Fried von der Leitung der Konzerte der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde zurück, weil er Bestrebungen, deren auf die Moderne gerichtete Programmatik zu unterlaufen, nicht akzeptierte. Während er in Berlin fortan seltener zu erleben war, führte ihn sein Weg in den letzten Jahren vor dem Krieg mehr und mehr ins Ausland, wo er zu einem Bahnbrecher für die moderne Musik wurde.

1912 komponierte er das Melodram « Die Auswanderer » auf Verse aus Émile Verhaerens Gedichtsammlung « Les Campagnes Hallucinées » in der Übertragung von Stefan Zweig (Uraufführung im Januar 1913 mit Tilla Durieux als Sprecherin und den Berliner Philharmonikern) . Wenig später gab er das Komponieren auf und wirkte fortan als freischaffender Dirigent.

Mit dem Zusammenbruch des Berliner Musiklebens infolge des Krieges war Fried in zunehmendem Maße auf auswärtige Gastdirigate angewiesen, die ihn durch ganz Europa führten: Manchester, Mailand, Paris, Kopenhagen, Budapest.

1916 leitete er die deutsche Erstaufführung der 4. Sinfonie von Sibelius in der Neuen freien Volksbühne Berlin.

1921 wurde er als erster ausländischer Künstler von Lenin in die UdSSR eingeladen (Beethovens 9. Sinfonie am Bolschoi-Theater) und unternahm 1924 erneut eine Konzertreise in die UdSSR, wo er auch weiterhin häufig gastierte. Das Aufblühen der Schallplattenindustrie und ein langfristiger, umfassender Vertrag banden ihn ab 1924 an die Deutsche Grammophon-Gesellschaft und wieder fester an Berlin. Als erster Dirigent realisierte er 1924 die Gesamteinspielung einer Mahler-Sinfonie für die Schallplatte (2. Sinfonie, Orchester der Berliner Staatsoper) . In den Jahren bis 1930 entstand vor allem mit dem Orchester der Berliner Staatsoper sein diskographisches Vermächtnis.

Er übernahm 1925 die Leitung des neu gegründeten, aus dem Blüthner-Orchester hervorgegangenen Berliner Symphonie-Orchesters (einem Vorgänger des heutigen Konzerthausorchesters Berlin) . Tourneen führten ihn durch Europa, in die UdSSR und nach Amerika.

1926 dirigierte Fried Tschaikowskys B-Moll Klavierkonzert anlässlich des deutschen Debüts von Vladimir Horowitz.

1934 musste Fried als Jude und Sozialist emigrieren, er ging in die UdSSR und wurde Kapellmeister in Tbilissi (Tiflis) sowie Dirigent des Sinfonie-Orchesters des Allunions-Radio-Komitees in Moskau und leitete bis 1937 eine Vielzahl von Konzerten, bevor er (wahrscheinlich krankheitsbedingt) das Dirigieren aufgeben musste.

Kurz vor seinem Tode am 5. Juli 1941 in Moskau erhielt er die sowjetische Staatsbürgerschaft. Eine Quelle spricht in Bezug auf seinen Tod von « merkwürdigen, bis heute nicht geklärten Umständen » .

Rückt Oskar Frieds Leistung als einer der herausragenden Dirigenten der ersten Jahrhunderthälfte und eines Vorkämpfers für die Moderne durch die Wiederveröffentlichung einer Reihe von Aufnahmen allmählich wieder in das Bewusstsein einer breiteren Öffentlichkeit, so ist sein kompositorisches Œuvre noch weitgehend vergessen. Insbesondere die nach der Jahrhundertwende entstandenen Werke erregten seinerzeit großes Aufsehen, man sprach sogar von einem typischen « Fried-Stil » . Die Werke jener Jahre, vorab « Die Auswanderer » , das « Erntelied » , « Das trunkene Lied » und die « Verklärte Nacht » , weisen Fried als einen Komponisten aus, der, ausgehend von der späten Romantik Wagners und beeinflusst vor allem von Gustav Mahler, eine durchaus eigene Sprache ausprägte. Sein Melodram « Die Auswanderer » (wohl überhaupt eines der ersten Stücke für den Konzertsaal, das von einer dezidiert politisch kritischen Intention getragen ist) reflektiert aktuelle soziale Probleme und verbindet überaus suggestive Melodik mit einer Harmonik, die über weite Strecken von Ganztonkomplexen gesteuert wird. Frieds Musik dem Repertoire zurückzugewinnen, wäre Aufgabe engagierter Interpreten.

Der Häuserkataster von 1885 weist als nächsten Besitzer Erzherzog Stephan aus. 1906 wurde es an die Firma « Koppel, Frisch & Co. » verkauft, von der es 1928 die « Lebensversicherungsgesellschaft Phoenix » erwarb und nach deren Zusammenbruch es in den Besitz der « Österreichischen Versicherungs A. Margaretenstraße Margaretenstraße (4 ; 5) , benannt (nach 1900) nach der gleichnamigen Vorstadt, eine der wichtigsten Ausfallstraßen ; der Verkehrsweg läßt sich ab etwa 1700 nachweisen und bildete damals als « Neu-Wiedner Straße » die Hauptachse eines eigenen Vorstadtbereichs, der Neuen Wieden. Der mittlere Abschnitt (zwischen Margaretenplatz und Reinprechtsdorfer Straße) hieß im 18. Jahrhundert Gries Gasse, der Abschnitt bis zum Linienwall Ziegel Gasse (1862 Obere Bräuhaus Gasse) . Als 1850 im untersten Teil der aus dem 17. Jahrhundert stammende Adlerhof (beim heutigen Rilkeplatz) abgetragen wurde, erhielt die Margaretenstraße eine Verbindung zur Wiedner Hauptstraße. Der gesamte Straßenzug erhielt erst am Anfang des 20. Jahrhunderts die einheitliche Benennung Margaretenstraße. Der zum 4. Bezirk gehörende Teil endet bei der Kettenbrückengasse beziehungsweise Kleinen Neugasse ; 1901 erfolgte eine Verlängerung durch die Griesgasse und die Obere Bräuhausgasse, 1914 durch den zwischen Johannagasse und Margaretenzügel liegenden Teil der Bräuhausgasse.

Karl Hayd

Karl Hayd (geboren 8. Februar 1882 in Hainburg an der Donau ; gestorben 14. Oktober 1945 in Linz) war ein österreichischer Maler und Grafiker.

Hayds Vater war Oberleutnant an einer Kadettenschule in Altaussee, die Mutter (geborene Hörzinger) stammte aus Linz.

Durch den Beruf des Vaters zog die Familie oft um, so verbrachte Karl Hayd seine Kindheit in Klosterneuburg, Salzburg, Linz und Wien. In Salzburg und Wien besuchte er die Realschule und in Wien später die Staatsgewerbeschule für Architektur. Nach dem Abschluß 1901 absolvierte er als Praktikant eine Maurerlehre und danach ein freiwilliges Jahr bei den Tiroler Kaiserjägern in Innsbruck.

Im Jahr 1902 begann er ein Kunststudium an der Akademie der bildenden Künste in Wien, das er 1906 abschloß. Danach wechselte er für zwei Jahre an die Akademie der bildenden Künste in Prag ; nach der Rückkehr schloß er Bekanntschaft mit Egon Schiele, und tauschte mit ihm Zeichnungen aus. Eine Studienreise nach Venedig, Dalmatien und Bosnien folgte 1909, danach ein längerer Aufenthalt auf der niederländischen Insel Marken in der damaligen Zuiderzee (heute IJsselmeer) . 1910 trat er dem Albrecht-Dürer-Bund bei und lebte seit 1911 als freischaffender Künstler in Wien. Im selben Jahr stellte er erstmals aus. Im Sommer folgte ein längerer Aufenthalt in Tamsweg, 1913 ein halbes Jahr in Cicale, Lussin piccolo (vor der dalmatinischen Küste) und in Arco am Gardasee. Noch im gleichen Jahr schloß er sich dem Oberösterreichischen Kunstverein in Linz an.

Im Jahr 1914 heiratete er in Linz Hedwig Kutschera, die Tochter des Besitzers der Linzer Beethoven-Apotheke.

Während des Ersten Weltkriegs arbeitete er vor allem als Kriegsmaler (zuerst an der galizischen) später an der Dolomitenfront und im Kampfgebiet um Trient. Nach Kriegsende gründete er gemeinsam mit Karl Emmerich Baumgarten und Otto Hamann die Künstlergruppe « Der Ring » und zog nach Linz. Diese Stadt verließ er in den folgenden Jahren nur noch für Reisen und Arbeitsaufenthalte. 1940 erkrankte er an einem Asthmaleiden, das auch eine Kur in Bad Hall kaum linderte. Im März 1944 erzwang der Bombenkrieg die Übersiedlung nach Traunkirchen, nach Kriegsende kehrte er jedoch nach Linz zurück wo er auch im Herbst 1945 starb.

Hayd beherrschte die meisten malerischen und grafischen Techniken, so enthält sein Gesamtwerk Ölbilder, Aquarelle, Fresken, Farbstiftzeichnungen, Radierungen und Lithografien. Die Fresken sind jedoch großteils verloren gegangen. In frühen Jahren (etwa 1907 bis 1912) illustrierte er auch Bücher, später entwarf er Plakate und malte Industriebilder. Letztere zeichnen sich vor allem durch eigenständige Komposition und technische Genauigkeit aus (etwa : « Bohrmaschinen im Salzbergwerk » , 1925) . Bekannt sind auch seine Blumenstillleben, Landschaftsbilder und Stadtansichten.

Die Bilder mit kriegerischen Themen stellen keine heroische Überhöhung dar, sondern vor allem das Makabere, Mörderische und Gespenstische (zu sehen in : « Das Lied der Toten » , « Gas » , « Tod speit Gas » oder « Tod als Flieger » . Hayds Werk blieb stets gegenständlich. Charakteristisch ist die Farbkraft der Bilder) Farbe war für ihn keine bloße Zutat, sondern Grundelement. Der Künstler distanzierte sich zeitlebens von Kunstströmungen, sondern strebte Universalität und Allgemeingültigkeit an.

Die Schaffensperiode reichte bis zwei Tage vor seinem Tod.

« Polydor »

« Polydor » was originally an independent branch of the « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » . Its name was 1st used as an export label, in 1924, the British and German branches of the « Gramophone Company » having severed their ties during World War I. « Deutsche Grammophon » claimed the rights to the « His Master's Voice » trademark for Germany, where « HMV » recordings were released under the « Electrola » trademark.

In turn, « Deutsche Grammophon » records exported out of Germany were released on the « Polydor » label.

« Polydor » became a popular music label, in 1946, while « Deutsche Grammophon » became a Classical music label. The German rights to the « His Master's Voice » trademark was sold by « Deutsche Grammophon » to the « Electrola » Records unit of « EMI » , in 1949. « Polydor » remained « Deutsche Grammophon » 's export label, including Classical music, in France and the Spanish-speaking world for the remainder of the long-playing era, as a result of language and cultural concerns.

Polydor (LC 00309) ist der Name eines deutschen Plattenlabels, das heute zu dem Major-Label Universal Music des Medienunternehmens Vivendi gehört.

Die Deutsche Grammophon AG durfte aufgrund des Versailler Vertrages außerhalb des Deutschen Reiches ihr Markenzeichen Stimme seines Herrn sowie den Namen Grammophon nicht mehr verwenden. In Europa behielt die Gramophone Company im britischen Hayes die Markenrechte. Die Amerika-Rechte verkaufte Firmenchef Emile Berliner 1924 an die Victor Talking Machine Company. Für den Export gründete die Deutsche Grammophon AG daher im gleichen Jahr die Marke Polydor als zusätzliches Label. Den Namen kreierte man aus dem Griechischen. Er heißt übersetzt Viele Geschenke.

During the 1st half of the 20th Century, there were some fundamental changes in the perception of Anton Bruckner as man and composer. Christa Brüstle provides comprehensive discussion of 4 main areas in the history of the composer's reception, particularly in Austria and Germany, the substance of her illuminating book.

In her 1st Chapter, « Stations of Bruckner Interpretation until 1930 » , Doctor Brüstle discusses not only writings on the composer but also the 1st important analyses of his works. These were significant at the time mainly because they attempted to show Bruckner as an important composer in his own right who wrote absolute (i.e. : non-programmatic) music and who was not unduly influenced by Richard Wagner. They are generally given short shrift today because, at their most extreme, they tend to put a certain gloss on the composer as a kind of visionary martyr. This is certainly true of some Bruckner biographies written in the period after the First World War, including parts of the 4 volume August Göllerich and Max Auer biography, which reflect the pessimistic « spirit of the age » .

Brüstle examines the distinctive contributions made by Rudolf Louis (Munich, 1905) ; August Halm (Munich, 1914) ; and Ernst Kurth (Berlin, 1925) . She discusses the more anecdotal biographies of Friedrich Eckstein (Vienna, 1923) ; Friedrich Klose (Regensburg, 1927) ; and Max von Oberleithner (Regensburg, 1933) and assesses articles written during Bruckner's lifetime by supporters who espoused the nationalistic, pro-German and increasingly anti-Semitic doctrines of the Christian-Socialist Party in Vienna led by Karl Lueger. The « nationalistic German » perception of Bruckner in these articles foreshadowed the more sinister politicizing of Bruckner and his music during the 3rd « Reich » . But there was an intervening period from roughly the beginning of the 20th Century when Bruckner's works (the Symphonies, in particular) were performed more frequently in Germany and reviewed more positively in journals like the « Leipzig Neue Zeitschrift für Musik » .

Brüstle turns next to the many organized Music Societies of Bruckner devotees that mushroomed in the period up to the beginning of the 1939-1945 War and mentions 32 characteristic features. 1st, there was a unique mixture of Catholicism and Wagnerianism. 2nd, these Societies consisted primarily of Austrian and German enthusiasts, most of whom had « nationally or regionally determined pro-German political and politico-cultural views and expectations » . 3rd, there was a specific motivation to « fight » for the composer, so that posthumous recognition would be given to this « misunderstood genius » . The history of organized Bruckner appreciation began after the 1914-1918 War with a « Bruckner association » in Berlin ; the conductor Arthur Nikisch was its honorary president.

Bruckner Centenary celebrations, in 1924, prompted Max Auer to suggest an International Bruckner Society with Wilhelm Marx, the new president of the Berlin association, as its leader, but there was opposition on account of his « outspoken political views » .

The need for an umbrella organization became more pronounced when plans to publish Bruckner's works in a Complete Edition were gradually coming to fruition. A Bruckner Society was founded in 1927. Its name was changed to International Bruckner Society, in 1928, at a meeting in Augsburg, and its headquarters were moved to Vienna in 1929. Max Auer was elected the 1st president, remaining in this post until 1938. All the regional Bruckner Societies held concerts and Festivals, or « concerts as Festivals » , on a regular basis. It was Ernst Kurth, the Austrian-born president of the Swiss Bruckner Society, who argued most vociferously for a truly international Society. Kurth was instrumental in arousing interest in France, England and, in particular, America, where « The Bruckner Society of America » (which was committed to achieving recognition for Mahler as well) was founded in 1931.

The 1st Festival to be organized by the International Bruckner Society (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , or « IBG ») was held in October 1930, not in Vienna but in Munich. The Munich Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Franz

Schalk, played Bruckner's 5th and 6th Symphonies on the opening-day. Siegmund von Hausegger directed performances of the 9th and the 8th (final concert) . Plans for a Festival, in 1932, had to be cancelled, and the 2nd « IBG » Festival took place in Munich, in August 1933. In the meantime, the political situation was becoming tenser. Both Otto Klemperer and Bruno Walter were forced to leave Germany in 1933. In May of that year, Adolf Hitler imposed the « 1,000 Mark toll » which meant that Germans could not travel to Austria unless they left the sum of 1,000 Marks as security. It also became more difficult to obtain exit visas in Austria. Robert Haas, the editor of the Complete Edition, was a typical casualty and could not travel to Munich for the Festival. Significantly, it was in 1933 that the politicizing of the « IBG » began, and « IBG » events, from this time onwards, could hardly be distinguished from National-Socialist cultural events. The 1st of the « IBG » Festivals to be held in Vienna, between 7 and 15 October 1934, was the 7th overall. Vienna was able to host it largely because Kurt von Schuschnigg, who became Austrian president after the murder of Engelbert Dollfuss, was both well-disposed towards the « IBG » and more amenable to Hitler.

In February 1936, permission was given by the National-Socialist authorities for a bust of Bruckner to be displayed in the « Walhalla » temple, in Regensburg. Max Auer, Siegmund von Hausegger and Peter Raabe (who had succeeded Richard Strauß as president of the « Reichsmusikkammer ») were involved in planning a special « IBG » Festival, in June 1937. Josef Gœbbels, the head of the Nazi propaganda machine, agreed to speak at the unveiling of the bust. Hitler laid a laurel wreath at the foot of its pedestal and was presented by Auer with the Society's 1st medal (« Ehrenmedaille ») . The whole occasion, in particular Gœbbels' revisionist appreciation of Bruckner and the use of the « IBG » as a kind of propaganda arm of the National-Socialists, is described by Doctor Brüstle in some detail.

One consequence of the increasing politicization of the « IBG » was that the word « International » was removed and its name changed to the « Deutsche Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , in June 1938. Only those regarded as « Aryans » were allowed to be members. Gœbbels was responsible for the running of the Society and the choice of officers, and Wilhelm Furtwängler was appointed its 1st president. Its headquarters were in the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » in Vienna. In 1939, the 1st « Großdeutsches Brucknerfest » (Greater German Bruckner Festival) was held in Linz, Saint-Florian and Vienna (from 30 June to 5 July) . 6 Symphonies were played : Nos. « 0 » , 1 (« Linz version ») , 2, 5, 6 and 8, and several of Bruckner's Motets, male-voice choruses and the Mass in E minor were performed. In his presidential address, Furtwängler, who did not entirely approve of the Robert Haas editions and was by no means a party-political « poodle » , spoke of the need to get rid of orthodoxies and slogans, and to appreciate that a love of Bruckner's music did not necessarily preclude a love of Johannes Brahms' or Richard Wagner's music. In 1941, Furtwängler successfully resisted plans to move the headquarters of the « IBG » to Linz or Saint-Florian.

The history of the « IBG / DBG » is closely associated with the origins of the 1st Complete Edition, with Robert Haas and Alfred Orel as principal editors, and the founding of the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » (MHV) . The 1st volume of the Complete Edition (Volume 15 : « Requiem » in D minor and « Missa solemnis » in B-flat minor, edited by Haas) was published by the « Benno Filser Verlag » in Augsburg, in 1930. Alfred Orel was responsible for the edition of Symphony No. 9 (including sketches and drafts) published in Augsburg, in 1932, and in Vienna and Leipzig, in 1934. Brüstle provides a thorough account of the background (which involved a considerable amount of back-biting) to the publication of Symphony No. 9 ; the « Linz » and « Vienna » versions of Symphony No. 1 (1935) ; Symphony No. 6 (1935) ; Symphony No. 5 (1935) ; Symphony No. 4 (1936) ; Symphony No. 2 (1938) ; and Symphony No. 8 (1939) .

She negotiates a clear passage through the stormy waters of the « original » versions as perceived by scholars and conductors at the time. Attention is drawn to Siegmund von Hausegger's « demonstration concert » in Munich, in April 1932, when he conducted both the « original » and the 1st printed version of the 9th ; Peter Raabe's « 1st performance » of the « Linz version » of the Symphony No. 1 at the Bruckner Festival in Aachen, in 1934 ; Hausegger's performance of the « original » version of the Symphony No. 5 in Munich, in October 1935 ; Hans Weisbach's performance of the « original » version of the Symphony No. 4 (with the original Scherzo) in Leipzig, in March 1936 ; and the performance of the « original » version of the Symphony No. 8 by the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler in Vienna, in July 1939.

An important section of Doctor Brüstle's book is the appendix. This contains documents that throw light on the uneasy relationships between Robert Haas and Lili Schalk, Franz Schalk's widow, and between Robert Haas and Alfred Orel, culminating in an open breach in February 1938 which left Haas as sole-editor of the Complete Edition.

In his « Walhalla » speech, in June 1937, Josef Gœbbels undertook to provide financial support for the ongoing publication of the « original » versions of Anton Bruckner's works. The old 1st edition scores (Ferdinand Löwe's 1903 edition of the 9th Symphony, for instance) became more and more discredited in favour of editions which would be faithful to the original manuscript text. Because of the lack of engraver's copies, letters to publishers and other intermediate sources in many cases, it was difficult to have a complete picture. There was also a generation split between the older Schalk and Löwe faction, on the one hand, and the younger faction which, on the whole, supported Haas. In the political climate of the time, « original » had various connotations, all positive : natural, pure, truly folk-like, and so on ; and the « original » versions presented Bruckner as a truly original composer with commendable rough-hewn, peasant-like qualities which distinguished him from Richard Wagner. Thus, discussing the 1st performance of the « original » version of the 5th Symphony, Oskar Lang was convinced that only this version bore the authentic stamp of Bruckner's style as far as the scholar was concerned.

With the official rubber-stamping of these « original » versions, the older scores were used less and less often. In some instances, however, there was actually not much difference between the old Universal-Edition score and the new version. The tendency to maximize the differences was regarded as unnecessary sensationalism by some independent scholars who took the time to compare them. Indeed, in 1939, there was an official rebuke concerning the publicity for Symphony No. 6 because it gave more prominence to the discrepancies « than was justified on musicological grounds » . It is also worth remembering that conductors of the old school like Wilhelm Furtwängler and Hans Knappertsbusch persisted in using the older versions even after 1945. As early as 1936, the critic Max von Millenkovich-Morold argued that these older versions also deserved a place in the Complete Edition. Unlike Haas, he was convinced that Bruckner sanctioned many of the changes which appeared in the 1st published editions. Haas, for his part, attempted to adhere to the principles of true scholarship, as he put it, while dissociating himself from what he called the unjustified criticism of Franz Schalk. When, however, the Symphony No. 8 was published in the Complete Edition, it was clearly not the « original » version (the sources were not available) but, essentially, nothing more than a revision of the 1st printed version.

Even without official approval of the Complete Edition, it is highly likely that the momentum started by Haas and Orel in the early 1930's would have been unstoppable.

Doctor Brüstle observes :

« The “ editorial guide-lines ” of the Bruckner Complete Edition can be absolutely separated from the political developments of the 1930's and 1940's, and from the ideological implications of this period. It cannot be claimed that the editorial decision to abide by the autograph scores was characteristic of the period between 1930 and 1944, or was a result of it. »

In 1939, the headquarters of the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » were moved from Vienna to Leipzig. Very little was published during the War years, mainly because it was difficult to gain access to manuscript sources of several works including the 3rd Symphony (vital material was in the possession of Alma Mahler-Werfel) . An edition of the E minor Mass appeared in 1940, and a study-score of the « original » 7th Symphony in 1944. In the meantime, « MWV » Leipzig (now called the « Bruckner-Verlag ») was moved to Braunau, away from the Allied bombing. Brüstle explores at some length the authenticity of the cymbal clash in the Adagio of the 7th and other issues that have still to be addressed in a Revision Report for the Leopold Nowak edition.

Doctor Brüstle deals finally with major repercussions in the United States and Great Britain. In the USA, the founding of the « Bruckner Society of America » was followed by the 1st issue of the journal « Chord and Discord » , in 1932. Otto Klemperer conducted the 1st American performance of the « original » version of the 9th, in Carnegie Hall, in 1934. In English-speaking countries, there was growing awareness of Anton Bruckner, in general, and the 1st Complete Edition in particular, thanks to Austrian and German scholars who were forced to emigrate during the 1930's. Hans Ferdinand Redlich, Willy Reich and Egon Wellesz all wrote articles on Bruckner and his music in the leading music journals. But the War made it difficult for new scores to be exported, and it was not until after 1945 that there was truly international interest in the « original » versions. Further, many musicologists were just beginning to study Robert Haas' editions when the 1st volumes of Leopold Nowak's were available.

Sociétés Bruckner

Austrian, German and American organizations promoting the music of Anton Bruckner. After World War I, numerous Bruckner Societies were established in Austria and Germany ; the one founded in Leipzig, in 1925, became the International Bruckner Society (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft ») , based in Vienna, in 1929. It published the periodical « Bruckner-Blätter » until 1940 and collaborated with the « Österreichische Nationalbibliothek » in publishing the earlier volumes of Robert Haas's complete Bruckner edition. Nationalist (Nazi and anti-Semite) propaganda among the German-speaking parts of the Society led to its decline.

1er janvier 1925 : Le chef Otto Klemperer dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 8e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 10e concert de la saison.

29 janvier 1925 : Le chef Fritz Goldschmidt dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre Philharmonique de Berlin.

9 février 1925 : C'est avec le « Kammerkonzert » (Concerto de chambre) que Alban Berg débute sa période dodécaphonique qui durera jusqu'à la fin de sa vie. Il compose alors des œuvres marquantes telles que la « Suite lyrique » pour quatuor à cordes (1926) , et le Concerto « à la mémoire d'un ange » , pour violon et orchestre (1935) . Dans ce dernier, il ré-introduit des accords tonals au sein du langage dodécaphonique, ce qui lui permet de renouer avec le passé en citant un choral de Jean-Sébastien Bach, « Es ist Genug » (Cantate BWV 60) , et une chanson populaire.

12 février 1925 : Le chef George Szell dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

19 février 1925 : Mort à Vienne du chef d'orchestre Ferdinand Löwe, élève et fervent disciple d'Anton Bruckner.

Bruckner et Ferdinand Löwe

Le chef d'orchestre et pianiste autrichien Ferdinand Löwe est né le 19 février 1865 à Vienne et est mort le 6 janvier 1925. Il est considéré comme un enfant prodige. Il est un élève d'Anton Bruckner au Conservatoire de Vienne. Il commence sa carrière comme chef de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich à partir de 1896, l'année de la mort de son Maître. En 1900, il fonde le « Wiener Konzertvereinsorchester » , devenu en 1933 l'Orchestre Symphonique de Vienne, et devient professeur au Conservatoire de la capitale autrichienne. Il dirige également l'Académie de Musique de Vienne, de 1918 à 1922.

En tant qu'élève et proche de Bruckner, Ferdinand Löwe joue un rôle important pour faire connaître les œuvres du Maître, en estimant parfois nécessaire, avec d'autres comme Franz Schalk, de pousser Bruckner à y apporter des retouches. Dans le cas de la 9e Symphonie, Löwe qui en dirige en 1903 la création, apporte de lui-même à la partition des modifications et des altérations très importantes touchant à l'harmonie, l'orchestration et la dynamique, faisant même éditer sa version en 1906. Il faut attendre 1932 pour que la version originale soit enfin créée, sous la direction de Siegmund von Hausegger, et publiée par l'éditeur Alfred Orel.

En 1873, la Société académique Richard Wagner de Vienne joue un rôle important dans la diffusion du nouveau répertoire. Elle favorise non seulement les œuvres de son « Saint-Patron » mais également (par la suite) celles d'Anton Bruckner et de Hugo Wolf. Au fil du temps, Hans Paumgartner, les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, Franz Zottmann et, surtout, Ferdinand Löwe se sont impliqués (soit en tant que pianiste-interprète ou soit en tant qu'arrangeur) dans la réalisation de nombreux concerts « Bruckner » .

Les lers concerts majeurs d'œuvres Symphoniques contemporaines, donnés à Vienne, eurent lieu à la Société académique Wagner. Cette branche, fondée en 1872-1873, avait d'abord pour but de promouvoir et de diffuser les œuvres de Richard Wagner. Bruckner lui-même en est devenu membre à l'automne de 1873. De nombreux élèves et supporteurs de Bruckner (Gustav Mahler, Hugo Wolf, Hans Rott, les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, Ferdinand Löwe, August Göllerich et Guido Adler) vont s'y joindre également. Outre les œuvres du Maître de Bayreuth, on mettait de l'avant celles de Franz Liszt, de Hugo Wolf et d'Anton Bruckner. Lors de réunions occasionnelles appelés « soirées privées » l'on va présenter, en grande première, les Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner sous la forme d'arrangements pour piano à 2 mains, à 4 mains ou 2 pianos. Suivront le « Te Deum », le Quintette à cordes et les Motets.

Le 1er concert de la Société a eu lieu le 12 novembre 1879, à la « Bösendorfer-Saal » de Vienne. Le duo composé de Hans Paumgartner et de Felix Mottl a joué une transcription pour piano à 4 mains (de Gustav Mahler) de l'Adagio et le Scherzo de la 3e Symphonie. Cette version ne remplace pas la partition pour orchestre mais elle permet au moins au public d'obtenir une bonne 1re impression.

Bruckner dut effectivement lutter pour pouvoir réaliser les peu nombreuses exécutions contemporaines de ses œuvres par des orchestres, et assez souvent il se vit contraint de présenter au public ses créations sur le piano.

Dans cette situation misérable, il fut soutenu principalement par Ferdinand Löwe, les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, August Stradal et le pianiste Cyrill Hynais ; ceux-ci comptèrent parmi ses élèves et furent partisans des œuvres de leur Maître, il servirent de copiste, rédigèrent des réductions pour piano 4 mains et se présentèrent principalement comme interprètes des Symphonies de Bruckner au piano. Ces arrangements pour le piano furent exécutées, la plupart du temps, lors de concerts semi-officiels, organisés par des Associations de musique privées bourgeoises. Ainsi, l'association académique viennoise pour la promotion de Wagner et la nouvelle association de Richard Wagner offrirent à Bruckner assez souvent la seule et unique possibilité de se produire en tant que compositeur et artiste.

À la fin des années 1880, au moment où Bruckner commence à être reconnu en tant que Symphoniste, ses amis et ses élèves, fascinés par son style avant-gardiste, décident de former un « Cercle » restreint afin de promouvoir ses œuvres de différentes façons. Beaucoup d'entre eux étaient de jeunes musiciens émergents qui ont étudié la théorie musicale dans la classe du Maître au Conservatoire de Vienne. Ils ont également agi comme assistants à diverses occasions. Certains de ses élèves sont devenus de précieux et proches collaborateurs. Les frères Josef et Franz Schalk de même que Ferdinand Löwe, en particulier, ont su gagner sa confiance. Ils vont faire connaître la musique de Bruckner au public grâce à des d'arrangements pour piano lors de récitals organisés par le « Wagner-Verein ». Franz Schalk et Ferdinand Löwe vont rester fidèle à la « cause » après la mort du Maître de Saint-Florian. Ils vont s'imposer comme les 1ers grands interprètes de sa musique. Leur dévotion profonde et leurs efforts dans la publication et la diffusion des Symphonies s'avérera un moment charnière dans l'histoire.

C'est dans ce cadre qu'il s'agit d'évaluer la problématique des versions pour piano des œuvres de Anton Bruckner : Bruckner prit au sérieux ces interprétations de ses œuvres pour orchestre (il dirigea (!) lui-même la création mondiale de son « Te Deum » dans la version pour 2 pianos, cependant, il fut conscient des problèmes de ces exécutions quant à une interprétation fidèle à l'original des œuvres écrites pour la postérité. Ferdinand Löwe, les frères Schalk et Cyrill Hynais furent des pianistes remarquables et des instrumentalistes capables, sans aucun doute, de réaliser des « exécutions soignées, presque orchestrales » et pouvant transmettre le contenu des compositions, même si l'orchestration et la sonorité furent pour Bruckner des éléments musicaux aussi importants que le rythme, la mélodie ou l'harmonie.

Le chef Ferdinand Löwe (que Bruckner surnommait affectueusement, « Berlioz ») , rapporte que le Maître leur avait demandé un coup de main pour la ré-orchestration des 3e et 4e Symphonies à cause de son manque d'expérience sur le plan pratique. Sans dénigrer leur musicalité (qui était, selon tous les témoignages, formidable) , il est peu probable que Bruckner se soit senti démuné dans l'art de l'orchestration. Bien au contraire, Bruckner leur a laissé préparé les partitions qu'il a, par la suite, révisées avec ses propres théories.

La médiocre qualité de beaucoup d'Orchestres de l'époque peut justifier la ré-instrumentation de Ferdinand Löwe de la 4e Symphonie, mais elle n'excuse pas les profonds changements de forme du Scherzo ni les coupures opérées dans le Finale. Sous le coup du découragement, dû au rejet de la 8e Symphonie par le chef Hermann Levi, Bruckner donna sa caution à cette version, sans toutefois y apposer sa signature. Le retour au texte authentique s'effectua en plusieurs étapes.

La 1re exécution à Vienne de la 5e Symphonie (dans la version de Franz Schalk) , eut lieu en 1898 sous la direction de Ferdinand Löwe, et fut assez bien accueillie. L'œuvre entra peu à peu au répertoire, mais il fallut attendre 1937 pour que la partition authentique de Bruckner soit publiée, dans l'édition de Robert Haas. (L'édition ultérieure réalisée par Leopold Nowak, en 1951, est essentiellement la ré-édition de celle de Haas.)

27 février 1884 : Création intégrale (dans le cadre d'un événement organisé par la Société académique Richard Wagner de Vienne) de la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner dans un arrangement pour 2 pianos donné par les solistes Ferdinand Löwe et Josef Schalk.

La réduction pour piano 4 mains de Franz et Josef Schalk ainsi que l'arrangement pour 2 pianos de Hermann Behn furent publiées en 1895-1896 aux éditions Albert J. Gutmann. L'adaptation pour 2 mains, publiée chez Universal-Edition, fut réalisée par le pianiste Cyrill Hynais et reproduit fidèlement la partition pour orchestre. L'honnêteté de Hynais concernant l'adaptation pour piano doit être considérée comme exception ; assez souvent, les arrangements pour piano comprirent des modifications et des corrections, qui se laissèrent justifier pour des raisons de sonorité, mais qui furent réalisées par les adeptes Schalk, Löwe et Stradal afin de rendre les œuvres plus attrayantes.

Bruckner va réviser la 7e Symphonie en 1885 après sa création, le 30 décembre 1884. La seule partition manuscrite autographe qui a survécu porte le numéro « Musik Handschriftlichen 19479 » . Mais des révisions ont été apportées à cette partition. Dans certains cas, le matériau d'origine (datant de 1881-1883) a été effacé. Par conséquent, la forme exacte de la version originale n'existe plus. Le manuscrit contient plein d'ajouts écrits sur des bouts de papier qui ont été collés directement sur les pages, particulièrement aux 1er et 2e mouvements. Ces interventions ne sont pas de la main du compositeur (probablement des disciples Franz Schalk et Ferdinand Löwe) mais elles sont soupçonnées d'avoir été faites à la demande de Bruckner.

Le choix fait par Bruckner semblerait corroboré par une lettre d'un des défenseurs les plus controversés, Josef Schalk, à son frère Franz. Elle est datée du 10 janvier 1885, soit 11 jours après la création leipzigoise de la 7e Symphonie :

« Ferdinand Löwe et moi avons dernièrement examiné la partition de la 7e avec Bruckner et discuté d'une ou 2 modifications et améliorations. Tu ignores probablement que Nikisch a arraché son accord pour notre coup de cymbales dans l'Adagio (accord de sixte et quarte en ut majeur) , avec le triangle et les timbales - à notre incommensurable joie. »

« Notre coup de cymbales » : voilà qui résout à coup sûr l'affaire ! Mais le fait est que nous ne saurons très certainement jamais combien de « modifications » et d'« améliorations » Bruckner fit sur l'insistance des Nikisch, Löwe et autres Schalk. Contrairement à ce qu'on croit, pourtant, il savait fort bien résister quand une idée lui déplaisait vraiment. Et bien qu'il pût être relativement puriste en matière d'instrumentation Symphonique (les harpes n'intégrèrent la Symphonie n° 8 qu'au bout d'un mois de bataille, à en croire son élève Friedrich Eckstein) , s'il avait douté du bien-fondé des cymbales et du triangle, pourquoi les introduire de nouveau dans l'Adagio de sa Symphonie n° 8 ? Musicologiquement parlant, c'est là une question difficile à trancher.

L'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie a été exécuté aux obsèques de Bruckner dans un arrangement pour harmonie de Ferdinand Löwe. Il a également été diffusé sur la radio allemande le 1er mai 1945, au lendemain de la mort d'Adolf Hitler.

Les frères Franz et Josef Schalk, Ferdinand Löwe, Cyrill Hynais et le docteur Max von Oberleithner (1868-1935) vont aider leur Maître, Anton Bruckner, à faire publier ses œuvres. Ils l'admiraient en tant que compositeur de génie mais ils jugeaient ses orchestrations trop simplistes, trop influencées par les sonorités de l'orgue, sans tenir compte de la réelle complexité d'un vaste orchestre Symphonique sur scène. Ce travail d'équipe permettra à Bruckner de voir, dès 1887, ses œuvres être imprimées chez l'éditeur.

Max von Oberleithner va contribuer, avec les frères Schalk et Ferdinand Löwe, aux retouches apportées à la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner lors de la publication de la 1re édition : Haslinger-Schlesinger-Lienau, Vienne (1892) . Ce qui sera fort critiqué avec le temps.

À partir de mars 1889 : Bruckner poursuit (ou amorce) la révision de sa 8e Symphonie.

Ferdinand Löwe fait pression auprès de l'éditeur viennois Albert J. Gutmann pour publier de la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner.

20 septembre 1890 : Lettre de Hermann Levi (Munich) à Anton Bruckner (Vienne) . Il dit à la toute fin ...

« Please tell “ Herr ” Löwe that I have recommended him as musical assistant for the next music Festivals.

Your true “ devoté ”,

Hermann Levi »

As early as 1885 (and probably earlier) , there were summer and early fall Music Festivals, in Austria and in Germany ; and they may have been coordinated. There was even an important one that went under the title of German « Musikfest » , but that was held in Vienna. Bruckner loved Berlin and Munich (and Hermann Levi, as well as his work) , so, it is not surprising that Levi would be writing to him about having his Symphony published and about recommending Ferdinand Löwe as director of the next Festivals. Bruckner was to hear his « Te Deum » , in Berlin ; the rehearsal to be held on May 31st, 1891. (There are letters, in April and May, that confirms this.) Furthermore, Bruckner states in 1891, that the German « Musikfest » , held in September, wants to perform his « 150th Psalm » .

Autour de décembre 1891 : Lettre de Hermann Levi (Vienne) à Anton Bruckner (Vienne) .

« Honoured Friend !

Unfortunately, I cannot see you at this point (in the evening, I am at the Theater and, tomorrow, I travel) but you will be hearing from me soon !

1st Symphony, “ wonderful ” ! It must be published and performed (but please, please, change little if anything) it is entirely good as it is. The instrumentation, too !

Please, please, do not retouch much !

Löwe performed it magnificently.

In haste, these few lines. Please, continue to think well of me.

In sincere friendship and respectfully yours,

Levi »

18 août 1892 : Lettre de Anton Bruckner (Steyr) à Cyrill Hynais (Vienne) .

« Most Sincere and Esteemed “ Herr ” Hynais !

“ Herr ” Gericke will conduct.

1st rehearsal on Monday, the 5th of September, expressly for which I shall return to Vienna. The conductor would like very much to have a piano score. Could you not simply write one out, just the vocal parts. If not, then, I request a full-score, in order that the work may be learned thoroughly and well ; and, on top of that, for the accompanying rehearsal, the same ; or, in the most pressing case, look-up “ Herr ” Löwe (in the rectory) at the “ Trauenkirche ” in Ebensee, in mine and all of our names, to see whether he may undertake this dear work. Thank you truly from my heart.

Yours,

Bruckner »

10 novembre 1893 : Confiné au lit pendant presque toute l'année, à Vienne, Anton Bruckner (69 ans) verra son état de santé défailant s'aggraver (encore) d'une façon alarmante.

Il jugera alors opportun d'entreprendre la rédaction de son testament. (À l'origine, Bruckner avait nommé son ami Rudolf Weinwurm, l'auteur de la cantate patriotique « Germania » , comme exécuteur testamentaire à cause de sa formation de juriste.) Son frère Ignaz et sa sœur Rosalie, dit « Sali » , (2 célibataires) seront nommés ses héritiers légaux.

Il termine son testament ainsi :

« I appoint Doctor Theodor Reisch, Imperial Legal Advocate in Vienna XIX, Oberdöbling, as my executor, and request the aforementioned to take care of fulfilment of my final wishes. I have prepared the same in the presence of the witnesses signed in their own hand-writing.

Doctor Anton Bruckner, m.p.

Ferdinand Löwe, m.p. , as requested witness

Cyrill Hynais, m.p. , as requested witness

Doctor Theodor Reisch, m.p. , as requested witness »

Durant les 3 dernières années de sa vie, étant atteint par la maladie et préoccupé par de nouveaux projets, Anton Bruckner se rendra graduellement compte qu'il avait perdu le contrôle de la publication de sa musique. Il devint, avec raison, de plus en plus méfiants surtout des frères Schalk et de Ferdinand Löwe. Il finira par conclure que les versions de ses œuvres majeures qui seront publiées ne représenteront pas ses intentions finales.

Novembre 1894 : Lettre écrite par le chef (et disciple) Ferdinand Löwe, en lien avec un concert à venir dédié à la musique d'Anton Bruckner. Elle est adressée à la résidence de madame Natalie Horn de la « Elisabethstraße », possiblement l'épouse ou la fille de « Herr » Horn, le directeur du « Wagner-verein » (Société académique Wagner) de Vienne. Löwe offre ses sincères excuses pour l'annulation d'une leçon de musique en privé, dû à un important concert Bruckner en préparation au « Wagner-verein ». Au programme, il s'agit soit de la première de la transcription pour piano de la 6e Symphonie (par Löwe) ou bien encore une exécution de la 7e Symphonie. Le tout devra être annulé à cause du mauvais état de santé du compositeur.

Anton Bruckner corrigera et modifiera les arrangements pour piano, faites par ses élèves, des 3e et 4e Symphonies avec un paternalisme qu'ils jugeront excessif.

À la mort de Bruckner, le dimanche 11 octobre 1896, les élèves et disciples Ferdinand Löwe et Josef Schalk mettent la main sur des feuilles de partition et des esquisses du Finale de la 9e Symphonie, retrouvées chez le défunt, au « Kustodenstöckl » (pavillon du garde-chasse) du Haut-Belvédère.

Mercredi, 14 octobre 1896 : Obsèques officielles d'Anton Bruckner célébrées en grande pompe, à partir de 3 heures de l'après-midi, devant le Tout-Vienne musical dans une « Karlskirche » remplie à pleine capacité. On compte pas moins de 200 dignitaires du monde musical viennois (ce qui n'est pas peu dire pour un personnage si controversé). Le réputé chef wagnérien, Hans Richter, dirige la musique funèbre de l'Adagio de la 7e Symphonie, dans une version pour instruments à vent (les musiciens ne sont pas visibles au public) réalisée, pour la circonstance, par le disciple brucknérien Ferdinand Löwe.

22 octobre 1896 : Lettre manuscrite de remerciements adressée au chef d'orchestre (et disciple) Ferdinand Löwe rédigée par le président de la Société académique de Vienne, Franz Schaumann, pour sa participation aux funérailles d'Anton Bruckner à l'église Saint-Charles Borromée de la « Karlsplatz » de Vienne.

14 février 1897 : Concert commémoratif à la mémoire d'Anton Bruckner donnée par l'Orchestre du « Konzertverein » de Vienne sous la direction de Ferdinand Löwe. Au programme : la 7e Symphonie et le prologue des « Maîtres-chanteurs » de Richard Wagner.

Les disciples Franz Schalk et Ferdinand Löwe ont eu l'occasion d'examiner les manuscrits et autres documents laissés par Bruckner. Ils en sont venus à la conclusion que les objets de moindre importance (comme les livres) devaient être légués à la sœur de Bruckner, Rosalia Hueber (dit « Sali ») qui résidait alors à Vöcklabruck. Le biographe Max Auer en sera plus tard l'héritier. En 1902, un boîtier contenant une partie de la correspondance de Bruckner sera légué au 1er biographe de Bruckner, August Göllerich de Linz. Ses lettres se trouvent aujourd'hui au monastère de Saint-Florian.

Tout le blâme ne doit pas être déposé sur les épaules de ces « collectionneurs de reliques ». Le docteur Theodor Reisch était d'avis que seules les versions finales des œuvres devaient être remises à la Bibliothèque de la Cour. Un article de journal datant de 1926 montre que le dossier est encore chaud :

« L'ancien solliciteur publique de la Cour, le docteur Theodor Reisch qui devait mener à bien la succession, s'est laissé convaincre par une tierce personne que les manuscrits dits originaux d'Anton Bruckner étaient sans valeur par rapport aux versions finales. » . Le retrait des dernières versions des piles de musique autographe, retrouvées un peu partout dans l'appartement du compositeur, s'est effectué en présence du chef d'orchestre Ferdinand Löwe qui, lui aussi, est décédé depuis. Par contre, un certain nombre de documents importants demeurait toujours introuvable comme la Messe en fa mineur, la Messe en si mineur et une Symphonie. Les exécuteurs se sont malheureusement satisfaits de la « promesse » des administrateurs de chercher et de retrouver ce qui manquait à l'appel. Ainsi, la Bibliothèque a été victime de cette tromperie et l'affaire est morte au feuilleton. »

11 février 1903 : Création à Vienne des 3 Iers mouvements de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner par l'Orchestre philharmonique, sous la direction du chef et disciple Ferdinand Löwe (avec des modifications instrumentales) .

Löwe offre une forme édulcorée et ré-orchestrée de la Symphonie. Il est difficile de mesurer l'influence réelle qu'eut cette création en son temps. Il est cependant certain que l'œuvre ultime de Bruckner annonçait déjà beaucoup des audaces harmoniques et stylistiques du siècle qui s'ouvrait.

La destinée posthume de la 9e Symphonie devait être à l'image des déboires qu'avait connus son auteur tout au long de sa vie. Les mouvements achevés, jugés trop aventureux pour être livrés au public dans leur état original, furent confiés à Ferdinand Löwe, qui crut devoir retoucher toute l'instrumentation et édulcorer nombre d'audaces harmoniques dans l'Adagio notamment. Ce fut lui qui en donna la primeur le 11 février 1903 ; simultanément, la partition parut sous cette forme (Ludwig Döblinger / Universal-Edition) .

Les enregistrements de Frederick Charles Adler, de Hans Knappertsbusch et de Josef Krips sont basés sur l'édition inauthentique de Ferdinand Löwe.

10 novembre 1898 : Lettre manuscrite de félicitations rédigée par le président de la Société académique Richard Wagner, Franz Schumann, transmise à l'occasion du mariage du chef Ferdinand Löwe, à Vienne, avec Amalie Zehetbauer.

11 février 1903 : Création au « Konzertverein » de Vienne des 3 mouvements achevés de la 9e Symphonie dans la révision du chef d'orchestre et élève de Bruckner, Ferdinand Löwe.

According to the cellist Josef Laser, Löwe rehearsed with parts made from the original manuscript, but made numerous alterations in the course of the rehearsals, which eventually resulted in a comprehensive revision. Löwe decided that the cello accompaniment in bars 223-224 in the 1st movement needed to be extended for another 2 bars to support the horn in bars 225-226 ; and that several passages in the same movement (for instance, bars 245ff) needed an added timpani part; and that a new passage for oboe and clarinet was required to fill in the pause in bars 301-302. A contrabassoon is added, and the opening of the Scherzo is re-scored with wind replacing the quaver pizzicati. Other changes conform to the patterns set by the Schalkian interventions in that dynamic contrasts are moderated throughout, as for instance in the passages before letters M (bar 173) and T (bar 219) in the Adagio, where Bruckner's crescendo sempre indications are replaced by diminuendi.

Most glaringly, the main climax (bar 199, letter Q) is tamed into an augmented chord on E ; Bruckner's A natural is absent, the F-sharp is represented only by demi-semiquaver passing notes on the violins, and as even the C natural is only fleetingly present in a trumpet quaver on the 1st beat, the initial effect is of a plain E major (further weakened when dynamic « hairpins » replace Bruckner's unrelenting fortissimo) . Löwe's treatment of this passage is surely the defining statement of his pupils' lack of understanding of their Master's work.

(In Löwe's piano solo reduction, issued at the same time, the C natural is strongly stated in left-hand chords, which are also emphasized in the piano duet version made in collaboration with Josef Schalk, but these do not correspond to anything in the full-score.)

Le jeune Anton Webern assiste à cette première de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner.

22 février 1903 : Lettre manuscrite de félicitations rédigée par le président de la Société académique Richard Wagner, Franz Schumann, transmise à l'occasion de la création donnée à Vienne de la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner sous la direction du chef Ferdinand Löwe.

21 février 1905 : Ire représentation de la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner par son élève Ferdinand Löwe, à la tête du « Münchner Philharmoniker » .

6 décembre 1906 : Lettre manuscrite de félicitations rédigée par le président de la Société académique Richard Wagner, Franz Schaumann, à l'occasion d'un récital donné à Vienne par la soliste Amalie Löwe accompagné par son mari (Ferdinand) au piano.

1907 : Le chef Karl Muck dirige la première américaine de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner, dans la version révisée de Ferdinand Löwe, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York.

31 octobre 1913 : Le disciple de Bruckner, le chef Ferdinand Löwe, dirige à Vienne le 2e mouvement (Andante molto) de la Symphonie en fa mineur (WAB 99) , dite « Symphonie d'étude » .

The review in the « Neue Freie Presse » commented on his affectionate interpretation but was rather lukewarm in its assessment of the movement itself.

1927 : Amalie, la veuve du chef d'orchestre Ferdinand Löwe (décédé le 6 janvier 1925) et Rosalie Hueber (la sœur de Bruckner) vendent un certain nombre de pages manuscrites du Finale de la 9e Symphonie à la ville de Vienne et à sa Bibliothèque nationale.

1 décembre 1927 : Le chef Willem Mengelberg dirige la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner, dans la version révisée de Ferdinand Löwe, avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de New York.

This grand performance of Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony was warmly received by the New York audience ; including critics such as Richard Gilman, Laurie Sauborn and Olin Downes. This was only the 2nd performance of the work by the Orchestra. The premiere was given by conductor Karl Muck, in 1907.

Before Robert Haas went public with outrageous accusations (directed, above all, towards Ferdinand Löwe and his revision of the unfinished 9th Symphony, but, in a wider sense also, towards Franz Schalk, Arthur Nikisch, Hermann Levi and the other conductors of 1st performances of the Symphonies) , he and the representatives of the Bruckner movement who were launching the Complete Critical Edition tried to enlist Franz Schalk to conduct the premiere of the original version of the 9th Symphony, which had meanwhile been published.

An attempt was made, therefore, to induce one of the last great Bruckner conductors, from the Master's circle of friends, publicly to acknowledge the validity of the original versions and, thereby, to discredit Universal-Edition's printed editions. This attempt failed. Franz Schalk categorically refused to direct the proposed premiere because, as he explained, he considered performances of the 1st versions of Bruckner's Symphonies to be a serious offence against the Master who left them unpublished, not without good reason and never submitted his Symphonies for printing without thoroughly revising the 1st versions of the scores, often, 2 or 3 times.

Efforts had been going on, since the 1920's, to found an international association of all Bruckner supporters, which was to secure the financial means to restore and maintain the famous Bruckner organ left to decay in the Collegiate Church of Saint-Florian. The architects of the plan were the University professor Ernst Kurth (from Berne) , who pointed-out, right from the beginning, that the Society would have to be an international one ; Max Auer (from Vöcklabruck) , Franz Graflinger (from Linz) , Karl Grunsky (from Stuttgart) and Franz Moißl, director of the church music department of the Klosterneuburg foundation, near Vienna. This group, chiefly made-up of officials from the « Austrian Bruckner League » set-up after the First World War, made contact with the « Berlin Bruckner Society » , founded earlier by Arthur Nikisch, and invited them to join the proposed international organization. A joint conference took place in the monastery of Saint-Florian, on 4 November 1925, under the chairmanship of the abbot Vinzenz Hartl, during which the decision to found an « International Bruckner Society » was formally registered.

2 avril 1932 : Création par le chef Siegmund von Hausegger à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version dite authentique (non retouchée) du Maître (préparée par le musicologue Alfred Orel) . Elle est confrontée à la version retouchée de 1903, préparée par le disciple Ferdinand Löwe. Ce double concert (à caractère semi-privé) se tient à la « Tonhalle » de Munich et, est commandité par Robert Haas et la Société internationale Bruckner (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , ou « IBG ») . Hausegger présente d'abord la version de Löwe, puis la version originale de Bruckner. (Il fera de même avec la 5e Symphonie, en 1935.)

Immediately after the concert, a consensus was clear. The Executive Committee of the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » issued the following statement :

« With all due respect to the services rendered by Ferdinand Löwe, who actuated by a spirit of sincere loyalty, made such changes in the work that he deemed absolutely prerequisite to its public performance, the Committee resolves that, because of the new conception of the true individuality of Bruckner's tonal language that has come into existence during the 30 years interim, and the overwhelming impression made by the original version at its 1st performance, the 9th Symphony, in the exact form in which it was left by the Master, should no longer be kept from the musical world. »

Dans ce concert spectaculaire, bouleversant le monde musical, Siegmund von Hausegger interprète (muni du bon matériau musical) la 9e Symphonie 2 fois de suite : tout d'abord dans la version connue jusqu'ici de la partition publiée en 1903 par Ferdinand Löwe puis dans la version originale suivant l'autographe de Bruckner. La différence était éclatante et les auditeurs remarquèrent que cette œuvre (et, par la suite les autres Symphonies de Bruckner) n'avait encore jamais été jouée telle que le compositeur l'avait écrite.

Les modifications de Ferdinand Löwe, Franz Schalk et autres réviseurs des Symphonies de Bruckner, supprimées par Robert Haas et ses collaborateurs scientifiques, s'exercent sur la forme, la dynamique et la sonorité.

Des coupes moindres ou importantes, apparemment pour faciliter la compréhension, détruisirent la forme originelle, les proportions, symétries et correspondances essentielles à l'intérieur de la vaste architecture brucknérienne.

Les arrangeurs pleins de bonnes intentions remplacèrent d'autorité sa dynamique en terrasses fortement contrastée, dérivée de la registration de l'orgue, par des crescendi et decrescendi. Ils supprimèrent aussi à plusieurs reprises les pauses générales si importantes pour la compréhension formelle, ajoutèrent des modifications de tempo personnelles, des accelerandi et ritardandi ainsi que d'autres « améliorations » mélodiques, harmoniques et rythmiques et ce, avec les meilleures intentions voire même, à plusieurs reprises, avec l'accord plus ou moins « volontaire » du Maître.

Les interventions les plus massives se portèrent sur les sonorités. De même qu'avec sa dynamique en terrasses apparentée à l'orgue, Bruckner a procédé selon le principe de l'architecture en groupes sonores : il structure en groupes des blocs sonores différents qui reposent sur une séparation claire des couleurs (cordes / bois / cuivres) ainsi que sur leur réunion selon des principes formels rigoureux. Il crée ainsi une tectonique sonore extrêmement originale qui est un élément structurel de la composition. Sans ces principes formels clairs, l'architecture musicale des mouvements symphoniques de vastes dimensions est incompréhensible.

Bruckner and Ferdinand Löwe

Ferdinand Löwe : Orchestral conductor and choral director, active mostly in Vienna and Munich, but appearing regularly in Budapest and Berlin ; a former Vienna Conservatory student of Bruckner and a friend and staunch supporter of his music - « in his own way » .With Bruckner's knowledge, he and Franz Schalk collaborated on a spurious score of Bruckner's 4th Symphony, with cuts and « Wagner-like » orchestration. Although Bruckner allowed its printing, he refused to sign the printer's copy, releasing his own definitive version of 1880. This was neither Löwe's only nor his last musical indiscretion in regard to Bruckner.

An Austrian conductor who was a pupil of Anton Bruckner. He was one of the main popularizers of Bruckner's Symphonies. He would sometimes persuade the composer to re-arrange his music in order to make it more palatable to the public. In the case of Bruckner's Symphony No. 9, Löwe himself made significant changes (by editing and publishing) to the harmony, orchestration, phrasing and dynamics before the posthumous première in February 1903. Bruckner's original conception of the Symphony was not heard until 1932 when it was revived by Siegmund von Hausegger, Löwe's successor at Munich. The Symphony is today performed without Löwe's changes.

The Austrian conductor Ferdinand Löwe was born on 19 February 1865 in Vienna and died on 6 January 1925 also in Vienna.

His career was primarily centered in Vienna and Munich. From 1896, Löwe conducted the Kaim Orchestra, today's Munich Philharmonic, where he returned from 1908 to 1914. In 1900, Löwe founded and conducted the « Wiener Konzertvereinsorchester » , today the Vienna Symphony. He taught at the Vienna Conservatory from 1884. He was elected director in 1919, and served until 1922.

A pupil of Anton Bruckner, Löwe was one of the main popularizers of Bruckner's Symphonies. He would sometimes persuade the composer to re-arrange his music, in order to make it more palatable to the public. In the case of Bruckner's Symphony No. 9, Löwe himself made significant changes to the harmony, orchestration, phrasing and dynamics before the posthumous premiere. Bruckner's original conception of the Symphony was not heard until 1932 when it was revived by the conductor Siegmund von Hausegger, Löwe's successor at Munich. The Symphony is today performed without Löwe's changes.

...

The Austrian conductor Ferdinand Löwe was a pupil of Bruckner, a member of the circle of friends around Bruckner, and associated with editing the latter's Symphonies.

Löwe was a teacher of piano, choral singing, and music education at the Vienna Conservatory (« Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst ») from 1884 to 1922, and Director from 1919 to 1922 (after the enforced resignation of Wilhelm Bopp) . In 1909, Friedrich Schenker speaks of him as known to him personally « but sadly not artistically close to me » . Why Schenker calls him « Director » in « WSLB 14, August 19, 1908 » , is unknown.

The 1st important performances of Bruckner's Symphonic works took place in the Viennese Academic Wagner Society. Founded in 1873, the Viennese Society, like its model in Germany, aimed to promote and disseminate the works of Richard Wagner. Numerous pupils and students of Bruckner belonged to it. Apart from Wagner's works, it also advocated those of Franz Liszt, Hugo Wolf, and Anton Bruckner. In the so-called « Internal Evenings » and weekly meetings of the Society, Bruckner's Symphonies were performed in arrangements for piano (2 or 4 hands) mostly in the « Bösendorfer-Saal » , or in the small hall of the « Musikverein » . The pianists, in charge at these events, were : Hans Paumgartner, Felix Mottl, Josef Schalk, Franz Zottmann, and Ferdinand Löwe.

7 May 1883 : Franz Schalk and Franz Zottmann played the 3rd Symphony on 2 pianos.

16 January 1884 : Bruckner had written to Josef Schalk :

« Do you really intend to play 2 movements with Löwe on 2 pianos ? You must know only too well (as does Löwe) that a Symphony like mine cannot produce its proper effect when played with 2 hands only. I would be very grateful if I could hear it once, for the sake of the tempi. »

Bruckner's 1st Symphony was performed in Linz, in 1868. As late as 31st January 1884, a movement of this music was heard in Vienna when Ferdinand Löwe gave his 1st recital, playing his own arrangement of the Adagio from the 1st Symphony. Theodor Helm reports in his « Erinnerungen » about « the accomplished piano transcription, very close to the original orchestral score » .

A critic wrote about the performance :

« Concerning the Adagio of the Symphony performed by Ferdinand Löwe, it is as an integral part of a great unknown organism beyond superficial judgement. Altogether, this Adagio is of a peculiar atmosphere, after remaining contemplative for too long, it makes a surprising passionate upswing. »

The 1st Symphony had been revived at the Vienna « Wagner-Verein » with piano performances ; Ferdinand Löwe following a solo performance of the slow movement, in January 1884, with the complete work, in duet with Josef Schalk, on 22 December 1884. The successes of the 7th Symphony and of the 1888 version of the 4th raised the prospect of an orchestral performance and, on 11 November 1889, Bruckner reported to his copyist Leopold Hofmeyer in Steyr that :

« “ Hofkapellmeister ” Hans Richter has become very enthusiastic about my Symphony No 1. He has borrowed the score and had it copied and, after tearfully embracing me and prophesying immortality for me, said he would perform it in a Philharmonic concert. I’m amazed ! »

In a so-called « Bruckner-Abend » , which took place on 22nd December 1884, Josef Schalk and his new partner Ferdinand Löwe played the whole 1st Symphony on 2 pianos, in an arrangement by Löwe.

Although the Symphony was not yet well-known in Vienna, the 2 piano performance was highly-successful.

27 February 1884 : Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe played the 7th Symphony.

22 December 1884 : Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe performed the Scherzo of the 3rd Symphony and the 1st movement of the 4th Symphony.

23 April 1885 : Ferdinand Löwe and Franz Schalk, again, played the Adagio and Finale from the 1st Symphony, in Löwe’s arrangement, and the 1st movement of the 3rd Symphony, on 2 pianos :

« Every sincere music-lover was indebted to both artists for arranging some movements from Bruckner’s Symphonies for piano and presenting them to the public with youthful enthusiasm and with such astonishing technical assurance that they and the composer, who was present, were received with acclamation at the end of each movement. »

30 December 1885 : Ferdinand Löwe again partnered Franz Schalk in a performance of the 1st and 3rd movements of the 7th Symphony, in a 2 piano arrangement ; a performance that was greeted with enthusiasm although it « cried-out for an orchestral interpretation » . Only a few days later, Albert J. Gutmann published the piano score (for 4 hands) of the Symphony.

18 March 1886 : Ferdinand Löwe and Franz Schalk played the 7th Symphony, in a weekly meeting of the « Wagner-Verein » . Only 3 days later, on 21st March 1886, the 1st orchestral performance, in Vienna, took place in a concert in the « Musikverein » which was a great success for Bruckner.

5 March 1890 : Ferdinand Löwe played the Adagio and Scherzo from the 3rd Symphony and was commended for « achieving the best possible results in making the polyphony clear » .

1890 : Theodor Rättig published the 4 hand version for piano arranged by Schalk and Löwe - at the end of the same year, on 21 December 1890, Hans Richter conducted the 3rd version of the 3rd Symphony in Vienna.

28 December 1890 : Ferdinand Löwe played the 2nd and 3rd movements and, on 29 November 1894, the 1st movement of the 6th, in an « Internal Evening » :

« The hero of the evening was Professor Löwe who has still not received sufficient recognition as an excellent musician and specialist performer of Bruckner's music. His recital of the 1st movement of the 6th, rendered with great accuracy and played with an orchestral sound, was unanimously admired. We also wish to put on record that Löwe played this very difficult movement from memory. »

30 December 1891 : Ferdinand Löwe played the 2nd and 4th movements of the 1st Symphony, less than 3 weeks after the 1st performance of the revised version of the work, in a Philharmonic concert on 13 December. Once again, Löwe was praised as an « unsurpassable interpreter of Bruckner's music » and the critic noted that he played the movements « from memory with thrilling effect » .

30 December 1891 : Ferdinand Löwe performed the 2nd and 4th movements and, on 28 November 1895, he played the 1st 3 movements of the 5th Symphony :

« Ferdinand Löwe arranged this great work for the piano and played the 1st 3 movements (the powerful Finale had to remain unperformed because of limited time) with perfect Mastery, as always by heart, a performance which no one else can imitate. »

1896 : The piano reduction for 4 hands of the 7th Symphony was published by the brothers Franz and Josef Schalk.

26 October 1896 : Only 1 day after the unveiling of Bruckner's bust in Vienna, Ferdinand Löwe performed the 1st 2 movements of the 7th Symphony.

Anton Bruckner was a perfectionist, and the original versions of the Symphonies usually underwent thorough revisions consistent with his very clear notion of what their form and structure ought to be. But too often, to get them performed, he let himself be swayed by the urgings of acolytes and well-wishers (who sometimes made « improvements » themselves) . All this has resulted in endless research and eternal argument as to just what the true version may be.

18 March 1897 : Ferdinand Löwe performed the 1st movement of the 6th Symphony. The critic said that he had the ability to « give some idea of the instrumentation of this almost unknown work in his playing » .

1898 : Ferdinand Löwe becomes « Kapellmeister » of the Vienna Court Opera.

7 April 1900 : Ferdinand Löwe played the 4th movement of the 6th Symphony at the « Wagner-Verein » concert.

...

We now know that Bruckner did not always accept the changes made by Ferdinand Löwe and the Schalk brothers with reluctance, and that the ideal versions of several works of Bruckner's will, forever, remain mirages.

Other editions of the 3rd Symphony were published by editors such as Fritz Öser (under the International Bruckner Society and, later, the « Brucknerverlag »), Alfred Orel (Haas's assistant), and Bruckner's students : Ferdinand Löwe and the 2 Schalk brothers, Josef and Franz. Barring a few irregularities, however, these editions are generally considered superfluous to the scores printed by Haas and Nowak. Current debate among scholars regarding the « Bruckner Problem » almost exclusively utilizes original autographs of Bruckner's scores, or the published works of Haas and Nowak.

The premiere given by Franz Schalk of the 5th Symphony in Graz, on 9 April 1894, was a huge success, with « jubilant applause that would not end » after each movement. A gratifying confirmation for a composer who lay near death, in Vienna, and a great honour for a provincial city - but not quite the beginning of a triumphal procession through the world's concert halls. In the following year, Ferdinand Löwe (1863-1925) conducted the work in Budapest, where it « remained quite uncomprehended », quite possibly further evidence that Bruckner's musical world was hardly a universal one.

Only upon the overwhelming success of a performance in Vienna by the Kaim Orchestra of Munich (the predecessor of the Munich Philharmonic) under Ferdinand Löwe's direction, on 1 March 1898, did the 5th Symphony set firm foot in the musical world of German-speaking Europe.

The Adagio of the 7th Symphony was ready in sketch on January 22, 1883, and in score 3 months later, on April 21. The Scherzo was sketched by July 14, 1882, and finished on October 16 that year. The Finale, and with it the entire Symphony, was completed on September 5, 1883. Bruckner's pupils Josef Schalk and Franz Zottmann had already played the 1st and 3rd movements on 2 pianos, in Vienna, in February 1883. Schalk and another Bruckner pupil, Ferdinand Löwe, gave the whole Symphony in that form in Vienna, 1 year later. Bruckner undertook a few revisions after the formal premiere, which Arthur Nikisch conducted with the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra of Leipzig, on December 30, 1884. The dedication, which Bruckner decided upon after the 1st performance of the work in Munich, is « to H. M., King Ludwig II of Bavaria, in deepest reverence ».

In the 1885 version of the 7th Symphony (Albert J. Gutmann edition published in 1885), some changes were made after the 1884 premiere but before the 1st publication by Gutmann in 1885. It is widely accepted that Arthur Nikisch, Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe had significant influence over this edition, but there is some debate over the extent to which these changes were authorized by Bruckner. These changes mostly affect tempo and orchestration.

Letter from one of Bruckner's more controversial champions, Josef Schalk, to his brother Franz. The date is 10 January 1885 (i.e. , 11 days after the Symphony's Leipzig premiere) :

« Ferdinand Löwe and I have recently gone through the score of the 7th with Bruckner, discussing 1 or 2 alterations and improvements. You probably don't know that Arthur Nikisch has got him to agree to our cymbal clash in the Adagio (C major 6-4 chord) , along with the triangle and the timpani ; to our unbounded delight. »

« Our cymbal clash » ; surely, that clinches the matter ! Yet, the fact is that we shall almost certainly never know how many « alterations and improvements » Bruckner made at the promptings of enthusiasts like Nikisch, Löwe and the Schalk brothers. Contrary to popular belief, Bruckner was quite capable of putting-up resistance when he really didn't like an idea. And although he could be relatively puritan about instrumentation when it came to Symphonies (harps were included in the 8th only after a 1 month long struggle, according to his pupil Friedrich Eckstein) , if he had doubts about the suitability of cymbals and triangle, why did he include them again in the Adagio of Symphony No 8 ? From a musicological point-of-view, the issue is hard to resolve.

This touch was not in Bruckner's original score ; it was apparently a suggestion from Löwe and Schalk, not only accepted by Nikisch but, according to Löwe, « insisted upon » by the conductor, who as late as 2 weeks before the delayed premiere more or less demanded that several sections be re-orchestrated. Such a demand, too, is hardly an unusual occurrence in the process of bringing so big a work to the public, especially when so powerful a conductor as Nikisch is involved.

The 7th achieved this level of success on Bruckner's own terms from the outset. Bruckner never revised it, as he did his others, but produced a single version and stood by it. Together with the aforementioned Schalk and Löwe, he did make changes in tempo markings and orchestration in a few passages before the premiere, but these were for the most part minimal and did not affect the character or proportions of the work. After the premiere, at Arthur Nikisch's suggestion, there was some more polishing, but nothing beyond the norm in making adjustments to a big score between its 1st actual performance and its publication.

The Robert Haas edition, published in 1944, attempted to remove the influence of Nikisch, Schalk and Löwe in order to retrieve Bruckner's original conception of the Symphony. Haas used some material from the 1883 autograph but because this autograph also includes later changes much of his work was the product of conjecture. The most prominent feature of Haas's edition is the absence of cymbals, triangle and timpani in the slow movement : Haas asserted that Bruckner decided to omit the percussion, a claim scholar Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt deems « implausible » .

The Leopold Nowak edition, published in 1954, kept most of the changes in the 1885 Albert J. Gutmann edition, including the percussion. He reprinted the tempo modifications from Gutmann but placed them in brackets. Some performances of this edition omit the cymbal clash at the climax of the slow movement, although it is included in the printed score.

Later advocates debate the superiority of the composer's initial concepts versus his subsequent reflections which, after all, could represent genuine attempts at refinement and growth rather than corruption under pressure.

Paul Hawkshaw, from Yale University, provided an update on his research into the sources of the Symphony No 8. His major findings were :

That Bruckner signed-off and, subsequently, took full ownership of the 1887 and 1890 editions of his Symphony.

That a vast amount of material related to the Finale exists and that Franz and Josef Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe were extremely helpful in assisting Bruckner in moving this work to publication. Without their help, Bruckner would most likely have been unable to bring this vast project to conclusion.

The « Bruckner Archive » of John F. Berky recently acquired a letter by conductor Ferdinand Löwe, written in November of 1894, which makes reference to a Bruckner event. The letter was written to Natalie Horn, possibly the wife or daughter of « Herr » Horn, director the the « Wagner-Verein » in Vienna. In the letter, addressed to Ms. Horn's residence on « Elisabethstraße », Löwe apologises for cancelling a music lesson on account of a big Bruckner event coming-up. The event in question was either Löwe's premiere of his piano transcription of Bruckner's Symphony No. 6 or, more likely, a performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 7 at a « Wagner-verein » concert. That concert was subsequently cancelled due to Bruckner's severe illness.

Symphony No. 9 in D minor : While free from the composer's own misgivings and 2nd thoughts, its posthumous 1903 publication was « edited » by his disciple Ferdinand Löwe, who reduced the dissonances, added transitional modulations and tempered the brittle climaxes with smooth swells of sound. Fortunately, despite a lifetime of submission to others' tastes, Bruckner bequeathed his original manuscripts to the Austrian Imperial Library, thus ensuring their future availability.

Ferdinand Löwe effectively put into circulation the idea that the Bruckner's poor health, in his final years, meant that all the composer had left were incoherent sketches for the Finale of the 9th Symphony.

Bruckner's pupils, Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe, could not leave what they knew of the Master's music alone and, in 1903, produced an edition of the completed 3 movements that falsely recasts much of the music, producing a version that was sanitised for public consumption. The work's dissonances were toned down, especially that of the 3rd movement's climax that was muted into a more usual minor 7th chord.

During rehearsals for the 1st performance in Vienna, on 11 February 1903, the conductor Ferdinand Löwe balked at the 9th's radical nature, completely re-orchestrating the 1st 3 movements ; still unresearched, the material for the Finale was dismissed. Löwe, « out of piety for the Master's wishes », as he claimed, included in this performance the « Te Deum », but he had not considered the stylistic discrepancy between his altered arrangement and the « Te Deum » , which was left in its original form. The « Te Deum » was excluded from his 1st edition, although Bruckner probably intended it to be published with the Symphony. Löwe even published his own arrangement without comment as Bruckner's authentic score. The editor's conviction, cited in his Foreword, that the 3 completed movements constituted, in themselves, a performable, closed unit, ultimately became dogma, for the distorted 1st editions maintained their validity on the concert podium for decades ; in the process, such opinions hardened into concrete.

The Ferdinand Löwe edition (1906) was the 1st published edition of the 9th Symphony. It was also the version performed at the work's posthumous premiere, and the only version heard until 1932. Löwe made multiple unauthorized changes to the Symphony amounting to a wholesale recomposition of the work. In addition to 2nd guessing of Bruckner's orchestration, phrasing and dynamics, Ferdinand Löwe also dialed back Bruckner's more adventurous harmonies, such as the complete dominant 13th chord in the Adagio.

Ferdinand Löwe made changes to the harmonies, dynamics and phrasing in a bid to make the 9th Symphony of Bruckner more acceptable to the public. This sole edition will be known for the next 3 decades.

The inauthentic Ferdinand Löwe version is available by Hans Knappertsbusch and Frederick Charles Adler. These can be as short as 51 minutes.

Interestingly, although all other conductors came to discredit it, Hans Knappertsbusch clung to (and lets us hear) the Ferdinand Löwe edition, which complements his swift tempos with its vital and simplified rescoring.

Bruckner died in Vienna, on 11 October 1896. It was Ferdinand Löwe, one of Bruckner's admirers and pupils, who conducted the 1st performance of the 3 movements at a concert of the Vienna Concert Society (now, the Vienna Symphony Orchestra) , on 11 February 1903. The performance in the « Musikvereinsaal » was no less than a triumph for Bruckner and Löwe, but it was seriously flawed by the many changes Löwe had made in the original score. His obvious reasoning was the success he wanted to achieve with this 1st performance and, in this sense, the performance was almost pre-programmed, with Löwe less interested in Bruckner's originality and more in « marketing » the Symphony. By polishing and softening the edgy instrumentation and by remodelling the bold progression of harmonics in the score, he thought he could increase the chances to glorify, and the history books would mention it. Löwe succeeded, although at the expense of the purity of Bruckner's heritage.

However, we should not forget that Bruckner's music had no fundamental part in Vienna's musical scene, with the mainstream of musicians and the public being indifferent or even hostile to the composer's creative output. Prominent critics like Eduard Hanslick had their share in the long and ongoing battle, taking each and every effort to condemn and to marginalise the modest composer, driving him to breakdowns and stimulating this poor man without adequate self-assertion to revise his works. Under these circumstances, it was no less than the act of a hero to take the 9th to the concert-hall and to lead the musician through the hardship of long rehearsals to get the best out of them. This was certainly one of Löwe's great achievements and, despite our criticism, we should be grateful for his advocacy of Bruckner's music, stubbornly knocking and heading against a strongly biased environment.

Löwe's concert ended with the « Te Deum », which was performed after the interval as a solitary work. In the program booklet, Löwe underlined that the « Te Deum » would be played in the right place and order, in accordance with Bruckner's wish. He did neither mention the changes he had made in the 1st 3 movements nor did he show any substantial interest in what Bruckner had left of the Finale.

Many reviews of this performance (and the interval must have played a part in this) did not mention that the choral work was set in C major, instead of in D major, the tonal scheme that should have concluded the D minor Symphony in all its splendour. Bruckner, although one of the great advocates of formal tonality schemes, had indeed suggested that the « Te Deum » would qualify to serve as the final movement for the Symphony, failing a better solution. His decision got some support from Max Kalbeck, one of the leading Viennese critics, who persisted that, after the closing bars of the Adagio in E major, the following C major did not sound better or worse compared to the usual D minor, and that there was no reason whatsoever to confine to the formal tonal scheme, with ample spiritual and esthetical arguments to left abandoning tonal unity (of the Classical scheme) in this particular case. This was written clearly against the intentions of Ferdinand Löwe and Robert Hirschfeld, who both suggested the Symphony should better be performed without the « Te Deum » at all, and that Löwe followed Bruckner's own suggestion only with « piety for the Master's decision » .

Hence the discussion focused on the idea that Bruckner's illness and death deprived him of the opportunity to finish the work, that the Adagio was Bruckner's real farewell to the world, the heartfelt conclusion of his work on earth and, at the same time, the quite moving announcement of the transition from suffering to transfiguration. Just from this perspective, the soft drum roll that starts the quirky Finale is hopelessly out of tune. The myth was created 100 years ago and is still alive today, heartily joined by most great Bruckner conductors and their compliant audiences.

In that long history of performing the 9th, the 3 movement version is always predominant. Löwe's voice still sounds : although the Symphony remained unfinished, it does not need to be finished. Or : the 3 movements say all that needs to be said, period. The myth is a very long preserved one, even after Alfred Orel had published a flow of so far unknown manuscript papers in his rather chaotic edition prepared for the « Bruckner Kritische Gesamtausgabe » .

Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe got the opportunity to verify the manuscripts and other papers that Bruckner had left after his death, and they decided that the less important relics (including books) were transferred to Bruckner's sister, Rosalie Hueber in « Vöcklabruck » (they were later acquired by Max Auer) . In 1902, a small case also containing part of Bruckner's correspondence was delivered to Bruckner's 1st biographer, August Göllerich, in Linz. He would return it after use to the Saint-Florian monastery.

In « Bruckner. Versuch eines Lebens » (Berlin, 1919) by Ernst Décsey, also one of Bruckner's former pupils, a total number of 75 bi-folios of the Finale is mentioned for the 1st time. In 1927, Amalie Löwe, the widow of Ferdinand (he had died on 6 January 1925) , and Rosalie Hueber (Bruckner's sister) sold a number of manuscript pages of the 9th to the Vienna City and State Library. It was in the same year that the « Anton Bruckner Gesellschaft » was established. In 1933, followed another sale by Amalie Löwe, this time to the Prussian State Library, in Berlin, and, in 1939, by Lili Schalk, the widow of Franz, to the Austrian National Library.

1900 : Ferdinand Löwe is named 1st Conductor of the « Wiener Konzertvereinsorchester » (« Wiener Symphoniker ») .

There are numerous references to Ferdinand Löwe in Friedrich Schenker's diaries, between July 1906 and January 1908, making clear that the 2 men knew each other well and met frequently.

August 19, 1906 : « In the afternoon, at Löwe's place, game of cards ; in the evening, leisurely discussion with Löwe about re-orchestrations (" Retouchen ") . » (O.J. 1/5, page 18)

August 24, 1906 : « Evening with Löwe until midnight : said goodbye. » (O.J. 1/5, page 18)

They met also in public.

May 8, 1907 : « With Löwe and Schalk, in the coffee-house. »

August 25, 1907 : « In the train carriage, I encounter Director Löwe on his return from Breslau ; conversation about Richard Strauß. » (O.J. 1/6, pages 40, 47.)

But, in 1909, Schenker speaks of him as known to him personally, « but sadly not artistically close to me » ; and comments disparagingly, « one calls a derivative person like him emphatically : a Bruckner " authority " ! » (Musicologist Hellmut Federhofer, page 207.)

1905-1919 : Ferdinand Löwe conducts the Workers' Concerts (« Arbeiterkonzerte ») . Teacher at the Vienna Conservatory (which, in 1919, became the Vienna Music Academy and, later, the « Musikhochschule ») .

The Munich Philharmonic was founded in 1893 through the private initiative of Franz Kaim, the son of a piano manufacturer. Since then, the Orchestra has left an indelible imprint on Munich's cultural life under the leadership of renowned conductors. In the Orchestra's earliest years (initially under the name « Kaim Orchester ») , conductors like Hans Winderstein, Hermann Zumpe and the Bruckner pupil, Ferdinand Löwe, guaranteed both a high-technical standard of performance and enthusiastic support of contemporary artistry.

From 1908 to 1914, : Ferdinand Löwe again took-over the Munich Philharmonic. In the wake of a triumphant guest appearance in Vienna, on March 1, 1898, featuring Anton Bruckner's 5th Symphony, he conducted the 1st large-scale Bruckner concerts and, thereby, founded the Orchestra's Bruckner tradition, which has continued unbroken to the present-day.

After the end of World War I, the Vienna State Academy was, again, re-organized. President Karl Ritter von Wiener resigned and conductor Ferdinand Löwe was elected director by the teachers. In 1922, Joseph Marx took-over. He wanted the Academy to be granted University status.

1918-1922 : Ferdinand Löwe heads the Vienna Conservatory ; particularly committed to the performance of Anton Bruckner's Symphonies.

6 January 1925 : Death of Ferdinand Löwe, in Vienna.

1933 : Amalie Löwe (widow of Ferdinand Löwe) sells the manuscripts of the Finale of Bruckner's 9th Symphony to the Prussian State Library, in Berlin.

1936 : A « Ferdinand Löwe Street » (« Ferdinand-Löwe-Straße ») is named after him in Vienna's 10th District.

The Nazi preoccupation with race affected the editing of Bruckner's music in 2 ways. On one level, by representing (literally re-presenting) the untainted « German » texts, the « Gesamtausgabe » manifested a desire to free Bruckner's works from the specter of an imagined history of Jewish influence. In his post-War critique of the « Gesamtausgabe », Emil Armbruster pointed-out that anti-Semitism was a formative premise of the edition :

« The defamation of Löwe and Schalk as “ Jews and allies of Jews ” (“ Juden and Judengenossen ”) had a determining influence on the position of the government of the “ Reich ” : Bruckner in Jewish hands, sultry eroticism dragged into nordic, “ Übermensch heroism ” (“ nordisch-übermenschlichen Heroismus ”) - this musical miscegenation must be put to an end, once and for all ! »

The involvement of Löwe and the Schalk brothers was, at times, discussed and dismissed - in racial terms. Max Auer, for instance, cast aspersions on the 1st prints as reflecting the unacceptable influence of « overly refined city-dwellers » (« überkultivierte Städter ») , a coded term for Jews. Between the lines of Auer's argument lay the claim that such individuals were incapable of understanding the essence of Bruckner, who was « deeply rooted in the healthy earth of his Upper-Austrian home » .

Although Ferdinand Löwe was of Jewish descent, he was not always identified as such. He is listed as a « Halbjude » in : « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » , edited by Theophil Stengel and Herbert Gerigk, Hahnefeld, Berlin (1941) , page 164.

In some Nazi-era books on Bruckner, in which the names of Jews were marked with asterisks, Löwe's name was not so marked. See, for example : Fritz Öser. « Die Klangstruktur tier Bruckner-Symphonie. Eine Studie zur Frage der Originalfassungen » , « Musikwissenschaftliche Verlag » , Leipzig (1939) , page 33 ; and Peter Raabe. « Wege zu Bruckner » , Gustav Bosse Verlag, Regensburg (1944) , page 239. (I am indebted to Brian Robison of Cornell University for his help with the information in the « Lexikon » .)

Since the 1960's, the conventional solution has been to accept as authentic only « original versions » of Bruckner Symphonies, preserved in un-published manuscripts. In contrast, the versions published during Bruckner's lifetime are seen as provisional editions prepared by well-meaning but misguided friends and students (notably, the conductors Ferdinand Löwe and Franz Schalk) that distort Bruckner's true intentions. Over time, those editions have been eclipsed by « urtext » versions that take no account of the scores published in Bruckner's time.

Orchestre symphonique de Vienne

C'est l'Orchestre le plus productif de la ville et le spécialiste incontesté de Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler et Richard Strauß. Il se produit au « Musikverein », au « Konzerthaus » et au « Theater an der Wien » .

Le « Wiener Symphoniker » veille de toute évidence au bien-être symphonique de la ville. Il assume la plupart des concerts et des représentations d'Opéras durant l'année. Avec 128 membres, il compte parmi les meilleurs Orchestres d'Europe et est principalement spécialisé dans la littérature concertante hautement Romantique.

Le « Wiener Symphoniker » a été fondé en 1900 sous le nom de « Wiener Concertverein » et a joué la « 9e Symphonie » d'Anton Bruckner, les « Gurre-Lieder » d'Arnold Schœnberg, ou bien le « Concerto pour la main gauche » de Maurice Ravel lors de sa création.

L'image sonore typiquement viennoise de l'Orchestre a été profondément marquée par la direction de chefs d'orchestre de renom tels que Herbert von Karajan et Wolfgang Sawallisch. L'Orchestre a déjà vécu de grands succès sous la direction de chefs d'orchestre exceptionnels tels que Leonard Bernstein, Lorin Maazel, Zubin Mehta, Claudio Abbado ou Carlos Kleiber.

Le « Musikverein » et le « Konzerthaus » sont les lieux de représentation principaux du « Wiener Symphoniker » . Il y a quelques années de cela, le « Theater an der Wien » , où l'Orchestre se produit également en tant qu'Orchestre d'Opéra est venu s'y ajouter. Et, depuis 1946 déjà, l'Orchestre viennois est l' « Orchestra in Residence » du Festival de Bregenz.

L'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne (« Wiener Symphoniker ») est le 2e Orchestre principal de Vienne, à côté du célèbre Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne.

L'Orchestre est fondé en 1900 par Ferdinand Löwe en tant que Société des concerts de Vienne (« Wiener Concertverein ») . En 1913, le « Konzerthaus » accueille l'Orchestre à Vienne. En 1933, le nom actuel de l'orchestre est définitivement choisi.

Bien que la fréquentation de l'Orchestre se soit raréfiée avec la radiodiffusion des concerts dès les années 1920, l'Orchestre survit jusqu'à l' « Anschluß » . L'Orchestre est alors utilisé pour la propagande du régime nazi et est dissous le 1er septembre 1944.

Le 1er concert d'après-guerre a lieu le 16 septembre 1945, avec la représentation de la 3e Symphonie de Gustav Mahler dirigée par Josef Krips. Après 10 années d'isolement, l'Orchestre entreprend des tournées à l'étranger, comme à Bregenz pendant l'été de 1946.

Le chef Herbert von Karajan dirige, à son tour, l'Orchestre à travers toute l'Europe et en Amérique du nord. En 1959 au Vatican, le pape Jean XXIII accueille l'Orchestre dirigé par le jeune Wolfgang Sawallisch. L'Orchestre accompagné de Sawallisch va également parcourir les plus grandes salles de concerts dans le monde entier.

Compositeur et chef d'harmonies militaires né à Vienne. Son père finance ses études au Conservatoire de la capitale autrichienne. Il suit les cours dans cette institution du grand théoricien de la musique, compositeur et organiste Simon Sechter qui fut également le professeur d'Anton Bruckner. L'éditeur viennois Carl Haslinger l'engage pour diriger les concerts à la salle de Diane après un échec financier avec Johann Strauß, fils (1863) . En 1870, Ziehrer accepte, durant

3 années, le poste de chef de l'harmonie du 55e régiment d'infanterie, forme ensuite un Orchestre pour l'Exposition universelle de Vienne de 1873 puis fonde un journal musical (1874) et dirige une nouvelle harmonie militaire (1875-1877) . À la suite d'un conflit avec Edouard Strauß pour le nom de son Orchestre, il part diriger en Allemagne et en Europe de l'Est. En 1893, il représente l'Autriche à l'Exposition universelle de Chicago et poursuit par une grande tournée américaine.

Carl Michaël Ziehrer participe à la création du « Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchester » , formation qui donnera naissance à l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne. L'Empereur François-Joseph lui confie la direction des bals de la Cour impériale dont le dernier a lieu sous sa direction en 1914. C'est le seul directeur de cette prestigieuse institution qui n'appartient pas à la famille Strauß.

Si ses Opérettes, par leur aspect « régional » ont connu un retentissement relativement limité à l'international, ses œuvres instrumentales et ses lieder sont, par contre, parmi les plus réputés de ces genres musicaux.

Carl Michaël Ziehrer dont la carrière ressemble à celle de Johann Strauß père, excepté ses années où il déploya des activités de chef d'harmonies militaires, fut le grand rival des fils de ce dernier. Prolifique, il a composé 23 Opérettes, environs 210 polkas, 84 marches, plus de 130 valse, de nombreux pots-pourris et autres danses.

Fondé en 1900 comme Orchestre du « Konzertverein » , l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne fusionne en 1914 avec un autre Orchestre Symphonique viennois, le « Verein Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchester » . Il prend son nom actuel, « Wiener Symphoniker » , en 1919, mais les 2 Sociétés absorbées gardent leur indépendance dans l'organisation des séries de concerts.

Ferdinand Löwe en jette les bases entre 1900 et 1925. Parallèlement, le « Tonkünstler-Orchester » est dirigé par Wilhelm Furtwängler (1919-1920) , puis Clemens Krauß (1923-1924) . Les chefs se succèdent alors sans qu'aucun ne marque véritablement l'Orchestre de son empreinte : Rudolf Nilius et Leopold Reichwein (1927-1928) , Oswald Kabasta, Hans Weisbach, Hans Swarowsky, Herbert von Karajan (1948-1949) . Au cours des années 1950, il n'y a aucun chef permanent. Wolfgang Sawallisch est le 1er chef de l'après-guerre qui parvient à créer une continuité (1960-1970) . Josef Krips perpétue la grande tradition viennoise (1970-1973) avant que l'Orchestre ne décide d'opter pour une vocation internationale, en faisant appel à des chefs très différents qui enrichissent considérablement son répertoire et son style d'interprétation. Sous la direction de Carlo Maria Giulini (1973-1976) , Guennadi Rojdestvenski (1981-1983) , Georges Prêtre (1986-1991) , Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos (1991-1996) , celui qui a toujours été considéré comme le « petit frère » de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne n'a plus à rougir de la comparaison.

On doit à cet ensemble la création d'œuvres d'Anton Bruckner (9e Symphonie, en 1903) ; Arnold Schönberg (« Pelléas et Mélisande » , en 1905, sous la direction du compositeur ; les « Gurrelieder » , en 1913) ; Maurice Ravel (Concerto pour la main gauche, en 1931) ; Karl Amadeus Hartmann (1re Symphonie, en 1957) ; Berthold Goldschmidt (« Ciaccona sinfonica » , en 1960) ; Boris Blacher (« Poème » , en 1976) ; Jean Françaix (Concerto pour 15 solistes et orchestre, en 1990) ; Georg Friedrich Haas (« Torso » , en 2000) .

In 1900, Ferdinand Löwe founded the Orchestra as the « Wiener Concertverein » (Vienna Concert Society) . In 1913, it moved into the « Konzerthaus » , in Vienna. In 1919, it merged with the « Tonkünstler » Orchestra. In 1933, it acquired its current name : « Wiener Symphoniker » . Despite a lull in concert attendance after the introduction of the radio during the 1920's, the Orchestra survived until the invasion of Austria, in 1938, and became incorporated into the German Culture Orchestras. As such, they were used for purposes of propaganda until, depleted by assignments to work in munitions factories, the Orchestra closed down on September 1, 1944.

Their 1st post-War concert occurred on September 16, 1945, performing Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 3. Under the direction of Josef Krips, they quickly rebuilt a modern repertoire after 10 years of isolation and travelled to the Bregenz Festival, for the 1st time, in the summer of 1946.

1946 marked the beginning of the tenure of Herbert von Karajan who, though not principal conductor, worked with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra in the « Karajan Series » concerts, going on extensive tours throughout Europe and North America. In 1959, the Vienna Symphony Orchestra performed for Pope John XXIII at Vatican City, leading-up to the debut of Wolfgang Sawallisch.

Sawallisch's leadership saw a tour of the United States in 1964, as well as a combined U.S.-Japan tour in 1967. It also included the re-opening of the « Theater an der Wien » , in 1962. Krips returned as artistic advisor in the interim between Sawallisch's departure and the arrival of Carlo Maria Giulini, as principal conductor. In the 1986, Georges Prêtre became principal guest conductor, and served until the arrival of Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos as principal conductor in 1991. Currently, Prêtre and Sawallisch each hold the title of « Ehrendirigent » (honorary conductor) with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra.

As Vienna's cultural ambassador and 1st Concert Orchestra, the « Wiener Symphoniker » handles the lion's share of Symphonic activity that makes-up the musical life of the city. The preservation of the traditional, Viennese orchestral sound occupies a central role in the Orchestra's many artistic pursuits. The « Wiener Symphoniker » is one of Europe's most prestigious ensembles and boasts 128 members. For this reason, the Orchestra is precisely the right vehicle for the great Romantic works of Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler and Richard Strauß that constitute its core repertoire.

The Vienna « Musikverein » and nearby « Konzerthaus » are the principal performing venues of the « Wiener Symphoniker » . The Orchestra has also been in residence at the « Bregenzer Festspiele » since 1946 and continues to maintain close ties to the Festival. Beginning in 2006, the Orchestra added another feather to its cap : the « Wiener Symphoniker » now serves as resident Opera Orchestra for a whole host of stylistically diverse productions taking place at the « Theater an der Wien » . Periodic international tours to the most important music centers round-out the extensive portfolio of this traditional, Viennese Orchestra.

Originally called the « Wiener Concertverein » , the « Wiener Symphoniker » was founded in 1900. The initial objectives were to produce affordable orchestral concerts for general audiences, on the one hand, and to meet the need for premieres and 1st performances of contemporary works, on the other. After some delays, the new Orchestra made its official debut in the Great Hall of Vienna « Musikverein » , on 30 October 1900, under the baton of Ferdinand Löwe. From the earliest decades of its artistic life, the « Wiener Symphoniker » premiered a series of works that are now among the undisputed staples of the orchestral repertoire, including Anton Bruckner's Symphony No. 9, Arnold Schönberg's « Gurrelieder » , Maurice Ravel's Concerto for the Left-Hand, and Franz Schmidt's « Book of the 7 Seals » .

In the early 1930's, the Orchestra was given the name by which it is still known today, the « Wiener Symphoniker » . The Orchestra 1st achieved international recognition during major tours of England and Italy under the leadership of Chief Conductor Oswald Kabasta. Frequent name changes are not the only means by which to gauge the eventful history of this ensemble. During the First World War, the Orchestra barely managed to avoid disbanding by merging with another Orchestra that was founded in 1913, the « Wiener Tonkünstlerorchester » . The Orchestra actually had to shut-down in 1944, if only for 8 months.

At the close of the Second World War, the Orchestra was re-established under extremely difficult conditions. The 16 September 1945, a Gala Concert for the Revitalisation of the Orchestra provided the framework for a resounding performance of Gustav Mahler's 3rd Symphony. Chief Conductors Hans Swarowsky and Josef Krips were largely responsible for the post-1945 restructuring.

Subsequent Chief Conductors Herbert von Karajan (1950-1960) and Wolfgang Sawallisch (1960-1970) decisively shaped the sound of the Orchestra. Following the brief return of Josef Krips, the position of Music Director was held by Carlo Maria Giulini and Gennady Rozhdestvensky. Georges Prêtre was Chief Conductor from 1986 to 1991. Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos, then, assumed leadership of the Orchestra.

Leading lights such as Leonard Bernstein, Lorin Maazel, Zubin Mehta, Claudio Abbado, Carlos Kleiber and Sergiu Celibidache have also enjoyed great success as guest conductors on the podium of the « Wiener Symphoniker » . A large number of high-quality CD recordings document the Orchestra's artistic legacy.

The « Wiener Symphoniker » has been the Orchestra in residence at the « Bregenzer Festspiele » since 1946. The Orchestra is not only responsible for Opera productions by the lake-side and in the « Festspielhaus » , but is also regularly represented in several orchestral concerts on the Festival program. Since 2006, the « Wiener Symphoniker » has also played for a number of Opera productions at the « Theater an der Wien » , all of which serves to underscore the Orchestra's prominent position in the musical life of Vienna.

Founded under the name of « Philharmonisches Orchester » by Karl Stix, in 1899, renamed « Concertvereinsorchester » in 1900, later merged with the Orchestra (founded in 1907) of the « Wiener Tonkünstler » association ; from 1921, called « Wiener Sinfonie-Orchester » , present name since 1933. It was the 1st Austrian Orchestra that was independent from service as a Theatre Orchestra, on October 30, 1900. The 1st conductor and organiser was Ferdinand Löwe, who conducted the inauguration concert. The 1st Workers' Symphony Concerts were held in 1905. The Vienna Symphonic Orchestra mainly plays the works of Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, Richard Strauß and contemporary artists. It is represented by the Vienna Symphonic Orchestra Association and financed, for the most part, by the City of Vienna.

Die Wiener Symphoniker sind ein Sinfonieorchester mit etwa 160 Auftritten jährlich, davon etwa 110 in Wien. Sie sind weltweit als Tournee-Orchester aktiv, bestreiten einen wesentlichen Teil der Opernproduktionen im Theater an der Wien und sind Orchestra in Residence der Bregenzer Festspiele.

Das Orchester wurde 1900 als Wiener Concertverein gegründet mit dem Ziel, die breite Öffentlichkeit durch den Besuch erschwinglicher Konzertveranstaltungen am kulturellen Leben teilnehmen zu lassen. So fanden zu Beginn des 20. Jahrhunderts sogenannte Popularkonzerte statt, in denen häufig auch Salonstücke für Orchester oder Potpourris gespielt wurden. Das erste Konzert fand am 30. Oktober 1900 unter Ferdinand Löwe statt. Das Orchester brachte eine Reihe von bedeutenden Werken zur Uraufführung oder österreichischen Erstaufführung, so Anton Bruckners 9. Sinfonie (Uraufführung) , Gustav Mahlers 6. Sinfonie (Eigenmächtig Abwesend) sowie Franz Schmidts Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln (Uraufführung) . Von großer kulturpolitischer Bedeutung waren auch die Arbeiter-Symphoniekonzerte, die seit 1907 von der Sozialistischen Bildungszentrale unter David Josef Bach organisiert und in den 1920er Jahren häufig von Anton Webern geleitet wurden.

1933 übernahm die bereits ständestaatlich kontrollierte RAVAG 50 % der Orchesterdienste und erzwang die Auflösung der Orchester-Dienstverträge. Jüdische Musiker wurden entlassen und das Orchester nunmehr unter dem Namen Wiener Symphoniker mit neuem Organisationsstatut und verschlechterten Anstellungsbestimmungen weitergeführt. Oswald Kabasta wurde neuer Orchesterchef, die Wiener Symphoniker fanden bei großen England- und Italien-Tourneen 1935 und 1937 erstmals auch internationale Beachtung. Nach der nationalsozialistischen Machtübernahme wurde das Orchester erstmals in seiner Geschichte kommunalisiert und entsprechend der Tarifordnung für deutsche Kulturorchester in die erste Kategorie eingereiht, was für die Musiker Gagenerhöhungen bis 30 % bedeutete. Es ist daher nicht verwunderlich, daß es unter ihnen (wie auch bei den Wiener Philharmonikern) einen überproportional großen Anteil an Parteimitgliedern und -anwärtern gab. Bis 1944 spielte das Orchester und andere in KdF-Konzerten, im Reichsrundfunk und in den großen Wiener Konzertserien, ehe es (bereits personell durch Einberufungen erheblich reduziert) im August dieses Jahres stillgelegt wurde.

Nach Kriegsende erstand das Wiener Konzertleben unter unvorstellbar schwierigen Bedingungen neu, das « Festkonzert zur Neubildung des Orchesters » fand am 16. September 1945 statt und brachte Mahlers 3. Sinfonie - Musik eines seit 1933 nicht mehr gespielten Komponisten. Da beinahe alle bedeutenden Dirigenten unter die Entnazifizierungsbestimmungen fielen, übernahm Hans Swarowsky kurzfristig den Posten eines Chefdirigenten, auch Josef Krips war am Wiederaufbau des Konzertlebens maßgeblich beteiligt. Ab 1948 war Herbert von Karajan als Konzertdirektor der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde quasi Chefdirigent des Orchesters und errang mit ihm bei Deutschland-Tourneen 1950 und 1953 große internationale Erfolge. Organisatorisch gesehen fungierten jedoch die Wiener Symphoniker, nunmehr subventioniert von der Gemeinde Wien, weiterhin als Mietorchester ohne eigenes Haus und Programmautonomie. Darunter hatte auch der erste « echte » Chefdirigent nach Kriegsende, Wolfgang Sawallisch, zu leiden, unter dessen Leitung das Orchester in den 1960er Jahren erstmals große Überseereisen nach Amerika und Japan unternahm. Auch Carlo Maria Giulini scheiterte an der unentwirrbaren Organisationsstruktur und resignierte nach drei Jahren Chefdirigentenzeit (1973-1976) .

Erst in den 1980er Jahren errang das Orchester gegenüber den Konzertveranstaltern eine gewisse Autonomie und konnte in deren Sälen eigene Konzerte veranstalten. Zudem verbesserte sich deren Kooperation untereinander und mit der Orchesterleitung erheblich und führte zu einer weit professionelleren Programm- und Terminplanung. Nach einem verunglückten Intermezzo mit Gennadi Roschdestwenski, der jede Probenarbeit verweigerte, führte die Zusammenarbeit mit Georges Prêtre als I. Gastdirigenten sowie mit Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos und Wladimir Fedossejew zu erfreulichen Resultaten.

Der Aufgabenbereich des Orchesters ist vielfältig : er umfasst zwei Zyklen bei der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde im Wiener Musikverein, einen Zyklus im Wiener Konzerthaus, einen Matinee- und einen Kammermusikzyklus als Eigenveranstaltung und etliche Sonderkonzerte. Zusätzlich spielen die Wiener Symphoniker seit 2006 jährlich einige Opernproduktionen im Theater an der Wien, das nach einer langen Phase als Musicalbühne wieder ausschließlich für Opernproduktionen verwendet wird. Daneben finden Tourneen im europäischen Raum und in Übersee statt, seit 1946 treten die Wiener Symphoniker jeden Sommer bei den Bregenzer Festspielen auf, mit deren Entwicklung sie eng verbunden sind. Neuerdings findet die Orchestertätigkeit auch eine wichtige Ergänzung in Richtung Jugendarbeit, Benefiz- und Open-Air-Konzerten.

1951 gehörten die Symphoniker zu den Preisträgern des Karl-Renner-Preises.

Das stetig steigende Bedürfnis an qualitätvollen Aufführungen symphonischer Musik führte Ende des 19. Jahrhunderts zu ambitionierten Versuchen, neben dem Hofopernorchester (Wiener Philharmoniker) ein weiteres ständiges Berufsorchester in Wien ins Leben zu rufen. Schon anlässlich der Internationalen Ausstellung für Musik- und Theaterwesen in Wien 1892 war es zur Gründung eines Orchesters unter der Leitung Hermann Grädeners gekommen. Bemühungen, dieses Orchester als Wiener Stadtorchester zu erhalten, scheiterten aus finanziellen Gründen. Gleich erging es in Folge zahlreichen ähnlich gearteten Projekten, bis schließlich 1899 eine Initiative des Wiener Musikerbundes (eine Vorform gewerkschaftlicher Interessenvertretung) gemeinsam mit dem populären Kapellmeister Karl Stix zum Erfolg führte. Die Programmpolitik des Neuen philharmonischen Orchesters, wie sich das Ensemble zunächst nannte, fand sogleich regen Zuspruch seitens der Kritik und des Publikums : klassische Symphonien, Ouvertüren, Querschnitte aus Oper und Operette sowie gehobene Unterhaltungsmusik in qualitativollen Aufführungen zu gemäßigten Preisen anzubieten. Trotz dieser Erfolg versprechenden Entwicklung stand auch das Neue philharmonische Orchester bereits nach wenigen Monaten vor dem finanziellen Aus. Mit Hilfe finanzkräftiger Mäzene aus dem Wiener Großbürgertum (Jakob Thonet, Gustav Bloch, Theodor Köchert, Carlo A. Artaria, Theodor Hämmerle, Paul Hammerschlag und andere) und Persönlichkeiten aus Kunst und Kultur (Robert Hirschfeld, Hugo Botstiber) gelang jedoch im Frühjahr 1900 die Neugründung eines bald etwa 1.000 Mitglieder fassenden Wiener Concert-Vereins. Die damit erreichte finanzielle Absicherung erlaubte nun das Engagement eines rund 50 Musiker umfassenden Sinfonieorchesters, dessen Leitung der populäre Konzertdirektor der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde Ferdinand Löwe übernahm. Vor allem die vom Dirigenten verfolgte volksbildnerisch-egalitäre Programmpolitik (zum Beispiel Symphoniezyklen von Ludwig van Beethoven oder Anton Bruckner, ermäßigte Veranstaltungen für Schüler, ab 1905 Arbeiter-Symphoniekonzerte) und auch die Tendenz zur Popularisierung gehobener Unterhaltungsmusik (so genannt « Populäre Orchesterkonzerte » im Volksgarten und Musikverein zumeist unter Leitung von Martin Spörr) , andererseits die Abhaltung von « Novitätenkonzerten » (und andere Uraufführung der IX. Symphonie Bruckners 1903 ; weiters Werke von Richard Strauß, Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg, Franz Schmidt, etc.) garantierten den durchschlagenden Erfolg beim breit gefächerten Publikum.

Die Zäsur des Ersten Weltkriegs bedeutete schließlich auch das organisatorische Ende des als Veranstalter und Orchester gemeinsam firmierenden Concert-Vereins. Eine Kooperation mit dem 1907 gegründeten Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchester (unter der Leitung von Otto Nedbal) sicherte vorerst das Weiterbestehen, ehe man mit der Gründung des privaten Vereins Wiener Sinfonieorchester 1922 den Wechsel vom Veranstalter zum reinen Dienstnehmerstatus vornahm. Geschaffen zum Zweck, die Existenz des Orchesters zu garantieren, fungierte der Verein als Mittler zwischen Orchester und Konzertveranstalter. Als solcher sollte neben den etablierten Institutionen wie die Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, Wiener Konzerthausgesellschaft und kleineren Veranstaltern besonders der seit 1924 bestehende Rundfunk (RAVAG) neue Arbeitsbereiche eröffnen.

Die wirtschaftlichen Krisen und politische Destabilisierung erzwangen 1933 eine erneute Umstrukturierung, im Zuge dessen der Verein Wiener Sinfonieorchester aufgelöst und als Verein Wiener Symphoniker neu gegründet wurde. Die damit einhergehende enge Bindung an den Rundfunk (die RAVAG beanspruchte circa 50 % des Orchester-Dienstvolumens und übernahm im Gegenzug die Hälfte der Erhaltungskosten, zusätzlich wurde eine neu gebildete Funkkapelle ausschließlich für leichte Unterhaltungsmusik installiert) versprach wirtschaftliche Konsolidierung, bedeutete gleichzeitig aber auch eine massive parteipolitische Einflußnahme im Sinne des Ständestaates (bei gleichzeitigem Zurückdrängen sozialdemokratischer Kulturpolitik ; Faschismus) - und bald auch des aufkommenden Nationalsozialismus. Eine Schlüsselrolle spielte dabei der nach Ferdinand Löwe zweite prägende Chefdirigent des Orchesters Oswald Kabasta.

Zugleich Musikchef der RAVAG und Konzertdirektor des Musikvereins formte er einerseits die Wiener Symphoniker zu einem homogenen, auch international erfolgreichen Orchester (Touren nach Italien 1935, England 1936) . Andererseits nützte er durch gezielte Personalpolitik die Durchsetzung nationalsozialistischer Ideen. - Die Zeit der NS-Herrschaft bedeutete für das Orchester neuerlich einschneidende Veränderungen : als Stadtorchester Wiener Symphoniker erstmals kommunalisiert und vom NS-Regime großzügig gefördert, dominierte das Ensemble das Wiener Konzertleben (besonders die so genannt « Dunkelkonzerte » unter Generalmusikdirektor Hans Weisbach erfreuten sich großer Popularität) . All dies fand jedoch mit der Stilllegung 1944 ein jähes Ende.

Die Aufbauarbeit nach 1945 bedeutete für das nun wieder als privater Verein auftretende Orchester den täglichen Kampf um finanzielle Absicherung und künstlerische Neuorientierung. Erstere erfolgte überwiegend durch die Gemeinde Wien, vorübergehend und zu geringen Teilen auch durch den Bund, gleichermaßen strebte man auf dem Wege von Eigeninitiativen, wie etwa die Produktion eigener Tonträger (Firma Symphonia, CD-Einspielungen) , die Existenz abzusichern. Auf künstlerischem Sektor formten nach Hans Swarowsky und Josef Krips vor allem Herbert von Karajan (1948-1960) und Wolfgang Sawallisch (1960-1970) das Klangbild des Orchesters. Ihnen folgten in den 1970-1980er Jahren Carlo Maria Giulini, Gennadij Roshdestvenskij und Georges Prêtre. Nach Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos und Vladimir Fedosejev steht nun (2006) Fabio Luisi als Chefdirigent dem Orchester vor.

Das international bekannte Konzertorchester (das erste vom Theaterbetrieb unabhängige Berufsorchester Österreichs) führt seine Entstehung auf das 1899 von Karl Stix gegründete « Neue Philharmonische Orchester » zurück, das erstmals im Ronacher an die Öffentlichkeit trat. Der Abonnementzyklus des neuen Orchesters hatte großen Erfolg beim Publikum, dennoch musste der 1900 neu gegründete « Wiener Concertverein » das hohe Defizit des Neuen Philharmonischen Orchesters übernehmen.

Ab Herbst 1900 wurde das Ensemble als « Orchester des Wiener Concertvereins » (« Concertvereinsorchester ») weitergeführt. Ferdinand Löwe leitete am 30. Oktober 1900 jenes Konzert, das man gewissermaßen als « Geburtsstunde » des heutigen Orchesters der Wiener Symphoniker ansehen kann. Seit dieser Zeit stellte dieses Ensemble das permanente Konzertorchester der Stadt dar. Mit Franz Schalk und Gustav Mahler kümmerte sich Löwe um den Aufbau eines intensiven Wiener Konzertlebens. 1905 wurden die ersten Arbeiter-Symphoniekonzerte veranstaltet, bei denen insbesondere Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg und Richard Strauß eine besondere Pflege erfuhren. Unter dem Eindruck des Ersten Weltkriegs und der personellen Schwierigkeiten entschlossen sich der Wiener Concertverein und der 1907 gegründete « Verein Wiener Tonkünstler » im Herbst 1914, ihre beiden Symphonieorchester zu fusionieren. Beide Vereine bestanden jedoch weiter.

Erster Dirigent und Organisator dieses ersten von Theaterdiensten unabhängigen Orchesters in Österreich war Löwe. 1927 folgte Leopold Reichwein als Chef, ab 1933 Oswald Kabasta. Schon damals arbeiteten bedeutende Gastdirigenten mit diesem Klangkörper.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg errang das Orchester vor allem unter Herbert von Karajan einen Spitzenrang. 1960 folgte Wolfgang Sawallisch als Chefdirigent, 1970-1973 Josef Krips und 1973-1975 Carlo Maria Giulini ; ab 1981 nahm Gennadi Roschdestwenskij diesen Posten ein.

In neuerer Zeit ist, neben vielen Auslandstourneen und Rundfunkaufnahmen, eine weitere Tätigkeit für das Orchester hinzugekommen : Seit der Gründung der Bregenzer Festspiele haben die Wiener Symphoniker die Funktion eines Festspielorchesters übernommen - sie spielen im Sommer daher Operette und Oper und haben sich auch schon des öfteren im Rahmen der Wiener Festwochen als Opernorchester vorgestellt.

Ähnlich den Wiener Philharmonikern sind auch viele Musiker der Wiener Symphoniker als Mitglieder diverser Ensembles tätig, üben Lehrtätigkeiten an Hochschule und Konservatorium aus. Der ehemalige Symphoniker Nikolaus Harnoncourt begründete beispielsweise das Ensemble Concentus Musicus, ein Ensemble für Alte Musik. Die besondere Pflege der Wiener Symphoniker gilt nach wie vor Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler und Richard Strauß, aber auch zeitgenössischen Komponisten.

Träger des Orchesters ist der Verein « Wiener Symphoniker » , finanziell werden die Wiener Symphoniker überwiegend von der Stadt Wien unterstützt.

Die Wiener Symphoniker sind Wiens Konzertorchester und Kulturbotschafter und bestreiten den weitaus größten Teil des symphonischen Musiklebens dieser Stadt. Die Aktivitäten des Orchesters sind vielfältig, wobei die Pflege der traditionellen Wiener Klangkultur einen zentralen Stellenwert einnimmt. Mit seinen 128 Mitgliedern zählt das Orchester zu den herausragenden Klangkörpern Europas und ist insbesondere für die hochromantische Konzertliteratur prädestiniert : Werke von Johannes Brahms, Anton Bruckner, Gustav Mahler und Richard Strauß zählen daher zum Kernrepertoire der Wiener Symphoniker.

Der Wiener Musikverein und das in unmittelbarer Nähe angesiedelte Konzerthaus bilden die zentralen Spielstätten der Wiener Symphoniker, darüber hinaus ist das Orchester seit 1946 als « Orchestra in Residence » eng mit den Bregenzer Festspielen verbunden. Im Jahre 2006 ist als weitere Spielstätte das Theater an der Wien hinzugekommen, wo die Wiener Symphoniker seitdem für stilistisch unterschiedlichste Produktionen als Opernorchester engagiert werden. Regelmäßig stattfindende internationale Tourneen und Gastspielreisen zu den wichtigsten Musikzentren runden das umfassende Portfolio dieses Wiener Traditionsorchesters ab.

Die Wiener Symphoniker wurden 1900 unter dem Namen Wiener Concertverein zunächst mit dem Ziel gegründet, einerseits für die breite Öffentlichkeit erschwingliche Orchesterkonzerte zu veranstalten und andererseits den Bedarf an Ur- und Erstaufführungen damaliger zeitgenössischer Werke abzudecken. Am 30. Oktober 1900 schließlich gab der neue Klangkörper unter Ferdinand Löwe sein offizielles Debüt im Großen Saal des Wiener Musikvereins.

Gleich in den ersten Jahrzehnten seiner Existenz brachte das Orchester eine Reihe an heute so selbstverständlich im Repertoire verankerten Werken wie Anton Bruckners Neunte Symphonie, Arnold Schönbergs Gurre-Lieder, Maurice Ravels Konzert für die linke Hand und Franz Schmidts Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln zur erstmaligen Aufführung.

Zu Beginn der 1930er Jahre erhielt das Orchester seinen noch heute gültigen Namen : als nunmehr Wiener Symphoniker feierte man unter dem damaligen Orchesterchef Oswald Kabasta bei großen England- und Italien-Tourneen erstmals auch international Erfolge.

Seine bewegte Geschichte kann man nicht nur an den Namensänderungen des Ensembles ablesen. Konnte im Ersten Weltkrieg die Auflösung des Orchesters nur durch die Fusion mit dem 1913 gegründeten « Wiener Tonkünstlerorchester » verhindert werden, so kam es 1944 tatsächlich zur Stilllegung für immerhin acht Monate.

Nach dem Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde das Orchester unter denkbar schwierigen Bedingungen wieder ins Leben gerufen : am 16. September 1945 erklang Mahlers 3. Symphonie im Rahmen eines « Festkonzerts zur Neubildung des Orchesters » . Für die nach 1945 geleistete Aufbauarbeit zeichneten vor allem die damaligen Chefdirigenten Hans Swarovsky sowie Josef Krips maßgeblich verantwortlich.

Danach waren es die Chefdirigenten Herbert von Karajan (1950-1960) und Wolfgang Sawallisch (1960-1970) , die das Klangbild des Orchesters entscheidend formten. In dieser Position folgten (nach kurzzeitiger Rückkehr von Josef Krips) Carlo Maria Giulini und Gennadij Roshdestvenskij. Georges Prêtre, formal von 1986-1991 Chefdirigent des Orchesters, bevorzugte die Bezeichnung « Erster Gastdirigent » für seine Tätigkeit. Danach übernahmen Rafael Frühbeck de Burgos und Vladimir Fedosejev das Orchester wieder in der offiziellen Position.

Als Gastdirigenten feierten zudem Stars wie Leonard Bernstein, Lorin Maazel, Zubin Mehta, Claudio Abbado, Carlos Kleiber oder Sergiu Celibidache viel beachtete Erfolge.

Die künstlerische Arbeit der Wiener Symphoniker ist durch eine große Zahl von hochwertigen CD-Produktionen dokumentiert.

Neben ihrer Präsenz in den großen symphonischen Zyklen der Häuser Musikverein und Konzerthaus veranstalten die Wiener Symphoniker seit Anfang der 1980er Jahre auch eigene Abonnementkonzerte. Zusätzlich zu zwei Symphoniekonzerte-Zyklen präsentieren sich die Mitglieder des Orchesters im Rahmen einer eigenen Kammerkonzerte-Reihe.

Bereits seit 1946 sind die Wiener Symphoniker jeden Sommer das « Orchestra in Residence » der Bregenzer Festspiele. Dort treten Sie nicht nur als Opernorchester beim Spiel am See und bei der Oper im Festspielhaus in Erscheinung, sondern sind auch mit mehreren Orchesterkonzerten im Programm des Festivals vertreten. Zusätzlich wirken die Wiener Symphoniker seit 2006 bei zahlreichen Opernproduktionen im Theater an der Wien mit und unterstreichen damit ihre herausragende Stellung im Musikleben Wiens.

Sergueï Bortkiewicz

Le pianiste et compositeur ukraino-autrichien Sergueï Bortkiewicz est né le 28 février 1877 à Kharkov, en Ukraine ; et est décédé le 25 octobre 1952 à Vienne.

Fils d'Edward et Zofia-Uszynska Bortkiewicz. La famille était d'origine noble polonaise et possédait le domaine Artemovka près de Kharkov. Bortkiewicz étudia la musique avec Karl von Arek et Anatoli Liadov au Conservatoire Impérial de Saint-Petersbourg et, à partir de 1900, au Conservatoire de Leipzig avec Alfred Reisenauer (piano) et Salomon Jadassohn (composition) .

En 1904, il épouse Elisabeth Geraklitova ; le couple s'installe à Berlin. Brillant pianiste, il se produit en concert dans toute l'Europe. Il donne également des cours privés, et, pour 1 an, enseigne au Conservatoire Klindworth-Scharwenka, où commence une longue amitié avec le pianiste néerlandais Hugo van Dalen (qui interprètera, plus tard, le 1er Concerto pour piano de Bortkiewicz) .

Avec le déclenchement de la Première Guerre mondiale, en 1914, commence une période malheureuse, marquée par la pauvreté. Le couple est plusieurs fois contraint de fuir, et s'installe définitivement à Vienne en 1923 (ils acquièrent la nationalité autrichienne en 1925) . Ils n'eurent pas d'enfants.

Elisabeth Geraklitova Bortkiewicz décède le 9 mars 1960. Ils sont tous deux enterrés au « Zentralfriedhof » (Cimetière Central) de Vienne.

Bortkiewicz a composé uniquement dans le style Romantique, profondément lyrique et nostalgique. Ses œuvres évoquent parfois Chopin, Rachmaninov ou Scriabine.

Sergei Eduardovich Bortkiewicz was born on 28 February 1877 in Kharkiv, Russian Empire (in present-day, Ukraine) . From a Polish noble family (father, Edward Bortkiewicz ; mother, Zofia Bortkiewicz « née » Uszyńska) and spent most of his childhood on the family Estate of Artemivka, near Kharkiv. Bortkiewicz received his musical training from Anatoly Lyadov and Karl von Arek at the Imperial Conservatory of Music in Saint-Petersburg.

In 1900, he left Saint-Petersburg and traveled to Leipzig, where he became a student of Alfred Reisenauer and Salomon Jadassohn, both pupils of Franz Liszt. In July 1902, Bortkiewicz completed his studies at the Leipzig Conservatory and was awarded the Schumann Prize on graduation. On his return to Russia, in 1904, he married Elisabeth Geraklitowa, a friend of his sister and then returned to Germany, where he settled in Berlin. It was there that he started to compose seriously.

From 1904 until 1914, Bortkiewicz continued to live in Berlin but spent his summers visiting his family in Russia or travelling around Europe often on concert-tours. For a year, he also taught at the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatory, where he was to meet his lifelong friend, the Dutch pianist Hugo van Dalen (1888-1967). Van Dalen premiered Bortkiewicz's Piano Concerto No. 1, Opus 16, in November 1913 in Berlin, with the Blüthner Orchestra conducted by the composer.

The outbreak of World War I, in 1914, changed Bortkiewicz's life : being Russian, he was initially under house-arrest and later forced to leave Germany. He returned to Kharkiv, where he established himself as a music teacher while, at the same time, giving concerts. The end of the War saw the beginning of the Russian Revolution, which forced the composer and his family to flee the family Estate at Artëmovka owing to occupation by the Communists. In June 1919, the Communists fled before the White Army and Bortkiewicz was able to return and help to rebuild the family Estate, which had been completely plundered. This, however, was short-lived and whilst on a trip to Yalta with his wife, the fall of Kharkiv to the Red Army meant that his family could not return to Artemivka. With the area now surrounded by the Red Army, the composer watched his mother and the husband of his sister, Vera, fall ill with typhus, both dying in the chaos at Novorossiysk. Bortkiewicz sought to escape from Yalta and succeeded in obtaining passage on the steamer « Konstantin » which brought them safe, but penniless, to Constantinople in November 1919.

In Constantinople, with the help of the Court pianist to the Sultan, Ilen Ilegy, Bortkiewicz began to give concerts and started teaching again. He became well-known throughout a number of Embassies and made an acquaintance with the wife of the Yugoslavian ambassador Natalie Chaponitsch, to whom he dedicated his « 3 Morceaux », Opus 24 (1922). She organised musical gatherings for Bortkiewicz within the Embassy, and it was with the help of her husband that the composer and his wife were able to obtain a visa for Yugoslavia. Bortkiewicz and his wife came to Sofia via Belgrade, where they had to wait for some time before obtaining an Austrian visa. On 22 July 1922, the composer and his wife reached Austria.

Initially, Bortkiewicz chose Baden, not Vienna, as his residence ; here, he remained until 1923. He, then, moved and settled in Vienna, where he was to remain for the next 5 years and where, in 1925, he finally obtained Austrian citizenship.

In 1928, Bortkiewicz went to Paris for 6 months and, then, returned to live in Berlin. In 1933, he was forced to leave Germany again - being a Russian, he was now facing persecution from the Nazis and saw his name being deleted from all music programmes. He returned to Vienna, where he established residence at No. 1 « Blechturm-gasse », Door 5, in 1935. He lived there for the rest of his life. It was during these years that Bortkiewicz suffered with serious financial difficulties and needed to ask for financial help from his friend Hugo van Dalen many times, which the pianist always gave freely. It was also during this period that he translated from Russian into German the letters between Tchaikovsky and Nadezhda von Meck. These letters were published as « Die seltsame Liebe Peter Tschaikowsky's und der Nadjeschda von Meck » edited by Köhler & Amelang, in Leipzig (1938). Van Dalen adapted Bortkiewicz's book for a Dutch readership, and published it as « Rondon Tschaikowsky's vierde symphonie », edited by De Residentieboede, in

World War II was also a terrible time for Bortkiewicz and his wife. At the end of the War, he described in a letter dated 8 December 1945 to his friend Hans Ankwicz-Kleehoven how he still lived :

« I'm writing to you from my bathroom where we have crawled in because it is small and can be warmed on and off with a gas light. (!) The other rooms cannot be used and I cannot touch my piano. This is now ! What awaits us further ? Life is becoming more and more unpleasant, merciless. I teach at the Conservatory with the heat at 4 degrees, soon even less ! »

During these terrible years, he composed a number of works including his Piano Sonata No. 2, Opus 60. The Sonata was 1st performed by the composer, on 29 November 1942, in the « Brahmssaal » of the « Musikverein » in Vienna. Hugo van Dalen gave the Dutch premiere, on 9 February 1944, in Amsterdam.

The Second World War brought Bortkiewicz to the edge of despair and ruin. The greater part of his printed compositions, which were held by his German publishers (Rahter & Litloff) , were destroyed in the bombing of German cities and, hence, he lost all his income from the sale of his music. Bortkiewicz and his wife were physically and mentally exhausted at the end of the War and were both in a desperate situation when his friend, the chief-physician Doctor Walter Zdrahal, admitted the couple to the Franz-Josef Hospital, in Vienna, in order to treat them.

In the autumn of 1945, Bortkiewicz was appointed director of a Master-class at the Vienna City Conservatory, which helped to give the composer some of the financial security he so sought. During this period, he composed his 6 Preludes, Opus 66 (1946-1947) , of which only 2 (Nos. 1 and 3) have so far been located. These Preludes are dedicated to the Dutch pianist Hélène Mulholland (1912-2000) , who helped him after the War by sending much needed food and clothes. After his retirement, in 1948, the community of Vienna awarded him an honorary pension.

At the instigation of Hans Ankwicz-Kleehoven, a Bortkiewicz Society was founded in 1947, in Vienna, in order to keep the memory of Bortkiewicz's music alive. The inaugural meeting took place in the library-hall of the « Akademie » on « Schillerplatz » , on 10 April 1947. As a result of that meeting, on the 1st Monday of each month, from November to May, friends of the composer and members of the Society gathered in the « Künstlerhaus » and listened to concerts of the composer's music much of which was played by Bortkiewicz himself. The Bortkiewicz Society was dissolved on 6 March 1973.

In the years after 1949, and primarily as a result of the War years, Bortkiewicz's wife was diagnosed as suffering from manic depression, which caused great concern for the composer. Nonetheless, the composer's light continued to shine brightly and, on 26 February 1952, the Bortkiewicz Society along with the « Ravag » Orchestra celebrated the 75th birthday of the composer at a concert in the « Musikverein » Great Hall, in Vienna. Bortkiewicz conducted the Orchestra with Felicitas Karrer playing the Piano Concerto No. 1, Opus 16 ; the violinist Jaro Schmied played his « Des Frühlings und des Pans Erwachen - ein lyrisches Intermezzo nach Gemälden von Sandro Botticelli » , Opus 44, and the concert was concluded with his Symphony No. 1, Opus 52, « Aus meiner Heimat » , which contains a touching quotation from « God Save the Tsar » in the Finale. This was to be his last great concert and the excitement of the event was illustrated in a letter dated 18 March 1952. The composer wrote to van Dalen :

« Finally, I had the opportunity to show, in a large hall with a large Orchestra and soloists, what I can do. Not only the critics, but others who know me, were surprised and amazed. I can always feel happy to have found so much recognition at the age of 75 years, which really comes, in most cases, after death to someone who really earned it. »

Bortkiewicz had been suffering for some time from a stomach ailment and, on the advice of his physician, he decided to undergo an operation in October 1952. He never recovered and died in Vienna, on 25 October of that year. His wife, Elisabeth, who was childless, died 8 years later, on 9 March 1960, in Vienna. The graves of Bortkiewicz and his wife can still be found at the « Zentralfriedhof » , Vienna.

Works

Bortkiewicz's piano style was very much based on Franz Liszt and Frederic Chopin, nurtured by Tchaikovsky, Rachmaninoff, early Scriabin, Wagner and Russian folklore. He was unaffected by the music trends of the 20th Century : The composer never saw himself as a « modernist » as can be seen from his « Künstlerisches Glaubensbekenntnis » , written in 1923. His workmanship is meticulous, his imagination colourful and sensitive, his piano writing idiomatic ; a lush instrumentation underlines the essential sentimentality of the melodic invention. But Bortkiewicz was not merely an imitator - he very much had his own style that drew upon all the influences of his life and that can be immediately recognized as a typically Bortkiewicz tone : lyrical and nostalgic.

With much thanks to Hugo van Dalen, his close friend, we can still enjoy Bortkiewicz's music and learn much about his life from the many letters he sent to the Dutch pianist. When van Dalen died in 1967, his family bequeathed the manuscripts of several compositions (such as the 12 « Études » , Opus 29, dedicated to van Dalen) ; a written autobiography, « Erinnerungen » (published in 1971, in German, in : « Musik des Ostens » , pages 136-169 ; in Dutch by Hugo van Dalen, in : « De Zevende Dag » , July / August 1939 ; and in English by Bhagwan Nebhraj Thadani, Recollections, 2nd edition, Cantext, 2001) ; plus a number of letters and printed music to the « Gemeentemuseum » , in The Hague, which recently passed it on to the Netherlands Music Institute (NMI) . The NMI has the only existing copy of the manuscript of the Piano Sonata No. 2, Opus 60, and of 2 of the Preludes, Opus 66.

Sergei Eduardowitsch Bortkiewicz (geboren 28 Februar 1877 in Charkow ; gestorben 25. Oktober 1952 in Wien) war ein ukrainischer Komponist.

Bortkiewicz studierte 1896 bis 1899 in Sankt Petersburg bei Karl von Arek und Anatoli Ljadow und danach bis 1902 in Leipzig bei Alfred Reisenauer, Karl Piutti und Salomon Jadassohn. Von 1904 bis 1914 lebte er in Berlin, wo er ein Jahr am Klindworth-Scharwenka-Konservatorium unterrichtete und von wo aus er Konzertreisen durch ganz Europa unternahm. Nach dem Ausbruch des Ersten Weltkrieges kehrte er nach Russland zurück.

Vor der russischen Revolution flüchtete er auf sein Gut Artemovka bei Charkow. Nach der Plünderung durch die Rote Armee ging er nach Sewastopol, von wo aus ihm 1920 die Flucht nach Istanbul gelang. 1922 übersiedelte er nach Wien. 1928 bis 1933 lebte er erneut in Berlin. Nach der so genannten Machtergreifung der Nationalsozialisten kehrte er nach Wien zurück. Er verstarb 1952 in Wien und wurde in einem ihm ehrenhalber gewidmeten Grab auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (30A-3-5) bestattet.

Bortkiewicz komponierte eine Oper, zwei Sinfonien, drei Klavier-, ein Cello- und ein Violinkonzert, eine sinfonische Dichtung, mehrere Suiten, eine Klavier- und eine Violinsonate und zahlreiche Klavierstücke.

Dirk Fock

The Dutch conductor and pianist Dirck Foch (Fock) was born on 18 June 1886 in Jakarta, Indonesia ; and died on 24 May 1973 in Locarno, Switzerland.

Born in the Dutch East-Indies to Dutch parents with the last name spelled as « Fock » . The 1st 12 years of his life in the city of Batavia, young Dirk absorbs his 1st musical impressions, as can be heard in the « Java Sketches for Piano » that he composes in 1944 in the United States.

In 1898, his family returns to the Netherlands (The Hague) and Foch takes his 1st steps in music : he plays the violin and writes compositions. Against the wishes of his father, counsel and statesman Dirk Fock Senior (1858-1941) , he opts for a career in music.

After studying in Amsterdam, Foch leaves for Berlin, where he receives an education in conducting by Karl Muck and Artur Nikisch, and violin lessons by Anton Witek. The conductor Nikisch offers him a chance to play in the Berlin Philharmonic and Concert-Master Witek assigns him the place of 1st violinist. In the Orchestra, he plays under famous conductors such as Gustav Mahler.

1907 : Conductor in Berlin.

Soon, Foch develops his direction skills and becomes in 1911 1st conductor to the « Kurfürstenoper » in Berlin, and the « Mülhausen » Opera House, 1 year later. Foch conducts, barely 26 years of age, complete Opera's by Richard Wagner and Richard Strauß.

From 1913 to 1917, Foch holds in Sweden positions with the Göteborg and Stockholm Orchestras, 1917-1919, frequent performances with the Amsterdam « Concertgebouworkest » Orchestra and « Den Haag Residentieorkest » .

12 October 1917 : While living in The Hague, as pianist, he founds the Dutch Sextet with members of the « Residentieorkest » : A. Best, flute ; D.P.W. van Emmerik, oboe ; A. Wilt, clarinet ; C.J. van Heyst, bassoon ; C. van der Berg horn.

1919 : Locarno, Orselina.

1919-1924 : Conductor in New York.

In 1919, Foch continues his career in New York, conducting the Philharmonic Orchestra in the popular « Yankee Stadium » , and the National Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall.

12 April 1920 : Debut at Carnegie Hall, New York.

13 March 1921 : With Mrs. E.H. Harriman, founder of the City Symphony Society of New York.

In 1922, he is co-founder and 1st conductor of the American Orchestral Society, an institution that permits young musicians and conductors a chance to gain high-level experience. That same year, Foch introduces the music of his friend Darius Milhaud to the United States. Next, he becomes 1st conductor to the New York City Symphony Orchestra and serves as guest-conductor with the New York Philharmonic, The National Symphony and the Saint-Louis Orchestra.

18 November 1922 : Founder of the New York City Symphony Orchestra.

In 1924, Foch returns to Europe at the request of Richard Strauß, where he becomes 1st conductor of the « Wiener Konzertverein » .

1924 - March 1927 : At the « Wiener Konzertverein » in Vienna.

1925 - December 1926 : Teacher at the « Wiener Musikhochschule » .

Until March 1927, he conducts numerous concerts. A programme dedicated entirely to Igor Strawinsky, culminating in a solo-performance on piano by the composer himself, becomes a huge success. Foch leads special direction classes at the « Hochschule für Musik » , directs concerts for students and directs Opera's. From Vienna, he performs guest-directions in Berlin, Budapest, Milan, Paris, Rome and, again, in Amsterdam and The Hague.

1928 : Settled in New York.

In the 1930's, Foch spends a long period in Paris, directing the « Orchestre National » on occasion, but focuses mainly on composing his own music.

1940 : Foch leaves for the United States.

3 December 1945 : Naturalized American.

In 1959, Foch and his wife Christine Suze Moltzer settle in Orselina, Switzerland, where Foch passes away in 1973. He is survived by Nina Foch, his daughter from a previous marriage, a famous Hollywood actress (born in 1924 in Leiden, Netherlands ; died on 2008 in Los Angeles) .

...

Dirk Foch, senior, was born on 19 June 1858 in Wijk-bij-Duurstede and died on 17 October 1941 in The Hague.

Friedrich Gernsheim

Le chef d'orchestre, pianiste et compositeur allemand Friedrich Gernsheim est né le 17 juillet 1839 à Worms et est mort le 10 septembre 1916 à Berlin.

Il reçoit sa 1^{re} éducation musicale à la maison, grâce à sa mère, puis, à l'âge de 7 ans sous la direction de Louis Liebe, un ancien élève de Louis Spohr. Son père, un important médecin juif, fait déménager sa famille après 1848 et ils s'installent à Francfort-sur-le-Main. Friedrich Gernsheim y étudie sous la férule d'Edward Rosenhain, frère de Jakob Rosenhain. Il se produit pour la 1^{re} fois sur scène en tant que pianiste, en 1850, et part en tournée pendant 2 ans, puis s'installe avec sa famille à Leipzig, où il étudie le piano avec Ignaz Moscheles à partir de 1852. Il passe les années 1855 à 1860 à Paris, où il rencontre Gioachino Rossini, Édouard Lalo et Camille Saint-Saëns.

Ses voyages l'emmènent ensuite à Sarrebruck, il prend en 1861 le poste de chef d'orchestre libéré par Hermann Levi, puis, à Cologne où, en 1865, Ferdinand Hiller le nomme au Conservatoire (Engelbert Humperdinck et Carl Lachmund seront de ses élèves) . The German composer, conductor and pianist Friedrich Gernsheim was born on 17 July 1839 in Worms and died on 10 September 1916 in Berlin.

He was given his 1st musical training at home under his mother's care, then, starting from the age of 7 under Worms' musical director, Louis Liebe, a former pupil of Louis Spohr. His father, a prominent Jewish physician, moved the family to Frankfurt-am-Main in the aftermath of the year of revolutions, 1848, where he studied with Edward Rosenhain, brother of Jakob Rosenhain. He made his 1st public appearance as a concert pianist in 1850 and toured for 2 seasons, then, settled with his family in Leipzig, where he studied piano with Ignaz Moscheles from 1852. He spent the years 1855 to 1860 in Paris, meeting Gioachino Rossini, Édouard Lalo and Camille Saint-Saëns.

His travels afterwards took him to Saarbrücken where, in 1861, he took the conductor post vacated by Hermann Levi ; to Cologne where, in 1865, Ferdinand Hiller appointed him to the staff of the Conservatory (his pupils there included Engelbert Humperdinck and Carl Lachmund) ; he, then, served as musical director of the Philharmonic Society of Rotterdam, from 1874 to 1890. In the latter year, he became a teacher at the Stern Conservatory in Berlin and, in 1897, moved there to teach at the Academy of Arts, where he was elected to the Senate in 1897. In 1877, he married Helene Hershheim from Karlsruhe.

Gernsheim was a prolific composer, especially of orchestral, chamber and instrumental music, and songs. Some of his works tend to Jewish subject-matter, notably the 3rd Symphony on the legend of the « Song of Miriam » . His earlier works show the influence of Robert Schumann and, from 1868, when he 1st became friendly with Johannes Brahms, a Brahmsian influence is very palpable. Gernsheim's 4 Symphonies (the 1st of which was written before the publication of Brahms' 1st Symphony) are an interesting example of the reception of Brahmsian style by a sympathetic and talented contemporary. Gernsheim's last works, most notably his « Zu einem Drama » (1902) , show him moving away from that into something more personal. Due to his Jewish background, his work was banned in Nazi Germany, and his papers and a biography written about him by Karl Holl were removed from music libraries.

Friedrich Gernsheim (geboren 17. Juli 1839 in Worms ; gestorben 10. September 1916 in Berlin) war ein deutscher Pianist, Dirigent, Komponist und Musikpädagoge der Spätromantik.

Friedrich Gernsheim entstammte als Sohn eines Arztes einer angesehenen jüdischen Familie in Worms, deren Mitglieder über einige Jahrhunderte dort nachweisbar sind. Erste musikalische Unterweisung erfuhr er in Worms durch seine Mutter, die Pianistin war. Später erhielt er Unterricht bei dem Louis Spohr-Schüler Louis Liebe. Wegen der Unruhen im Revolutionsjahr 1848 übersiedelte er nach Mainz, wo er Klavierunterricht von Ernst Pauer erhielt.

1849 ließ sich Gernsheim in Frankfurt-am-Main nieder und erhielt dort geregelten und systematischen Unterricht in Klavier und Violine. Mit elf Jahren debütierte er dort erstmals öffentlich als Pianist und Geiger sowie als Komponist einer Konzert-Ouvertüre. Ab 1852 studierte Gernsheim in Leipzig bei Ignaz Moscheles und Ferdinand David. Von 1855 bis 1860 hielt er sich in Paris auf, wo er Bekanntschaft mit Édouard Lalo und Camille Saint-Saëns machte. Seine erste Anstellung fand er in Saarbrücken als Musikdirektor.

Ab 1865 war er Lehrer am Konservatorium in Köln und Leiter des städtischen Gesangvereins und der Musikgesellschaft.

Zudem hatte er die Stelle des Kapellmeisters am Stadttheater inne. Einer seiner Schüler war Engelbert Humperdinck. Im Jahr 1874 erfolgte die Berufung nach Rotterdam als Direktor der « Gesellschaft zur Beförderung der Tonkunst » (Maatschappij tot Bevordering der Toonkunst) . Mit Johannes Brahms verband ihn eine enge Freundschaft. Eine Berufung ans Stern'sche Konservatorium in Berlin erhielt Gernsheim im Jahr 1890. Im Oktober 1910 wurde sein Vortrag dreier eigener Kompositionen für Welte-Mignon aufgenommen.

Gernsheim heiratete am 1. Mai 1877 in Worms Helene Herrnsheim (geboren 1851 in Karlsruhe ; gestorben 26. Oktober 1927 in Berlin) ; das Paar hatte zwei Töchter. Nachfahren leben heute im Ausland.

Er war Mitglied der Akademie der Künste. Die Stadt Dortmund ehrte den 75-jährigen Komponisten im Jahr 1914 mit einem zwei Tage andauernden « Gernsheimfest » , bei dem er als Dirigent und Pianist zu erleben war.

1872 wurde Gernsheim Freimaurer in der Loge Zum wiedererbauten Tempel der Bruderliebe in Worms, 1897 dann in der Berliner Loge Friedrich zur Gerechtigkeit.

Seine Grabstätte befindet sich auf dem Jüdischen Friedhof Weißensee in Berlin.

In der Zeit des Nationalsozialismus wurde Gernsheims Musik nicht gespielt, in Herbert Gerigks und Theophil Stengels Lexikon der Juden in der Musik erschien sein Name in der ersten Auflage 1940.

Anton Heiller

L'organiste, claveciniste, compositeur, professeur et chef d'orchestre autrichien Anton Heiller est né le 15 septembre 1923 à Vienne (Dornbach) et est décédé le 25 mars 1979 à Vienne (Dornbach) .

Après un apprentissage initial de la musique liturgique avec Wilhelm Mück (organiste à la Cathédrale Saint-Étienne de Vienne) , Heiller combina son travail de répétiteur et de directeur de chorale à l'Opéra populaire de Vienne (« Wiener Volksoper ») avec l'étude du piano, de l'orgue et du clavecin sous Bruno Seidlhofer, ainsi que la théorie musicale et la composition sous Friedrich Reidinger au Conservatoire de musique de Vienne. Il fit son service militaire, surtout comme aide médical. Diplômé du Conservatoire en 1945, il y devint la même année professeur d'orgue puis professeur agrégé en 1957.

La carrière de Heiller après la Seconde Guerre mondiale est une suite ininterrompue de concerts, conférences, enregistrements, de participation à des concours de musique comme juge, et d'honneurs reçus. En 1952, il fit une tournée des États-Unis et de l'Europe avec le 1er prix du Concours international d'orgue de Haarlem en poche. Ses récitals d'orgue à Harvard sur les orgues du facteur Charles Brenton Fisk nouvellement installées à la « Memorial Church » ont été particulièrement appréciés. L'enregistrement de ces concerts est disponible en coffret de 4 CD. Quelques années avant le lancement du 1er de ces disques, il avait déjà publié sous étiquette « Vanguard » une étonnante série d'enregistrements de plusieurs pièces importantes du répertoire pour orgue de Jean-Sébastien Bach interprété sur un majestueux orgue du facteur « Marcussen & Søn », en Suède.

On lui offrit la direction de l'orchestre de l'Opéra de Vienne qu'il refusa afin de parfaire son jeu au clavier. Il reviendra plus tard à la direction d'orchestre.

Heiller enregistra une grande part de son répertoire s'étendant de Giovanni Gabrieli, Dietrich Buxtehude et Jean-Sébastien Bach à Max Reger et son ami Paul Hindemith ; le répertoire Romantique pour orgue l'intéressait moins que le Baroque et la musique du XXe siècle. Dans tout ce qu'il aborda, il démontra une technique irréprochable, un sens du rythme indéniable et un talent rare pour clarifier et maintenir l'élan rythmique des plus complexes passages polyphoniques, ce qui laissait au mélomane l'impression d'une grande facilité d'exécution.

Depuis l'adolescence, Heiller composa des morceaux d'un style hermétique, souvent dodécaphoniques, avec des clins d'œil à Hindemith et Frank Martin, morceaux qui n'atteignirent jamais la notoriété de ses prestations. Ils sont toutefois nombreux et incluent bon nombre de pièces pour les instruments dont il jouait, y compris un Concerto pour orgue (1963) , et ce qui semble être le seul Concerto jamais écrit pour orgue et clavecin (1972) .

Sa mort prématurée à l'âge de 55 ans (d'un malaise cardiaque probablement provoqué par un étouffement au cours d'un repas) priva l'Europe d'un des plus versatiles musiciens et d'un des meilleurs interprètes de l'œuvre de Bach pour orgue.

Les gouvernements successifs de l'Autriche lui ont décerné tous les prix en leur pouvoir, incluant :

Le Prix de la culture de Vienne (1963) .

La Croix d'honneur pour les Arts et la Science de Vienne (1968) .

Le Grand Prix national (1969) honorant un artiste pour son travail exceptionnel.

The Austrian organist, harpsichordist, composer, and conductor Anton Heiller was born on 15 September 1923 in Vienna-Dornbach and died on 25 March 1979 in Vienna-Dornbach.

Heiller was first trained in church music by Wilhelm Mück, organist of Vienna's Saint-Stephen's Cathedral (« Stephansdom ») . He, then, combined work as « répétiteur » and choir Master at the Vienna « Volksoper » with further study at the Vienna Academy of Music under Bruno Seidlhofer (piano, organ, harpsichord) and Friedrich Reidinger (music theory and composition) while serving in the military service, mostly as a medical aide. In 1945, he both graduated from the Academy and was appointed organ teacher there. He was promoted to professor in 1957.

Heiller's career after World War II is an uninterrupted list of concerts, lectures, records, jury service at contests, and professional honours. In 1952, he won the International Organ Competition in Haarlem, the Netherlands, and toured both Europe and the United States, where his organ recitals at Harvard University (on the, then, new Charles Brenton Fisk instrument in Memorial Church) , still available on a 4 CD boxed set compact discs, were particularly appreciated. A few years before the first of them, he had released a set of recordings for « Vanguard » of many of Johann Sebastian Bach's larger organ works on a majestic « Marcussen & Søn » instrument, in Sweden. His 2 Haydn Society LP's, from the early 1950's, of Franz-Josef Haydn's Symphonies No. 26 (« Lamentation ») and No. 36 ; and Symphonies Nos. 52 and 56, are distinguished for their forthright conciseness and straightforwardness, without gratuitous « ritardandi » or other tempo changes not requested by Haydn in the score.

Successive Austrian governments bestowed on Heiller every artistic award in their power, including the Vienna Culture Prize (1963) ; the Vienna Cross of Honour for Arts and Science (1968) ; and the Grand Austrian State Prize (1969) . Offered the conductorship of the Vienna State Opera, he declined in order to concentrate on keyboard playing although, near the end of his life, he said he was looking forward to conducting more.

Heiller recorded most of his large repertory, which ranged from Giovanni Gabrieli and Dieterich Buxtehude through Johann Sebastian Bach to Max Reger and Heiller's good friend Paul Hindemith ; Romantic works interested him much less than Baroque and 20th Century material. In whatever works, he performed he displayed formidable technique, immense rhythmic strength and, in particular, a rare talent for clarifying and maintaining the momentum of the most complex polyphonic passages with what sounded like effortless ease.

He also composed from his teens onward. His works, influenced by Paul Hindemith and Frank Martin, were often dodecapronic, and never achieved anything like the acclaim of his performances, but he was prolific and composed much music for his own instrument, including an Organ Concerto (1963) and what may be the only Concerto ever written for organ and harpsichord (1972) .

He died, unexpectedly and prematurely, in Vienna at 55, collapsing after choking on food, from what was thought to be a cardiac event.

His notable pupils include Monique Gendron, Judy Glass, Yuko Hayashi, Grant Hellmers, Monika Henking, Wolfgang Karius, Jan Kleinbussink, Bernard Lagacé, Brett Leighton, Peter Planyavsky, Michæl Radulescu, Christa Rakich, Paula Pugh Romanaux, Christa Rumsey, David Rumsey, David Sanger, Bruce Stevens, Sibyl Urbancic, and Jean-Claude Zehnder.

The esteemed Austrian organist, conductor, pedagogue, and composer, Anton Heiller, received training in piano, organ, harpsichord, and composition in the Vienna Academy of Music, from 1941 to 1942.

After winning the Haarlem Competition for Organ Improvisation, in 1952, Anton Heiller was notably successful as an organ virtuoso, excelling especially in the music of Johann Sebastian Bach.

In 1945, Anton Heiller joined the faculty of the Vienna Academy of Music. After it became the Vienna « Hochschule für Musik » , he was made a Professor there, in 1971. In 1969, he was awarded the Austrian State Prize for Music. In his compositions, he displayed an adept handling of polyphonic writing. In some of his music, he utilized the 12 tone method.

Anton Heiller is one of the 20th Century's most renowned and influential organists. Born in 1923, Heiller was trained in Vienna and rose to prominence quickly, giving his 1st solo recital at the age of 22. Before concentrating on the organ exclusively, he was a successful conductor of the Symphonic repertoire, and, from 1945 until his untimely death in 1979, he was professor of organ at the University of Music and Performing Arts, in Vienna. His interpretations of Johann Sebastian Bach, which included registration and articulation, as well as a consideration of the theological underpinnings, would change the way Bach is played.

« Anton Heiller : Organist, Composer, Conductor » provides an assessment of Heiller's works and teaching, while also examining his complex personality, one torn between strong religious devotion and the world of artistry. The narrative also offers a unique view of the organ world in the decades after World War II, featuring the important organs, builders, and organists across North America and Europe.

Peter Planyavsky was Anton Heiller's successor as an organ professor in Vienna, and organist of Saint-Stephan's Cathedral in Vienna, from 1969 through 2004. He is also a prolific composer, improviser, and conductor. Christa Rumsey, a former student of Heiller's, translated the book from the original German.

Anton Heiller (geboren 15. September 1923 in Wien-Dornbach ; gestorben 25. März 1979 ebenda) war ein österreichischer Komponist, Organist und Musikpädagoge.

Bereits frühzeitig erhielt Anton Heiller ersten Unterricht in den Fächern Klavier (beim Vater) , Harmonielehre und Kontrapunkt. In den 1930er Jahren erhielt er Orgelunterricht bei Wilhelm Mück, dem Organisten des Wiener Stephansdoms.

Gleichzeitig studierte er von April 1941 bis Juni 1942 an der Wiener Musikhochschule die Fächer Orgel, Klavier, Cembalo und Musiktheorie. Unmittelbar nach Abschluss seines Studiums wurde er im Jahre 1942 zum Militärdienst einberufen.

Nach Kriegsende war er an der Wiener Musikhochschule tätig, wo er im Jahre 1945 eine Professur für Kirchenmusik übernahm und die Fächer Orgel, Tonsatz und seit dem Jahre 1969 Kirchliche Komposition lehrte. Im Jahre 1950 übernahm er das « Collegium Musicum für zeitgenössische Musik » . Ab dem Jahr 1947 folgten neben seiner Lehrtätigkeit mehrere Konzertreisen als Organist, Cembalist und Dirigent, die ihn unter anderem in die Schweiz und in die Niederlande führten, wo er im Jahre 1952 den I. Preis im angesehenen Improvisationswettbewerb in Haarlem gewann.

Heiller war ein hochangesehener Konzertorganist, welcher sich insbesondere den Werken Johann Sebastian Bachs widmete. Im Rahmen seiner Tätigkeit an der Musikhochschule Wien zeichnete er für die Ausbildung einer Reihe führender Organisten der jüngeren Zeit und aus aller Welt verantwortlich. Er leitete viele Meisterklassen und führte Sommerkurse durch. Zu den Schülern Heillers zählen unter anderem Michæl Radulescu, Peter Planyavsky, Roman Summereder, Ekkehard Schneck und Ernst Triebel. Anton Heiller war mit der im Jahr 2007 in Wien verstorbenen Pianistin Erna Heiller verheiratet. Er selbst verstarb bereits 1979 in Wien, nachdem er im Jahre 1974 einen ersten Schlaganfall erlitten hatte und seine linke Hand teilweise gelähmt war.

Sein ehrenhalber gewidmetes Grab befindet sich auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof (Gruppe 40, Nummer 133) .

Anton Heiller schuf in einem reichen polyphonen und chromatisch gefärbten Stil fast ausschließlich kirchliche Werke sowie Kompositionen für Orgel. Zu seinem kompositorischen Schaffen gehören weiterhin Messen, Requiem, Psalmen, Chorwerke, Motetten, Kantaten und Oratorien sowie weitere Orchesterwerke. In seinen Kompositionen verbindet er die traditionelle österreichische Musik mit Elementen der Modernen Musik, indem er beispielsweise verstärkt die Zwölftontechnik einband. Paul Hindemith war seit 1950 ein Freund und Mentor Heillers, der im Jahre 1963 Hindemiths Konzert für Orgel und Orchester in New York uraufführte. Heiller gilt als Leitfigur der Kirchenmusik in Österreich und Süddeutschland in der zweiten Hälfte des 20. Jahrhunderts.

Anton Heiller erwarb sich große Verdienste um den österreichischen Orgelbau nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg. Vor allem die von ihm konzipierte und initiierte Unterrichtsorgel mit mechanischen Schleifladen für die damalige Wiener Musikakademie, erbaut 1958 von Johann Pirchner / Steinach am Brenner, wurde für mehrere Organistengenerationen stilbildend. Das Instrument befindet sich heute in der Pfarrkirche Sandliten im 16. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Ottakring.

Anton Heiller wurde mehrfach geehrt, unter anderem 1954 mit dem Staatspreis für Musik und 1969 mit dem Großen Österreichischen Staatspreis. Weiterhin gewann er mehrere Preise bei Orgelwettbewerben im In- und Ausland.

Paul August Klenau

Le compositeur danois Paul August von Klenau est né le 11 février 1883 à Copenhague et est mort le 31 août 1946 à Copenhague. Il travailla principalement en Allemagne et en Autriche.

Klenau eut comme professeurs Otto Malling, Max Bruch, Ludwig Thuille et Max von Schillings.

Klenau fit partie des défenseurs d'Arnold Schönberg durant les années 1920. D'ailleurs, Schönberg assista à un concert de ses œuvres dirigé par Klenau en 1923, à Fribourg.

Toujours selon Schönberg, Klenau défendit à une occasion son utilisation du dodécaphonisme dans l'un de ses 3 Opéras (écrit en 1932-1933) comme un exemple d'art national-socialiste.

Œuvres

9 Symphonies.

3 Quatuors à cordes.

Cantate « Die Weise von Liebe und Tod des Cornets Christoph Rilke » , basée sur l'œuvre de Rainer Maria Rilke (1919) .

...

The Danish-born composer and conductor Paul August von Klenau was born on 11 February 1883 in Copenhagen and died on 31 August 1946 in Copenhagen. He worked primarily in Germany and Austria.

His teachers included : Otto Malling, Max Bruch, Ludwig Thuille and Max von Schillings.

Klenau was among Arnold Schœnberg's advocates during the 1920's. Schœnberg attended a concert of his music conducted by Klenau in 1923, in Freiburg.

Also according to Schœnberg, Klenau once defended his use of the 12 tone technique as the basis of an Opera (Klenau's output includes 3 12 tone based Operas in all, the 1st from 1932-1933) as an example of National-Socialist art, making an analogy of the row with the leader that everything else in the piece needed to follow. (This, and a political analogy made by Socialist composers, Schœnberg equally derided as « nonsense » . He refers to Klenau as « the German composer, Paul von Klenau » .)

Klenau's musical output, some of which is undergoing recording revival, includes 9 Symphonies ; 3 String Quartets ; and a Cantata setting of Rainer Maria Rilke's « Die Weise von Liebe und Tod des Cornets Christoph Rilke » (1919) , among other works.

The Danish-born composer and conductor Paul August von Klenau was born on 11 February 1883 in Copenhagen and died on 31 August 1946 in Copenhagen.

As a young man, Klenau left his native country to study and work in Germany and Austria. His 1st Symphony was influenced by Anton Bruckner, while later influences came from both French music and Arnold Schœnberg's 12 tone technique. He never achieved real recognition as a composer in Denmark, but held important conducting posts, for example at the « Wiener Konzerthausgesellschaft » , and belonged to Alban Berg's circle of friends. Klenau began music studies in Copenhagen, in 1900, with Otto Malling (composition) ; and F. Hillmer (violin) . With his move, in 1902, to the « Berlin Hochschule für Musik » , where he studied composition under Max Bruch and the violin under Karl Halir, he started to enter Germanic circles and, as he did so, he to receive less recognition in Denmark. In 1904, he went to Munich as a pupil of Ludwig Thuille after whose death, in 1907, he was appointed « Kapellmeister » to the Freiburg Opera. But he soon moved to Stuttgart, where he studied with Max von Schillings (1908) and took a post at the « Hofoper » (1909) . His 1st Symphony had been performed at the 1908 Munich « Tonkünstlerfest » and, within 5 years, it was followed by 3 more. Klenau was in Frankfurt, in 1912, as conductor of the Bach Society ; however, he returned in the next years to his position with the Freiburg Opera House. By now, his compositional interests had turned to dramatic music : in 1913, he completed « Sulamith » , a sacred Opera on the « Song of Salomon » ; « Kjarten und Gudrun » , an Opera on Icelandic themes, was conducted by Wilhelm Furtwängler at Mannheim, in 1918.

Shortly after World War I, he went to Arnold Schœnberg for a final period of study. The War had caused him to return to Copenhagen where, in 1920, he participated in the formation of the Danish philharmonic Society. As conductor of the Society (1920-1926), he introduced much new music to Denmark, but his attempts to generate interest in Schœnberg's work, at that time, were unsuccessful. Feeling drawn-back to Germany musical centres, he accepted a concurrent appointment as conductor of the Vienna « Konzerthausgesellschaft » (1922-1930). Klenau returned in his later years to composing Operas and Symphonies. In his last Opera, « Elisabeth von England », his style evolved beyond the techniques of Anton Bruckner and Strauß (these had marked most of his output) as he employed Schœnbergian atonal procedures. He remained in Vienna until advancing deafness began to limit his activities, returning finally to Copenhagen, in 1940.

Paul August von Klenau (geboren 11. Februar 1883 in Kopenhagen ; gestorben 31. August 1946 ebenda) war ein dänischer Komponist und Dirigent.

Klenau, der aus einer deutschstämmigen Familie stammte, trat 1900 ins Kopenhagener Konservatorium ein und studierte dort Violine und Komposition. 1902 siedelte er nach Berlin über, wo er Schüler Max Bruchs wurde. Zwei Jahre später nahm er in München ein erneutes Studium bei Ludwig Thuille auf. Nach Thuilles Tod 1907 fand Klenau eine Anstellung als Kapellmeister am Städtischen Theater in Freiburg, nahm aber auch weiterhin Musikunterricht, diesmal bei Max von Schillings.

Klenaus erste Symphonie wurde 1908 erfolgreich in München uraufgeführt. 1912 leitete er Konzerte der Frankfurter Bach-Gesellschaft. In den folgenden Jahren führten seine Auftritte als Dirigent Klenau durch mehrere europäische Länder (und andere stiftete er in seiner Geburtsstadt Kopenhagen 1920 die Dänische Philharmonische Gesellschaft) , bis er

Klenaus Werk zeigt vielfältige Einflüsse, besonders von deutscher Musik. Durch seine frühen Kompositionen schimmert gelegentlich die Tonsprache seiner Lehrer Bruch und Thuille, aber auch die Richard Wagners und Anton Bruckners durch. Allerdings vermochte es der Komponist bereits hier, seinen eigenen Weg vorzuzeichnen. Für Klenaus spätere Laufbahn als Komponist wurde die Beschäftigung mit der Zwölftonmusik Arnold Schönbergs wichtig, die er aber einer vorwiegend tonalen Ordnung unterwarf. Da es Klenau gelang, die Nationalsozialisten davon zu überzeugen, dass seine Form der Zwölftonkomposition ein Gegenstück zur « jüdischen » Richtung Schönbergs darstelle, vermochte er sich nach 1933 als moderner Komponist auf den Spielplänen zu halten. Sein Werk umfasst 9 Symphonien, Opern, Ballette Lieder und Kammermusikwerke.

Robert Alexander Kolisko

Robert (Alexander) Kalisko est né le 1er février 1891 à Vienne et est mort le 2 février 1974 à Vienne. Il fit ses études musicales dans la capitale de l'Autriche-Hongrie, auprès de Maîtres prestigieux (Alexander von Zemlinsky, Franz Schreker) . Il reçut même, pendant quelques mois, des cours privés d'Arnold Schönberg. Robert Kalisko, engagé comme chef principal à Teplitz-Schönau par Karl Ettinger, n'y passa qu'une seule saison (1926-1927) avant de poursuivre à Zürich, puis à Vienne, une brillante carrière. Engagé ensuite au « Stadttheater » de Zürich, il revint à Vienne en 1938 et y demeura après l'« Anschluß » , devenant chef des « Wiener Symphoniker » . À ce poste pendant toute l'ère nazie (où il dirigea en maintes circonstances officielles, sous le parrainage de Josef Göbbels et de Baldur von Schirach, et pour des retransmissions radiophoniques au « Reichsender ») , il y demeura cependant après la Guerre et jusqu'en 1959.

The Austrian conductor Ernst Kunwald was born on 14 April 1868 in Vienna and died on 12 December 1939 in Vienna.

Kunwald studied law at the University of Vienna, earning his Doctorate in 1891. He also studied piano with Teodor Leszetycki and composition with Hermann Grädener. At the Leipzig Conservatory, he studied with the composer Salomon Jadassohn.

He conducted Opera in the following cities : Rostock (1895-1897) ; Sondershausen (1897-1898) ; Essen (1898-1900) ; Halle (1900-1901) ; Madrid (1901-1902) ; Frankfurt (1902-1905) ; and at the Berlin « Kroll Oper » (1905-1906) .

A review of a concert he led with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, in February 1906, described him as :

« Not a great conductor ; not one with the finest feelings or a subtle sense for the deeper things in music ; but he is a capable one, in many ways an intelligent one, a vigorous and energetic one. »

He served as assistant-conductor of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1907 to 1912. He was the conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, from 1912 to 1917 ; and the Cincinnati May Festival, from 1914 to 1917. His approach to conducting was very different than his predecessor in Cincinnati : the flamboyant Leopold Stokowski.

J. Herman Thuman, a Stokowski detractor, wrote a review in « The Cincinnati Enquirer » that :

« Kunwald does not find it necessary to resort to vaudeville stunts to gain the acclaim of the crowd. »

American premieres in Cincinnati, under Kunwald, included Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 3 and Richard Strauß's « Alpine Symphony » . He also conducted the Orchestra's 1st recording, for « Columbia Records » , on 13 January 1917 : the « Barcarolle » from Jacques Offenbach's « The Tales of Hoffmann » .

America's entry into World War I caused the downfall of the Austrian conductor's career in Cincinnati. On November 17, 1917, the « Daughters of the American Revolution » brought pressure on the public safety director of Pittsburgh to forbid Kunwald's conducting his Orchestra in that city. He was arrested by the United States Marshals Service, on December 8th, 1917, and released from jail, the next day. His resignation as conductor was accepted by the Board, at that time. On January 12th, 1918, he was interned under the « Alien Enemies Act » and imprisoned at Fort Oglethorpe, in Georgia. He was joined in interment by fellow conductor Karl Muck, who was arrested March 25th, 1918. The evidence on which Kunwald was interned was never fully-divulged, but conducting German music and pride in his homeland may have been considered overly propagandistic. He conducted the « Star-Spangled Banner » before one concert after telling the Orchestra and audience (many of whom were German) that his sympathies were with his own country. This information was noted in a memo dated December 19th, 1917, from J. Edgar Hoover to the United States Attorney-General. His sentiments led to the revocation of his honorary membership in « Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia » Fraternity, in May 1919. (Sinfonia Handbook, Spring 1939 ; page 24.)

After deportation, Kunwald was named general music-director in Königsberg (1920-1927) and, then, the « Konzerthausorchester Berlin » (Berlin Symphony Orchestra) from 1928 to 1931. From 1933 to his death, in 1939, he lived in Vienna.

Ernst Kunwald was 5 feet 9 inches tall, with dark hair and blue eyes. He was married to Lina, a German citizen born in 1869. He wrote a text-book on conducting (unpublished) , and several published articles.

Kunwald's article, « Über das Dirigieren » , was published in the « Neue freie Presse » on 4 November 1934 (pages 27-28) .

Ernst Kunwald and Heinrich Schenker were personally acquainted. Kunwald is first mentioned in Schenker's diary on April 9th, 1907, in the company of Fritz Wahle and Moriz Violin in a coffee-house in a discussion of Johannes Brahms' epigonism, in which Kunwald is presented as somewhat naive. Kunwald further figures in the entry for November 11th, 1911 : an « altogether naive article » by him on the 9th Symphony prompts Schenker to retell the story of the epigonism discussion in greater detail.

Ernst Kunwald, österreichischer Dirigent : geboren 14. April 1868 in Wien ; gestorben 12. Dezember 1939, ebenda.

Kunwald studierte Rechtswissenschaft an der Universität Wien, an der er 1891 zum Doktor juris promovierte. Daneben studierte er Klavierspiel bei Teodor Leszetycki und Hermann Grædener. An der Musikhochschule Leipzig war er Schüler von Salomon Jadassohn.

Zwischen 1895 und 1907 als Operndirigent hervorgetreten, war er fünf Jahre Assistenzdirigent der Berliner Philharmoniker. 1912 wurde er Nachfolger von Leopold Stokowski beim Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. Als Woodrow Wilson 1917 dem Deutschen Kaiserreich den Krieg erklärt hatte, sorgten die Töchter der Amerikanischen Revolution für ein Auftrittsverbot Kunwalds in Pittsburgh. Im Dezember 1917 vom United States Marshals Service für einen Tag inhaftiert, bat Kunwald um seine Entlassung. Nach den Alien and Sedition Acts wurde er im Januar 1918 in Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia, interniert. Karl Muck leistete ihm ab März 1918 Gesellschaft. Da Kunwald seine Sympathien für die deutsche Kriegsseite nicht verhehlte, wurde ihm die Ehrenmitgliedschaft in der « Phi Mu Alpha Sinfonia » aberkannt.

Nach Deutschland zurückgekehrt, dirigierte er in der Weimarer Republik die Königsberger Symphoniekonzerte (1920-1927) und das Konzerthausorchester Berlin (1928-1931) .

Anton Lippe

Anton Lippe, Dirigent, Domkapellmeister, Kirchenmusiker, Weltpriester : geboren 28. April 1905 in Sankt Anna am Aigen, Steiermark (ehemals Bezirk Feldbach, nunmehr Bezirk Südoststeiermark) ; gestorben 19. Februar 1974 in Berlin. Urverbindung : Traungau (20. Oktober 1926) . Lippe war 1935 Domkapellmeister in Graz, 1948-1964 musikalischer Leiter der Wiener Hofburgkapelle, dann Kapellmeister an der Sankt-Hedwigs-Kathedrale in Berlin.

...

Am 28. April 1905 wurde in Sankt Anna am Aigen als Sohn einer sehr musikalischen Kaufmannsfamilie Anton Lippe geboren. Neben seiner großen Vorliebe für Musik (er leitete bereits im Alter von zehn Jahren in Sankt Anna eine Weihnachtsmesse !) zeigte sich auch bald ein starkes religiöses Empfinden, das sein Vorbild im gutkatholischen Elternhaus hatte. Nicht zufällig stellten sich neben Anton Lippe auch zwei seiner Geschwister in den kirchlichen Dienst : Sein Bruder Konstantin wurde ebenfalls Priester, seine Schwester Frieda trat als Schwester, Dominika in den Orden der Schulschwestern in Graz ein, wo auch sie ihre musikalische Begabung jahrzehntelang an die Schülerinnen als Musiklehrerin : und Chorleiterin weitergab.

Anton Lippe aber ging an das Bischöfliche Gymnasium in Graz, legte dort die Matura ab und wurde im Jahr 1928 nach dem Studium der Theologie an der Grazer Universität zum Priester geweiht.

Während seiner Jahre als Kaplan in Pöllau zeigte sich, daß dieser Priester ohne musikalisches Engagement nicht leben konnte. Nachdem er schon im Kirchenchor Pöllau seine Begabung unter Beweis gestellt hatte, begann er im Jahr 1930 seine vierjährigen Studien der Musik in Rom, die er mit dem Titel Doktor in Musik abschloß.

Nach einem weiteren Kaplansjahr in Hartberg übernahm Doktor Anton Lippe 1935 die Leitung des Grazer Domchores, den er dann fast 30 Jahre führte und dem er zu internationaler Bekanntheit verhalf. Nach den auch für Lippe schwierigen Jahren des Zweiten Weltkrieges begann für den Grazer Domchor der Aufstieg zu einem sakralen Klangkörper höchsten Niveaus. Die Tatsache, daß der Chor mit seinem Kapellmeister Doktor Anton Lippe mehrere große und ausgesprochen erfolgreiche Konzertreisen ins Ausland unternahm, und andere in die Schweiz, nach Frankreich, Deutschland und Italien, spricht für sich.

Von den vielen Werken, die Doktor Lippe im Laufe seines Lebens erarbeitet und einstudiert hat, soll stellvertretend das Oratorium « Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln » von Franz Schmidt genannt sein. Das Werk erlebte unter Lippe im Jahr 1949 seine Grazer Premiere, es erfreute sich offensichtlich der besonderen Fürsorge des Domkapellmeisters, der es im Laufe seiner Karriere noch viele Male aufführen sollte, zuletzt im Jahr 1965 mit dem Grazer Domchor in Berlin. « Das Buch mit sieben Siegeln » wurde mit dem Grazer Domchor auch auf Schallplatte aufgenommen.

Seinen persönlich vielleicht bewegendsten Auftritt als Musiker und Priester aber erlebte Lippe, als er im Jahr 1963 während des Zweiten Vatikanischen Konzils vor Papst Paul VI. und den Konzilsteilnehmern das Konzilskonzert mit internationaler Besetzung dirigierte.

Der Ruf von Doktor Anton Lippe war inzwischen in alle Welt gelangt, und so war es auch keine Überraschung, als er ab 1. Februar 1964 der ehrenvollen Berufung als Kapellmeister des Sankt-Hedwigs-Kathedralchores in Berlin Folge leistete.

In den letzten zehn Jahren seines Lebens und Schaffens ist der Sankt Annarer Lippe mit seinem neuen Chor noch einmal um die halbe Welt gefahren, um durch die Musik die Botschaft der Verständigung und des Friedens, die Zusammengehörigkeit über die Grenze von Sprache und Nation zu verkünden : Bedeutende und vielbeachtete Konzertreisen führten den Sankt-Hedwigs-Kathedralchor Berlin mit seinem Leiter und Dirigenten und andere nach Italien, Frankreich, Portugal und Spanien, eine dreiwöchige Tournee sogar nach Japan (1968) .

Am 19. Februar 1974 stirbt Prälat Doktor Anton Lippe, noch nicht 69jährig, in Berlin. Auch ihn hat seine Heimatliebe bewegt im Wunsch, in Sankt Anna begraben zu werden. Jahre vor seinem Tod schon soll er gesagt haben :

« In der Großstadt ist man rasch vergessen, zu Hause betet doch bald wer ein Vaterunser an einem Grabe. »

Nach dem Requiem im Grazer Dom (2. März) wurde Anton Lippe am Sonntag, dem 3. März 1974, unter außergewöhnlich großer Beteiligung, darunter achtzig Mitglieder des Sankt Hedwigchores und Bischof Weber mit fast achtzig Priestern, in seiner Heimat Sankt Anna im Familiengrab beigesetzt.

Alljährlich wird seither im Februar ein Gedenkgottesdienst zum Todestag dieses großen Sankt Annarers in der Pfarrkirche gefeiert.

Als Grundlage für die vorstehenden Ausführungen dienten diverse Zeitungsartikel aus den Jahren 1963 bis 1977 (« Süd-Ost-Tagespost » ; « Kleine Zeitung » ; « Neue Zeit » ; « Sonntagsblatt ») und mündliche Informationen sowie diverse Eintragungen in der Chronik der Pfarre Sankt Anna am Aigen.

...

Anton Lippe wurde als Sohn eines Kaufmanns geboren. Seine musikalische Begabung trat schon als Kind hervor. So dirigierte er bereits als Zehnjähriger in seiner Heimatpfarre Sankt Anna die Weihnachtsmesse. Aus dieser stammten übrigens der seinerzeitige Fürstbischof von Graz-Seckau, Leopold Schuster, der Kurienkardinal Andreas Franz Frühwirth (gestorben 1933) und der nunmehrige Erzbischof von Salzburg, Franz Lackner.

Nach der Volksschule besuchte Lippe das Bischöfliche Gymnasium in Graz, wo er 1923 die Matura ablegte. Danach begann er das Studium an der Theologischen Fakultät der Universität Graz (absolvieren in Theologie 1928) , wo er dem Traungau beitrug. Nach seiner Priesterweihe am 15. Juli 1928 war er Kaplan in Pöllau (Bezirk Hartberg), wo er sich kirchenmusikalisch engagierte und den Kirchenchor leitete. Aufgrund seiner musikalischen Begabung beziehungsweise seines entsprechenden Engagements wurde er vom Grazer Fürstbischof Fredinand Pawlikowsky zum kirchenmusikalischen Weiterstudium 1930 an das Pontificium Institutum Musicae Sacrae nach Rom geschickt (Doktor in Musik 1934).

Nach einem weiteren Kaplansjahr in Hartberg wurde Lippe 1935 zum Domvikar in Graz und Leiter des Domchores ernannt. Daneben unterrichtete er noch Religion am Gymnasium. 1937 erfolgte die Ernennung zum Domkapellmeister. Während des Zweiten Weltkrieges beziehungsweise der Nazizeit gelang es ihm nur mühsam, den Grazer Domchor funktionstüchtig zu halten.

Nach 1945 gelang es Lippe bald, den Grazer Domchor zu einem sakralen Klangkörper von höchstem Niveau zu entwickeln. Er unternahm mit diesem Chor mehrere Konzertreisen ins Ausland, so zum Beispiel nach Deutschland, Frankreich, Italien und in die Schweiz. 1960 wirkte er musikalisch beim Eucharistischen Weltkongress mit, und im Oktober 1963 dirigierte er in Rom während des II. Vatikanums in Anwesenheit von Papst Paul VI. Die « Hohe Messe » von Johann Sebastian Bach. In diesen Jahren studierte Lippe viele musikalische Werke mit dem Domchor ein. Am bekanntesten wurde das Oratorium « Das Buch mit den sieben Siegeln » von dem Wiener Spätromantiker Franz Schmidt, das er 1949 erstmals aufführte und danach oft wiederholte. 1965 wurde es auf Schallplatte aufgenommen.

In Graz war Lippe auch Vorsitzender der Diözesankommission für Musik und Leiter der diözesanen Kirchenmusikschule für die besondere Ausbildung von Kirchenmusikern. In seiner Grazer Zeit wurde er zum Päpstlichen Ehrenkämmerer (Monsignore) ernannt, und vom Bundespräsidenten erhielt 1953 er den Berufstitel Professor verliehen. Ab 1948 war er zeitweise und zusätzlich Kapellmeister der Wiener Hofburgkapelle.

Anfang 1964 erhielt Lippe den Ruf, die Leitung des Chores der Ostberliner Sankt-Hedwigs-Kathedrale zu übernehmen. Als österreichischem Staatsbürger war es für ihn kein Problem, in Ostberlin tätig zu sein, weil er ohne Probleme jederzeit die Grenze (« Berliner Mauer ») überqueren konnte. Er war diesbezüglich kein Einzelfall. Österreichische Staatsbürger, die damals in Ostberlin beziehungsweise der DDR uneingeschränkt lebten, waren und andere der Schriftsteller Bert Brecht, der Komponist der DDR-Hymne Hans Eisler und der spätere Bischof von Görlitz, nunmehr von Augsburg, Konrad Zdarsa. Allerdings geriet der Grazer Domchor nach seinem Abgang in den folgenden Jahren in eine gewisse Krise (Abspaltung des Grazer Konzertchores).

Lippe leitete den Chor der Sankt-Hedwigs-Kathedrale mit ebensolchem Engagement wie den Grazer Domchor und unternahm mit diesem zahlreiche Reisen ins Ausland, so nach Italien, Frankreich, Portugal, Spanien und Japan. Damit wurde auch ein besonderer politischer Akzent in der Zeit des Höhepunkts des Kalten Kriegs gesetzt. Die Musik wurde somit zum Botschafter der Verständigung und des Friedens sowie für die Zusammengehörigkeit über die Grenzen von Sprachen und Nationen hinweg. Gleichzeitig war er Leiter des Kirchenmusikalischen Referates in Berlin. 1967 wurde er zum Päpstlichen Hausprälaten ernannt.

Lippe, der Konzerte auch im Frack dirigierte, verstarb nach Krankheit noch nicht 69-jährig in einem Berliner Krankenhaus und wurde seinem Wunsch gemäß in Sankt Anna am Aigen begraben :

« In der Großstadt ist man rasch vergessen, zu Hauses betet doch bald wer ein Vaterunser an einem Grabe. »

Das Requiem wurde im Grazer Dom unter Beteiligung des Chores der Sankt-Hedwigs-Kathedrale von Bischof Johann Weber zelebriert.

Dominik Josef Peterlini

Dominik Josef Peterlini, österreichischer Musiker, Chorleiter, Pädagoge : geboren 4. April 1875 in Wien ; gestorben 8. April 1944 ebenda.

Dominik Peterlini stammte aus einer Südtiroler Fabrikantenfamilie und kam im 7. Wiener Gemeindebezirk Neubau, Mariahilfer Straße 6, zur Welt. Er wuchs in einem wohlhabenden Elternhaus auf, sein Vater Andreas Peterlini war Rohr- und Strohsesselfabrikant, seine Mutter Katharina (verehelichte Brandstetter) firmierte als Feld- und Strohsesselfabrikantin. Peterlini bekam bereits frühzeitig Musikunterricht, anfangs Violinunterricht bei seinem Vater, später vervollständigte er seine Studien bei Franz Xaver Haberl und Michæl Haller in Regensburg sowie Albanus Schachleiter in Prag. Um 1890 gründete Peterlini mit Schülern des Wiener Konservatoriums ein kleines Orchester und leitete dies auch. Die 1895 von ihm gegründeten Peterlini-Sängerknaben waren ein Knabenchor, aus dem sich später die Wiener Sängerknaben entwickelten. 1919 errichtete Peterlini auf seinem Landsitz in Mauer bei Wien ein « Erholungsheim » für den Sängerknaben-Chor. Von 1925 bis 1932 war Peterlini Professor an der Wiener Musikakademie, während dieser Zeit gründete er auch in Mauer eine Kindersingschule. Ab den 1890er Jahren wirkte er in Wiener Kirchen als Chorregent, anfangs in der Kapuzinerkirche und Altlerchenfelder Kirche, später in der Universitätskirche und Lazaristenkirche und zuletzt bis 1939 in der Laimgrubenkirche.

Peterlini wurde am 14. April 1944 auf dem Friedhof Mauer beigesetzt. 1954 wurde ihm zu Ehren im Liesinger Bezirksteil Mauer die Peterlinigasse nach ihm benannt ; davor hieß die Straße Draschegasse, weshalb sie im Zuge der Neubegrenzung und Neunummerierung des Gemeindebezirks Liesing (siehe 23. , 24. und 25. Bezirk) zur Vermeidung von Straßennamenredundanzen umbenannt werden mußte, da im Bezirksteil Inzersdorf bereits eine Draschestraße existierte. In der Westbahnstraße 40 im Bezirk Neubau erinnert eine Gedenktafel an Peterlinis Wirken als Direktor der Chorgesangs- und Musikschule im Katholischen Jünglingsverein « Maria-Hilf » und Gründer der « Peterlini-Sängerknaben » . In der Langen Gasse 96 in Mauer, wo Peterlini zuletzt lebte, ist ebenfalls eine Gedenktafel angebracht. Sein Nachlaß befindet sich in der Musiksammlung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek.

Felix Prohaska

The Austrian conductor Felix Prohaska was born on 16 May 1912 in Vienna, and died on 29 March 1987 in Vienna.

He was the son of composer Karl Prohaska (1869-1927) . He received his primary music education at home with his father. Then, he studied piano with Eduard Steuermann, and theory with Egon Kornauth and Hans Gál.

He served as « répétiteur » at the Graz Opera House, from 1936 to 1939. He conducted at the Duisburg Opera House, from 1939 to 1941. He conducted at the Strasbourg Opera House, from 1941 to 1943. He was named Ist « Kapellmeister » of the « Deutschen Oper » in Prague, from 1943 to 1945. Prohaska rehabilitated the Salzburg Festival.

After World War II, Prohaska conducted for many years at the Vienna State Opera (1945-1955) . Principal conductor and general music-director of the Frankfurt-am-Main Opera, from 1955 to 1961, before his appointment as director of the Frankfurt « Hochschule für Musik » . He conducted at the Hanover Opera House, from 1965 to 1974, and was director of the Hanover « Hochschule für Musik » , from 1961-1975. He, again, conducted at the Vienna State Opera, from 1964-1967. For a short period, he taught at the Vienna Conservatory and, from 1961 to 1975, at the Vienna « Musikhochschule » .

Prohaska is noted for his recordings for the « Vanguard Classics » label of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Franz Schubert, and Gustav Mahler. The soloists in his Bach recordings were the leading performers at the Vienna State Opera, after World War II. The members of the Bach Guild choir and orchestra were drawn from the Vienna State Opera chorus and the Vienna Philharmonic. Together, with Hermann Scherchen, who also drew upon Viennese forces for his Bach recordings, Prohaska was kind of a pioneer in recordings of Bach's vocal works in the early 1950's. In preparing the works for recording, all efforts were made to insure a reading as close to Bach's intentions as possible. The chorus and the orchestra were held to the approximate size of Bach's own and, wherever possible, authentic instruments were used.

Hugo Reichenberger (geboren 28. Juli 1873 in München ; gestorben 11. Oktober 1938 ebenda) war ein deutsch-österreichischer Dirigent und Komponist.

Hugo Reichenberger war der Sohn des Münchner Kaufmannes Louis Reichenberger und dessen Frau Pauline, geborene Fay aus Wiesbaden. Reichenberger besuchte das humanistische Maximiliansgymnasium in München. Von 1882 bis 1884 bekam er Klavier- und Theorieunterricht bei Heinrich Schwartz, und trat bereits im Alter von 11 Jahren als Pianist und Komponist im Museumssaal auf. Wenig später bestätigte Hermann Levi sein außergewöhnliches Talent. Reichenberger wurde außerdem durch Hofkapellmeister Friedrich Wilhelm Meyer und Eugenie Menter, ab 1889 auch durch Ludwig Thuille unterrichtet und gefördert. Nach einem Jahr beim Militär begann Reichenberger 1893 ein Universitätsstudium in München, im Rahmen dessen er die Fächer Geschichte der Oper, Literatur, Anthropologie, Akustik und Philosophie belegte.

Im Sommer 1894 erhielt Reichenberger ein erstes Engagement als zweiter Kapellmeister und Chordirigent in Bad Kissingen. Es folgten Anstellungen in Breslau, Aachen und als erster Kapellmeister nach Bremen. Im Jahr 1897 veröffentlichte er zwei Liedsammlungen bei Josef Aibl in München. 1898 erteilte ihn der Ruf zum Hofkapellmeister des königlichen Hoftheaters in Stuttgart. Eine Liaison mit der beliebten Stuttgarter Opernsängerin Anna Sutter, aus der ein unehelicher Sohn Felix Sutter (geboren 1902) stammte, kostete ihn nach 5 Jahren den württembergischen Hofkapellmeister-Posten. Im Winter 1903 gab er ein sehr erfolgreiches, mehrere Konzerte umfassendes Gastdirigat in Madrid. Nach dem Tod Zumpes 1903 übernahm er für zwei Jahre den Posten des Hofkapellmeisters des königlichen Hoftheaters in München. Dort leitete er mehrere Ur- und Erstaufführungen (und andere Wolf-Ferraris Die neugierigen Frauen ; Max von Schillings Der Pfeifertag ; Karel Weis Der polnische Jude ; Felix Weingartners Orestes) . 1905 ehelichte er die um 12 Jahre jüngere Münchner Kaufmannstochter Frieda Kapfer, weshalb er vom Judentum zum Katholizismus konvertierte. In seiner Zeit als erster Kapellmeister am Opernhaus in Frankfurt-am-Main 1905 bis 1908 leitete er die dortige Erstaufführung von Richard Straußs Oper Salome am 6. Februar 1907. Im Februar 1908 gastierte er am Concertgebouw Amsterdam.

Ab dem 1. September 1908 trat Reichenberger sein Engagement an der von Felix Weingartner geleiteten Wiener Hofoper an, wo er bis 1935 tätig war. Hier dirigierte er am 24. März 1909 die Erstaufführung von Richard Straußs Elektra und im Jahr 1911 seinen ersten Wiener Der Ring des Nibelungen. Am 15. März 1913 leitete Reichenberger die Uraufführung von Franz Schrekers Das Spielwerk und die Prinzessin - zeitgleich mit Frankfurt. Reichenberger wurde aufgrund der großen Erfolge mehrerer Gastdirigate in Madrid vom spanischen König im März 1914 mit dem Komturkreuz des spanischen Ordens Isabella der Katholischen ausgezeichnet.

Seinen zweijährigen Kriegsdienst von Sommer 1914 bis 1916 leistete er im I. Bayrischen Feldartillerieregiment Prinzregent Luitpold. Im Herbst 1916 wurde er für eine Tournee an der Westfront beurlaubt, die er gemeinsam mit den SängerInnen Berta Morena und Carl Perron absolvierte. Im August 1916 kehrte er wieder an die Wiener Hofoper zurück. Am 27. April 1917 fand unter seiner Leitung die Wiener Erstaufführung von Alexander von Zemlinskys Eine florentinische Tragödie statt. Am 16. Februar 1918 (im letzten Kriegsjahr) brachte Reichenberger Leoš Janáčeks Oper Jenůfa erstmals in Wien heraus. Reichenberger war zuvor extra nach Prag gereist, um sich ein Urteil über den völlig unbekanntem mährischen Komponisten zu bilden. Er hat sich nicht nur vehement für « Její pastorkyňa » eingesetzt, sondern die Übersetzung ins Deutsche von Max Brod bearbeitet und den Titel « Jenůfa » durchgesetzt. Es gab ebenfalls einen Briefwechsel zwischen ihm und Leoš Janáček in Brünn.

Im Jahr 1919 zeichneten Reichenberger und der Sänger Wiedemann als führende Männer des Personalausschusses der Oper für die « Revolte » des Opernpersonals gegen die Berufung von Richard Strauß in die Operndirektion verantwortlich. Dem Ereignis folgte das Zerwürfnis Reichenbergers mit Strauß. Am Nationaltheater in München hatte Reichenberger von Dezember 1919 bis April 1920 ein fünfmonatiges Gastspiel und zwei Gastdirigate an der Berliner Philharmonie. Im September 1920 leitete er Hans Pfitzners Palestrina bei den Münchner Festspielen und im Oktober kam es unter anderem zur Aufführung von Franz Schmidts 4. Symphonie an der Berliner Philharmonie. Im Januar 1921 führten Gastdirigate Reichenberger nach Warschau Warschau (Philharmonie) und im Herbst für zwei Monate an die Opera Națională București. Von 1923 bis 1925 leitete er die Kapellmeisterschule der Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst in Wien. Im Jahr 1924 wurde ihm der Titel Professor verliehen. Organisiert von Gruder-Guntram unternahm Reichenberger 1933 eine Operntournee nach Ägypten, wo unter anderem die Oper Aida von Giuseppe Verdi in Kairo aufgeführt wurde. Ende 1934 war er als Gastdirigent mit Richard Straußs Arabella in Antwerpen. Nach jahrelanger Zugehörigkeit erhielt Reichenberger am 12. Februar 1935 ein Kündigungsschreiben der Wiener Staatsoperndirektion. Am 28. Juni 1935 fand sein 27-jähriges Wirken an der Wiener Hof- und Staatsoper unter fünf verschiedenen Direktionen mit Lohengrin als Abschiedsvorstellung ein Ende. Er war im Alter von 61 Jahren zwangspensioniert worden. München Reichenberger übersiedelte noch im Sommer 1935 in seine Heimatstadt München. Nachdem er 1935-1936 noch einige Male als Gast an der Wiener Staatsoper war, gab es die endgültig letzte Vorstellung in Wien mit Tosca am 15. März 1936. Am 23. April 1936 leitete er eine Festvorstellung von Beethovens Fidelio im « Théâtre de la Monnaie » in Brüssel.

Aufgrund eines plötzlichen Herztodes starb Reichenberger am 11. Oktober 1938 in seiner Wohnung in München und wurde auf dem Waldfriedhof in München beigesetzt, und 1968 auf den Hietzinger Friedhof in Wien überführt. Aus der Ehe mit Frieda Kapfer stammte ein Sohn, Walter Reichenberger (1908-1990) .

Hugo Reichenberger, Komponist, Dirigent : geboren 28. Juli 1873 in München ; gestorben 11. Oktober 1938 in München.

Hugo Reichenberger hat mit seiner dirigentischen Qualifikation und Versiertheit durch 27 Jahre (1908-1935) dem Wiener Opernbetrieb Kontinuität gegeben und nachweisbar auch beachtliche Impulse gerade bei Ur- und Erstaufführungen gesetzt. Er war einer der letzten Dirigenten, die noch in persönlichem Kontakt mit den großen Schöpfern unsterblicher Opernwerke des 20. Jahrhunderts standen, wie Richard Strauß, Leoš Janáček, Giacomo Puccini, Jules Massenet, Franz Schreker und Wilhelm Kienzl oder Franz Lehár - dieses fand auch in der Korrespondenz des Künstlers Niederschlag.

Der in München geborene Dirigent und Komponist Hugo Reichenberger wirkte nach Stationen in Stuttgart, München und Frankfurt über ein Vierteljahrhundert an der Wiener Hof- beziehungsweise Staatsoper. Er war dreifacher Hofkapellmeister (Württemberg, Bayern und Österreich) und einer der längstdienenden Dirigenten der Wiener Oper. Schon Hofoperndirektor Gustav Mahler hat 1903 Interesse bekundet, den bayerischen Hofkapellmeister Hugo Reichenberger nach Wien zu holen. Reichenberger ; 1908 von Felix Weingartner an die Wiener Hofoper geholt, hat bis 1935 unter fünf verschiedenen Direktoren an der Wiener Oper gewirkt, und somit Wiener Operngeschichte geschrieben. Er war eine der Säulen des Ensembles : Zu den Höhepunkten seiner Laufbahn gehören neben unzähligen Opern-Neueinstudierungen die Wiener Erstaufführungen von Richard Straußs Oper « Elektra » 1909 und von Leoš Janáčeks Oper « Jenůfa » 1918. Auch Werke seiner Zeitgenossen Alexander von Zemlinsky, Franz Schreker und Wilhelm Kienzl hat Reichenberger aus der Taufe gehoben. Reichenberger arbeitete eng mit Berühmtheiten wie Selma Kurz, Lotte Lehmann, Maria Jeritzka, Leo Slezak oder Richard Mayr beziehungsweise mit Gästen wie Enrico Caruso und Georges Baklanoff zusammen. Die Zahl der von ihm an der Wiener Oper geleiteten Aufführungen beläuft sich auf circa 2.200 .

Reichenberger gastierte außerhalb seiner Wiener Tätigkeit als Botschafter Wiener Musiziertradition von Amsterdam und Berlin bis Rom, mehrwöchige Dirigate beziehungsweise Gastspiele führten ihn und andere nach Bukarest, Madrid und Ägypten. Er war ein großer Förderer neuer Musik und nahm vorzugsweise österreichische Komponisten wie Franz Schmidt und Karl Weigl in seine Konzertprogramme auf. Er war häufiger Gast in den großen Wiener Konzerthäusern und wirkte nicht zuletzt auch als Leiter einer Dirigentenklasse an der Akademie für Musik in Wien.

Ludwig R th

Deutscher Musiker und Bandleader von Tanzorchestern Lewis Ruth (eigentlich Ludwig R th) : geboren 30. Januar 1889 in Landau in der Pfalz ; gestorben 2. April 1941 in Durban, S dafrika, nach anderen Quellen im Juli 1947 in Windhuk, heute Namibia.

Ludwig R th wurde als Sohn eines Generaloberarztes geboren. Ab 1909 studierte er in M nchen an der K niglichen Akademie f r Tonkunst (Fl te, Kompositionslehre und Dirigieren) sowie an der M nchner Universit t (Philosophie, Medizin und Musikwissenschaft) . Er ging 1912 als Solofl tist an die Hofoper Stuttgart und spielte als Erster Fl tist in Leipzig und M nchen ; dort dirigierte er seit 1914 den Akademischen Orchesterverband. Nach ersten Versuchen als Orchestermusiker und Dirigent wurde er im Ersten Weltkrieg als Soldat eingezogen, aber dann im Rahmen der « Kulturpropaganda » als Gastdirigent im neutralen Ausland eingesetzt.

Nach dem Krieg leitete R th zun chst das Landes-Sinfonie-Orchester f r das Saarland und die Pfalz, konnte sich im klassischen Fach aber nicht endg ltig durchsetzen. Um sich  ber Wasser zu halten, nahm er Gelegenheitsarbeitern in Unterhaltungsetablissemments an und kam so auf die Idee, 1925 die « Lewis Ruth-Band » mit ihm als Saxophonisten zu gr nden. Er spielte von da an Unterhaltungsmusik und vor allem Jazz, womit sich auch die Anglisierung seines Namens zu Lewis Ruth erkl rt. Einen Riesenerfolg hatte seine Band durch die Zusammenarbeit mit Theo Mackeben. Dieser war musikalischer Leiter bei Bertolt Brecht und Kurt Weill und besetzte die Urauff hrung der Dreigroschenoper mit Ludwig R ths Band, die dann auch alle anderen Auff hrungen der Dreigroschenoper begleitete und sich f r dieses Projekt selbst den Namen Dreigroschenband gab. 1933 dirigierte R th auch die Urauff hrung der Operette Bezauberndes Fr ulein von Ralph Benatzky.

Sowohl unter dem Namen Lewis Ruth als auch Ludwig R th nahm der « jazzende Symphoniker » (Werbung der Schallplattenfirma Electrola) zwischen 1928 und 1937 rund 400 Schellackplatten auf, bei denen er meist als Begleitorchester von Schlagerinterpreten auftaucht. Seine Band wirkte daneben in Theater- und Filmproduktionen mit, so auch in dem Ufa-Streifen Die Drei von der Tankstelle. Insgesamt war das Ludwig-R th-Orchester an fast zwanzig Filmproduktionen beteiligt. In zwei Filmen (Die drei von der Tankstelle sowie Ein Tango f r Dich) war L th mit seinem Orchester auch auf der Leinwand zu sehen. L ngere Zeit wirkte er neben Werner Schmidt-Boelcke als Kapellmeister am Berliner Metropol-Theater.

Weil Ludwig R th (nach der Trennung von seiner Ehefrau) mit der J din Vera Cohn-Moser zusammenlebte, kam es zu Anfeindungen durch die Nationalsozialisten. Diese wurden nach der Geburt der gemeinsamen Tochter Gabrielle immer heftiger. 1937 verlie  R th schlie lich Deutschland. Sein Orchester  bernahm Hans Carste, mit dem R th zusammengearbeitet hatte. R th emigrierte nach S dwest-Afrika und heiratete dort ein Jahr sp ter seine inzwischen nachgekommene Lebensgef hrtin. Er versuchte, eine neue Musikkarriere zu starten, konnte sich aber im Exil (nicht zuletzt wegen Boykottbestrebungen dort lebender Anh nger und Mitglieder der NSDAP) nicht wirklich durchsetzen. So trat er im Oktober 1940 in die auf Seiten Gro britanniens k mpfende Armee S dafrikas ein. Nach Angaben seiner Tochter Gabi Robinson fiel Ludwig R th am 2. April 1941 bei Durban einem Badeunfall zum Opfer. Die

Filmenzyklopädie IMDb nennt den Juli 1947 als Todesdatum.

Ludwig RÜTH wird am 30. Januar 1889 in Landau / Pfalz geboren. Als Sohn eines Arztes kommt er in den Genuss einer akademischen Ausbildung. Von 1909 bis 1911 studiert er an der Königlichen Musikschule / Akademie der Tonkunst in München unter Professor Rudolf Tillmetz Flöte sowie bei Anton Beer-Walbrunn Kompositionslehre und Dirigieren. Nebenbei noch an der Münchner Universität Musikwissenschaft, Philosophie und Medizin.

An der Hofoper in Stuttgart spielte Ludwig RÜTH ab 1912 zunächst als Soloflötist, dann in Leipzig und München als erster Flötist. In der Bayrischen Landeshauptstadt dirigierte er ab 1914 den Akademischen Orchesterverband.

Bereits ab 1914 tritt Ludwig RÜTH (als Dirigent) in klassischen Konzerten auch in Berlin auf. Zwar wird Ludwig RÜTH im Ersten Weltkrieg als Soldat eingezogen, er kann aber weiter als Musiker und Konzert-Dirigent arbeiten. Ausgedehnte Konzertreisen führen ihn von Wien, quer durch Deutschland bis nach Dänemark und Schweden. Nach Ende des Krieges wurde er zusammen mit Fritz Grunert am 14. September 1919 erster Kapellmeister des neu gegründeten Landes-Sinfonie-Orchester für Pfalz und Saarland in Landau. Diesen Posten hatte RÜTH jedoch nur ein Jahr inne, danach schloßen sich bis Mitte der zwanziger Jahre wieder Konzertreisen durch verschiedenste Städte an. Anfang der zwanziger Jahre war für RÜTH dann Wien der Lebensmittelpunkt.

Die Konkurrenz war jedoch zu groß, als klassischer Dirigent war in der direkten Nachkriegs- und Inflationszeit kaum ein Auskommen zu verdienen. Wie viele seiner Kollegen wechselte auch Ludwig RÜTH zur Unterhaltungsmusik. Der Weg von der Flöte zum Saxophon war nicht weit, ab etwa 1925 stellte er Jazz-Kapelle zusammen um im « Variété » und Kabaretts aufzutreten.

Gemäß der Zeit wurde aus dem bürgerlichen, klassischen Dirigenten Ludwig RÜTH der anglophile Lewis Ruth.

Bis Anfang 1928 tingelte er mit durchschnittlichem Erfolg, teils als Lewis Ruth Band, aber auch als Lewis Ruth and his Joe Larsen Band durch Berliner Vergnügungstätten. Der große Durchbruch kam dann im Sommer 1928, als ihn und sein Orchester, Kurt Weil und Theo Mackeben für die Dreigroschenoper verpflichteten.

Bis 1933 tritt das Orchester unter dem Namen Lewis Ruth auf. Einspielungen entstehen aber auch zum Beispiel als Dreigroschenoper-Band. Auf Schallplatte wird die Electrola ab 1931 neue Heimat für Ludwig Rütth / Lewis Ruth. Hier wird er auch als der « jazzende Symphoniker » beworben. Regelmäßige Auftritte im Rundfunk machen den Musiker und sein Orchester aber auch über die Landesgrenzen hinaus bekannt. Auch in der Verfilmung der Dreigroschenoper durch Georg Wilhelm Pabst 1930-1931 ist wieder die Lewis Ruth Band unter Leitung von Theo Mackeben zu hören.

Neben den Auftritten sowie den Platteneinspielungen ist Ludwig Rütth mit seinem Orchester auch im jungen Tonfilm regelmäßig zu hören - und zu sehen.

Bei der Electrola trifft Ludwig Rütth mit dem jungen Arrangeur Hans Carste zusammen. Dieser instrumentiert nun viele Einspielungen des Orchesters auf Schallplatte. Ab 1932 wird Hans Carste auch festes Orchestermitglied ; Ludwig Rütth am Saxophon und Carste am Klavier teilen sich ab 1932 die Orchesterleitung. Neben dem Schallplatten-Orchester, mit welchem Rütth auch in anderen Spielstätten und Tanzlokalen auftritt, teilt er sich bald mit Werner Schmidt-Boelcke die Stelle als erster Kapellmeister am Berliner Metropol-Theater. Unter seiner Leitung werden 1935 im Metropol Theater unter anderem Revue-Operetten wie « Ball der Nationen » inszeniert und mit seinem Orchester auch auf Schellackplatte eingespielt.

Zusammen mit Hans Carste geht das Ludwig Rütth Orchester 1934 auf eine ausgedehnte Konzertreise durch mehrere europäische Länder. Nach einigen Monaten Arbeit im Metropol-Theater und für die Schallplattenfirma Electrola folgt 1935 eine weitere Tournee mit dem Orchester durch Deutschland.

Rütth löst dann das « Entertainment-Orchester » auf. Auf den folgenden Einspielungen handelt es sich um eine Studiobesetzung. Rütth und Carste versuchen jedoch auf einen möglichst festen Stamm aus Musikern für die Schallplattenaufnahmen zurück zu greifen. Nur noch vereinzelt stellt der ehemalige Symphonie - Dirigent eine « Show-Band » für Auftritte zusammen. Mit einer dieser Besetzungen tritt er 1937 in Hamburg auf.

Die Pflege der guten Tanzmusik ist gewiß verdienstvoll, besonders, wenn sie in so kultivierter und geschmackvoller Weise geboten wird wie im Boccaccio-Casino. Man hat hier immer Wert auf Kapellen von Rang und Namen gelegt, und dieser Vorzug, dem man der musikalischen Unterhaltung hat angedeihen lassen, hat nicht zuletzt dazu beigetragen, daß diese Vergnügsstätte am Hauptbahnhof sich immer steigender Beliebtheit erfreut.

In diesem Monat spielt im Boccaccio die Kapelle Ludwig Rütth, die sich rühmen darf, durch ihre klingende Melodik und durch ihren beschwingten Rhythmus die Tanzfreudigkeit immer aufs neue zu steigern. Man schätzt das ausgezeichnete Zusammenspiel des Orchesters, das sich im besonderen Maße durch seine farbige Instrumentation und durch die Klangschönheit des Spiels auszeichnet. Die Kapelle Rütth, die am Nachmittag und Abend spielt.

Ergänzt durch Solisten wie Walter Dobschinski und Franz Thon, sowie den Arrangements von ihm und Carste entstehen 1937 noch einige recht jazzige Aufnahmen.

Die (erfolgreiche) Karriere von Ludwig Rütth, sowohl auf Schallplatte, wie auch allgemein, endete jedoch im frühen Herbst 1937. Im September 1937 verlässt Rütth seine Heimat. Das (Schallplatten) Orchester wird von Hans Carste übernommen. Neue Aufnahmen erscheinen zunächst unter dem Namen « Orchester Ludwig Rüh - Leitung Hans Carste ». Ab 1938 wird aus der Rüh-Band auf dem Label Electrola dann das Orchester Hans Carste. Ludwig Rüh hatte Deutschland verlassen.

So erfolgreich Ludwig Rüh (auch auf Schallplatte) bis zum Ende seiner Karriere war, so tragisch sein persönlicher Lebenslauf. Anfang der 1930er Jahre trennte sich Rüh von seiner ersten Frau ; er zog mit seiner jüdischen Lebensgefährtin zusammen. Noch im faschistischen Deutschland wurde das Paar Eltern einer (unehelichen) Tochter. Spätestens ab den « Nürnberger Rassengesetzen » 1935 war an eine legitime Ehe der Familie in Deutschland nicht mehr zu denken. Im gleichen Jahr kam seine Tochter zur Welt. Rüh sah sich Anfeindungen unter anderem der RMK (Reichs Musikammer) ausgesetzt. Unter dem Vorwand Verwandte in Südwest-Afrika (ehemalige deutsche Kolonie, heute Namibia) besuchen zu wollen, verließ Ludwig Rüh im September 1937 Deutschland. 1938 folgte seine Lebensgefährtin mit der gemeinsamen Tochter. Ludwig Rüh heiratete fern der Heimat seine Frau.

Seine Karriere war jedoch beendet. Zwar versuchte er sich weiterhin als Musiker, alleine die Abgeschiedenheit verhinderte ein Auskommen für seine Familie. 1940 trat er der Armee Südafrikas bei. Diese war damals Teil der britischen Armee. Für einen recht geringen Sold war Rüh nun Soldat im Musikkorps eines kleinen afrikanischen Landes. Die finanziellen Schwierigkeiten der Familie zuvor lassen sich nur erahnen.

Über den Tod von Ludwig Rüh liegen zwei Versionen vor. Leider wurde bis dato für keine der beiden eine nachvollziehbare Quelle offen oder zur Verfügung gestellt.

Nach Knut Wolfram (wohl basierend auf Erzählungen der Tochter) starb Ludwig Rüh am 2. April 1941 in Durban, Südafrika, bei einem Unfall im offenen Meer. Wiederbelebungsversuche scheiterten. Gänzlich unbestätigte Quellen geben als Sterbeort Juni 1947 (Windhuk / Namibia) an. Was davon stimmt - vollkommen ungeklärt ! Vielleicht finden sich im Laufe der Jahre noch Quellen und Bestätigungen über den Tod von Ludwig Rüh hier. Verdient hätte es der Lebenslauf und Mensch allemal.

The Austrian conductor of Jewish ancestry Rudolf Schwarz was born on 29 April 1905 in Vienna and died on 30 January 1994 in London, aged 88. He became a British citizen and spent the latter half of his life in England.

Schwarz was born in a Jewish family and, at the age of 6, began piano lessons followed shortly by the violin. His father was opposed to his son's ambition to become a conductor, and money for music lessons and gallery tickets at the Opera came from him given lessons himself. He studied with the composers Richard Robert, Hans Gál and Richard Strauß. At the age of 17, he played viola in the Vienna State Opera Orchestra and the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, in 1922, and he made his conducting debut in Düsseldorf as assistant to Georg Szell in 1924. Schwarz also acted as director of the Choral Society in Rheydt.

After Opera experience in Düsseldorf, Schwarz moved to Karlsruhe in 1927, as 1st conductor at the State Theatre alongside Josef Krips and Joseph Keilberth. There, he conducted all Wagner Operas, except « Tristan und Isolde », and led Symphonic concerts. The Civil Service Law of 7 April 1933 led to his dismissal by the Nazis because he was Jewish.

In 1936, he became a director of the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » in Berlin, a German-Jewish cultural organization backed by the Nazi Propaganda Ministry of Josef Goebbels, which allowed Jewish artists to perform for Jewish audiences. He also conducted in Gothenburg, between 1936 and 1938. The Nazis imprisoned him, from 1939 to 1940. When the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » was dissolved in 1941, he was deported to Auschwitz, but Wilhelm Furtwängler's wife Zitla secured his release. He was, then, sent to Sachsenhausen and ended-up in Bergen-Belsen concentration camp, in 1945. While at Auschwitz, he suffered a broken shoulder-blade, which inhibited his gestures as a conductor in later life. The effects of this injury on his conducting style can be seen in a DVD of him conducting the Finale of the Brahms Violin Concerto with David Oistrakh, in May 1958.

It is not clear why Schwarz did not attempt to leave Germany in 1939. Possible explanations include the security of his employment with the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » and the difficulty of finding work elsewhere.

After the end of World War II, Schwarz went to Sweden to recover from typhoid and, there, met his future 2nd wife Greta. In 1946, he received an offer to join the Berlin Opera as conductor, which he refused.

He was preparing to go to America when, in 1947, his brother in London sent him an advertisement for a post in Bournemouth. After the trial concerts, the Orchestra voted unanimously for his appointment in 1947 to lead the newly-reformed Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra, despite objections from the Musicians' Union which tried to prevent his appointment on the grounds that there were already too many non-British musicians in the country. He was central to re-building the Bournemouth Municipal Orchestra, with notable performances of Beethoven's 9th Symphony ; Mahler's « Song of the Earth » with Kathleen Ferrier and Richard Lewis ; and Arnold Bax's 3rd Symphony at the Festival Hall in 1951. The workload was immense, as Schwarz was required to lead 150 concerts in his 1st season.

Schwarz received praise from Thomas Beecham as an « able conductor » for his work with the Bournemouth Orchestra and, subsequently, held Principal Conductor positions with the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra (1951-1957) and the BBC Symphony Orchestra. With the BBC Symphony Orchestra, he was praised for his efforts « to reach the truth of the music » . However, in the 1961-1962 season, his interpretation of Mahler's Symphony No. 9 was criticized in the press as « blatant misrepresentation » , and as moving « from bad to worse » . In addition to press criticism, Schwarz contended with the appointment in 1959 of William Glock as Director of Music at the BBC. Conflict between Glock and Schwarz over such matters as style and repertoire may have contributed to the conductor's departure from the organization in 1962.

In 1964, Schwarz was appointed Artistic Director and Principal Conductor of the Northern Sinfonia, where he served until 1973. Schwarz returned to Bournemouth as a regular guest, from 1970 to 1979, and also held guest-appointments in Bergen, and with the English Opera Group and National Youth Orchestra. In June 1973, he was appointed a Commander of the Order of the British Empire.

Schwarz received much praise from Northern Sinfonia musicians who played under him : violinist Martin Hughes said that his « sense of rhythm, structure and tempo was exceptional » and clarinetist George McDonald reflected that « he made the Sinfonia listen to themselves (blend with each other) ; he helped form the Orchestra's style and gave them musical discipline » . Oboist Janet Craxton praised his selflessness, while David Patmore considers that he « may not have been a great conductor, but he certainly was a great musician » .

Simon Rattle acknowledged Schwarz as a « formative influence » who taught him « the paramount importance of imposing his pulse on the music he played » : According to Rattle, Schwarz never « gave any interpretation that didn't have a real truth about it » .

Schwarz's 1958 recording of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 5 with the London Symphony Orchestra originally for the « Everest » label has been highly-praised. In addition, he conducted for many Concerto recordings, as well as the Antonín Dvořák « Slavonic Dances » with the BBC Symphony Orchestra, and Franz Liszt « Hungarian Rhapsodies » with the Philharmonia Orchestra. He started and ended his recording career with the Bournemouth Orchestra : several Overtures in the early 1950's and an LP of Franz Schubert Overtures in 1980 (all for « EMI ») . There are further broadcast recordings by Schwarz in the British Library Sound Archive.

Rudolph Schwarz became a fairly familiar conductor in England from the 1950's on, and developed a small but dedicated following abroad from numerous recordings on the « EMI » and « Everest » labels. Schwarz conducted both in the concert-hall and the Opera House, and while he could be eccentric in some of his interpretations (Gustav Mahler, particularly) , he was generally held in high-regard by both critics and public. As a Vienna-born Jew, Schwarz suffered Nazi persecution during the War-time era and, after the War, relocated to England, where he spent the remainder of his career. There, he became known for conducting many contemporary works by British composers (Bliss, Tippett, Rubbra, Hamilton, and others) and for his controversial Mahler. But Schwarz was adept at the standards as well and was highly-respected by the musicians in the Orchestras he led. In the latter-20th Century, Schwarz enjoyed a swell of attention when several of his recordings, like the 1958 Mahler 5th, were re-issued on budget labels. Today, many of his recordings are available on « Testament » , « Brana Records » , « BBC Legends » , and « Danacord » .

Rudolph (or Rudolf) Schwarz studied music with Richard Strauß and Hans Gál, and, at 18, secured the post of « répétiteur » at the Düsseldorf Opera. He served as an associate-conductor at the Karlsruhe State Theater, from 1927 to 1933. In 1936, he was appointed music-director at the Berlin-based Jewish Cultural Organization.

In 1939, he was imprisoned by the Nazis and, 2 years later, sent to Auschwitz, where he received a shoulder injury that would affect his conducting style for the rest of his life. In 1943, Schwarz was transferred, spending the remainder of the War years in other Nazi concentration camps, including Bergen-Belsen.

Schwarz traveled to England in 1947 and was appointed conductor of the Bournemouth Municipal (later, Symphony) Orchestra. The 1950's were, perhaps, his most active decade : he served as music-director of the City of Birmingham Symphony Orchestra, from 1951 to 1957 ; and of the BBC Symphony Orchestra, from 1957-1962. He conducted relatively little Opera in England, though he guest-conducted at Sadler's Wells and elsewhere.

From 1964, Schwarz served as principal conductor of the Northern Sinfonia and regularly conducted the Bergen « Harmonien » Symphony Orchestra, in Norway. Schwarz departed his Northern Sinfonia post in 1973 and, for most of the 1970's, he guest-conducted the Bournemouth Symphony Orchestra. In his final decade or so, he was largely inactive.

Erwin Stein

The Austrian musician and writer Erwin Stein was born on 7 November 1885 in Vienna, and died on 17 July 1958 in London. He was prominent as a pupil and friend of Arnold Schönberg, with whom he studied between 1906 and 1910. He was one of Schönberg's principal assistants in organizing the « Society for Private Musical Performances ». In 1924, it was Stein to whom Schönberg entrusted the delicate as well as important task of writing the 1st article, « Neue Formprinzipien » (New Formal Principles) , on the gradual evolution of what was soon to be explicitly formulated as « 12 tone technique ». Until 1938, he lived in Vienna, where he was respected as a music teacher and conductor as well as a writer active on behalf of the music and composers he valued.

After the « Anschluß », he fled to London to escape the Nazis and worked for many years as an editor for the music publishers Boosey & Hawkes. His focus was mainly on Gustav Mahler, Arnold Schönberg and Benjamin Britten (all 3 of whom he knew personally) as well as his colleagues within the Schönberg circle, Alban Berg and Anton Webern.

His books include : « Orpheus in New Guises » (a collection of writings from the period 1924 to 1953) , and « Form and Performance » (1962) . He was the editor of the 1st collection of Schönberg's letters (published in Germany, in 1958 ; and in the United Kingdom, in 1964) . He was also instrumental in setting-up the modern music periodical « Tempo » , in 1939.

Erwin Stein married Sophie Bachmann (1883 ? - 1965) , and their daughter, the pianist Marion Stein, married successively George Lascelles, 7th Earl of Harewood and the Liberal politician Jeremy Thorpe.

Mostly known for his close association with Arnold Schönberg, Erwin Stein was born in Vienna, but like many other Jewish musicians, he emigrated to London in 1938. During the course of Aryanization, Stein was forced to sell his stock-holdings in Universal-Edition. He was also forbidden to publish any further of his writings ; thus, he was forced to go to London in exile, in 1938. Stein worked as an editor for Boosey & Hawkes, his primary focus on the music of Benjamin Britten, Arnold Schönberg and Gustav Mahler.

Prior to moving to London, Stein was well-respected as a conductor, music-teacher and a writer and worked closely with Schönberg in organizing the « Society for Private Musical Performances » .

Erwin Stein, österreichischer Komponist, Dirigent und Musiktheoretiker : geboren 7. November 1885 in Wien ; gestorben 17. Juli 1958 in London.

Erwin Stein wurde als jüngstes Kind des aus Böhmen stammenden und in Wien tätigen Verlegers und Buchhändlers Markus Stein (Manz Verlag) in eine kunstsinnige großbürgerliche Familie jüdischen Ursprungs geboren. Am 19. Januar 1886 konvertierte er gemeinsam mit seiner Mutter und seiner Schwester Helene zum evangelischen Glauben H. B.

Der mittelmäßige Schüler inskribierte zum Wintersemester 1905-1906 am Institut für Musikwissenschaft der Universität Wien, besuchte aber auch philosophische Vorlesungen bei Wilhelm Jerusalem und Friedrich Jodl.

1906-1910 nahm Stein Unterricht bei Arnold Schönberg. « Die Begegnung mit Schönberg hat Steins weiteres Schicksal bestimmt. » Stein wurde zu einem unermüdlichen Vorkämpfer für die Musik seines Lehrers und der des Schönberg-Kreises. In seinen Wiener Jahren war Stein führender Mitarbeiter der Universal-Edition, an der er auch Anteile besaß.

Nach dem « Anschluß » Österreichs an Deutschland 1938 mußte Erwin Stein als Jude seine Anteile an der Universal-Edition verkaufen und nach London emigrieren. Dort wurde er Mitarbeiter des Musikverlags Boosey & Hawkes und förderte und propagierte (wie zuvor in Wien das Arnold Schönbergs) das Werk Benjamin Brittnens.

Am 17. Juli 1958 erlitt Stein einen tödlichen Herzinfarkt. Seine Asche wurde nach einer Feuerbestattung in alle Winde verstreut. Er hinterließ zwölf Lieder, vier Klavierwerke und ein Scherzo für Streichquartett, Bearbeitungen von Werken von Gustav Mahler, Alban Berg, Anton Bruckner, fünf Bücher und mehr als 170 musiktheoretische Aufsätze.

Der Ehe mit Sofie Bachmann entsprang die Pianistin Marion Thorpe. Erwins Geschwister waren der Verleger Richard Stein (1871-1932) (Manz Verlag) , die Theosophin Paula Kemperling (1878-1952) , die im Verlag Manz tätige Emma von Sax (1882-1969) sowie die Malerin Helene Winger (1884-1945) .

Baron Géza von Zichy

The Hungarian composer Géza Zichy was born on 23 July 1849 in Sztára Castle and died on 14 January 1924 in Budapest, aged 74. He was also renowned as the world's 1st professional one-armed pianist. Zichy also published an autobiography in 3 volumes, « Aus meinem Leben » (1911-1924) and some poetry.

Zichy came from a noble family and held the title Count Vasony-Keö. He lost his right-arm in a hunting accident, aged 14 or 15. Still determined to become a pianist, he persevered by writing and performing piano music for the left-hand. In 1873, he began 6 years of study with Franz Liszt. He also studied under Robert Volkmann.

In spite of his limitations, Zichy had a successful career as both a concert pianist and a composer for the next 40 years. He gave entire concerts playing music only for the left-hand, the proceeds of which he gave to charity as he was independently wealthy. He was known for his artistic sensitivity as well as dextrous playing and had several admirers ; including Franz Liszt who wrote glowing reviews of his performances in letters to friends. The Viennese music-critic Eduard Hanslick, who pulled no punches, said Zichy's playing was « the greatest marvel of modern times on the piano » .

From 1891 to 1894, he was Intendant of the Royal Hungarian Opera. His appointment spelt the end of Gustav Mahler's term as music-director.

Among Zichy's many compositions was a left-hand Piano Concerto and several Operas. In addition to his music career, Zichy also worked as a lawyer.

An entire chapter is devoted to Zichy, in : « Piano Music for One Hand » by Theodore Edel (Indiana University Press) ; a comprehensive survey of music written for those pianists who have the use of only one hand.

Géza Graf Zichy zu Vászonykeö, ungarischer Pianist und Komponist : geboren 23. Juli 1849 in Sztára, Österreich-Ungarn, heute Staré, Slowakei ; gestorben 14. Januar 1924 in Budapest.

Géza Zichy, der im Alter von vierzehn Jahren bei einem Jagdunfall den rechten Arm verlor, absolvierte eine Klavierausbildung und andere bei Franz Liszt und studierte Komposition bei Robert Volkmann. Seit 1890 trat er international als Pianist auf, gelobt und andere von dem Musikkritiker Eduard Hanslick. Daneben war er von 1875 bis 1892 Präsident der Königlich Ungarischen Landesmusikakademie und von 1891 bis 1894 Intendant der Oper in Budapest, deren Leiter zu dieser Zeit erst Josef Řebíček (1891-1893) und dann Arthur Nikisch war.

Er komponierte sechs Opern, von denen die Rákóczi-Trilogie den größten Erfolg hatte, außerdem die Kantate Dolores und das Ballett Gemma, ein Klavierkonzert, Klavieretüden für die linke Hand und Lieder. Er veröffentlichte eine dreibändige Autobiographie. Sein Cousin Mihály Zichy (1827-1906) wurde als Maler bekannt.

Carl Michæl Ziehrer

Le compositeur et chef d'orchestre autrichien Carl (Karl) Michæl Ziehrer est né le 2 mai 1843 à Vienne et est mort le 14 novembre 1922 à Vienne.

Le jeune Ziehrer effectue son apprentissage de la musique au Conservatoire de Vienne, auprès de Simon Sechter, et commence à composer en 1862. L'année suivante (1863) , il est repéré par l'éditeur Carl Haslinger qui décide de le publier, et à la fin de cette même année, il dirige son 1er concert à Vienne, dans le but voulu par Haslinger de concurrencer les frères Strauß (Johann fils, Josef et Eduard) . En 1867, il prend la direction d'un nouvel orchestre viennois puis, de 1870 à 1873, il est le chef d'un orchestre militaire, toujours à Vienne (à noter que dans l'intervalle, après la mort d'Haslinger, fin 1868, il est passé chez l'éditeur Ludwig Döblinger) . Et, en 1873, il devient le directeur musical d'un autre orchestre viennois, avec lequel il se produit lors de l'Exposition universelle de 1873 à Vienne.

Dans le cadre de ses activités de chef d'orchestre, Ziehrer fait des tournées en Europe (Allemagne, Roumanie) et, alors qu'il est à la tête d'un autre orchestre militaire viennois (de 1885 à 1893) , il se produit avec lui à l'Exposition universelle de 1893 à Chicago (États-Unis) . De retour en Europe, il obtient encore un poste important en 1907, celui de directeur musical des bals de la Cour Impériale (poste où l'un de ses prédécesseurs était Johann Strauß, père) qu'il conserve jusqu'en 1915.

Ruiné par la Première Guerre mondiale (ses biens sont détruits) , Ziehrer meurt oublié, dans la misère ; n'ayant jamais réussi à s'imposer face aux Strauß.

Comme compositeur, on lui doit pourtant un corpus important, riche de 23 Opérettes et d'environ 600 pièces pour orchestre (valse, polkas, marches, mazurkas) , dont certaines tirées de ses Opérettes comme la « Liebeswalzer » , valse, Opus 537 (1911) , d'après l'Opérette « Die Liebeswalzer » créée en 1908.

Notons encore qu'un film germano-autrichien tourné en 1944, mais sorti seulement en 1949, « Jeunes filles viennoises » , est consacré à la vie de Ziehrer (il est réalisé par Willi Forst, personnifiant en outre le compositeur) .

Signalons que 2 Opérettes de Ziehrer ont été jouées à « Broadway » , New York : « Ein tolles Mädel » (1907) , adaptée l'année suivante sous le titre « Mademoiselle Mischief » ; et « Die Liebeswalzer » (1908) , adaptée en 1911 sous le titre « The Kiss Waltz » , mettant en vedette Robert Warwick.

The Austrian composer Carl (Karl) Michæl Ziehrer was born on 2 May 1843 in Vienna and died on 14 November 1922 in Vienna. In his lifetime, he was one of the fiercest rivals of the Strauß family ; most notably Johann Strauß senior and Eduard Strauß.

Ziehrer was taught music by Simon Sechter, a famous Viennese music theorist and pedagogue, and Johann Emanuel Hasel. He was soon discovered by music publisher Carl Haslinger, one of Johann Strauß senior's publishers, who had fallen-out with Strauß regarding the receipts from the latter's lucrative Russian venture.

Ziehrer was, in the words of Strauß' Ist wife, Henrietta Treffz, « one of Haslinger's machinations » , and « what Haslinger writes as his own would be passed on the ward to be published as his own » . Her prophecy was, however, only ever partially fulfilled ; though Ziehrer's pulsating and lively waltzes lit-up Vienna, and though he challenged the famed Strauß family for the Viennese public's affections, his many works have not survived long in today's Classical repertoire.

Haslinger sought to promote his promising young ward and, on 21 November 1863, the young conductor appeared as the head of a newly-formed orchestra aimed at toppling the Strauß dynasty at the « Dianabad-Saal » , in Vienna. Not long after that, he secured a place at one of Viennese military-bands. As was the current trend, he took-over as « Kapellmeister » of a large civilian orchestra, in 1873. He also published the journal « Deutsche Musikzeitung » , around the same time, and was credited as being one of the important sources of music study in the late-1870's.

Not long after founding the music journal, he changed his publisher to Ludwig Döblinger, and toured Eastern Europe and Germany for many years, earning a good reputation as a strict, yet, efficient conductor. It was in 1881 that he met his future wife, Marianne Edelman, a famous Operetta singer, in Berlin.

Throughout the period between 1885 and 1893, Ziehrer toured extensively and was a military band-Master, having achieved the distinction of « Übernahme der Militärmusik der Hoch » , as well as the « Deutschmeister » decoration. His fame was such that he was invited to perform at the 1893 World Exhibition, in Chicago. After that, in a flurry of events, he toured 41 German cities and finally returned to Vienna, where he formed an even larger and successful orchestra that specialized in playing dance-music. At this point, his works began to gain a wider circulation among the music-loving Viennese, and works such as « Weaner Mad'In » , Opus 388, as well as the more famous « Wiener Bürger » , Opus 419, were received with greater appreciation, the latter even temporarily triumphing over Strauß compositions when Ist published in 1890.

Despite being a strong challenger of the Strauß music dynasty, he was unable to triumph over them and remained under their influence, which numbered among them his personal appearance ; he maintained a « Schnurrbart » moustache as well as a similar hair-style. By the turn of the Century, Ziehrer felt that he needed to devote his time and attention towards composing, and his military-band participation waned until he relinquished his last position in 1899, the year Johann Strauß senior died.

Ziehrer enjoyed success in the Operetta writing business, with stage-works such as « Die Landstreicher » , in 1899, but it was with the Operetta « Fremdenführer » (Tourist Guide) that he achieved stage success. He was one of the composers who bridged the « Golden Age » of Operetta with the new influence of the emerging « Silver Age » , with composers such as Franz Lehár, who would dominate the Operetta scene for many years, later on.

In 1909, he was awarded the honorary post of the « Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofballmusikdirektor » , which was created for Johann Strauß senior more than half a Century earlier and, subsequently, dominated within the Straußes with Johann Strauß son and Eduard Strauß also holding the office for many years. He was also the last person to hold this post, with the destruction of the Habsburg dynasty, in World War I, resulting in its dissolution. During the time before the War, he worked well with composers Franz Lehár, Oscar Straus, and Leo Fall, and was guest-conductor at their concerts on many occasions.

The outbreak of the War sealed his career as a composer, and most of his property was destroyed. He died a poor and forgotten man in Vienna. He was buried in the « Zentralfriedhof » in the graves of honour. His wife was buried beside him.

His rich musical heritage may not be comparable to the Straußes, who dominated for well over a Century, but he was more prolific, having composed over 600 Waltzes, Polkas and Marches, which are still performed today. Some of his works are even more Viennese in nature than that of the Straußes. His works are vigorous and forceful, with cheerful melodies written even near the end of the Habsburg dynasty.

Ziehrer was the subject of a 1945 bio-picture called « Viennese Girls » and was played by Willi Forst who also directed the film.

Carl Michæl Ziehrer, österreichischer Komponist : geboren 2. Mai 1843 in Wien ; gestorben 14. November 1922 ebenda. Er schrieb rund 600 Tänze und 23 Operetten.

Carl Michæl Ziehrer erlernte von seinem Vater das Handwerk des Hutmakers. Er spielte auch Klavier und verfasste bereits mit 19 Jahren eigene kleine Kompositionen. Der Verleger von Johann Strauß (Sohn) , Carl Haslinger, der sich zu dieser Zeit mit seinem Walzer-Komponisten zu überwerfen begann, vermutete in ihm Talent und protegierte den jungen Carl Michæl Ziehrer, indem er ihm Lehrmeister für Dirigenten- und Komponistentätigkeit zur Verfügung stellte. Ziehrers wichtigster Lehrer war der Wiener Musiker und Komponist Johann Emanuel Hasel, der auch mit Ziehrers Kapelle das Programm des ersten Konzerts einstudierte und seinem Schüler zahlreiche Eigenkompositionen zur Verfügung stellte, die Ziehrer bei seinem Debüt am 21. November 1863 im DianabadSaal in Wien-Leopoldstadt unter seinem Namen zur Aufführung brachte. Hasels Hilfestellung wurde von Ziehrer zeit seines Lebens konsequent verschwiegen. Im Jahr 1903 gelang es Ziehrer mithilfe eines Privatdetektivs, eine inkriminierende Partitur aus dem Besitz von Hasels Witwe an sich zu bringen, um das peinliche Bekanntwerden von Hasels wahrem Anteil an Ziehrers Frühwerk zu verhindern.

1865 wurde Ziehrer in die Blumensäle der Wiener Gartenbaugesellschaft engagiert, wo er als Ballregent fungierte und einige Neukompositionen zur Uraufführung brachte. Im November 1867 ernannte man Ziehrer zum Kapellmeister des Arbeiter-Bildungswerks.

Nach Differenzen mit seinen Förderern und Gönnern in Wien zog Ziehrer nach Berlin, übernahm die Kapelle der Reichshallen und agierte als Variété-Diregent. Dabei arbeitete er mit Marianne Edelman aus Linz zusammen, die er am 1. September 1888 heiratete.

Im Jahre 1885 erhielt Ziehrer den Posten als Kapellmeister des berühmten Kaiserlich und Königlich Infanterie-Regiment Hoch- und Deutschmeister Nr. 4, nachdem der im selben Jahr ernannte Heinrich Strobl (1839-1885) unerwartet verstorben war. Damit erlangte er auch in Wien Anerkennung, wo sich die Strauß-Ära dem Ende zuneigte. Carl Michæl Ziehrer gab Konzerte in ganz Europa und auch 1893 in Chicago im Rahmen der Weltausstellung.

Rechts : Das von Ziehrer zuzeiten vor dem Ersten Weltkrieg in Baden bei Wien genutzte Wohnhaus, in dem der Komponist seinen 70. Geburtstag feierte.

Das Ziehrerdenkmal im Wiener Prater, 1959 gestaltet von Robert Ullmann.

Als Höhepunkt in seiner Laufbahn kann man Ziehrers Ernennung zum vierten und letzten Kaiserlich-Königlich Hofballmusikdirektor (nach Johann Strauß, Vater ; Johann Strauß, Sohn ; und Eduard Strauß) im Jahre 1907 bezeichnen. Carl Michæl Ziehrer verlor während des Ersten Weltkrieges sein Vermögen und starb verarmt 1922. Sein Leichnam wurde am 17. November 1922 vom Trauerhaus, Erdbergstraße 1, Wien-Erdberg, zur Einsegnung in die Rochuskirche gebracht und danach auf dem Wiener Zentralfriedhof in einem Ehrengrab (Gruppe 32 C, Nummer 1) zur letzten Ruhe bestattet.

Ziehrer war Freimaurer. Er wurde 1892 in die Loge « Treue » in Preßburg (heute : Bratislava) aufgenommen.

In his review of the performance, Kurt Singer recognized 1 or 2 glimpses of the mature Bruckner and considered the outer movements to be more successful than the middle-movements whose authenticity he would have doubted had it not been established by « men of the calibre of Moißl, Springer and Orel » .

18 mars 1925 : Le chef Michæl Taube dirige une Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Michæl Taube

Born in Poland, in 1890, Michæl Taube studied at Leipzig Conservatory, before moving to Cologne, where he was a conducting pupil of Hermann Abendroth. In 1924, he joined the Berlin « Städtische Oper » , serving under Bruno Walter, and exploring earlier and less performed repertoire with ensembles he established.

Along with Kurt Singer, Joseph Rosenstock led the Opera department of the « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Culture League) , originally called the « Kulturbund Deutscher Juden » (Culture League of German Jews) , in which Kurt Baumann also worked. The concert department, linked with the Opera division, was headed again by Rosenstock and Singer, but also by the concert director Michaël Taube, who had been Bruno Walter's assistant at the Municipal Opera, in Berlin. Taube acted as conductor of the « Kulturbund » 's small Orchestra until he immigrated to Palestine, at the end of 1934. Taube was an important figure in the development of the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra. When he left for Tokyo, in 1936, Hans Wilhelm Steinberg (later known as William Steinberg) replaced him.

In later years, Taube continued to undertake guest appearances throughout Europe, including engagements with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He died in Tel-Aviv in 1972.

29 octobre 1925 : Le chef Emil Bohnke dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

Emil Bohnke

The German violist, composer and conductor Emil Bohnke was born on 11 October 1888 in Zduńska Wola near Łódź, Poland ; and died on 11 May 1928 near Pasewalk (« Mecklenburg-Vorpommern ») , Pomerania (Germany) . Bohnke and his wife are buried at « Friedhof Dahlem » (« Steglitz-Zehlendorf ») in Berlin.

He was the son of textile manufacturer Ferdinand Bohnke. From 1901 to 1908, he studied violin with Hans Sitt and composition with Stephan Krehl at the Leipzig Conservatory, continuing his studies in Berlin at the Prussian Academy of Arts from 1908 with Friedrich Gernsheim.

Bohnke taught for 2 years at the Stern Conservatory, in Berlin. In 1919, he married violinist Lilli von Mendelssohn (born in 1897) of the Mendelssohn family, and fathered 3 children ; the youngest of which was pianist Robert-Alexander Bohnke (1927-2004) . He was the violist of the Bandler Quartet, and the Busch Quartet (1919-1921) led by Adolf Busch. Bohnke played a 1699 viola by « luthier » Giovanni Grancino given to him by his father-in-law. As conductor, he headed the Leipzig Symphony Orchestra (1923-1926) , and succeeded Oskar Fried as principal conductor of the Berlin Symphony Orchestra, in 1926.

In May 1928, Bohnke and his wife were in Pasewalk in search of a summer home when they had an automobile accident and, tragically, both were killed. The children had been left with their maternal grandparents, Marie (1867-1957) and Franz von Mendelssohn (1865-1935) who, thereafter, raised them in their mansion in Berlin.

Emil Bohnke is one of the great might-have-beens of Germany's moderate avant-garde. At the time of his early death in an automobile accident, his works were being performed both in Germany and abroad and had entered the repertoires of such sterling musicians as the pianists Edwin Fischer, Artur Schnabel, and Rudolf Serkin and violinists Georg Kulenkampff, Max Rostal, and Carl Flesch. Flesch even went so far as to include Bohnke's « Ciacona » for unaccompanied violin, Opus 15, No. 2, in his standard violin method (1923, revised in 1929) .

After completing his training in Leipzig and Berlin, Bohnke taught for 2 years at the Stern Conservatory in Berlin, played viola in the famous Adolf Busch Quartet (from 1919), headed the Leipzig Symphony Orchestra (1923-1926), succeeded Oskar Fried as principal conductor of the Berlin Symphony Orchestra (1926), and led a special Master-Class in viola at the « Berlin Musikhochschule ». At the same time, he brought forth a body of 16 instrumental compositions ranging from the late-Romantic 1st String Quartet, Opus 1 (1913) to the brooding, deeply contemplative personal idiom of his Violin Concerto, Opus 11 (1920), and his Piano Concerto, Opus 14. Being situated between the avant-garde currents of his esteemed colleague Arnold Schönberg and the traditionalism of a Max von Schillings or a Paul Græner, his music soon fell into oblivion and had disappeared from the German concert stage by the early 1930's, doubtless partly because of the emigration of many of his former champions and his marriage to a Jewess.

The conductor, composer and violinist Emil Bohnke is probably best-remembered for his brief tenure on the podium of the Berlin Symphony Orchestra. The child of a manufacturer, he studied both violin and composition at the Leipzig Conservatory from an early age, then continued training in Berlin after 1901. Bohnke taught at Berlin's Stern Conservatory for 2 years and 1st came to note as violinist of the Bandler and Busch String Quartets. From 1923 until 1926, he served as music-director of the Leipzig Symphony Orchestra, then, held the same position with the Berlin Symphony Orchestra, where he succeeded Oskar Fried, from 1926 until his death in a motor vehicle accident at Pasewalk. Bohnke left behind a number of compositions, mostly chamber works but also including one each of Piano and Violin Concertos. Probably his most significant creation was a « Symphony », finished in 1927, which received a posthumous 1928 premiere by the Berlin State Opera Orchestra under the baton of Erich Kleiber. His body of work was suppressed during the Nazi era due to his wife having been Jewish (Lilli von Mendelssohn Bohnke, 1897-1928), then, largely forgotten; his son Robert-Alexander Bohnke (1927-2004) was eventually to record the pieces written for piano.

...

Lilli von Mendelssohn was born on November 30, 1897, in Berlin. She was the daughter of Franz and Marie von Mendelssohn. Franz, a banker and president of the Berlin Chamber of Commerce, was also the grandson of the great composer, Felix Mendelssohn. Lilli had a Red Mendelssohn Stradivarius of 1720. Formerly owned and played by Joseph Joachim, in the late 1800's, it was famously known as the « Red Stradivarius ».

Lilli married conductor, composer, Emil Bohnke in 1919. She was 22 and he, 31. They had 3 children, the youngest, was famous pianist, Robert-Alexander Bohnke.

Lilli was brought-up as a career violinist and there is evidence she also performed for high-school students when she was 29. Her husband, Emil, composed numerous pieces mostly for piano, yet, also included is his better-known Violin Concerto in D major, Opus 11. (Last recorded in 2004, by the Prague Radio Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Israel Yinon, with violinist Koljia Lessing.) This Concerto was composed in the late-1800's as his were his other notable compositions, thus, implying that Lilli, herself, likely performed this piece (in private or otherwise).

Tragically, while looking for a summer home, on May 11, 1928, the lives of both Emil and Lilli Bohnke were taken in a car accident. Fortunately, they had left their children with their grandparents. The youngest was only 1 year old at the time. Emil was 39 ; and Lilli, 31.

The 3 Bohnke children spent the remainder of their younger years under the care of their grandparents, growing-up in the von Mendelssohn mansion, in Berlin. Later, during the beginning of WWII, the family fled to Austria due to Berlin being a prime bombing target. In regard to the compositions of Lilli's husband, Emil, his final Symphonic composition was debuted just 6 months after his death ; in late-1928. His existing compositions were easily suppressed by the Nazis and it was left to his youngest son, Robert-Alexander, born 13 months before his parents' death, to gradually rediscover them after the War, helped along in part by the urging of Edwin Fischer, who had often played Emil's music.

Emil's final compositions were the Piano Concerto, Opus 14 ; and the Symphony, Opus 16. These pieces conveyed the doom-laden atmosphere, towering, nightmarish shadows, and creeping unease which was present at the time, in between WWI and WWII. Robert-Alexander recorded the piece, in 2001, just prior to his death, in 2004. He was married twice and fathered 5 children.

Compositions

Bohnke composed a body of 16 Opuses, comprising mainly chamber music and piano pieces, but also orchestral works and Concertos. His initial compositions are in the late-Romantic vein, and gradually incorporate more expressionistic elements. The later works are characterized by dense thematic material and bold harmonies that often go beyond his still-existing framework of tonality.

Some efforts have been made to revive Bohnke's music through performances and recordings :

Bohnke's most important work, a Symphony composed in 1927, was premiered shortly after his death, on 11 November 1928, by the « Staatskapelle Berlin » conducted by Erich Kleiber. Soon after Bohnke's death, his music was largely forgotten. In 1933, during the 3rd « Reich » , the authorities prohibited his music largely due to his wife being of Jewish origin.

This work is generally considered his Masterpiece, was premiered posthumously, on 9 November 1928, by the Orchestra of the « Berlin Staatsoper Unter den Linden » conducted by Erich Kleiber. The program booklet contained an introductory essay by the distinguished musicologist, and later Harvard professor, Hugo Leichtentritt which, with its detailed analysis and passionate advocacy, deserves to be quoted here in full :

The 1st movement is filled with tragic pathos, dark and ponderous in sound and character. Even a quick glance at the score reveals its underlying mood in its expression marks : « brooding » near the opening or, later, « heavy » , « energetically and broadly arched, broad and flowing, passionately agitated and strictly in time » . It departs from the standard Symphonic design mainly by declining, in the development section, to juxtapose and contrast sharply differing moods, as in a primary and secondary theme. Instead, the movement actually consists entirely of transformations of a single basic mood and dispenses with a contrasting lyrical secondary theme. It, thereby, attains an overriding unity of expression characterized by a rich and varied treatment of the Orchestra and a riveting and imaginative Symphonic transformation of the basic motifs. These motifs rarely congeal into broadly conceived unified themes in the traditional sense, thereby again, lending the movement an aura of violence, turbulence, and excitement. This is music rooted in the pathos of declamatory speech.

The basses open with a monologue (« brooding » , hesitantly expanding, frequently interrupted by rests) beneath a soft tremolo shimmering in the upper-most register of the strings. The mood is one of agitated questioning interspersed with touches of timid sorrowfulness and gloomy contemplation. We find ourselves in psychic regions bordering closely on many of Anton Bruckner's moods.

The urgent question in the basses is answered by the violas and clarinets with yet another, more broadly stated question. We hear a brief upsurge to an instant of loudly eruptive sound, after which the entire monologue is repeated in a different key. An essential new motivic element is now introduced by the horns in a rhythm resembling a death march. This is followed by a Symphonic development of motifs 1 and 2, which, in a few instants, engulfs the entire Orchestra in a mighty culmination of sound. The prevailing key of C minor now proceeds with ponderous gait, « energetically and broadly arched » .

The further progress of the movement cannot be captured in a brief explication. It makes no use of the familiar Sonata allegro design. One might refer to it as a Symphonic fantasy that adds a number of closely related secondary motifs to the 2 aforementioned principal motifs, knitting them tightly together and unfolding in a timbral argument filled with extremes of passion. Forte, fortissimo, and sforzato predominate to such an extent that there is not a single expanse of piano to be heard in the entire movement until just before the end, when the turbulence suddenly subsides and the pent-up energy comes to an exhausted standstill.

Indeed, the true climax and focal point of the movement occurs precisely in this final section where, for 35 bars, a pedal point on the C major chord gradually drags the entire Orchestra down into the depths, gradually breaking the force of the sound and introducing the aforementioned piano passage to extraordinary effect. Here, in outline, is the opening of this truly inspired passage, with its strange harmonic effects in the chromatically descending 8 notes of the inner-voices.

The tragic sound of this piano episode, with its death-march rhythms, yields to a new crescendo erupting into maximum fortississimo. This 8 bar interruption of the pedal point then reverts to pianissimo and completely dissolves into a barely audible conclusion. Finally, it gives way to the rigid C minor « death march » rhythms of trumpets, trombones, and timpani, as if wafting into the score from far away. 2 bars of fortissimo rudely force this moving episode aside and end the movement with steely hammer blows.

The 2nd movement is a Scherzo with that demonic, uncanny, savage, often bizarre sound that Gustav Mahler introduced to the Symphonic tradition and that Franz Liszt had earlier struck in his « Dance in the Village Inn » , the « Mephisto Waltz » from the final movement of his « Faust Symphony » .

The form strictly adheres to the large-scale ternary design that has dominated the Scherzo movements of Symphonies and Sonatas ever since Beethoven. An initial main-section, a contrasting middle-section corresponding to the earlier Trio, and a repeat of the opening main-section make-up the larger architecture of this piece, which is quite straightforward and requires no further explanation of its form. Here, too, a constant rhythmic formula dominates the entire movement in a myriad melodic variants. This formula is solidified early in the movement through the even 3/4 meter of the accompaniment, the boldly leaping bass-figure in the opening bars, and the suave, almost delicate response from the violins with their intermittent 8ths.

This opening briefly adumbrates the entire motivic argument of the 1st main-section. It, too, is subdivided into 3 parts : a taught, terse opening-section rising to a rapid culmination at the end, a middle-section consisting of a varied Symphonic development, and a free reprise of the opening, bringing the entire main-section to a wild and « pêle-mêle » conclusion.

The 2nd main-section, corresponding to the trio-intermezzo, is more tender, bright, and delicate in its rhythm and sonority. Here, too, the opening suffices to form an acquaintance with the thematic material of the entire section. Note the leaping, gracefully undulating melody in the violins ; the constant « ostinato » viola part in the middle, humorously reiterating the same sequence of pitches ; the light pizzicato bass ; and the leisurely counter-motif in the muted trumpets, expanding in an unhurried dance rhythm. Only toward the end does the sound of the Trio become more ponderous and gloomy, thereby, occasioning a transition to the reprise of the 1st main-section, which brings the entire Scherzo to a conclusion without further ado.

The 3rd movement (« proceeding slowly, in sorrowful resignation ») is an expansive lamentation suffused with unutterable pain, ever circling its unchanging nucleus, now closer, now farther away, and giving reign to its feelings, now softly, now loudly. No sound of solace or redemption interrupts the progress of this outpouring of melancholy, but neither does the music congeal into a dramatic and climactic outburst of emotion. The music offers us a glimpse into the tragically darkened psyche of its creator - touching in its honesty of expression, unalloyed by any admixture of elegy.

The musical structure reveals hardly any unusual complexities. Although a number of contrasting motifs are employed, they all proceed from the same root and are so closely interrelated in rhythmic gesture and expression that we have no call to speak of different themes. As in the 1st movement, the entire piece is dominated by a single main theme that branches-off in various metamorphoses. Listeners should pay special heed to the moving final-section, striding upward in mighty steps after a brief fortissimo, pausing in shadowy and dolorous depths, and finally dying away in silence, as if with a gentle sob.

« Bursting in abruptly, passionately agitated » : thus, the opening of the final movement, shattering the trembling, expiring conclusion of the slow movement as if with truncheons. After a few moments, a vivid shape emerges from the roiling tumult of notes : a continuation of the ostinato 16th note figure in the violins against a powerful and sharply contrasting motif in the basses, a characteristic transformation of a principal motif from the slow movement. This thematic material dominates the 1st main-section of the movement in a wide array of variants.

As a 2nd main-section, we hear a « turbulent march tempo ; grim, defiant » , in brittle rhythms and sonorities primarily accorded to the brass. This section gives way to a « wildly agitated » Intermezzo, followed by a « quiet » episode, a thematic development of the aforementioned motif from the slow movement in the low-strings. The opening of the final movement again intervenes, « passionately agitated » , swirling about and culminating in a powerful tutti before giving way, once again, to the march.

This time, the entire Orchestra is involved in the development of the march-theme. Toward the end, the tempo broadens ; characteristic motifs from the 1st movement reappear ; and the « death march » motif of trumpets, trombones, and timpani that concluded the 1st movement brings to the entire Symphony to its appointed end.

Emil Bohnke (geboren 11. Oktober 1888 in Zdunska Wola bei Łódź, Polen ; gestorben 11. Mai 1928 bei einem Autounfall bei Pasewalk) war ein deutscher Bratschist, Komponist und Dirigent in Berlin.

Emil Bohnke, Sohn des Textilfabrikanten Ferdinand Bohnke, heiratete 1919 die Violinistin Lilli von Mendelssohn. Eines der Kinder aus dieser Ehe war der spätere Pianist Robert-Alexander Bohnke (1927-2004) .

Als Bratschist spielte er unter anderem im Quartett von Adolf Busch. Kompositorisch und persönlich stand er dem Kreis um Heinz Tiessen nahe, zu dem auch der Pianist und Komponist Eduard Erdmann gehörte. In seiner Funktion als Interpret (1926 wurde er Leiter des Berliner Sinfonie Orchesters) setzte sich Bohnke oft für Werke dieser Kollegen ein.

Bohnke kam gemeinsam mit seiner Frau bei einem Autounfall bei Pasewalk ums Leben, als sie sich gerade auf der Suche nach einer Ferienunterkunft für ihre Kinder befanden.

Bald nach seinem Tode geriet der Komponist in Vergessenheit, was vor allem Schuld der nationalsozialistischen Machthaber war : Da Bohnkes Frau Lili jüdischer Herkunft war, er außerdem enge Kontakte zu politisch Missliebigen hatte (so war sein Freund Tiessen bekennender Sozialist) , wurden seine Werke nach 1933 verboten. Trotz einigen Wiederbelebungsversuchen ist die Musik Bohnkes, ein ohne Zweifel interessantes Dokument der Musik aus den 1920er Jahren, nie wieder recht in die Konzertsäle zurückgekehrt.

Da Bohnke mit nur 39 Jahren starb, ist sein Werk nicht sonderlich umfangreich. Da der Komponist selbst hervorragender Kammermusiker war, konzentriert sich sein Schaffen auch vorrangig auf dieses Gebiet. Daneben gibt es einige Klavierstücke, Orchesterwerke sowie Lieder aus Bohnkes Feder.

Bohnke begann als spätromantisch geprägter Komponist, etwa in der Nachfolge Max Regers, bezog später jedoch mehr und mehr expressionistische Elemente in seine Werke mit ein. Allerdings ist ein deutlicher Bruch in seinem Schaffen nicht zu bemerken. Die Kompositionen Bohnkes zeichnen sich durch dichte thematische Arbeit und kühne Harmonik aus, die sehr oft den (noch vorhandenen) Rahmen der Tonalität sprengt. Als wichtigstes Werk des Komponisten gilt die kurz nach seinem Tode uraufgeführte Symphonie Opus 16.

Emil Bohnke ruht in einem Ehrengrab des Landes Berlin mit seiner Frau. Das Ehepaar war bei einem Verkehrsunfall im Jahre 1928 gemeinsam ums Leben gekommen.

Robert Heger

Le violoncelliste, chef d'orchestre et compositeur allemand Robert Heger est né le 19 août 1886 à Strasbourg, en Alsace-Lorraine ; et est mort le 14 janvier 1978 à Munich, en Bavière.

Heger fait d'abord ses études au Conservatoire de Strasbourg, sous la direction de Franz Stockhausen.

On peut mesurer le niveau du Conservatoire de Strasbourg à l'aune des débouchés immédiats suivis par ses élèves à leur sortie de l'établissement. Est-il un tremplin ?

Dans quelle mesure alimente-t-il la vie musicale locale ou celle d'autres cités ?

2 principaux débouchés s'offrent aux musiciens ayant achevé leur scolarité au Conservatoire de Strasbourg :

La fréquentation d'autres établissements d'enseignement musical en guise de formation complémentaire. La fréquentation des Conservatoires allemands (Leipzig, Berlin) et du Conservatoire de Paris est fortement recommandée mais « seul le Conservatoire de Dresde semble accessible aux élèves strasbourgeois ». Viennent ensuite les Conservatoires de Lyon et de Marseille.

Robert Heger, futur chef d'orchestre au Théâtre municipal de Strasbourg, est inscrit successivement aux Conservatoires de Zürich (où il étudie auprès de Lothar Kempter) et de Munich (où il étudie auprès de Max von Schillings). Charles Munch (né en 1891 à Strasbourg ; mort en 1968 à Richmond, en Virginie) que l'on connaît bien pour son activité de chef d'orchestre à la tête du « Boston Symphony Orchestra » (1948-1962), va se perfectionner au Conservatoire de Paris avec Lucien Capet (1873-1928) après avoir été l'élève d'Anton Nast (violon) et de Marie-Joseph Erb (harmonie) au Conservatoire de Strasbourg.

Après ses débuts à Strasbourg, Robert Heger a fait ses débuts à Ulm, en 1908 ou 1909. Il a occupé des postes à Barmen (1909), à l'Opéra populaire de Vienne (1911), et à Nuremberg (1913), où il dirige aussi des concerts philharmoniques.

Il passe de Munich à Berlin, entre 1933 et 1950, puis retourne à Munich. En 1937, il rejoint le Parti nazi (NSDAP).

Il dirige également le « Royal Opera House », de 1925 à 1935, et y revint en 1953 pour y diriger la 1^{re} représentation à Londres de l'Opéra de Richard Strauß, « Capriccio ». Il meurt à Munich.

...

Robert Heger commence ses études musicales au Conservatoire de Strasbourg (1900-1902), puis les poursuit à Zürich (1902-1905), à Lyon (1905-1907) et à Munich (1907), alors qu'il a déjà entamé sa carrière.

Violoncelliste de formation, il s'oriente rapidement vers la direction d'orchestre et fait ses débuts en fosse à Strasbourg en 1907 (il a alors 21 ans).

Après un passage dans les théâtres d'Ulm (1908), de Barmen (1909) et au « Volksoper » de Vienne (1911), il est nommé (en 1913) à l'Opéra de Nuremberg où il dirige également les concerts symphoniques. En 1920, il devient Premier chef au « Nationaltheater » de Munich avant d'être engagé, 5 ans plus tard, à la « Staatsoper » de Vienne. Parallèlement, il assure la direction des concerts de la « Société des Amis de la Musique ». En 1933, il est nommé chef permanent à la « Staatsoper Unter den Linden » de Berlin (« Deutsche Staatsoper ») . En 1936, son Opéra « Der verlorene Sohn » (le Fils prodigue) est créé, avec succès, à Dresde sous la direction de Karl Böhm. L'année suivante (1937) , il adhère au NSDAP, le Parti nazi, et dirige un concert dans la Cracovie occupée. Son inscription sur la « Gottbegnadeten-Liste » lui évitera d'être appelé au front.

Après la Guerre, sa carrière se poursuit au « Städtische Oper » (« Deutsche Oper Berlin ») avant son retour à Munich comme Premier chef et président de la « Hochschule für Musik und Theater » . C'est avec la troupe de Munich qu'il dirige la création londonienne de « Capriccio » de Richard Strauß, en 1953.

Il meurt à Munich le 14 janvier 1978. Une rue porte son nom.

Robert Heger a composé 5 Opéras (dont « Ein Fest zu Haderslev » , Opéra en 3 actes créés à Nuremberg en 1919, révisé en 1943 ; « Der Bettler Namenlos » de 1932 ; « Der verlorene Sohn » ; « Lady Hamilton ») , 3 Symphonies dont une en ré mineur, des Concertos (dont I pour violon en ré majeur) , des œuvres chorales, des mélodies. Il a laissé de nombreux enregistrements.

Robert Heger was not a famous conductor outside of Europe. His principle claim to fame was the recording of « Der Rosenkavalier » that he made with Lotte Lehmann, Elisabeth Schumann, et al. He conducted Lehmann many times at « Covent Garden », but was most conspicuous in her life at the Vienna Opera. Lehmann probably sang more under his baton, than any other single conductor (82 performances !) . He was also a composer and wrote a cycle of songs to Lehmann poems. His Nazi associations hurt his post during the War years.

The German cellist, conductor and composer Robert Heger was born on 19 August 1886 in Strasbourg, Alsace-Lorraine ; and died on 14 January 1978 in Munich, Baviara.

He studied at the Conservatory of Strasbourg, under Franz Stockhausen then, in Zürich, under Lothar Kempfer and, finally, in Munich under Max von Schillings. After early conducting engagements in Strasbourg, he made his debut in Ulm, in 1908 or 1909. He held appointments in Barmen (1909) , at the Vienna « Volksoper » (1911) , and at Nuremberg (1913) , where he also conducted Philharmonic concerts. He progressed to Munich and then to Berlin (1933-1950) , after which he returned again to Munich.

In 1932, he conducted the Vienna Symphony Orchestra and the pianist Paul Wittgenstein in the world-premiere of Maurice Ravel's Piano Concerto for the Left-Hand, after Arturo Toscanini had declined Ravel's invitation to conduct the premiere.

In 1937, Heger joined the Nazi Party (NSDAP) .

Robert Heger conducted at the Royal Opera House, « Covent Garden » , from 1925 to 1935, and again with his Munich Opera House, in 1953, when he gave the 1st London performance of Richard Strauß's Opera « Capriccio » . He died in Munich.

...

Robert Heger's father was a member of the Strasbourg Municipal Orchestra, and his son was a pupil of Franz Stockhausen at the Strasbourg Conservatory, between 1900 and 1902, before he moved on to continue his studies, Istly with Lothar Kempfer in Zürich until 1905, and then with the famous German conductor and composer Max von Schillings in Munich until 1908. Heger began his conducting career in his home city in 1907, before accepting appointments in Ulm (1908) , Barmen (1909) and Vienna where he conducted at the « Volksoper » from 1911 ; between 1913 and 1920, he also conducted at the Nuremberg Opera. After acting as an assistant to Bruno Walter at the Munich State Opera, from 1920 to 1925, Heger returned to Vienna to be a conductor at the State Opera until 1933 ; during this period in Vienna, he also was director of the concerts of the « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » .

In the year of Adolf Hitler's accession to power, in 1933, Heger moved to Germany to take-up appointments as a conductor at the Berlin State Opera (« Staatsoper ») , as general music-director in Kassel, and at the « Waldoper » in Zoppot, a summer Festival at which Wagner's Operas were performed in the open-air, explaining its nick-name « the Bayreuth of the North » . He was also a frequent guest at the international Opera seasons at « Covent Garden » , in London, between 1925 and 1935, conducting Wagner's « Der Ring des Nibelungen » and « Parsifal » there, in 1928, as well as a wider repertoire during the early 1930's. Heger was active in Berlin throughout World War II, making several radio recordings with the Berlin « Staatskapelle » that have survived, and remaining there after the cessation of hostilities, conducting at the municipal « Städtische Oper » .

In 1950, Heger moved to Munich to become president of the High-School for Music, a post he held until 1954, and also to conduct, once again, at the Munich State Opera. Based in Munich, he remained active as a conductor in the Opera House, concert-hall and recording studio almost to the end of his life. He made his last appearance at « Covent Garden » in 1953, when he conducted the company in Richard Strauß's final Opera « Capriccio » . Heger was also an accomplished if not highly-distinctive composer, writing in a conservative idiom derived from Max Reger, Hans Pfitzner and Richard Strauß. His « Verdi Variations » , 1st performed in 1933, were often played during the 1930's, and he orchestrated several of Richard Strauß's songs. He wrote 5 Operas, 2 of which, « Der verlorene Sohn » and « Lady Hamilton » , were composed to commissions from the Dresden and Berlin State Operas, awarded during the period of the 3rd « Reich » . The subject matter of « Lady Hamilton » , the love-affair between the English Admiral Nelson and Lady Hamilton, militated against its performance in Germany, during World War II, and it was not heard until 1951. Another Opera, « Der Bettler Namenlos » , was more successful, being performed in several different productions in Germany including a staging conducted by Heger, in Munich, as late as 1967.

Robert Heger was a highly-respected conductor throughout his lifetime, and was an outstanding example of the German « Kapellmeister » tradition at its best, able to take on another's musical conception with fidelity. He conducted « EMI » 's recording of substantial excerpts from Richard Strauß's « Der Rosenkavalier » , made in Vienna in 1933, with a stellar cast after the composer's financial requirements had been rejected by « EMI » as excessive. The result was very distinguished and has consistently featured in the catalogues in different recording formats. His conducting of excerpts from Richard Wagner's « Siegfried » from this period, with Lauritz Melchior, is another recording which has stood the test of time. In addition, before World War II, Heger recorded a wide selection of short pieces with the premiere Orchestras of the period, such as the Vienna and Berlin Philharmonics, the Berlin « Staatskapelle » and the London Symphony Orchestra. Many of the radio recordings which he made during the War, predominantly of Operas and of vocal music, have been republished : notable among these recordings are a distinctive account of Max von Schillings's rarely heard « Glockenlieder » with the tenor Peter Anders and the Berlin « Staatskapelle » , and a fiery realization of Verdi's « Rigoletto » which goes a long way towards explaining the esteem in which Heger was held.

After the War, his recording career was initially more haphazard and included Vienna-based work for the budget-priced American label « Remington » , as well as an account of « Tannhäuser » , recorded at the 1951 Munich Festival and 1st published on the American « Urania » label, which has been widely-reissued. Several recordings of outstanding live-performances from this period have appeared such as Hans Pfitzner's « Palestrina » and Richard Strauß's « Josephs-Legende » . Towards the end of his life, Heger made a significant number of recordings, once again for « EMI » , of German repertoire such as Friedrich von Flotow's « Martha » ; Albert Lortzing's Operas « Der Wildschütz » and « Undine » ; Otto Nicolai's « Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor » ; Franz Schubert's incidental music for « Rosamunde » ; and Carl Maria von Weber's « Der Freischütz » . Among the several outstanding live-performances from his last years is a peerless realization of « Capriccio » . All these late-recordings display his sterling qualities of good taste and a highly-musical sense of style.

Remembered today more as a conductor than a composer, Robert Heger left a legacy of 5 Operas and a substantial output of choral, orchestral, and chamber works that together divulge a masterly, if somewhat elusive post-Romantic voice. As a conductor, Heger was better-known for his work in Opera and made several famous Opera recordings, including an abridged one of « Der Rosenkavalier » .

Heger was born in Strasbourg, France, on August 19, 1886. He began serious music study when he was 14 with composer/harpist Franz Stockhausen, from whom he took lessons locally for 2 years. In Zürich, Heger was a pupil of conductor/composer Lothar Kempter, from 1902-1905, and in Munich, he studied with composer Max von Schillings, in 1907-1908. Heger's Piano Trio Opus 14 (1908) , probably his 1st important instrumental work, dates to his period of study with Schillings. Several earlier choral works (Opuses 6 and 13) had already demonstrated the composer possessed a fine grasp of vocal music.

After his study with Schillings, Heger launched his conducting career in Strasbourg, and following brief conducting stints in Germany (Ulm and Barmen, from 1908-1911) , he landed his 1st important post, at the Vienna « Volksoper » , in 1911. 2 years later, he began conducting Opera in Nuremberg. It was during his Nuremberg period that he composed and premiered his 1st Opera, « Ein fest auf Haderslev » (1919 ; revised in 1943) . It was not a success though, the following year, he tasted success in his new conducting post, this one at the Munich Opera, where he would stay until 1925.

During his Munich years, he produced one of his more important choral works, « Ein Friedenslied » (1924) , for soloists, mixed choir, orchestra and organ. From 1925-1933, he conducted at the Vienna State Opera. During this period, he wrote 2 of his finest works : the Opera « Der Bettler Namenlos » (1932) and « Variationen über ein Thema aus Verdis Maskenball » (1933) , for orchestra.

In 1933, Heger was appointed conductor at the Berlin State Opera. Here, he remained through the turbulent War years, garnering several important commissions from the arts administrators, 2 of which resulted in the Operas « Der verlorene Sohn » and « Lady Hamilton » . Heger left Berlin in 1950 to spend the remainder of his career at the Munich State Opera, where his successful 1967 revival of « Der Bettler Namenlos » helped give the work much deserved exposure. Heger died in Munich on January 14, 1978.

...

A recording I grew-up on was the 1933 abridged « Der Rosenkavalier » with Maria Olczewska, Otto Klemperer's one-time girlfriend Elisabeth Schumann and his maybe-almost-girlfriend Lotte Lehmann, conducted by Robert Heger, not exactly a household name in the annals of conducting and one that would, I'm sure, be relegated to some lower-pocket by those pigeon-holers of performers according to « tiers », 1st, 2nd, and I hope no worse than that. But Robert Heger was a wonderful conductor, one of those fiery craftsmen of the pit who tend to serve more as a « 1st conductor » at a big-name Opera House than « general music-director » (and if German or Austrian spend most of their career in German-speaking countries ; and don't make as many commercial recordings as Bruno Walter or Toscanini) . Think also of the muscular/poetical Rudolf Moralt (oh, the anguished brass and those palpitating flutes early on in his 1948 Vienna « Parsifal ») and there is Arthur Rother, a great favourite of the baritone Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, or the underrated and rather Blech-like Horst Stein, author of the most lyrical « Elektra » in my experience. Or Heinrich Steiner, whose subtle and rather Harnoncourtian « Freischütz » Overture « live » from Berlin in 1936 is world-class.

And there was the much-maligned Heinrich Hollreiser, who, said the San Francisco Opera's boss, Kurt Herbert Adler, quite accurately, could do a wonderful show, a lilting, tingly Wagner say, if you lit a fire under him (aka : dressing room pep-talk from the coach) before the performance. Another candidate for frequent contempt was the « Met » conductor/administrator Paul Breisach whose 1943 « Don Giovanni » contains passages I've never heard better : the delicacy and pathos of the Anna-Ottavio duet early in the 1st Act would be the opening evidence in my case for the defence. I should also mention Bernard Haitink's teacher, Ferdinand Leitner, a « Generalmusikdirektor » to be sure but underrated in view of how mellifluous and undulant a Wagnerian evening he could produce with his Karl Muck-trained baton. And how many Karajan-Solti groupies know the name Joseph Keilberth ? Wilhem Furtwängler considered him the best of his junior colleagues because he understood the art of climax so well.

Just in from Hamburg, in 1965, my wife and I were amazed in the little lobby of the fabled Sacher Hotel behind Vienna's « Staatsoper » to see that the evening's performance, « Der fliegende Holländer », would be conducted by none other than Professor Robert Heger. Ah, so he wasn't a mirage, that not-a-Walter-or-Toscanini who had conducted those « gemütlich » chunks of « Rosenkavalier » for a cumbersome 13 disc « Victor » album, 32 years before ! Alas, we had other plans for the evening (« crêpes », I think, at the Balkan Grill) , for which I now kick myself : to have seen Heger at his impressive exercise would have been something to tell one's grandkids. Listening again to the 1933 « Rosenkavalier » after many a Straußian moon, I couldn't fail to notice the mixture of wistfulness and sexuality in the prelude - but surely you know about the famous « orgasm » in the horns 4 bars after number 4, whoop-whoop, etc. , it took the music-director of the Budapest Opera to explain it to me ! Then, there's the sweet-soft atmosphere as the curtain rises, with that nasty old real world held totally at bay, and the perfection of « leggiero » in the breakfast music. A very Viennese performance in short, recorded in that very town, but for all its laid-backness never rhythmically sloppy - terrible habit we, commentators, have of putting in these oft-redundant buts ; I added this one to distinguish Heger from his slightly less immaculate colleague, Franz Schalk.

Substantial « live » performances of Richard Wagner led by Robert Heger have surfaced over the years, much to his credit. The 1942 Berlin « Tristan » is a darting, smoldering performance urgent to the point of what might be called controlled frantic. The scene in the 1st Act wherein Tristan, backed-up by Kurvenal, tells Brangäne he's too busy keeping the ship on course to deal with other matters (i.e. , of emotion) , well, that scene comes on like an angry family drama, an energetic Soap Opera if you will. The Classic Berlin « Lohengrin » from 1942 with Maria Müller and Franz Völker is a 1st-class work of art - the Prelude comes from Nowhere, plaintive while almost statuesque ; paced quite broadly, it moves with majesty and lilt, sad, restrained, always true to its lyrical tone. Then, as the 1st Act evolves, Heger spreads the music like good sonic toast with a layer of fascinating misterioso. The sizzle and echt-Viennese vibrance of « Philharmoniker » violins fairly crinkling with a sweetness just short of cloying, these make an « Immolation Scene » from a 1933 « Götterdämmerung » across the street from Madame Sacher's hostelry an addictive experience. And how nice the unrushed ardor of the Prize Song in the final scene of a 1943 Berlin « Meistersinger » , peopled by a rather emaciated sounding War-time chorus of, one figures, senior citizens and 4-F's.

Strauß. Wagner. Yes, of course. In fact, Heger's Wagner with its all-there personality seems as trademarkable in the 21st Century as, say, Thomas Beecham's (I've just discovered Sir Thomas' Royal Philharmonic Orchestra « Good Friday Spell » from « Parsifal » , so aureoled and hyper-intimate, just short of unctuous. But Heger was quite a Puccinian as well. A 1954 Vienna Radio « Manon Lescaut » stands-out for its long and supple line, precision of articulation, and, for this is a performance as emotional as craftsmanly, its quick striking of notes plaintive as well as jolly. The Intermezzo is milked to a turn, gracefully, its heavy regretful steps striking a bull's-eye at our willing heart-strings.

Back in War-time, D-day very recent history, Heger and the pianist Walter Gieseking retreated to the near-Shangri La of Baden Baden for a Concerto program recently surfaced on CD. Find here, a younger than spring-time performance of the Grieg, full of ardour and « élan » , even if it begins with a positively terrifying DRUMROLL : this call to arms might have sent a few burghers heading for that nearest exit such as we 21st Century audiences are always instructed to « make a note of » before the House lights dim. Enjoy, in the 2nd movement, the warm, fuzzy strings, nice and sweet. And, in the Schumann Piano Concerto, Heger produces from his Radio Orchestra a magical intimacy of tone. Higher « tier » conducting, I cannot imagine. Even London and Milan got to experience it now and then, Heger did cross the Channel and train down the gorgeous Gottardo.

And a postscript : Just found, the 1951 Munich Opera recording of « Tannhäuser » conducted by Heger with a characteristically blazing baton. The Overture is almost Mengelbergian, rather more formal in shaping but no less visceral in its gut-kicking intensity. A springy start, then huge warmth in the cellos at good old bar 17, a wonderful crescendo of compassion to follow, then, a uniquely lengthened up-beat to ahem, so to speak, the amen of the pilgrims' procession. The allegro has a feverish sensual abandon : never has this music been more aroused, absolutely kicking-off its trousers without care for where they might land. In the final minutes, sinful strings buzz hysterically around the hear-no-evil see-no-evil brass. The Opera in a nutshell. And imagine : at the very end of the Opera, Heger manages the rare feat of making Wagner's rather abrupt final cadence work. Big-bangs mustn't be awkward !

Robert Heger (geboren 19. August 1886 in Straßburg ; gestorben 14. Januar 1978 in München) war ein deutscher Dirigent, Komponist und Hochschullehrer.

Nach seinem Musikstudium in Straßburg, Zürich und München (bei Max von Schillings) war Robert Heger zunächst Cellist. Seine Karriere als Opernkapellmeister begann 1907 in seiner Geburtsstadt Straßburg. Weitere Stationen waren dann Ulm (1908) , Barmen (1909) und die Volksoper Wien (1911) . 1913 ging Heger als Chef an das Opernhaus

Nürnberg, wo er auch die Philharmonischen Konzerte leitete. 1920 wurde er I. Kapellmeister am Nationaltheater München. 1925 holte ihn Franz Schalk an die Wiener Staatsoper, wo er acht Jahre als Kapellmeister wirkte. Am 10. November 1932 erlebte hier seine Oper « Der Bettler Namenlos » ihre Erstaufführung, mit Max Lorenz und Viorica Ursuleac in den Hauptrollen. Gleichzeitig übte er das Amt des Konzertdirektors der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien aus.

1933 wurde Heger als ständiger Dirigent an die Berliner Lindenoper engagiert. 1936 wurde seine Oper « Der verlorene Sohn » uraufgeführt, wozu er sich mit den Worten äußerte : « Das Thema will dartun, daß sich der Mensch nicht zu lösen vermag vom Lande und Volk, das ihn gebar. » . 1937 trat er in die NSDAP ein. Im Februar trat er im besetzten Krakau als « Träger des deutschen Kulturwillens im Osten » auf. Am 5. April 1942 fungierte er als Gastdirigent des neu gegründeten Stadttheaters Thorn, eröffnet als « Beweis für den Kulturwillen des wiedergewonnenen deutschen Ostens » . In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs wurde er im August 1944 in die von Adolf Hitler genehmigte Gottbegnadeten-Liste der wichtigsten Dirigenten aufgenommen, was ihn von einem Kriegseinsatz, auch an der Heimatfront, bewahrte.

Robert Heger setzte seine Karriere nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg unbeschadet fort. Er wurde 1945 an die Städtische Oper Berlin verpflichtet. 1950 kehrte er als I. Staatskapellmeister wieder nach München zurück und leitete dort auch bis 1954 als Präsident die Hochschule für Musik und Theater.

Robert Heger hinterließ ein umfangreiches kompositorisches Œuvre, darunter allein mehrere Opern, drei Sinfonien, Instrumentalkonzerte, Chorwerke, Lieder und Kammermusikwerke.

Le sujet de l'Opéra « Wozzek » , que Berg tire de la pièce de Georg Büchner, est très marqué par la psychologie et développe un aspect social assez typique de l'expressionnisme. Il y mélange tradition, avec parfois l'utilisation de la musique tonale et des influences romantiques, et modernisme, avec l'atonalité et de nombreuses techniques développées par Arnold Schœnberg tel que le « Sprechgesang » et même l'utilisation d'une série, sans être encore vraiment développée au sens dodécaphonique.

Janvier 1926 : The Working Association of the North and West, led by Gregor Straßer, Otto Straßer, and Josef Gœbbels, formed to balance the Munich faction and push-back the 1920 platform, which it considered reactionary. It was not an immediate challenge to the leadership of Adolf Hitler, but Hitler did hold a counter-meeting in Bamberg, on 14 February 1926. It had considered joining with the Communists to expropriate royal properties. This infuriated Hitler, as he had received contributions from those past leaders, as well as conservative industrialists. The Bamberg meeting gave the 1st clear indication that the Nazis would base their approach on the « Führer » , rather than a platform.

Dimanche, 14 février 1926 : Adolf Hitler was allowed to speak to a private gathering of the Hamburg National Club, principally to seek financial support. His delivery was aimed at the solid citizen, and only after he connected with them on logic, did he become emotional about the need to destroy Marxism. He told them that the masses did not want intellectual ideas, implying he was speaking to an elite.

« The broad masses of people are blind and stupid and don't know what they are doing. The masses have a primitive view. What abides is the feeling of hatred. »

His unsaid message was that he could connect to this hatred.

La conférence de Bamberg

The Bamberg Conference (« Bamberger Führertagung ») included some 60 members of the leadership of the Nazi Party, and was specially convened by Adolf Hitler in Bamberg, in Upper-Franconia, Germany, on Sunday 14 February 1926 during the « wilderness years » of the Party.

Hitler's purposes in convening the « ad hoc » conference embraced at least the following :

To curtail dissent within the Party that had arisen among members of its northern branches and to foster Party unity based upon (and only upon) the « leadership principle » (« Führerprinzip ») .

To establish without controversy his position as the sole, absolute and unquestioned ultimate authority within the Party, whose decisions are final and non-appealable.

To eliminate any notion that the Party was, in any way, a democratic or consensus-based institution.

To eradicate bickering between the northern and southern factions of the Party over ideology and goals.

To establish the 25 Point Programme as constituting the Party's « immutable » programme.

To achieve his objectives, Hitler had to pressure the dissident northern faction to accept the leadership of Munich and to adhere without question to the « Führerprinzip » . His decision to convene the Bamberg Conference was something of a gamble (it could have provoked an express revolt by the northern faction or, otherwise, exacerbated the north-south conflict, leading to a rupture) but Hitler chose to nip a possible nascent rebellion in the bud. He correctly believed that the dissidents lacked both the heart and the stomach to press their dissent, and that their true intent was not to challenge his leadership but to « rescue » him from the « reactionary » forces of the Munich clique, who had by default come to dominate the Party whilst Hitler served his 30 month jail term in Landsberg Castle for his role in the « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » (during which he also completed « Mein Kampf ») .

Soon after Hitler was banned from public speaking in Bavaria, on 9 March 1925, he appointed Gregor Straßer to develop the Party in the north. Straßer, a hard-working and gregarious pharmacist of forceful personality who read Homer in the original for relaxation, had exceptional organizational talents and dramatically increased the number of Nazi cells within the north.

Straßer was more idealistic than Hitler and took the notion of « socialist » in the Party name with some degree of seriousness. The Communists were a larger factor in the more industrialized north, and Straßer was sensitive to the appeal that « socialism » had to those dissatisfied workers who were tempted by the Red flag. He also apparently felt that the Munich clique was ruled by lesser men, and he chafed under their leadership in Hitler's absence.

Straßer was more radical than Hitler on the issue of adherence to the « legal and constitutional » method of obtaining political power through the Weimar Constitution's electoral processes. He had been the SA leader in Lower-Bavaria before the « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » and was not convinced that Hitler's repudiation of force, violence and « Putsch » as a path to political power was correct.

Most serious, perhaps, was the attitude of the northern faction to the Party's 25 Point Programme, which indisputably was intellectually confused and often half-baked. Considering the circumstances in which it was written, it is hard to imagine that it could be otherwise. To Straßer and Gœbbels, men with intellectual and ideological bents, the absence of intellectual rigour was a serious defect.

Straßer first convened a meeting of the northern Party leaders in Hagen, Westphalia, on 10 September 1925. The meeting failed to accomplish much, as Straßer was absent due to his mother's serious illness. Nevertheless, the delegates unanimously rejected the strategy of electoral participation, formed the Working Community of the Northern and Western German Gaue of the NSDAP (the Working Community, or the « Arbeitsgemeinschaft ») , enacted statutes to govern the Working Community, which provided for the establishment of its publicity function through the National-Socialist Letters (« Nationalsozialistische Briefe ») , to appear bi-monthly with Josef Gœbbels as editor, and respectfully notified Hitler in writing of these developments. In no way was this an open-revolt against Hitler or an attempted secession from the NSDAP ; Hitler gave his approval to the formation of the Community. The members of the Working Community were by statute dedicated to work « in the comradely spirit of National-Socialism under the leadership of Adolf Hitler » .

Nevertheless, the Community's intent to re-shape the programme of National-Socialism threatened Hitler's absolute authority. The underlying premise of the Community was, in effect, democratic: neither Munich nor the « Führer » could have all the answers and the best solution was a comradely, communal and cooperative effort by concerned Party members, who would combine their skills and intelligence to formulate a winning programme.

In November 1925, Straßer produced his own draft programme, and circulated it among the dissidents. It basically proposed a corporate State, with peasants tied to their land in a quasi-feudalistic manner and with the means of production under government control, while private property rights were nevertheless respected. The most inflammatory provision was the advocacy of expropriation of princely estates, such as the Hohenzollerns and the Wittelsbachs. The draft was often incoherent and vague, however, and it promoted controversy even among the northerners. In January 1926, a meeting of the dissidents in Hanover became extraordinarily heated when Gottfried Feder appeared (uninvited but as Hitler's representative) and objected strenuously to the proposed programme in any form. The conferees nevertheless voted to accept the draft, with only Feder and Robert Ley dissenting. In particular, they supported the initiative to expropriate, without compensation, the land-holdings of the German princes, an issue which would be the subject of an upcoming plebiscite ; the expropriation initiative had been sponsored by the Left, including the Communists. The dissidents passed a resolution to start a new publishing house, the « Kampfverlag » , which would operate a new Party newspaper for the north, « Der Nationale Sozialist » . The proposed newspaper would obviously compete with the Party's « Völkischer Beobachter » . Some « Gauleiter » were even so bold as to criticize Hitler, although the resolution that was adopted expressly stated that the northerners did not intend to displace the leadership decisions of Munich, and that, in any case, the expropriation issue was « not one which touches on the fundamental interests of the Party » .

Feder, fuming at the audacity of the northerners, reported back to Hitler who, in due course, called for the conference in Bamberg, to be held on 14 February 1926.

Bamberg was chosen as it was situated as close to the northern « Gau » as possible, while still remaining on Bavarian soil ; additionally, a Sunday was probably chosen to make the conference more convenient for all, but in particular for the northerners, who would have longer distances to negotiate.

Julius Streicher had also done a good job in gaining support in the area for the Party, and the Bamberg branch was both large and devoted to the authority of Munich. Hitler, of course, could use the popular support as a further weapon in his propaganda to coerce the rambunctious northerners into line. The local Nazis turned-out to demonstrate in favour of Hitler, which must have impressed the northern visitors.

There was no debate ; Hitler was not in the habit of debating with his entourage in any event and he had no intention of engaging in any such quasi-democratic practice at Bamberg. The conference was a typical lengthy Hitlerian monologue.

At the conference, Hitler drew from « Mein Kampf » , the 1st volume of which was principally written while he served his time in the comforts of Landsberg Prison. And his rejection of the Working Community's programme was complete, oblique and effective.

Foreign Policy : Alliances were purely pragmatic, according to Hitler. The Community had suggested alliance with Russia. This, Hitler emphasized, was impossible. It would constitute the « bolshevization of Germany » and « national suicide » . Germany's salvation would come instead by acquisition of living space in the East: Germany would have « Lebensraum » , at Russian expense. This colonial policy would be accomplished, as in the Middle-Ages, by the sword.

Expropriation : He stated without equivocation that the uncompensated expropriation of the princes was contrary to the Party's aims.

« There are for us today no princes, only Germans. We stand on the basis of law, and we will not give a Jewish system of exploitation a legal excuse for the complete plundering of our people. »

Sectarianism : Furthermore, the objections of the mainly Protestant northerners to the toleration of Catholicism by the Bavarians would be studiously ignored. Religious questions such as this had, according to Hitler, no place in the National-Socialist movement. The Party aimed to create a people's community, a « Volksgemeinschaft » in which all true Germans would bond together for national unity.

The 25 Points would not be changed. It was the foundation of all Nazi ideology.

« To tamper with it would be treason to those principally the “ martyrs ” of the Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” who died believing in our idea. »

But Hitler's major thrust was not programmatic. He offered the dissidents an alternative methodology. The Party was based not on program, but on the principle of the leader. The Party leadership, therefore, had a simple choice : either accept or reject him as the unquestioned leader.

John Toland astutely places Hitler's ultimatum in Messianic terms :

« National-Socialism was a religion and Hitler was its Christ. Crucified at the “ Feldherrnhalle ” and risen after Landsberg, he had returned to lead the movement and the nation to salvation. »

The dissent evaporated after this. Straßer made a short statement in which accepted the « Führer's » leadership and Hitler put his arm around Straßer in a show of comradeship. Straßer agreed to have the recipients of the alternative program return their copies to him. Josef Gœbbels did not speak at all, dismaying his fellow northern delegates.

Hitler continued his efforts to conciliate with both Straßer and Gœbbels. As to Straßer, Hitler approved the establishment of the new publishing house under Straßer's control. He allowed Straßer to merge 2 « Gaue » (Westphalia and Rhineland North) into 1 new and more powerful « Gau » called the « Ruhr Gau » , with Gœbbels, Franz Pfeffer and Karl Kaufman as a ruling triumvirate. To placate Straßer, he even removed Hermann Esser from the Party's leadership cadre, in April 1926. When Straßer was injured in an automobile accident (his car was hit by a freight train) , Hitler visited him in his Landshut home, bearing a large bouquet of flowers and expressions of sympathy.

Hitler wooed Gœbbels as well. He invited Gœbbels to speak, with Hitler on stage, at the « Burgerbraukeller » , on 8 April 1926, and had the event widely publicized. Hitler's chauffeur, driving the super-charged Mercedes, picked-up Gœbbels (along with Pfeffer and Kaufman) at the train station and gave them a tour of Munich. Hitler greeted the trio at their hotel, and Gœbbels confessed to his diary that :

« His kindness in spite of Bamberg makes us feel ashamed. »

After Gœbbels' speech at the beer-hall, the audience responds wildly and Hitler embraces Gœbbels, with « tears in his eyes » .

The next day, Hitler dressed-down Gœbbels, Pfeffer and Kaufman for their rebelliousness but forgave them, and Gœbbels wrote in his journal that « unity follows. Hitler is great. » Hitler continued his conversations with Gœbbels and invited him to dine in Hitler's apartment, accompanied by Geli Raubal, who flirted with the young Gœbbels, much to his delight. Later, Hitler took Gœbbels on day-long sightseeing tours in Bavaria and when Hitler spoke in Stuttgart, Gœbbels was on stage with him.

Adolf Hitler called for a Nazi Party conference to be held at Bamberg. Hitler was becoming concerned that the Nazi Party was splitting in 2 ideologically and wanted the issue resolved as soon as possible. Bamberg was not a random choice for this conference. Bamberg is in Bavaria and Hitler was effectively making a statement about where he thought the heart and soul of Nazism lay.

In early 1926, the Nazi Party appeared to Hitler as if it was splitting into 2 different ideologies. He believed that the Party could only go down one road and the conference at Bamberg was called to resolve the issue once and for all. Party « Gauführers » (District Leaders) were called to the meeting. Those district leaders from Northern Germany were at odds with district leaders from the south of Germany as to where the heart of Nazism lay. Those from the north were described as « urban, socialist with a revolutionary trend » (Louis Snyder) while those district leaders from the south were described as « rural, racist and with populist ideas » . (Louis Snyder)

The northern side of the Party was represented by Gregor Straßer (considered, at the time, as a rival to Hitler for the future leadership of the Party) while the south was best represented by Gottfried Feder.

Hitler chose at Sunday, February 14th, for the meeting in the hope that those from the north of Germany would find it more difficult to get to Bamberg than those in the south. In this sense, Hitler was making it clear where his loyalties lay. However, he knew that he had to be careful as he was unsure which group had the most support when the meeting opened. Both Straßer and Josef Gœbbels spoke for the north but were out-numbered by representatives of the Party from the south of Germany. Hitler did, however, make himself clear when he told the conference that he would not allow the Party to go in the direction of « undiluted socialist principles » .

One of the key-topics that highlighted differences within the Party was what should be done to the homes and estates of those from noble « princely » background. The more radical northern representatives believed that the estates should be expropriated and put to the greater use of the many. Hitler made a 2 hour speech in which he stated where he stood : that expropriation of the estates would push the Party along the road of Communism and that he could not tolerate anything that would help « Communist-inspired movements » .

Hitler knew exactly what he was doing in the speech. He tainted those who stood behind Straßer with the stain of Communism - taking land from those who owned it and re-distributing it. There was a loathing of Communism among the Party and Hitler correctly gambled that those who stood behind Straßer would quickly move behind the southern Nazis who, by the end of the congress, clearly had the backing of Hitler. One of the main-figures who made this move was Josef Gœbbels. He had originally gone to Bamberg to speak on the behalf of the northern « urban revolutionaries » but by the time the conference broke-up, he had set himself firmly in the Hitler camp. It was a move of loyalty recognized by Hitler who made the future Head of Propaganda « Gauleiter » of Berlin. Straßer, for his part, called Gœbbels a « scheming dwarf » .

However, Hitler never forgot someone who he believed represented a challenge to his authority. In 1926, Straßer appeared to do just this. He was one of those murdered in the « Night of the Long Knives » in 1934. Straßer had nothing to do with the threat posed by Ernst Röhm and the SA and was politically inactive at the time - but the whole episode presented Hitler with the perfect opportunity for revenge.

The Bamberg leadership conference was a meeting of the leadership of the National-Socialist German Workers' Party (NSDAP) on Sunday, 14 February 1926. Adolf Hitler claimed there sole, uncompromising leadership within the Party that he was able to pass completely through the course of the year.

After the failure of the Hitler-Ludendorff « Beer-Hall “ Putsch ” » of 1923 and the subsequent trial for treason, the NSDAP was banned until 1925 and sentenced Hitler to December 20, 1924, in Landsberg Fortress prison. During this time, there was « Aufsplitterungstendenzen » and changing leadership aspirations within the organization. Especially under Gregor Straßer, a Left-wing began to emerge who had a « national socialism » instead of « Nazism » to the destination according to its own definition.

Within the NSDAP took place in winter 1925-1926 into a political discussion, the position that we should refer to the « Reichstag » in the upcoming issue of Prince severance. The NSDAP functionaries of the Association Northwest met on January 24, 1926, in Hanover, and spoke-out against compensation. This view did not meet the approval of Hitler, who had no desire to alienate supporters of a prince compensation and this question looked at as secondary, as in Bavaria since 1923, there was a system with the House of Wittelsbach. An impending split of the NSDAP wanted to stop Hitler. Matter was held on February 14, 1926, a meeting of leaders place in Bamberg (Bavaria) . There, the Left-wing of the Party had his program demands that expressed a more « National Bolshevik » policy, withdraw under Gregor Straßer, and Josef Gœbbels. The « Völkische » observers reported that it was complete unanimity has been reached. Adolf Hitler went emerge from this debate out, combined the wing of the Party and became the sole leader of the NSDAP. With the adopted little (later) Party constitution of 22 May 1926, its 1920 declared the 25 Point Programme unchangeable, the victory over the Straßer group was complete.

Josef Gœbbels, however, showed in his diary entry of Hitler deeply disappointed :

« Hitler is talking about. 2 hours. I'm like beaten. What a Hitler ? What a reactionary ? Fabulous clumsy and uncertain. Russian question : completely wrong. Italy and England inherent allies. Horrible ! Our task is the destruction of Bolshevism. Bolshevism is Jewish making ! Prince severance ! Law must remain legal. Even the princes. Not shake question of private property ! Dreadful ! Straßer speaks. Hesitantly, trembling, awkward, the good, honest Straßer, oh God, how little we have grown these pigs down there. Probably one of the biggest disappointments of my life. I no longer believe completely to Hitler. That's the terrible thing : my inner-reliance is taken. I'm only halfway. »

2 months later, however, wrote Gœbbels, who was embraced by a speech by Hitler :

« I'm something of happy. »

On July 25th, 1926, Gœbbels was then in the diary :

« He (Hitler) - I feel connected to the last. Now, the last question to me has disappeared. Germany is live ! “ Heil Hitler ” ! »

Finally, he justified his « volte-face » in an open-letter, of 15 November 1926.

Straßer, who represented increasingly pro-business positions since 1931 and of individual industrialists who accepted donations, resigned from all Party posts due to recurring differences with Hitler, in 1932. On June 30th, 1934, he was murdered in so-called « Röhm “ Putsch ” » by the « Gestapo » .

Die Bamberger Führertagung war ein Treffen der Führungsriege der Nationalsozialistischen Deutschen Arbeiterpartei (NSDAP) am 14. Februar 1926. Adolf Hitler beanspruchte dort die alleinige, kompromisslose Führung innerhalb der Partei, die er im Verlauf des Jahres auch vollständig durchsetzen konnte.

Nach dem gescheiterten Hitler-Ludendorff-Putsch von 1923 und dem darauffolgenden Prozess wegen Hochverrats wurde die NSDAP bis 1925 verboten und Hitler bis zum 20. Dezember 1924 in Landsberg zur Festungshaft verurteilt. Während dieser Zeit kam es zu Aufsplitterungstendenzen und wechselnden Führungsansprüchen innerhalb der Organisation. Vor allem unter Gregor Straßer bildete sich ein linker Flügel heraus, der laut Selbstdefinition einen « nationalen Sozialismus » statt eines « Nationalsozialismus » zum Ziel hatte.

Innerhalb der NSDAP kam es im Winter 1925-1926 zu einer politischen Diskussion, welche Position man bei der im Reichstag anstehenden Frage der Fürstenabfindung beziehen sollte. Die NSDAP-Funktionäre der Arbeitsgemeinschaft Nordwest trafen sich am 24. Januar 1926 in Hannover und sprachen sich gegen eine Entschädigung aus. Diese Auffassung stieß nicht auf die Zustimmung Hitlers, der keinesfalls Anhänger einer Fürstenentschädigung verprellen wollte und diese Frage als zweitrangig ansah, da im Freistaat Bayern bereits seit 1923 eine Regelung mit dem Haus Wittelsbach bestand. Eine drohende Spaltung der NSDAP wollte Hitler verhindern.

Am 14. Februar 1926 fand darum eine Führertagung in Bamberg (Bayern) statt. Dort musste der linke Flügel der Partei unter Gregor Straßer und Josef Gœbbels seine Programmforderungen, die eine eher « nationalbolschewistische » Politik ausdrückten, zurückziehen. Der Völkische Beobachter meldete, es sei völlige Einmütigkeit erreicht worden. Adolf Hitler ging gestärkt aus dieser Auseinandersetzung hervor, vereinte die Parteiflügel und wurde alleiniger Führer der NSDAP. Mit der wenig später verabschiedeten Parteisatzung vom 22. Mai 1926, die das 25-Punkte-Programm von 1920 für unabänderbar erklärte, war der Sieg über die Straßer Gruppe vollkommen.

Josef Gœbbels allerdings zeigte sich in seinem Tagebucheintrag von Hitler zutiefst enttäuscht :

« Hitler redet. Zwei Stunden. Ich bin wie geschlagen. Welch ein Hitler ? Welch Reaktionär ? Fabelhaft ungeschickt und unsicher. Russische Frage : vollkommen daneben. Italien und England naturgegebene Bundesgenossen. Grauenhaft !

Unsere Aufgabe ist die Zertrümmerung des Bolschewismus. Bolschewismus ist jüdische Mache ! Fürstenabfindung ! Recht muß Recht bleiben. Auch den Fürsten. Frage des Privateigentums nicht erschüttern ! Grauensvoll !! Straßer spricht. Stockend, zitternd, ungeschickt, der gute, ehrliche Straßer, ach Gott, wie wenig sind wir diesen Schweinen da unten gewachsen. Wohl eine der größten Enttäuschungen meines Lebens. Ich glaube nicht mehr restlos an Hitler. Das ist das Furchtbare : mir ist der innere Halt genommen. Ich bin nur noch halb. »

Zwei Monate später aber schrieb Gœbbels, der nach einer Rede von Hitler umarmt worden war :

« Ich bin so etwas von glücklich ! »

Am 25. Juli 1926 trug Gœbbels dann im Tagebuch ein :

« Ihm (Hitler) fühle ich mich bis zuletzt verbunden. Nun ist mir der letzte Zweifel geschwunden. Deutschland wird leben ! Heil Hitler ! »

Schließlich rechtfertigte er seine Kehrtwendung in einem offenen Brief vom 15. November 1926.

Straßer, der seit 1931 zunehmend unternehmerfreundliche Positionen vertrat und von einzelnen Großindustriellen Spenden entgegennahm, trat wegen wiederkehrender Differenzen mit Hitler 1932 von allen Parteiämtern zurück. Am 30. Juni 1934 wurde er beim sogenannten « Ernst-Röhm-Putsch » von der Gestapo ermordet.

3 mars 1926 : Le chef Kurt Singer dirige le « Tantum ergo » et l' « Ave Maria » de Bruckner avec le « Chœur des docteurs » de Berlin (« Berliner Ärzte-Chor ») . À l'orgue : Walter Fischer. (En 1924, Singer a publié un bouquin sur la musique chorale de Bruckner.)

Kurt Singer

Le chef d'orchestre et réalisateur Kurt Singer créa, en 1933, la « Fédération culturelle des Juifs allemands » (« Kulturbund deutscher Juden ») pour permettre aux artistes juifs de continuer à exercer leur métier, et pour œuvrer contre l'exclusion des Juifs de la vie culturelle en Allemagne. Mais, en 1935, les autorités nazies contraignirent la scène culturelle juive à fonder la « Fédération du « Reich » des associations culturelles juives » (« Reichsverband der jüdischen Kulturbünde ») et placèrent son travail sous le contrôle direct de la « Gestapo » . Au moyen de cette mesure et de l'interdiction qui fut faite aux « aryens » d'assister aux représentations culturelles juives, la « Gestapo » transforma la fédération en un instrument de mise à l'écart de la population juive, isolée ainsi dans un ghetto culturel et intellectuel. Kurt Singer fut arrêté en Hollande, en 1940, et déporté au camp de concentration de « Theresienstadt » , où il mourut en février 1944.

The musician, musicologist, conductor and neurologist Kurt Singer was born on 11 October 1885 in Berent (Koblenz) , West Prussia ; and died on 7 February 1944 at the « Theresienstadt » concentration camp.

Though described by his daughter Margot Wachsmann-Singer as « more German than the Germans » , he was dismissed as a Jew from his roles in Germany's musical life after Adolf Hitler's take-over in 1933. He, then, turned to « Jewish » undertakings and, from 1933 to 1938, led the Berlin « Jüdischer Kulturbund » (Jewish Culture League) , an organization devoted to Jewish culture performed by and for Jews. This organization, which existed from 1933 to 1941, was at the centre of Singer's life and death.

The son of a rabbi, Kurt Singer studied medicine and musicology in Berlin, where he became a neurologist. Combining his interests in medicine and music, in 1912, he founded the « Berliner Ærztechor » (Doctors' Choir) , which he also conducted. During World War I, he was a military doctor, earning an Iron Cross for his service. After the War, he acted as music-editor for the Berlin newspaper « Vorwärts » , the central organ of the Social-Democratic Party of Germany. He also wrote and published such works as « Wesen und Heilwirkung der Musik » (The Healing Power of Music) as well as « Berufskrankheiten der Musiker » (The Occupational Illness of Musicians) , and produced valuable research on German folk-song and the composers Richard Wagner and Anton Bruckner. In 1927, his diverse musical accomplishments earned him a post as Intendant of the « Städtische Oper » (Municipal Opera House) , in Charlottenburg, Berlin, under Heinz Tietjen.

When the Nazis came to power, in 1933, Singer lost this position. One of the regime's earliest decrees was the « Gesetz zur Weiderherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums » (Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service) , of 7 April 1933, passed 6 days after the boycott of Jewish businesses. By means of the Law's Aryan paragraph, « civil servants who are not of Aryan ancestry » were to be dismissed. This measure prevented non-Aryans from holding positions in the public sphere, especially at cultural institutions such as State-run Music Conservatories, Opera Houses, concert-halls and theatres. In response to such Nazi legislation, rising anti-Semitism, and simple mathematics (Berlin had a significant Jewish population) , Kurt Baumann, who had worked as Singer's assistant at the Municipal Opera House, from 1930 to 1932, drafted a detailed proposal for a Jewish cultural association and contacted Singer. Baumann was wise to contact Singer. Singer had envisioned a similar organization and (as a combat veteran and respected figure in German national circles) was the perfect spokesperson for such an endeavour. Baumann and Singer revised the initial proposal for the League and, then, recruited other Jewish leaders, such as Berlin's chief rabbi Leo Bæck, journalist Werner Levie and conductor Joseph Rosenstock, who had been removed from his post as music-director at the National Theatre, in Mannheim. When Baumann approached theatre-critic Julius Bab with the project, Bab was justifiably skeptical :

« Are we allowed to do this ? »

Indeed, it was not clear how the organization would win the Nazi government's sponsorship.

A born leader, Singer has been described as charismatic and a « great personality » . He drew on these attributes as he struggled to generate interest within various government offices. He was eventually invited to meet with Hans Hinkel, who had been appointed head of the Prussian Theatre Commission by the new Prussian minister Hermann

Göring immediately after Adolf Hitler's ascension to power. In April 1933, Hinkel began negotiating with Singer the operating terms for the creation of the « Kulturbund ». In the middle of May, Hinkel summoned Singer to a final meeting with Göring, who warned :

« If all of you do everything right and obey “ Herr ” Hinkel, then everything will go well. If all of you behave badly, then there'll be trouble, you know that. »

In this way, the « Kulturbund » received the Nazi government's « blessing », and one of the most paradoxical partnerships in German history began.

During the « Kulturbund » 's tenure, Singer did his best to meet the various demands of the heterogeneous Jewish community involved through a repertoire both familiar and « Jewish ». He also struggled to maintain the organization despite economic hardships and emigration. To do this, Singer turned to Kurt Sommerfeld, a former musician in the « Kulturbund », who had left the ensemble in 1936 to participate in the newly-formed Palestine Orchestra. In a letter of 1937, he asked Sommerfeld to help prevent additional musicians from emigrating to join the Orchestra. Though Singer generally helped « Kulturbund » members leave Germany, Singer's devotion to the « Kulturbund », at times, bordered on delusional as conditions for Jews in Germany worsened. This detachment from reality became more dangerous in the following year.

In 1938, Singer travelled to the United States, where he visited his sister and lectured at Harvard University. Ernest Lenart, the « Tempelherr » in the League's inaugural performance (1933) of Lessing's « Nathan the Wise and an “ émigré ” since 1938 », visited Singer during his trip. Lenart told him about « Kristallnacht », the catastrophic pogroms of November 9 to 10, and urged him to remain in America. Singer replied :

« Dear Lenart, I must go back. »

Despite being offered a University position during his stay in the United States, out of loyalty and the importance he placed on the « Kulturbund », Singer refused. Upon hearing news of « Kristallnacht », he returned to Europe to, in his own words, « rescue what could be rescued ». « En route » in Rotterdam, friends and acquaintances were able to intercede and persuade Singer to suspend his homecoming. Within a few days, he believed the « Kulturbund » could no longer function in Nazi Germany. He remained in Holland and, until he realized the severity of the situation, participated, to a limited extent, in musical activities there, including concerts at the « Joodsche Schouwburg » (Jewish Theatre), which the Nazis established in 1941 on the model of the Berlin Jewish Culture League. With the Nazi occupation of Holland, Singer tried to return to the United States, eventually pinning all his hopes on a non-quota-visa. But no means of escape was forthcoming. On 15 July 1942, the 1st deportations from Amsterdam to Auschwitz began. Between August 1942 and November 1943, the « Jewish Theatre », of all places, was used as a deportation centre and Jews in the region, including Singer, reported there to await transport. Because of his « outstanding service to Germany's artistic community », Singer was sent to the « model » concentration camp of « Terezín », where he died in January 1944. On 11 October 1997, a memorial tablet was erected in Singer's honour on the « Mommsenstraße », in Charlottenburg.

Doctor Kurt Singer, former president of the Jewish « Kulturbund », the single Jewish cultural organization permitted to function in Germany till the outbreak of the War, died in England today. He was 59 years old.

Doctor Singer was also the president of the Association of the Jewish « Kulturbunds » in the 3rd « Reich » which, as late as 1938, had branches in about a hundred cities in Germany and counted more than 70,000 members. This association provided work for 1,700 Jewish artists who had been ousted from their jobs in the German theatres under the anti-Jewish laws. It maintained in Berlin its own « ghetto theatre » and conducted « ghetto concerts » until the outbreak of War, in various parts of Germany where Jews were concentrated.

Doctor Singer was born in Berent, West Prussia. He studied medicine and music. He practiced medicine till 1927 when he was engaged by the Berlin municipality to take an active part in the arrangements for the celebration of Beethoven's Centenary. 3 years later, he was appointed general-manager of the Berlin State Opera. He was dismissed from this position, as a Jew, immediately after the Nazis came to power in 1933.

Kurt Singer (geboren 11. Oktober 1885 in Berent, Westpreußen ; gestorben 7. Februar 1944 im KZ Theresienstadt) war ein Berliner Neurologe, Musikwissenschaftler und Vorsitzender des jüdischen Kulturbundes.

Kurt Singer, Sohn eines Rabbiners, verbrachte seine Jugend in Koblenz. Nach dem Abitur studierte er Medizin, Psychologie und Musikwissenschaften. 1908 wurde er zum Doktor der Medizin promoviert und arbeitete zunächst als Nervenarzt in der Berliner « Charité ». Seit 1910 schrieb er Musikkritiken. 1913 gründete er den Berliner Ärztechor, den er bis in die Zeit des Nationalsozialismus leitete. 1923 wurde er Professor an der Staatlichen Akademischen Hochschule für Musik, wo er sowohl lehren als auch forschen konnte. Drei Jahre später erschien sein Werk Die Berufskrankheiten der Musiker. Singer leitete von 1923 bis 1932 die ärztliche Beratungsstelle an der Hochschule für Musik und hielt Vorlesungen über Berufskrankheiten von Musikern. Von 1927 bis 1931 war er vorübergehend zunächst Stellvertreter und dann Intendant der Städtischen Oper Berlin. An der Musikhochschule wurde er im Herbst 1932 wegen angeblicher finanzieller Schwierigkeiten entlassen. Als nach der Machtübergabe an die Nationalsozialisten 1933 zahlreiche Musiker jüdischer Herkunft nach dem Gesetz zur Wiederherstellung des Berufsbeamtentums ihre Stellung verloren, gründete er den jüdischen Kulturbund. Singer emigrierte 1938 nach Amsterdam. 1943 wurde er verhaftet, zunächst in das Durchgangslager Westerbork, anschließend in das Ghetto Theresienstadt deportiert. Dort starb er am 7. Februar 1944 an den Folgen der Haftbedingungen.

Nach Singer ist heute das Kurt-Singer-Institut für Musikergesundheit an der Hochschule für Musik « Hanns Eisler » Berlin benannt.

Kurt Singer besuchte das Gymnasium in Koblenz ; vermutlich erhielt er am dortigen Konservatorium auch eine musikalische Ausbildung. Nach dem Abitur studierte er in Berlin Medizin (Promotion 1908) und setzte daneben seine musikalischen Studien bei Paul Grünberg (Violine) , Max Friedländer (Musikgeschichte) und Siegfried Ochs (Chorgesang und Dirigieren) fort. Nachdem er eine Zeitlang als Nervenarzt praktiziert hatte, nahm er 1910 eine Tätigkeit als Musikkritiker auf. Singer arbeitete und andere für den « Vorwärts » und verfaßte Schriften zur Musikgeschichte und -theorie sowie über Berufskrankheiten von Musikern. 1913 gründete er den Berliner Ärztechor (später Kurt Singerscher Chor) . Seit 1923 Lehrbeauftragter an der Staatliche akademie Hochschule für Musik in Berlin, gab er Kurse über die Belastungen und Krankheiten von Musikern und leitete eine ärztliche Beratungsstelle. 1927 wurde er stellvertretender Intendant der Städtische Oper Berlin-Charlottenburg und 1930-1931 deren Intendant. Außerdem übernahm er dort sowie an der Berliner Staatsoper Regiearbeiten ; darüber hinaus wirkte er als Stadtverordneter der SPD.

Angeblich aus finanziellen Gründen erfolgte 1932 seine Entlassung aus der Stellung an der Berliner Musikhochschule. Nachdem 1933 zahlreiche Musiker und Musikerinnen jüdischen Herkunft ihre Arbeit verloren hatten, setzte sich Singer zusammen und andere mit dem Regisseur Kurt Baumann (1907-1983) für die Gründung des Kulturbundes Deutscher Juden (später Jüdischer Kulturbund) ein. Zunächst in Berlin, später dann reichsweit Vorsitzender und künstlerischer Leiter dieser Organisation, übernahm er administrative Aufgaben und trat in Veranstaltungen des Jüdischer Kulturbundes in Berlin und anderen Städten als Chor- und Orchesterleiter sowie als Opernregisseur auf. Sein Interesse galt insbesondere der Berliner Kulturbundoper, wo er Opern beziehungsweise Operetten von Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, Ludwig van Beethoven, Camille Saint-Saëns, Giuseppe Verdi, Piotr Ilitch Tschaikowsky, Otto Nicolai, Johann Strauß und Jacques Offenbach inszenierte, sowie der Aufführung der Oratorien Händels. Während einer Reise im Herbst 1938 in die USA suchte Singer nach Möglichkeiten, den Jüdischer Kulturbund vollständig in die USA zu transferieren. Nach den Novemberpogromen 1938 kehrte er nach Europa zurück, wurde aber davor gewarnt, nach Deutschland einzureisen. Er blieb in Amsterdam, wo er als Musikschriftsteller und -lehrer arbeitete. Seine Bemühungen, ein Visum für die USA und dort eine Stellung an einer Universität zu erlangen, schlugen fehl. Nach der Besetzung der Niederlande durch die deutsche Wehrmacht arbeitete er für die jüdische Selbstverwaltung in Amsterdam und leitete 1941-1942 noch einen Chor. Im April 1943 wurde Singer verhaftet, im KZ Westerbork inhaftiert und dann in das Ghetto Theresienstadt deportiert. Dort arbeitete er noch eine Zeitlang als Musikkritiker und setzte sich für die Aufführung von Händels Oratorien ein, bis er in diesem Ghetto starb. Singers Studie über « Die Berufskrankheiten der Musiker, Systematische Darstellung ihrer Ursachen, Symptome und Behandlungsmethoden » (1926, 21960, englisch 1932) fand weite Verbreitung. Systematisch waren darin die Erfahrungen verarbeitet, die Singer seit 1923 in der Beratungsstelle der Staatliche akademie Hochschule für Musik in Berlin zu Problemen der physischen und psychischen Belastung von Musikern gesammelt hatte.

2002 wurde an der Universität der Künste Berlin und der Hochschule für Musik « Hanns Eisler » Berlin das Kurt-Singer-Institut für Musikergesundheit nach ihm benannt.

Wird Kurt Singer zunächst Nervenarzt und folgt erst spät seinen künstlerischen Neigungen. Als Kritiker, Dirigent und Regisseur findet er weithin Beachtung. 1933 gründet er mit Freunden den « Kulturbund deutscher Juden » in Berlin und will auf diese Weise verfeimten und entlassenen jüdischen Künstlern Beschäftigung, den Zuschauern aber einen Zugang zu Kultur erhalten. 1935 wird Singer Leiter des Reichsverbandes der jüdischen Kulturverbände in Deutschland und ständiger Kontrahent des nationalsozialistischen « Reichskulturverwalters » Hans Hinkel, der alle deutschen Juden zu überwachen hat. Im November 1938 kehrt Singer aus den USA nach Europa zurück, als er die Nachricht vom Novemberpogrom erhält. Freunde halten ihn in Holland davon ab, nach Deutschland zurückzukehren. Kurt Singer wird dort ab 1940 bis zu seiner Deportation in das Konzentrationslager Theresienstadt gefangengehalten, wo er Anfang Februar 1944 stirbt.

Hermann Wunsch

Hermann Wunsch (geboren 9. August 1884 in Neuß ; gestorben 21. Dezember 1954 in Berlin) war ein deutscher Komponist, Dirigent, Musiktheoretiker und Lehrbeauftragter für Komposition.

Hermann Wunsch kam 1884 als Sohn des Eisenbahnwerkmeisters Balthasar Wunsch und dessen Frau Amalie Hafels im rheinischen Neuss zur Welt. Seine Ausbildung begann er mit einem Lehrerseminar. Danach besuchte er die Konservatorien in Krefeld, wo er Komposition bei Theodor Müller-Reuter studierte, Düsseldorf, wo er von Frank Limbert unterrichtet wurde, sowie Köln.

Anschließend ließ sich Wunsch in Krefeld nieder. Dort war er zunächst ein Jahr lang als außerordentlicher Lehrer am Konservatorium tätig. Von 1907 bis 1910 dirigierte er den örtlichen Philharmonischen Chor und arbeitete außerdem als Musikprivatlehrer. Danach übernahm er die Leitung des neu gegründeten Konservatoriums in Viersen. Von 1911 bis 1912 studierte Wunsch an der Hochschule für Musik Berlin bei Engelbert Humperdinck. Im Anschluß war er ein Jahr Musikdirektor in Wattwil, Schweiz.

Während des Ersten Weltkriegs diente Wunsch an der Ostfront. Nach Kriegsende lebte er in Berlin. Von 1919 bis 1920 lehrte er am Klindworth-Scharwenka-Konservatorium. Danach arbeitete er als freischaffender Komponist. Finanziell wurde er von Heinrich Schenker unterstützt, der ihm 1924 ein Stipendium für mittellose Musiker aus dem Sofie-Deutsch-Fond gewährte. Von 1930 bis 1931 war Wunsch als Chordirektor des Stern'schen Konservatoriums tätig. 1937 begann er, Komposition an der Berliner Musikhochschule zu lehren, ab 1945 als Professor. 1954 starb er in Berlin.

Wunsch war mit Paula Augusta, « née » Peschken, verheiratet. Aus der Ehe ging ein Sohn, Hans Wolfgang Wunsch (geboren 1913) hervor.

« Bruckner-Gesellschaft »

The International Bruckner Society (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft ») was an organization which began its existence in 1927, in Leipzig ; and was officially founded in 1929, in Vienna. Its main purpose since then has been to publish editions of the music of Anton Bruckner. Most of Bruckner's music had been published during the composer's lifetime or shortly after his death, but often in versions that incorporated numerous changes suggested by his friends and students. In the case of Bruckner's unfinished 9th Symphony, Bruckner student Ferdinand Löwe made several unauthorized changes even after Bruckner's death. The mission of the International Bruckner Society was to publish versions of Bruckner's works based directly on the original manuscripts, which the composer had bequeathed to the Austrian National Library.

The Society hired Robert (Maria) Haas as General Editor, with Alfred Orel as his assistant. The 1st publication was Orel's critical edition of the 9th Symphony, published in 1934, but premiered 2 years earlier, in 1932, in a concert by Sigmund von Hausegger conducting the Munich Philharmonic Orchestra. In this concert the 9th Symphony was performed twice : once in the Löwe edition and, again, in the new Orel edition, and its success provided much impetus for a complete critical edition of Bruckner's work.

Between 1935 and 1944, Haas published editions of all the remaining numbered Symphonies except for the 3rd (Haas' work on this Symphony was destroyed in a War-time incident) . In several cases, multiple revisions of a single Symphony existed in the manuscripts, and Haas did not hesitate to combine material from different versions to produce what he considered an « ideal » version for publication (even though it did not correspond to anything actually written by the composer) .

The Society had officially been dissolved in 1938, immediately after the « Anschluß » (although publication of the complete edition continued from Leipzig) . After World War II, the Society was refounded in Vienna. Haas was fired because of his Nazi connections and publication resumed under a new General Editor : Leopold Nowak. The 1st post-War publication was a critical edition of the 3rd Symphony, edited by Fritz Öser. Nowak continued as General Editor until 1989, by which time the Society had published multiple versions of the Symphonies and also numerous other works by Bruckner. Nowak was a more scholarly and less creative editor than Haas : he saw his task as reproducing all the different versions that Bruckner wrote on the basis of the manuscript and printed sources, and documenting all the differences in great detail. The post-War Nowak editions became more commonly performed and recorded than the pre-War Haas versions, although a significant number of conductors continued to prefer Haas.

The Society continued to produce new editions of Bruckner's works after Nowak stepped down. It also sponsors periodicals and scholarship dedicated to Bruckner.

Die Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft befasst sich mit der Veröffentlichung von Ausgaben der Musik des österreichischen Komponisten Anton Bruckners und der dazugehörigen Literatur. Sie war ursprünglich 1927 in Leipzig und dann offiziell 1929 in Wien gegründet worden.

Die Musik Bruckners war weitgehend zu seinen Lebzeiten oder kurz nach seinem Tode veröffentlicht worden, aber oft mit zahlreichen Änderungen auf Vorschlag seiner Freunde und Schüler. Im Falle von Bruckners nicht vollendeter 9. Sinfonie hatte Bruckners Schüler Ferdinand Löwe mehrere nicht autorisierte Änderungen nach Bruckners Tod vorgenommen. Die Aufgabe der Internationalen Bruckner-Gesellschaft bestand darin, Versionen von Bruckners Werk zu veröffentlichen, die unmittelbar auf den Originalpartituren (Autographen) beruhten, die Bruckner der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek vermacht hatte.

Die Gesellschaft verpflichtete Robert Haas, den damaligen Leiter der Musiksammlung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek, als wissenschaftlichen Gesamtleiter mit Alfred Orel als Assistenten. Orel hat die Ausgabe der 9. Sinfonie erarbeitet, die Sigmund von Hausegger mit den Münchner Philharmonikern aufgeführt hatte. Er führte die

Sinfonie zwei Mal auf, einmal in der bis dahin bekannten Löweschens Fassung und dann nach dem von Orel wiederhergestellten Notentext des Autographen. Die Mehrzahl der Hörer entschied sich für die Orel'sche Fassung.

Zwischen 1935 und 1944 veröffentlichte Haas Ausgaben der Brucknerschen Sinfonien außer der Dritten (sie wurde durch Kriegseinwirkungen zerstört) . In einigen Fällen existierten mehrere Versionen einer einzigen Sinfonie, und Haas zögerte nicht, die verschiedenen Versionen zu mischen, um eine seiner Meinung nach « ideale » Version zu schaffen (auch wenn Teile nicht mit irgendeiner eigenen Handschrift des Komponisten korrespondierten) .

Unmittelbar nach dem Anschluß Österreichs 1938 wurde die Gesellschaft aufgelöst (auch wenn die Veröffentlichung der vollständigen Ausgabe in Leipzig fortgesetzt wurde) . Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg wurde die Gesellschaft in Wien neu gegründet. Haas wurde wegen seiner nationalsozialistischen Vergangenheit entlassen und die Arbeit des wissenschaftlichen Gesamteditors Leopold Nowak übertragen, der bereits seit 1937 in der Gesellschaft mitgearbeitet hatte. Nowak blieb wissenschaftlicher Herausgeber bis 1989. Während dieser Zeit hat die Gesellschaft mehrfache Versionen der Sinfonien und zahlreicher anderer Werke Bruckners herausgegeben. Nowak war mehr wissenschaftlich und weniger kreativ als Haas. Er sah seine Aufgabe darin, die verschiedenen Versionen von Bruckners Arbeiten auf der Basis von Autographen und gedruckten Quellen wiederherzustellen und die Unterschiede im Detail zu dokumentieren. Die Nachkriegsausgaben von Nowak wurden häufiger aufgeführt als die Haasschen Vorkriegsausgaben, auch wenn eine nennenswerte Zahl von Dirigenten (zum Beispiel Herbert von Karajan, Günter Wand, Bernard Haitink) Haas vorzuziehen.

Die Gesellschaft setzt die Herausgabe neuer Ausgaben von Bruckner auch nach dem Ausscheiden von Nowak fort. Sie veröffentlicht ein Mitteilungsblatt (Studien und Berichte) und vergibt Stipendien, die Bruckner gewidmet sind.

Robert Haas

The Austrian musicologist and conductor Robert (Maria) Haas was born on 15 August 1886 in Prague and died on 4 October 1960 in Vienna.

At the beginning of his career with the Austrian national library, Haas was mostly interested in Baroque and Classical music. Later on, he was engaged by the newly formed International Bruckner Society to work on a complete edition of Anton Bruckner's Symphonies and Masses based on the original manuscripts bequeathed by the composer to the Vienna library.

Between 1935 and 1944, Haas published editions of Bruckner's, 6th (1935) ; 5th (1935) ; 1st (1935) ; 4th (1936 and 1944) ; 2nd, 8th (1939) ; and 7th (1944) Symphonies. (A scholarly edition of Bruckner's 9th Symphony had already been produced in 1932 by Alfred Orel, and Haas's work on the 3rd Symphony was destroyed during the War.)

Haas's editions of Bruckner are controversial. Scholar Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt charges that, in the 2nd, 8th and 7th Symphonies, Haas made changes to Bruckner's musical texts that « went beyond the limits of scholarly responsibility » .

For example, the 8th Symphony existed in 3 versions : Bruckner's original manuscript of 1887, a revised manuscript of 1890 which incorporated suggestions from Franz Schalk, Arthur Nikisch and others, and the 1st published edition of 1892 which went even further in the direction of the changes suggested by Bruckner's friends. Haas decided to make a composite edition based on the 1890 manuscript but adding in some passages from the 1887 version that he thought it a shame to lose : he also re-wrote a brief passage himself. Haas thus produced a text of the Symphony that did not correspond to anything ever written or approved by Bruckner. A similar problem occurs in Haas's edition of the 2nd Symphony. Some scholars have suggested that Haas was motivated to make these changes in order to assert copyright over his work.

Another source of controversy is Haas's attachment to the Nazi Party. Haas was a member of the Nazi Party and did not hesitate to use the language of Naziism to garner approval for his work. He portrayed Bruckner as being a pure and simple country soul who had been corrupted by « cosmopolitan » and Jewish forces. This proved Haas's undoing, as after World War II, he was removed from the Bruckner project and replaced by the more scholarly, if less inventive, Leopold Nowak who went on to produce new editions of all Bruckner's Symphonies.

The great conductor Wilhelm Furtwängler criticized what he called Haas' « violation myth » in his private notebooks :

« Only unproductive minds can seriously believe that a great productive artist (i.e. , Bruckner) can be “ put under pressure ” for the duration of a depression. The falsification that is done here to the character of Bruckner (Bruckner as a “ fool ”) is much greater than that done by the essays (attempts ?) of the 1st scholars, Löwe and Schalk. »

On the other hand, noted Bruckner conductor Georg Tintner has described Haas as « brilliant » and calls Haas's edition of Bruckner's 8th Symphony « the best » of all available versions. Many conductors, including Herbert von Karajan, Bernard Haitink, Daniel Barenboim, Takashi Asahina and Günter Wand continued to prefer Haas's editions, even after the more scholarly Nowak editions became available.

Robert Haas also edited some of the music of Hugo Wolf, Claudio Monteverdi's « Il Ritorno d'Ulisse in Patria » , Christoph Willibald von Gluck's « Don Juan » , and other Baroque music. He also wrote about the « Wiener Singspiel » , Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart and Johann Sebastian Bach.

Robert Maria Haas (geboren 15. August 1886 in Prag ; gestorben 4. Oktober 1960 in Wien) war ein österreichischer Musikwissenschaftler und Dirigent.

Robert Haas studierte in Prag, Berlin und Wien Musikwissenschaft und promovierte 1908 in Prag zum Doktor der Philosophie. Einige Zeit war er Assistent von Guido Adler am Wiener Musikhistorischen Institut und schlug dann eine Kapellmeisterlaufbahn ein. 1920 übernahm er die Leitung der Musikabteilung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek. Haas gab in den 1930er Jahren als erster eine vollständige Edition der Symphonien Anton Bruckners heraus. Für das mehrbändige Handbuch der Musikwissenschaft von Ernst Bücken verfasste er zwei Bände.

Haas war seit 1933 NSDAP-Mitglied, was ihm anscheinend in Österreich vor dem Anschluß Österreichs zum Nachteil wurde. Es sind führertreue und antisemitische Äußerungen von Haas überliefert. Er erhielt nach dem Krieg keine Lehrbefugnis mehr.

The Bruckner Society Embarks on a Series of Translations

(July 2015) The Bruckner Society of America has commissioned the translation of several German essays from the 1930's. These essays are critical to a better understanding of the climate in Germany regarding the preparation of the « Bruckner Original Edition » by musicologist Robert Haas.

In discussing the project, Society President, Benjamin Korstvedt stated that :

« These essays are some of the most important texts from the “ Bruckner Streit ” that broke-out around the appearance of the 1st controversial volumes of the Bruckner edition, in 1935 and 1936. There was a rather lively, and often less than honest, debate about it all. But it came to an abrupt end when Josef Gæbbels weighed-in, in 1937, and with the official ban on music-criticism, in the following year. The arguments in 1936 are quite enlightening about how and why we now regard the “ Bruckner Problem ” the way we do. Since this material is almost totally unknown to English speakers, these translations will have something important to say to a modern audience. »

...

According to Robert Haas, Anton Bruckner was intellectually violated and compelled against his better judgement and conscience by friends and students (principally, conductors of the 1st performances of his symphonies such as Ferdinand Löwe, Franz Schalk, Arthur Nikisch and others) to accept, into the printed editions, those cuts and instrumental retouchings carried-out by these conductors, on practical grounds. Thus, the « true Bruckner » , to be found only in the scores of the original versions, had not been heard at all, until now.

The way in which Haas supported the « falsification theory » in the introductions and commentaries of the «

Complete Critical Edition » and in his other verbal and written statements, all too obviously trying to construct a « criminal musical case around Anton Bruckner » , contrasts so strongly with the scrupulousness and wealth of information in his other musicological works that one cannot possibly mistake his role as an illicit, clandestine agent of National-Socialist propaganda. It is scarcely credible that he would, otherwise, have neglected to examine more closely the personal relationships between Bruckner and his friends and the various conductors of his 1st performances as they appear in several contemporaneous sources (particularly, the correspondence between Bruckner and his conductors relating to questions of cuts and alterations) and that he would have overlooked the conclusions arising from this, in his historical-critical introductions and commentaries to the « Complete Critical Edition » . Instead, Haas attempted to represent each divergence between the original and printed versions as an act of sacrilege committed against Bruckner's music by his conductors and friends who had imposed their will on the old Master. The huge intellectual energy with which Bruckner pursued his goal of complete Mastery, fulfilling his intentions whether initially as an organist, later as a composer of counterpoint and fugues, or finally as a Symphonist, demonstrates that it is unacceptable to portray him as a weakling who was not in full possession of his mental powers. And, in fact, several letters show that conductors from among Bruckner's circle of students such as Arthur Nikisch and Franz Schalk took great pains to come to an understanding with the Master about every detail of the 1st performances they were directing. This was the case both with the insertion of the cymbal crash in the Adagio of the 7th Symphony for which Nikisch obtained the Master's consent through the mediation of Josef Schalk, and with the disposition of the Chorale passage for separate wind group in the close of the 5th Symphony's Finale for which Franz Schalk had the express permission of Bruckner. On the other hand, an exchange of letters between Bruckner and Hermann Levi, who much to Bruckner's annoyance had initially refused to conduct a performance of the 8th Symphony, in Munich, shows that the Master took to heart the famous conductor's criticism and immediately began an extensive revision of the score of the 8th Symphony, as he informed Levi, in a letter of 20 October 1887, writing :

« I will do whatever is possible to the best of my knowledge and conscience. »

In a further letter of 27 February 1888, Bruckner reported on the progress of this revision of the 8th Symphony with the words :

« It looks different already. »

It is significant that this material containing important arguments against Haas' falsification theory and refuting the assumption that Bruckner's conductors and students exerted pressure on him or that he acted under any coercion when deciding to revise and alter his scores for printing, was published by none other than Alfred Orel, co-editor of the « Complete Critical Edition » , in his seminal study, « Original und Bearbeitung bei Anton Bruckner » (Original work and revisions by Bruckner) , though only after Haas had succeeded in forcing Orel out and appropriating the sole editorship of the « Complete Critical Edition » for himself.

Whether this repudiation of Haas' falsification theory was merely an act of personal revenge on Orel's part for his unprofessional treatment at the hands of Haas, or whether, as a musicologist, he believed he could no longer be responsible for advocating something that had nothing to do with scholarship but had revealed itself simply National-

Socialist propaganda, need not be more he brazen anti-Austrian propaganda with which the ... the 2 International Bruckner Festivals of 1936 and 1937, held in Linz and Upper-Austria, demonstrated that Orel had every reason to recoil from the political consequences of continuing involvement with the campaign for Bruckner's original versions. On these occasions, the principal slogan of this large-scale, organized whispering campaign ran :

« The true Bruckner has never existed in Austria at all, but only a falsified distortion (“ Zerrbild ”) of his music has been heard. The true Bruckner, who was never at home in the former Austria, has been discovered and brought to light only through National-Socialism. »

It was in this sense that « the official annexing of Anton Bruckner by Fascist great-Germany » followed in summer 1937, on the occasion of the unveiling of the Bruckner bust in the « Walhalla » Temple, in Regensburg, at which Adolf Hitler personally gave the Festival speech. Just as the « true Bruckner » was, then, openly celebrated as the discovery of the 3rd « Reich » and assigned his place of honour among German musical heroes by the « Führer » and « Reich » Chancellor, so National-Socialist propaganda laid its cards on the table : the « Musicological Publishers » , in Vienna, received a subsidy of 100,000 RMarks from the government of the German « Reich » for the further publication of the « Complete Critical Edition » of Bruckner's works.

The ceremony at the « Walhalla » , in Regensburg, was the culminating point of the distortion to which the Bruckner phenomenon had been subjected at the hands of posterity. In complete contrast to the monstrous clamour of this political propaganda, which ended-up with the annexation of the Austrian Symphonist Bruckner by the 3rd « Reich » and the granting of a 100,000 « Reichsmark » subsidy to the « Musicological Publishers » , by the Hitler regime, stood « Gustav Mahler's secret act of devotion » whereby, 27 years earlier, in summer 1910, he allowed his 1st 4 Symphonies, in which he had continued the Master's artistic heritage, to be used as security for 50,000 « Kronen » , making it possible for Universal-Edition to produce a new edition of the printed versions of Bruckner's Symphonies.

Imagine if one of the few « cognoscenti » had been called as chief witness to explain the publication process of Bruckner's Symphonies before the « tribunal » of posterity, and had had the courage to counter-act the feelings of hatred fanned by the propaganda of triumphant Hitlerite Fascism - towards those guilty of an alleged falsification of the Master's music with a clear admission of Mahler's great act of devotion ! If only, for example, Josef Venantius von Wöb, director of the music department of « Waldheim-Eberle A.G. » who had been admitted to the Board of Universal-Edition and who was fully conversant with all the transactions shared by both firms, had openly declared :

« We should not be in a position today to sit in judgement over whether Bruckner was justified in re-working his Symphonies as often as he thought fit, or the extent to which he accepted advice from his disciples and 1st conductors and accepted their proposed cuts and instrumental retouchings into the printed editions of his works, if the pioneering work of these early conductors and disciples had not prevailed in the face of a world of hostility and lack of understanding. With complete faith in their mission and in difficult conditions, with Orchestras that were still barely equal to the technical demands of this new Symphonic style, they repeatedly performed Bruckner's works until their fame gradually spread across Europe and new artists took-up their cause. The fact that this was possible, that the chain of performances did not break and Bruckner's work did not fall into oblivion when the 1st editions of the Symphonies had long been out of print and, due to a peculiar combination of circumstances, material could no longer be reprinted, can be put-down to the act of devotion of one of the Master's followers who, in 1893, in Hamburg reclaimed for the concert-hall the Mass in D minor, not given since its 1st concert performance in Linz, under Bruckner himself ; who, in 1899, conducted the 1st " complete " performance of the 6th Symphony, albeit with cuts - in a concert of the Vienna Philharmonic ; and who, finally, despite vigorous opposition, gave 1st performances of all Bruckner's Symphonies in America : Gustav Mahler. He made possible the new edition of Bruckner's Symphonies on which all the more recent cultivation of the composer depended, by renouncing the royalties from his 1st 4 Symphonies. »

But neither WöB nor the composer Friedrich Klose, a survivor from Bruckner's most intimate circle who had been called to Vienna to give his opinion on whether a 3rd party could have had a hand in the printing of Bruckner's manuscripts, dared to speak-up, let alone throw into the debate (alongside Ferdinand Löwe, Franz Schalk and Arthur Nikisch) the name Gustav Mahler, which appeared on the list of composers outlawed by National-Socialism. Nothing more stood in the way of the annexing of the « true » Bruckner by the 3rd « Reich » , of his nomination as « German hero of music » . And thousands of grateful Bruckner supporters looked to the « Reich » in whose « Walhalla » the « Führer » had personally unveiled the bust of their Master. « The blow against the separate Austrian development of the post-Classical Symphony, so disagreeable to great-German ideology, had succeeded. »

The International Bruckner Society and the N.S.D.A.P. : A Case Study of Robert Haas and the Critical Edition

Abstract : Focuses on how the elements of the political climate in Germany in the 1930's merged to shape a perception of Anton Bruckner that exerts its influence on how audiences and music professionals understand the composer. Linking of the International Bruckner Society with the « National-Sozialistische Deutsche Arbeiter-Partei » (N.S.D.A.P.) ; Case study of Robert Haas and the critical edition.

Linking the International Bruckner Society with the « National-Sozialistische Deutsche Arbeiter-Partei » (N.S.D.A.P.) suggests, at once, an array of highly-charged issues : the institutionalization of Anton Bruckner, the influence of politics on art, and the tragic course of events that befell the world (some 70 years ago) as the Nazis assumed power in Germany under Adolf Hitler. The following discourse focuses on how the elements of this particular historical situation merged to shape a perception of Bruckner that, even today, exerts its influence on how audiences and music professionals understand this composer. It is not my intention to make any claims about Bruckner's political leanings, nor do I want to besmirch existing Bruckner institutions that do so much for current scholarship. I do not even wish to blame the individuals directly involved in this dark chapter of Bruckner reception for their deeds and misdeeds. My assertion is simply that, by examining this period, we can see how ideological determinants in the political climate of the 1930's mapped themselves onto perceptions of Bruckner's life and character and that this politicized approach ultimately constituted a crucial factor in the editing practice of the critical edition. Thus, our impressions of Bruckner as an individual and, even sometimes, the scores that are said to represent his musical genius relate almost inevitably to the views that emerged in these tumultuous years of the 20th Century. It is time, as others have said before me, to question the origins and the agenda of these often tacit assumptions.

This study relies, in great part, on papers of the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft », in the holdings of the Music Collection of the Austrian National Library. The materials (cataloged as F60 BRGA) were connected with Leopold Nowak's Estate and were made available for study only a few years ago. To my knowledge, no detailed examination of these folders has yet been completed : the roughly 5,000 pages of materials (letters, protocols, statements, notes, etc.) are alphabetized and ordered chronologically in several series, but there is no cross-index or ...

Plagued by insecurity all of his life, Anton Bruckner constantly revised his Symphonies, in the hope of gaining the approval of his critics. His orchestral works went through many editions and a brief history shows how many alterations exist :

Symphony No. 1 : 2 significantly different versions with several other minor revisions.

Symphony No. 0 : Probably originally composed before No. 1, it was completely revised after the composition of the 1st and, then, withdrawn altogether.

Symphony No. 2 : 3 different versions.

Symphony No. 3 : 4 different versions, as well as a 2 piano version fashioned by Gustav Mahler and Rudolf Krzyzanowski while they were disciples of Bruckner.

Symphony No. 4 : 2 main versions, one with an entirely new movement, and several minor revisions.

Symphony No. 5 : Only minor revisions, perhaps explained by the fact that this Symphony was never performed in Bruckner's lifetime.

Symphony No. 6 : No revisions.

Symphony No. 7 : Only minor revisions.

Symphony No. 8 : 2 very different versions ; the original sounds like an entirely fresh and new piece of music after having grown-up with the more normally performed revision.

Symphony No. 9 : No revisions, but it must be remembered that the composer died while still working on this Symphony.

This number of incarnations would certainly present a daunting task for a cataloger, but it is only the tip of an Alpine ice cap. The trusting composer allowed 2 Viennese musicologists to prepare the actual versions for publication and these 2 men, Franz Schalk, director of the Vienna Opera, and Ferdinand Löwe, radically altered these great Symphonies before sending them to the printer. Bruckner was a great worshipper of Richard Wagner and, in fact, had dedicated his Symphony No. 3 to this great Master. However, during its 1st revision, Bruckner decided to take-out many of the musical references to his spiritual mentor's works, hoping to placate the anti-Wagner critics led by Eduard Hanslick. Ironically, when Schalk and Löwe got their hands on the scores, they endeavored to make them sound more like Wagner, making wholesale cuts in many pieces and changing the instrumentation to reflect the sonic landscape of Bayreuth. So, now, posterity has inherited the many Bruckner editions, as well as the performing versions of Schalk and Löwe.

Enter the International Bruckner Society. Its President in the 1930's was Robert Haas, and he and his associate, Alfred Orel, made it their mission to try to restore Bruckner's original intentions (whatever that really meant) . The Symphonies were now revised again and these revisions are known as the Haas editions. That should certainly have put the Bruckner question to rest, however, there was more intrigue to come. With the fall of the Nazi Party, Haas was replaced by the more politically acceptable Leopold Nowak who revised the works, yet again ! The resulting Nowak editions are his personal conceptions of the composer's original intentions and are prefaced by lengthy and convoluted explanations justifying his particular contribution to Brucknerian scholarship. Most recordings of the Bruckner Symphonies identify whether they are Haas, Nowak or original editions (« Urfassungs ») and, ultimately, it becomes a matter of personal taste rather than « authenticity » . Unlike a great painting that can be cleaned to eliminate the Centuries of dirt, that may have distorted it, there is no final composer-approved version of a Bruckner Symphony, as the original is simply one of many that the great man sanctioned at various points in his lifetime.

Mass No. 3 is the finest example of Bruckner's writing for the liturgical service, a virtually unexplored output outside of Austria. Swimming upstream from the current tide of « original equals better » polemics, Professor Leon Botstein offered significant rethinks of the 1st versions, crediting the composer with considerable musical sense exclusive of his obsessive self-effacement. Unlike his « protégé » Gustav Mahler and his « in-turn » Bruno Walter, Bruckner was never a patient of Doctor Sigmund Freud, although he lived literally right around the corner from him in Vienna (otherwise, his penchant for counting the beads on ladies' dresses might have immortalized him as a case study) .

Being granted the honour of offering the premiere of his new Mass at the « Augustinerkirche » (scene of all the Royal Hapsburg weddings) afforded the still under-recognized composer an air of instant respectability. He continued throughout the remainder of his life to enjoy the comfortable trappings of academic success, even if he was never enshrined in the creative Pantheon by his contemporaries and colleagues. For many of his generation, the title conferring this respect was paramount (in the only sound recording of his fellow composing genius, the great man introduces himself as Doktor Brahms) , but for the « naïf » Bruckner, secular accolades were trivial at best, surreal at worst (he was once apparently duped into believing that he had been appointed King of Romania !) . What mattered rather was his humble relationship with his God, a life-long passion which culminated in the eloquence of Symphonies Nos. 5, 8 and 9.

Dès avant 1933, Anton Bruckner fut qualifié par Richard Eichenauer, dans « Musik und Russe » , de musicien « nordique-dinamique » , formule subtile qui permettait d'intégrer les artistes talentueux du Sud (Bruckner est né près de Linz) dans l'élite nordique de la musique germanique et d'opposer au cosmopolitisme intellectuel, Libéral et « décadent » de Vienne, le brave paysan du Danube, l'organiste naïf et génial qui réunissait toutes les qualités d'enracinement (« Blut und Boden » : le sang et la terre) , de candeur religieuse (la foi profonde du charbonnier) , de soumission obséquieuse au pouvoir et de respect des règles sacro-saintes de l'harmonie traditionnelle (accords et cadences parfaites, modulations simples, clarté polyphonique, emphase hymnique, solennités cuivrées) . Cette opposition entre Bruckner et Vienne a été clairement formulée par Adolf Hitler dans un de ces « Propos de table » qu'il imposait à ses collaborateurs.

Celui-ci date du 13 ou 14 janvier 1942 :

« On peut imaginer dans quelle situation difficile se trouvait le petit paysan quand il est arrivé à Vienne dans la société corrompue de la grande ville. »

Hitler ne pouvait pas être insensible à un destin d'artiste qui reflétait le peintre manqué qu'il fut lui-même, échouant totalement face au cosmopolitisme et à l'esthétisme avancé de la capitale autrichienne. Il n'y avait plus qu'un pas à franchir pour retrouver le leitmotiv wagnérien : tout cela est la faute des Juifs.

La consécration réparatrice suprême de Bruckner, comme musicien germanique exemplaire, vint le 6 juin 1937 lorsqu'un buste en marbre, plus grand que nature, fut inauguré au « Walhalla » de Regensburg (Ratisbonne) , une imitation du Parthénon, construite entre 1830 et 1841 par Louis Ier de Bavière. Des 250 stèles destinées à accueillir les bustes des grandes figures de la culture germanique, 163 étaient déjà occupées lorsque Hitler décida que son concitoyen de Haute-Autriche (né à Ansfelden, près de Linz) y avait sa place, sur la 1re stèle ornée d'une Croix gammée. Bruckner n'était cependant pas le 1er Autrichien puisque Franz Schubert y était entré 9 années auparavant en même temps que Friedrich Jahn, un pédagogue prussien qui joua un rôle important au début du XIXe siècle dans le développement des mouvements nationalistes pan-germaniques et de leurs manifestations antisémites. Bruckner permettait ainsi à la liturgie nazie de s'installer dans un des hauts-lieux historiques de la germanité mais cette manœuvre avait aussi un sens politique. Dans un discours prononcé le même jour à Regensburg, Hitler parla de l'unité culturelle de « notre Empire ». L'« Anschluß » culturel annonçait l'« Anschluß » tout court. Dans son discours de 17 minutes prononcé devant le buste, Goebbels n'utilisa pas une seule fois l'adjectif « catholique » ou « chrétien » mais parla de Bruckner comme d'un « croyant en Dieu (" Gottgläubig ") délivré de toutes les complications qu'entraînent les doutes intellectuels ». Or, à cette époque, plusieurs millions d'Allemands adhéraient au mouvement néo-païen proche du Nazisme des « Gottgläubigen », dirigé par la générale Mathilde Ludendorff.

In Nazi Germany, « Gottgläubig » (literally, belief in God) , was a Nazi religious movement of those who broke-away from Christianity but kept their faith in a higher-power or divine creator. The term implies someone who still believes in God, although without having any religious affiliation. The Nazis were not favourable toward religious institutions but they did not promote or require atheism on the part of their membership. By the decree of the « Reich » Ministry of the Interior (of 26 November 1936) , this religious descriptor was officially recognized on government records. It was last recognized in the 1946 census of the French Occupation Zone.

Bruckner ne quittait pas l'Autriche catholique pour rejoindre l'Allemagne protestante. C'est une Germanie nordique pré-chrétienne qui l'attendait, dont Hitler était le nouveau prophète, le National-Socialisme la nouvelle religion officielle, et Bruckner le nouveau Bach.

En novembre 1942, alors que des milliers de soldats allemands meurent chaque jour inutilement devant Stalingrad, Hitler dessine une esquisse de monument wilhelminien gigantesque à la gloire de Bruckner qu'il envisage d'ériger dans sa ville natale de Linz, et il projette de créer à l'abbaye de Saint-Florian un autre Bayreuth à la gloire de celui qui est, plus encore que Wagner, son alter-ego musical. Le Finale de la 5e Symphonie est utilisé en septembre 1937 pour clôturer solennellement la Journée du Parti, à Nuremberg.

Bruckner ayant toujours éprouvé des doutes sur la valeur musicale et l'exécutabilité de ses Symphonies, elles firent l'objet de nombreuses révisions de telle sorte qu'il existe au moins 3 versions, le plus souvent 4 et, parfois, 5 ou 6 des mêmes partitions ; tantôt manuscrites, tantôt éditées. Cette situation résultait évidemment des réactions que suscitaient les 1ers jets ; même le célèbre Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne trouvait les partitions originales inexécutables. Les modifications provenaient donc des remarques des chefs d'orchestre désireux d'inscrire ces œuvres à leurs programmes comme Ferdinand Löwe, Hermann Levi, Gustav Mahler, Franz Chaim, les frères Franz et Josef Schalk ou des éditeurs comme Albert J. Gutmann, Ludwig Döblinger ou Ernst Eulenburg, intéressés à leur publication dans une forme exécutable. À l'exception de Schalk et Döblinger, tous étaient des Juifs, appartenant pour la plupart au courant Libéral, cosmopolite et moderniste qui s'opposait à la Vienne traditionnelle, « kakanique » et conservatrice. En dehors de l'orgue, Bruckner n'avait guère de connaissance personnelle des instruments et, sans doute, beaucoup de remarques étaient-elles justifiées par la pratique instrumentale de l'époque.

Ce n'est que 36 ans après la mort du compositeur que l'on put, grâce à une initiative de Max Auer, Président de la Société Bruckner, se livrer à la comparaison entre la version remaniée et imprimée et celle, antérieure et restée manuscrite, de la 9e Symphonie en les exécutant successivement en avril 1932 au cours d'un même concert dirigé par Siegmund von Hausegger, un Autrichien adversaire de tout modernisme cosmopolite. Cette exécution conduisit l' « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , fondée à Vienne en 1929, à entreprendre une édition moderne des Symphonies. Dans ce but, on engagea successivement en avril 1934 : Alfred Orel, un musicologue qui dirigeait le département musical de la bibliothèque de la ville de Vienne et était l'auteur de plusieurs publications sur Bruckner depuis 1921 ; puis, Robert Haas (1886-1960) , un spécialiste du Baroque et des manuscrits musicaux. Ils furent d'abord chargés d'établir une édition de la version originale de la 9e Symphonie. Le travail se révéla très vite difficile, les 2 musicologues développant des vues différentes sur ce qu'il y avait lieu de faire. Le conflit éclata lorsque Orel publia en 1936 dans la revue « Deutsche Musikkultur » , récemment créée par la maison d'édition « Bärenreiter-Verlag » , un article intitulé « Original und Bearbeitung bei Anton Bruckner » dans laquelle il exposait clairement la complexité des problèmes rencontrés et s'interrogeait sur la meilleure façon de rejoindre les véritables intentions du compositeur, d'autant plus que, soulignait-il, souvent Bruckner lui-même avait souhaité revoir ses partitions. C'était, en d'autres termes, mettre en cause la méthode de Robert Haas qui rejetait « a priori » toute révision comme nécessairement influencée par des tierces parties, point de vue qu'Alfred Orel résumait clairement en disant :

« Si, autrefois, on a succombé à la tentation d'aller au-delà de Bruckner, il y a maintenant un danger de rester en deçà. »

Long de 30 pages, l'article ne laissait donc aucun doute sur l'existence d'un désaccord avec Robert Haas qui, dans une conférence tenue quelques mois auparavant, avait donné jour à la dimension idéologique de son interprétation musicologique en affirmant que Bruckner avait été victime « de la cravache d'une certaine " intelligentsia " de la presse qui avait acculé un génie simple et naturel comme Bruckner à la capitulation » . Orel fût cependant soutenu dans la revue qui avait publié son article par Friedrich Klose, un élève de Bruckner, par le chef d'orchestre Siegmund von Hausegger et même par Peter Raabe, le Président de la « Reichsmusikkammer » , qui s'intéressait particulièrement à ce Bruckner qu'Hitler aimait tant. Le conflit s'envenima et Haas écrivit en décembre 1936 qu'il était, comme Bruckner, la cible des attaques haineuses de la presse juive bien qu'en réalité Orel fut, comme lui, un militant du Parti nazi autrichien. Interrogé par le Comité de la Société Bruckner, Haas remit un memorandum qui écartait les arguments plaidant en faveur d'un respect rigoureux des données documentaires :

« L'esprit de cette édition critique telle que je l'ai projetée est si différent des habitudes Libéralistes de la philologie musicale qu'elle a évidemment à surmonter les plus fortes objections et résistances juives. En 12 longues années de bataille, je me suis vu obligé de défendre mes vues contre les éditeurs juifs de musique, contre la presse juive et, malheureusement aussi, contre des aryens qui se laissent entraîner. Je peux aujourd'hui souligner avec fierté le fait que, grâce à mon plein engagement, j'ai non seulement réussi à préserver cette œuvre de l'oppression, de la destruction et de la mutilation mais que j'ai aussi prouvé qu'elle est digne du monde entier et, en particulier, de la musique allemande. »

Ce document, daté du 25 avril 1938, donc 45 jours après l' « Anschluß » , se terminait par la dédicace :

« Au peuple allemand et à notre " Führer " Adolf Hitler, de la tâche monumentale qui lui aurait été confiée. »

11 mois plus tard, Hitler entra à Prague et Robert Haas marquait de cette date historique, le 15 mars 1939, sa nouvelle édition de la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner dont la préface soulignait que :

« C'est un signe de la Providence que cette partition restaurée dans son état original puisse résonner comme un salut aux marches de l'Est. »

« Ostmark » était le terme utilisé par Hitler pour désigner son expansion à l'Est.

L'édition Bruckner, dirigée désormais par le seul Haas, reçut un subside considérable pour l'époque, 10,000 « Reichsmarks », du ministère de la Propagande de Berlin. Cependant, les querelles entourant le travail de Haas déplurent et, dans une lettre du 7 février 1940, le ministère le pria de s'abstenir de toute controverse publique sur le thème des versions originales des 4e et 6e Symphonies en préparation. Malgré ces interférences politiques, le travail de Haas a joui d'une très bonne réputation auprès des musicologues et des chefs d'orchestre. Néanmoins, après la Guerre, une autre édition fut décidée à Vienne sous la direction d'un nouveau responsable, Leopold Nowak. En fait, à moins de reprendre tout à zéro, personne ne peut définir exactement les mérites et les lacunes du travail de Haas mais on ne saurait oublier que sa méthode fut, dès l'origine, rejetée par son collègue Alfred Orel qui l'avait observé à l'œuvre. Le plus grave est évidemment l'attitude fanatique de Haas, convaincu de retrouver l'âme spirituelle germanique authentique d'un musicien génial mais victime, à cause de sa modestie, des manipulations d'un environnement qu'aurait dominé une « intelligentsia » Libérale et juive. Haas rejeta, pour cette raison, la plupart des éditions imprimées du vivant ou peu après la mort du compositeur (7 Symphonies sur 9) en les accusant de contenir des retouches ou des modifications que Bruckner n'aurait acceptées que sous « l'influence délétère de citadins sur-cultivés » (Max Auer, Président de la « Bruckner-Gesellschaft »), voire sous les « insultes, mensonges et diffamations de la presse juive » (Robert Haas). Max Auer, éditeur de la grande biographie en 4 volumes d'August Göllerich (Gustav Bosse, Regensburg, 1922-1938), après la mort de celui-ci en 1923, publia lui-même différents ouvrages sur la vie et les lettres de Bruckner. Comme Président de la Société Bruckner, dès sa fondation à Leipzig en 1927, il remit, lors de la cérémonie du « Walhalla » de Regensburg, la 1re médaille d'honneur à Adolf Hitler. La 3e édition de son livre « Anton Bruckner, sein Leben und Werk » (Leipzig, 1941) porte l'avertissement :

« À la demande de l'éditeur, les noms de personnes non-aryennes sont à leur 1re apparition et, dans l'index, précédés d'une étoile. »

La sélection étant effectuée à l'aide du « Lexikon der Juden in der Musik » de Herbert Gerigk, paru peu auparavant. Par la suite, Max Auer prit ses distances vis-à-vis du régime, ce que semble confirmer le fait que c'est à lui que fut confié en 1946, à Vienne, le discours commémoratif du Cinquantenaire de la mort de Bruckner. Le dictionnaire encyclopédique « Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart » (MGG) de Friedrich Blume ne le jugea pas digne d'une biographie et, au lieu d'Auer, c'est Blume lui-même, spécialiste de la musique d'avant le XVIIIe siècle et du thème « Musique et Race », qui se chargea d'écrire 20 pages sur Bruckner. Ce règlement de compte dans l'Allemagne d'après-guerre reste d'autant plus inexplicable que le « Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart », édition 1999, ignore toujours autant Max Auer, un des 1ers pionniers de la musicologie brucknérienne.

Largement favorisée par le National-Socialisme, la musique de Bruckner fut donc systématiquement jouée d'après les éditions que Robert Haas publia à un rythme accéléré, entre 1934 et 1938 (toutes les Symphonies sauf la 7e en 1944) . Les chefs dits « brucknériens » comme Siegmund von Hausegger, Wilhelm Furtwängler, Eugen Jochum ou Karl Böhm, ont perpétué une tradition de tempi lents et de sonorités monumentales qui en font des grand-Messes de la solennité germanique et de l'accord parfait, ce rempart musical de l'âme allemande face à la perversion de la tonalité causée par les Juifs Gustav Mahler et Arnold Schönberg.

Or, les anciennes partitions imprimées sont beaucoup plus riches en indications de tempi et de nuances, ajoutées sans doute pour répondre aux demandes des chefs qui en dirigèrent les Ires exécutions sans qu'on ait des preuves que Bruckner les ait formellement désapprouvées. En retournant aux seuls manuscrits originaux, pauvres en indications, on a favorisé une interprétation moins variée, plus statique, moins nuancée. Une des justifications présentées est la mention « für spätere Zeiten » écrite par Bruckner sur l'un ou l'autre manuscrit. Ces mots veulent dire « pour plus tard » , ce qui n'a rien de surprenant chez un compositeur insatisfait, toujours désireux de revoir ses œuvres. On en a fait une déclaration du genre « mon temps viendra » ce qui évolue dans le langage de Robert Haas :

« Quand je serai débarrassé de tous ces Juifs qui faussent ma musique. »

C'est ce que des « Considérations scientifiques et artistiques sur la musique de Bruckner » soulignaient dans un ouvrage collectif, publié en 1937 par la Société Bruckner :

« Le Scherzo de la 9e Symphonie dans l'édition imprimée revue par ... »

Le processus musicologique devenait un procès en béatification autrichienne et catholique. Pour Leopold Nowak, l'évolution de la tonalité qui conduisit à la Seconde École de Vienne était « l'œuvre du diable » ; or, son début est contemporain des dernières œuvres de Bruckner nettement plus dissonnantes. Comme expert musical, Nowak se prononça en 1961 contre l'achat par la Bibliothèque nationale autrichienne d'une grande partie de la succession d'Anton Webern qui partit en Amérique. Or, cette collection renfermait nombre d'œuvres ou esquisses de jeunesse de Webern, révélatrices de l'influence de Bruckner (dont Webern dirigea des Symphonies durant les années 1920) et de Mahler.

Nowak prit sa retraite en 1969 et personne ne lui a officiellement succédé. Sa tâche était considérée comme quasi-achevée et les derniers volumes de la fameuse « Collection bleue » ont paru depuis, mais la question que Günter Brosche a posée reste clairement ouverte :

« Le XXIe siècle verra-t-il une 3e édition Bruckner libérée des influences idéologiques ? »

Quelques chefs d'orchestre se sont intéressés à des lectures nouvelles de Bruckner, en particulier Leon Botstein, Michæl Gielen, Nikolaus Harnoncourt, et Philippe Herreweghe. À l'exception du 1er, ils n'ont pas rompu avec les éditions Nowak ou Haas, ce qui ne pouvait pas aboutir à des différences significatives. En attendant cette possible révélation d'un Bruckner sensiblement différent, le débat illustre « a contrario » (puisqu'il n'était pas un Juif mais a quand même été épuré d'éléments supposés juifs) à quel degré d'aberration les obsessions antisémites ont pu mener les démarches artistiques et intellectuelles, modifiant ainsi la signification du triangle d'or de la musique autrichienne : Schubert-Bruckner-Mahler. Franz Schubert étant racialement et psychologiquement suspect, il fut comme compositeur symphonique largement supplanté dans la vie musicale nationale-socialiste par Bruckner devenu, à la suite des manipulations décrites, le modèle racialement et spirituellement exemplaire de l'âme originelle germanique. Quant à Gustav Mahler, Juif cosmopolite coupable de toutes les perversions, il se trouva définitivement exclu du « Reich » de 1,000 ans par l'« Anschluß » prononcé au « Walhalla », devant le buste de Bruckner.

Leopold Nowak

Le musicologue autrichien Leopold Nowak est né le 17 août 1904 à Vienne et est mort le 27 mai 1991 à Rekawinkel, en Haute-Autriche. Il est principalement connu pour ses éditions des œuvres d'Anton Bruckner pour la Société internationale Bruckner. Il tenta de rétablir au mieux les formes originelles de la plupart d'entre elles, souvent révisées du vivant même du Maître, parfois tronquées et arrangées par ses amis ou élèves ou sous leur influence.

Nowak étudia le piano et l'orgue à l'Académie de Vienne, puis la musicologie avec Guido Adler et Robert Lach à l'Université de Vienne où il enseigna ensuite de 1932 à 1973.

Il succéda à Robert Haas en tant que directeur musical des collections de la Bibliothèque nationale d'Autriche, en 1946, et commença à son tour à travailler sur les documents de Bruckner qu'il contribua à préserver.

L'approche de Nowak dans ses éditions de la musique de Bruckner était beaucoup plus scientifique que celle de Haas. Par exemple, Haas s'était permis (avec une grande réussite, pensent néanmoins certains) de combiner des éléments différents des versions de 1887 et de 1890 de la 8e Symphonie pour établir « son » édition de l'œuvre. Nowak rejeta cette manière de faire et publia les 2 versions séparément. Son travail sur le Finale inachevé de la 9e Symphonie fut prolongé et mené à bien par William Carragan. D'une manière générale, les éditions de Nowak sont aujourd'hui plus appréciées pour cette rigueur et sont à la base des nouvelles éditions de la Société internationale Bruckner, voulent définitives.

Nowak écrivit aussi des essais sur les aspects tant théoriques que métriques et rythmiques de la musique, de Bruckner comme d'autres compositeurs.

Nowak travailla également à une nouvelle édition du « Requiem inachevé » de Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, et fut capable de distinguer ce qui était de la propre main de Mozart de celles de Franz Xaver Süssmayr puis Joseph Leopold Eybler, à un point plus poussé que jamais auparavant. Ce travail lui valut une récompense officielle en 1985.

Nowak étudia aussi la musique de Heinrich Isaac, Franz-Josef Haydn, les musiques d'églises ou populaires d'Autriche, et de très nombreux compositeurs autrichiens depuis le Moyen-âge (1480 à 1550) .

The Austrian musicologist Leopold Nowak was born on 17 August 1904 in Vienna and died on 27 May 1991 in Rekawinkel (Upper-Austria) . He was chiefly known for editing the works by Anton Bruckner for the International Bruckner Society. He reconstructed the original form of some of those works, most of which had been revised and edited many times.

Nowak studied piano and organ at the Imperial Academy of Music in Vienna. He studied musicology with Guido Adler and Robert Lach at the Vienna University, where he later taught from 1932 to 1973.

He succeeded Robert Haas as music-director of the music collection of the Austrian National Library, in 1946, and is credited with helping preserve documents about Bruckner.

Nowak's approach to editing Bruckner's music was much more scientific than Haas's. Whereas Haas, for instance, combined bits from the 1887 and 1890 versions of Bruckner's Symphony No. 8 in C minor to make « his » edition of the work, Nowak put out 2 separate editions for the 2 versions. Nowak also wrote essays examining theoretical aspects of the music of Bruckner and others, such as an essay on the metrical and rhythmical aspects of the Symphonies of Beethoven and Bruckner.

Nowak worked on a new edition of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart's famously « uncompleted Requiem » , and was able through detailed scrutiny to distinguish Mozart's own hand-writing from that of Süßmayr and Eybler to an extent no one had been able to do before. In recognition, Nowak was awarded the « Goldene Mozart Medaille » in 1985.

Nowak also studied the music of Heinrich Isaac, Franz-Josef Haydn, Austrian church and folk-music, and various Austrian composers from the Middle-Ages (1480 to 1550) .

His work on Bruckner's music, particularly the Finale of Bruckner's 9th Symphony, is being continued by William Carragan.

Leopold Nowak, österreichischer Musikwissenschaftler : geboren 17. August 1904 in Wien ; gestorben 27. Mai 1991 Rekawinkel (Niederösterreich) . War ein und hauptsächlich bekannt für die Herausgabe des Werkes von Anton Bruckner für die Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft.

Nowak studierte Klavier und Orgel an der Universität für Musik und darstellende Kunst Wien und Musikwissenschaften bei Guido Adler und Robert Lach an der Universität Wien, an der er später von 1932 bis 1973 selbst unterrichtete.

Er promovierte 1927 mit der Dissertation Das deutsche Gesellschaftslied bei Heinrich Finck, Paul Hofhaymer und Heinrich Isaak (ungedruckt) , erweitert als : Das deutsche Gesellschaftslied in Österreich von 1480 bis 1550.

Von 1928 bis 1939 war er Assistent des Musikwissenschaftlichen Seminars der Universität Wien, 1932 Privatdozent, 1939 titulierter außerordentlicher Professor (1946 erneuert), seit 1946 (als Nachfolger von Robert Haas) Direktor der Musiksammlung der Österreichischen Nationalbibliothek. 1930 wurde Nowak Mitglied der Denkmäler der Tonkunst in Österreich, 1945 ernannt zum Leiter der Sektion Musikwissenschaft der Wiener Katholischen Akademie, 1946 zum Mitglied der Kommission für Musikforschung der Österreichischen Akademie der Wissenschaften sowie wissenschaftlicher Leiter der Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe.

Nowak arbeitete besonders über Anton Bruckner. Sein Ansatz bei der Herausgabe von Bruckners Werken war « wissenschaftlicher » als der seines Vorgängers Robert Haas. Während dieser zum Beispiel Teile der Versionen von 1887 und 1890 von Bruckners Sinfonie Nr. 8 zusammenfügte, gab er unabhängige Ausgaben beider Versionen heraus. Seine Arbeit zum Finale der Sinfonie Nr. 9 wurde von John Alan Phillips fortgeführt, der in der Bruckner-Gesamtausgabe eine Faksimile-Ausgabe des Fragments veröffentlichte.

Nowak erarbeitete eine neue Ausgabe von Mozarts unvollendetem Requiem und unterschied zwischen Mozarts eigener Handschrift und der von Süßmayr und Eybler. Dafür erhielt er 1985 die Goldene Mozart-Medaille. Nowak studierte ferner die Musik von Heinrich Isaac, Franz-Josef Haydn, Franz Liszt, österreichische Kirchen- und Vokalmusik und verschiedene österreichische Komponisten des ausgehenden Mittelalters (1480 bis 1550).

The 1st electrical recording of Bruckner's 7th Symphony (in E) with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by the then 30 year old Jascha Horenstein, issued on Gramophone / Polydor (66802LM through 66808LM) .

« Grammophon » have some interesting records not duplicated in the « Decca » catalogue. There is Bruckner's 7th Symphony for those who like the rather diffuse eloquence of this composer. English conductors and orchestras treat us badly over Bruckner : they are too gentle with him. Few could resist him as he is played in Germany, where his love of noise and his sentimentality are given full play. Surprisingly enough, however, Bruckner gets away with it, as owners of these records (Grammophon 66802LM-66808LM) will see.

« One of the finest-sounding recordings of its era. » (Mark Obert-Thorn)

« The Symphony is played by the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra conducted by Jascha Horenstein. » (« Some Interesting German Records » , « The Gramophone » , December 1935.)

Review of the « American Record Guide » (July / August 2010) :

There are 2 particularly remarkable things about this Bruckner 7th. The 1st is that « Grammophon / Polydor » entrusted this premiere electrical recording of a complete Bruckner Symphony to the 30 year old Jascha Horenstein. At a time when that label was also making records with Wilhelm Fürtwängler, Oskar Fried (who had made the 1st « acoustic » recording of the work, several years earlier) , Otto Klemperer (who had previously recorded the Adagio of the 8th, acoustically) , Hans Pfitzner, Erich Kleiber and Richard Strauß, this was high praise, indeed, and a vote of confidence in the young Mæstro's future career.

The 2nd remarkable feature is the recorded sound that the original engineers were able to capture. Having transferred many orchestral discs from the late-1920's, I found it to be one of the finest-sounding recordings of its era. This is greatly aided by the quiet surfaces of the German Polydor pressings used for this transfer. As the matrix numbers indicate, this was recorded over 3 separate sessions : the first movement in 1 session ; the 2nd movement and the 1st part of the Scherzo in the 2nd ; and the Scherzo's Trio and the Finale in the 3rd. Each session was recorded at a different speed, with the 1st 2 being well above the « standard » 78.26 rpm and the last being below it. (The pitches have all been corrected) . Like some other recordings of the 78 rpm period which featured A-B-A movements spread over 3 sides (the Scherzo in Willem Mengelberg's recording of the Schubert 9th comes to mind) , it was assumed that the listener would replay the 1st side of the Scherzo after the Trio side ended, since that side was not included twice in the set. (Mark Obert-Thorn)

Was anyone in North America recording entire Symphonies like this, in 1928 ? I don't think so !

Having reviewed the 1st acoustic 78 rpm version of the Bruckner 7th with Oskar Fried (on « Music & Arts ») , it seems appropriate to review the 1st electrical recording of the same massive Symphony, this from 1928 Polydor with the 30 year old Jascha Horenstein (1898-1973) , then a member of the elite circle that surrounded Wilhelm Fürtwängler. Plastic and lyrical is the 1st movement Allegro moderato (with great Wagnerian spacious arches in its lengthy periods made of irregular phrase units of 3 and 5) the real « tour de force » rests in the monumental C-sharp minor Adagio movement, almost 22 minutes in length, a solemn hymn of inordinate girth and anguished power, held in taut relief against its many harmonic meanderings. Slowly mounting string scales and Wagner horns take to Bruckner's answer to « Walhalla » , a nobly and (for the period) splendidly resonant vista. « Himmel hoch ! » .

As restored by Mark Obert-Thorn, the various orchestral choirs collaborate in moody balanced orisons of singular intensity. The elegant C major mystery of the last pages, with thumping bass chords under the diaphanous violins and flute, has to stand as one of the miracles of the original sound engineers. A commanding energy marks the Scherzo, the trumpet inviting sweeping gestures, the supporting strings and tympani inflamed. The chugging ostinati move through the various orchestral choirs gathering ever more force, a snowball rolling uphill. The rhythmic tattoo enters the bucolic Trio, both thick and serene, has something of Siegfried's sojourn into the woods. The da capo shivers with, yet, more fervent and feral agitation as of a gathering storm. The layerings of sound coalesce, separate, reel and then swell to a mighty peroration whose resonance still packs a shattering effect. No non-sense tempos for the Finale, which alternates with post-Beethoven mysticism and stolid march impulses colored by the wafting flutes.

Even at Horenstein's accelerated pace, the labyrinths in the music, its sudden sea-changes in musical periods, give us the impression that spiritual complexity and crisis underlie the driven surface confidence of the progression. The music of the 1st movement returns in the form of fanfares, whose intensity reaches an apotheosis that well crosses Wagner's « Walhalla » with affirmations of Bruckner's idiomatic faith.

This recording of Bruckner's 7th was the 1st electrical recording of a complete Symphony by the composer. As Mark Obert-Thorn says in his accompanying note, it's pretty remarkable that « Gramophone / Polydor » should have entrusted such an enterprise to Jascha Horenstein, who was then just 30 years old. The label had access to several more eminent and established conductors, including Wilhelm Fürtwängler, but Horenstein repaid the trust placed in him with a fine performance.

The 1st movement is taken at quite a brisk tempo and there were a few occasions when Horenstein pressed ahead just a bit too much. However, he conveys the geniality and lyricism of this movement very well. The Adagio is deeply felt and sonorous. Horenstein may have been relatively youthful but, already, he knew how to pace slow music and how to unfold convincingly a long Brucknerian line. There are some pitching issues, probably stemming from the recording rather than from the players, but these are minor when set aside the grandeur and nobility of Horenstein's performance, which unfolds very naturally. Incidentally, he includes the cymbal clash at the main climax.

The Scherzo is taken at a very lively pace, Horenstein imparting considerable energy and rhythmic vitality to the music. The Trio, by contrast, is taken at quite a relaxed tempo. Though very warmly phrased, it is a bit too leisurely, especially in contrast to the main Scherzo material. The recording of the Scherzo was split over 2 sessions and the join between the Scherzo and the Trio would have been the obvious place for a session break. It's possible that this might explain the slightly excessive contrast between the 2 elements of the movement but this is an accurate reflection of Horenstein's overall interpretation. The Finale is quite fleet of foot but, generally speaking, not to the extent that Horenstein was too hasty. The grand passages in the movement are given their due weight but overall it's an urgent, energetic reading. We wish that Horenstein had taken the final peroration at a broader tempo but his no-nonsense pacing is of a piece with the urgency of his conception of the whole movement.

The recording was made over 3 separate sessions, we learn, with the 1st movement recorded in 1 session, the Adagio and part of the Scherzo at the 2nd session and the remainder of the Symphony at the 3rd session. Sound engineer Mark Obert-Thorn has corrected the pitch discrepancies between the 3 sessions in making his transfer and Horenstein's skill on the podium ensures that, with the one reservation about the 3rd movement, the Symphony emerges as a unified entity.

The truly remarkable thing about this CD is the quality of the recorded sound. I've heard several discs that show the excellence of the results that German « tonmeisters » were able to achieve in the 1930's but I can't recall hearing such an early example of comparable excellence. Not only is a copious amount of detail reported but the sound is full and largely free from the shrillness in the treble that so often afflicted recordings from this period. The bass is full without being tubby and the Orchestra is balanced with quite remarkable naturalness. The climaxes reproduce with remarkably little distortion. The transfer has been achieved skilfully and the amount of background hiss is minimal.

In summary, very few allowances need to be made for the sound. In a blind hearing I would suggest that few listeners would guess that the recording was made some 82 years ago. From the recordings that have been issued by « BBC Legends » of the 5th Symphony and of the 8th and 9th Symphonies, we know that Horenstein was a notable exponent of Bruckner in the autumn of his career. This fine performance shows that he was just as adept in Bruckner at a relatively youthful age. In this excellent new transfer, this performance takes a place of note in the Bruckner discography.

Jascha Horenstein

Le chef d'orchestre ukrainien Jascha Horenstein est né le 24 avril (ou 6 mai) 1898 à Kiev et est mort le 2 avril 1973 à Londres. Sa famille, avec sa mère autrichienne, se rend à Vienne dès 1911. Il étudie le violon avec Adolf Busch (1911), puis la philosophie à l'Université (1918) où il étudie avec Franz Schreker et Joseph Marx. Puis, il se rend à Berlin afin de devenir l'assistant de Wilhelm Fürtwängler. Il débute comme chef d'orchestre en 1923. Dans les années 1920, il est invité à diriger l'Orchestre symphonique de Vienne ainsi que l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Il est nommé à la tête de l'Opéra de Düsseldorf en 1928. Il travaille à Düsseldorf jusqu'en 1933. Avec l'avènement des Nazis, il s'exile aux États-Unis en 1940 où il enseigne à la « New School for Social Research » de New York. Il dirige également les plus grandes phalanges américaines.

Jascha Horenstein a défendu le répertoire contemporain, avec notamment la première de l'arrangement en 3 mouvements pour ensemble de cordes de la « Suite lyrique » d'Alban Berg ou encore la première française de son Opéra « Wozzeck » (à l'O.R.T.F., en 1950). Des chefs de sa génération, il fut l'un des plus grands interprètes d'Anton Bruckner (s'illustrant dans les Symphonies n° 1, n° 3, n° 5, n° 7, n° 8 et n° 9) et de Gustav Mahler qu'il a dirigé dès 1922. Il a aussi gravé une superbe version de la Symphonie « Mathis le peintre » de Paul Hindemith avec l'Orchestre symphonique de Londres.

The Ukrainian conductor Jascha Horenstein was born on 24 April (or 6 May) 1898 in Kiev, Russian Empire (now, Ukraine) and died on 2 April 1973 in London.

Horenstein was born into a well-to-do Jewish family ; his mother (Marie Ettinger) came from an Austrian rabbinical family and his father (Abraham Horenstein) was Russian.

His family moved to Königsberg in 1906 and then to Vienna in 1911 and he studied at the Vienna Academy of Music starting in 1916, with Joseph Marx (music theory) and Franz Schreker (composition) .

In 1920, he moved to Berlin and worked as an assistant to Wilhelm Fürtwängler. During the 1920's, he conducted the Vienna Symphony Orchestra and the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra. He became principal conductor of the Düsseldorf Opera in 1928, and then the company's « Generalmusikdirektor » in 1929. He had to resign his post in March 1933 after the rise of the Nazi Party. His Düsseldorf tenure was the only permanent musical directorship in his career. Forced as a Jew to flee the Nazis, he moved to the United States in 1940, and eventually became an American citizen. He taught at the New School for Social Research while in New York City.

Horenstein is particularly remembered as a champion of modern music and as a Mahler conductor, although his repertory as shown by discographies was quite wide. In 1929, he conducted the premiere of 3 movements of Alban Berg's « Lyric Suite » in an arrangement for String Orchestra. In 1950, he conducted the 1st Paris performance of Berg's « Wozzeck » .

Horenstein conducted the works of Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler throughout his career, and he also displayed ongoing interest in Carl Nielsen, whom he knew personally, at a time when these composers were unfashionable. For example, his 1952 « Vox » recording of Mahler's Symphony No. 9 was the 1st studio recording, and the 2nd commercial record, of that work. Several years later, he recorded the original version of Bruckner's Symphony No. 9. He made studio recordings of several of Mahler's Symphonies at various points in his career, including Symphonies Nos. 1 and 3 with the London Symphony Orchestra. A number of radio archives hold broadcast air-checks of many of the other Mahler Symphonies, as well as « Das Lied von der Erde » .

In recent years, several of Horenstein's concert performances have been reissued on the « BBC Legends » label, including his celebrated 1959 Royal Albert Hall performance of Mahler's Symphony No. 8 and his 1972 Manchester performance of Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » .

Horenstein also recorded Robert Simpson's 3rd Symphony and music by Paul Hindemith and Richard Strauss during the last few years of his life. He was also the 1st conductor to record the complete Bach's Brandenburg Concertos (BWV 1046-1051) on period instruments (Vox, September 1954) . His Opera recordings included Nielsen's « Saul og David » . His final Operatic, and British, engagement was his March 1973 performances at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden of Richard Wagner's « Parsifal » .

It was during a performance of Nielsen's 5th Symphony in Minneapolis, in 1971, that Horenstein suffered a heart attack and was caught in mid-air by the leader of the Orchestra. Though warned by his doctors to reduce his workload, he continued to conduct. At the time of his death, he was planning to conduct Mahler's 5th, 6th and 7th Symphonies.

A champion of modern music and an intellectual and philosophical conductor of a sort not much encountered any more, Jascha Horenstein moved to Vienna with his family at age 6. He went on to study violin with Adolf Busch, Indian philosophy at the University of Vienna, and music at the Vienna School of Music. By 20, he had already decided to become a conductor and left Vienna for study in Berlin, where he conducted the Schubert Choir and became an assistant to Wilhelm Fürtwängler. In 1924, he made his debut with the Vienna Symphony Orchestra, conducting Gustav Mahler's then-little-known 1st Symphony. From 1925 to 1928, he conducted the Berlin Symphony Orchestra and, in 1929, as guest-conductor, he led the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra in the premiere of Alban Berg's « Lyric Suite ». As a young man, he made the acquaintance of Arnold Schœnberg, Anton Webern, Igor Stravinsky, Sergueï Rachmaninov, Richard Strauß, Ferruccio Busoni, and Leoš Janáček, and frequently programmed their music for the rest of his life.

On Fürtwängler's recommendation, Horenstein was appointed director of the Düsseldorf Opera, in 1929, and remained there until, as a Jew, he was forced to leave Nazi Germany. In the 1930's, he lived in Paris and traveled extensively, conducting in Brussels, Vienna, and the USSR, visiting Scandinavia with the « Ballets russes », and touring Australia and New Zealand. He settled in the United States in 1942, became a american citizen, conducted many of the leading orchestras of both North and South America and was one of 4 conductors, including Arturo Toscanini, to conduct the newly formed Palestine Symphony Orchestra. Though in great demand from the 1930's onwards, Horenstein did not actively seek a permanent conductorship ; he appeared to prefer to work on his own terms.

After the Second World War, Horenstein returned to Europe and lived in Lausanne, Switzerland. Highlights of his renewed European career came in 1950, when he introduced Alban Berg's Opera « Wozzeck » in Paris and, in 1959, when his performance of Gustav Mahler's 8th Symphony for the « BBC » did much to stimulate a Mahler revival in Britain. After 1964, when he presented Ferruccio Busoni's « Doktor Faust » in New York, he gave many concerts in London with the London Symphony Orchestra and in Manchester with the « BBC » Northern Symphony Orchestra. In his later years, he appeared frequently at London's Covent Garden.

From Fürtwängler, Horenstein learned the importance in searching for the metaphysical rather than theoretical meaning of music, and that outlook coincided with his own interest in Eastern philosophy. As a conductor, Horenstein greatly admired Leopold Stokowski for his broad repertoire and the sense of occasion he brought to every performance. He was intolerant of routine performances, even from the greatest Orchestras and, in rehearsal, he would run through large sections of a work to establish coherence and continuity before proceeding to finer details of interpretation. In the words of his assistant Lazar :

« The exceptional unity and cohesion that characterized his performances arose from the way he controlled rhythm, harmony, dynamics and tempo so that each individual moment might achieve the most vivid characterization, but the overall line and cumulative effect would not be lost. »

In the early days of the LP record, Horenstein was widely known for his recordings of the Viennese Masters, particularly Mahler and Bruckner, and derived inspiration from the interpretations of his idols, Arthur Nikisch, Bruno Walter, and Fürtwängler. Before he was 30, he had recorded Mahler's « Kindertotenlieder » and Bruckner's 7th Symphony. Shortly before his death, he said :

« One of the greatest regrets in dying is that I shall never again be able to hear ' Das Lied von der Erde '. »

The distinguished Russian-born American conductor, Jascha Horenstein, began his musical training in Königsberg as a piano student of his mother, and he also studied with Max Brode. In 1911, his family moved to Vienna, where he studied philosophy at the University and, starting from 1916, was a pupil of Adolf Busch (violin) , Joseph Marx (music theory) , and Franz Schreker (composition) at the Vienna Academy of Music. He then continued his training with Franz Schreker at the « Berlin Hochschule für Musik » (1920) .

From 1920, Jascha Horenstein served as an assistant to Wilhelm Fürtwängler in Berlin and began his career conducting the Schubert Choir in Berlin. In 1923, he was a guest-conductor with the « Wiener Symphoniker » . Returning to Berlin, he conducted the Blüthner Concerts (1924) and was conductor of the « Berliner Symphoniker » (1925-1928) ; he also appeared as a guest-conductor with the « Berliner Philharmoniker » . He became principal conductor of the Düsseldorf Opera, in 1928, and then the Company's « Generalmusikdirektor » , in 1929, but was removed from that position in March 1933 by the Nazi regime because he was a Jew. His Düsseldorf tenure was the only permanent musical directorship in his career. After conducting in Europe, Australia, New Zealand, and Palestine, he went to the USA, in 1940, and became a naturalized American citizen. He also taught at the New School for Social Research while in New York City.

Following the end of World War II, Jascha Horenstein resumed his career in Europe. He became especially admired in England, where he appeared as a guest-conductor with the London Symphony Orchestra. In 1961, he made his debut at London's Covent Garden conducting Beethoven's « Fidelio » . His final Operatic, and British, engagement was his March 1973 performances at the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden of Richard Wagner's « Parsifal » .

While Jascha Horenstein's repertoire ranged widely from the Baroque era to the 20th Century, he is particularly remembered as a champion of modern music and as a Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler conductor. In 1929, he conducted the premiere of 3 movements of Alban Berg's « Lyric Suite » in an arrangement for String Orchestra. In 1950, he conducted the 1st Paris performance of Berg's « Wozzeck » . Horenstein conducted the works of Bruckner and Mahler throughout his career.

Jascha Horenstein was a conductor of unusually wide sympathies coupled with unusually clear insights into music of varying styles. If it seemed natural that a conductor trained in Austria and Germany in the years immediately after the First World War should have a deep sympathy with the works of Arnold Schönberg and Alban Berg, it sometimes seems surprising that his approach to composers as remote from each other and from the German tradition as Leoš Janáček and William Walton should be equally sympathetic. Accepted as a major conductor on the Continent by the beginning of the Second World War, in the late-1950's, Horenstein began to make a deep impression in English audiences who had previously known him only from recordings as a conductor at home in the very different musical worlds of Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler.

Jascha Horenstein was born in Kiev on May 6, 1898. At the age of 6, he was taken to Königsberg, where he began to learn the violin. In Vienna, after 1911, he studied under Adolf Busch and, at the Conservatoire, under Josef Marx and Franz Schreker, combining philosophy, at the University with his musical studies. He began to conduct in 1919, when he founded the « Freie Orchester-Vereinigung » of students and amateurs. When Schreker moved to the High-School for Music in Berlin, Horenstein followed him, becoming a member of the same composition class as Alyos Hába and Ernst Křenek. In 1922, he became conductor of the Berlin Schubert Choir and the « Gemischter » Choir.

His 1st appearance as an orchestral conductor was in Vienna, in 1922, in a programme which included Mahler's then barely acceptable 1st Symphony. He conducted the Blüthner Concerts in Berlin, in 1924, a series with the Berlin Philharmonic, in 1926, and, in 1928, he became chief conductor and later General Musical Director of the Düsseldorf Opera. By the time that the coming of the Nazi regime drove him out of Germany (Horenstein was Jewish) , he had built a reputation in France and, during the 1930's, his activities ranged from Russia to Australia and New Zealand, taking in Belgium Israel and the Scandinavian countries. In 1941, he settled in the United States where he conducted all the major Orchestras and those of South America.

In 1950, he was responsible for the 1st performance in France of Alban Berg's « Wozzeck » and, at the Leeds Festival of 1958, deputizing for Otto Klemperer, he conducted a performance of Beethoven's Mass in D still remembered for its electrical vitality and shattering intensity. Shortly after that, he was heard in London as conductor of a performance of Gustav Mahler's 8th Symphony, the 1st in London for many years, which did a great deal to help Mahler's music to its present English popularity.

Jascha Horenstein, by both training and temperament, seemed in many ways to be a German conductor rather than a native born Russian. He approached music with the seriousness of purpose and intensity of feeling which seemed to belong to the world inhabited by Wilhelm Fürtwängler and Otto Klemperer, though he seemed to relish Mahlerian grotesqueries more than any completely German conductor would and he gave fine performances of works like Leoš Janáček's « Sinfonietta » , which seem remote from any normal German attitude to music.

Tiny and apparently frail, he rehearsed and conducted with what one orchestral player described as « gritty persistence » , demanding complete accuracy and faithfulness to any composer's text as the foundation of an interpretation which aimed at intensity of expression, precise balance and organic growth, finding in the combination of these qualities a personal utterance which, paradoxically, seemed to reveal the nobility and power of the music rather than anything of Horenstein himself.

...

Jascha Horenstein (geboren 24. April - 6. Mai - 1898 greg. in Kiew, Russisches Kaiserreich ; gestorben 2. April 1973 in London) war ein ukrainisch-jüdischer Dirigent. Er gilt als niveauvoller Bruckner- und Mahler-Interpret.

Jascha Horenstein wurde als dreizehntes von sechzehn Kindern einer religiös und musikalisch gebildeten jüdischen Familie geboren. 1905 verließ diese Russland und siedelte sich in Königsberg an, wo Horenstein seinen ersten Violinunterricht bekam. 1911 zog die Familie nach Wien, wo die Vorfahren seiner Mutter gelebt hatten. Seine Nichte war Beate Sirota.

Horenstein studierte bei Joseph Marx und Franz Schreker, dem er 1920 nach Berlin folgte. Sein Debüt als Dirigent erfolgte 1922 in Wien. Zurück in Berlin wurde er von Wilhelm Fürtwängler gefördert, der ihm bereits ab Mitte der 20er-Jahre Gastdirigate mit den Berliner Philharmonikern einräumte. 1929 wurde er Musikdirektor der Düsseldorfer Oper, der heutigen Deutschen Oper am Rhein, der Generalintendant war Walter Bruno Iltz.

Horenstein machte sich um die Aufführung zeitgenössischer Opern verdient, auf dem Spielplan der Oper standen Ernst Kreneks Schwergewicht, die Uraufführung von Manfred Gurlitts Die Soldaten, Der Lindberghflug von Bertolt Brecht und Kurt Weill und Igor Stravinskys Die Geschichte vom Soldaten und Hans Pfitzners Das Herz (1932) , Hermann Reutters Der verlorene Sohn nach Andre Gide (1933) und Winfried Zilligs Der Rossknecht nach dem Drama von Richard Billinger (alle dirigiert von Horenstein) . Walter Bruno Iltz inszenierte Ariadne auf Naxos von Richard Strauß (1934, in den Bühnenbildern von Caspar Neher) , Die Bürgschaft von Kurt Weill (Text : Caspar Neher) , Aus einem Totenhaus von Leoš Janáček (1931) und eine spektakuläre Inszenierung von Wozzeck von Alban Berg (1930, zu der Alban Berg an Iltz schrieb : « Diese Reprise freut mich mehr als manche Erstaufführungen, ja sie macht mich stolz. ») .

Horensteins auch international immer erfolgreichere Karriere erfuhr 1933 durch den Machtantritt der Nationalsozialisten eine jähe Wende. Obwohl Propagandaminister Josef Goebbels seine schützende Hand über Walter Bruno Iltz hielt, bekam er Schwierigkeiten mit den Nationalsozialisten, da er sich bereits 1932 den Forderungen der Düsseldorfer NSDAP-Leitung nach einem « deutschen Spielplan » und einem « deutschen Ensemble » entgegengestellt und sich jede Einflussnahme verboten hatte.

1933, anlässlich des 50. Todestages von Richard Wagner, wurde Iltz und der Oper in einer Pressekampagne der jüdische Jascha Horenstein zum Vorwurf gemacht :

« Leider hat Herr Horenstein die Weihstunde dirigiert. Wir müssen sagen " leider ", denn es ist unerhört, daß das deutsche Theater in Düsseldorf für eine Wagnerfeier keinen deutschen Dirigenten findet, daß man hierzu Herrn Sascha

(!) Horenstein bemühen muß. Oberbürgermeister Lehr und Generalintendant Iltz werden sich noch umstellen müssen, sonst wird hier eines Tages auf irgend eine Weise doch dafür gesorgt werden müssen, daß im deutschen Düsseldorf wirklich deutscher Geist und deutsche Kultur in allen Zweigen zur Geltung kommt. » (Volksparole, 13. Februar 1933)

Anfang März 1933 schließlich belagerte eine SA-Einheit die letzte Aufführung Horensteins, Ludwig van Beethovens Fidelio und verlangte die sofortige Absetzung des Dirigenten.

Horenstein wurde beurlaubt und musste Düsseldorf verlassen. Er ließ sich in Paris nieder und nahm Einladungen bis nach Australien an. 1939, kurz vor Beginn des Zweiten Weltkriegs, zog er nach New York, wo er neben anderen prominenten Exilgenossen (wie Thomas Mann) an der New School for Social Research lehrte und zweitrangige Orchester leitete. Ab 1947 dirigierte er wieder in Europa, zunächst vorwiegend in Frankreich. In den 1950er Jahren trat er auch wieder in Deutschland auf. Später Höhepunkt seiner Karriere waren die Konzerte in seiner letzten Wahlheimat Großbritannien, wo er als Dirigent des London Symphony Orchestra für die österreichische Spätromantik etliche Lanzen brach.

1958 wurde Horenstein mit dem Deutschen Kritikerpreis ausgezeichnet.

1 octobre 1928 : Le chef Dol Dauber dirige à Vienne le Scherzo de la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version révisée de Franz Schalk (1894) , éditée par Ludwig Döblinger, avec son propre Orchestre de chambre. Un enregistrement existe.

Dol Dauber

Adolf Dauber (known also as « Dol » , « Doli » or « Dolfi » Dauber) was born on 27 July 1894 in Vyzhnytsia (Wijnitz) , Bukovina, Ukraine (then Austria-Hungary) and died 15 September 1950 in Prague, Czechoslovakia. He was a jazz violinist, band-leader, composer and music arranger of Jewish origin, who was active in the 1st half of the 20th Century in Central Europe, mainly in Austria, Czechoslovakia and Germany. During his career, he has collaborated with international jazz personalities, led numerous orchestras and ensembles, and created music for several films.

Dauber was born to a musical family. He started his musical education at the age of 4, under the mentorship of his older sister, Clara. While still in his childhood, his sister arranged an audience with Carl Flesch, a violin virtuoso and teacher at the Bucharest Conservatory. His talent impressed Flesch, and Dauber joined his class as the youngest pupil to be accepted.

In 1911, Flesch recommended him to the renowned Czech violinist and teacher, Otakar Ševčík. Dauber studied with Ševčík in Brno, up to 1914. Even as a youngster, he earned money for his studies as a band leader of ensembles in Chernivtsi (Czernowitz) and Lviv.

During World War I, he served as a concert Master and soloist in a military orchestra in Italy. The Opera composer Giacomo Puccini was allegedly so impressed by his playing that he dedicated him several autograph sheets of his Opera « Manon Lescaut » . Later, Franz Lehár arranged his transfer to the renowned Austro-Hungarian military ensemble « Deutschmeister » .

After the War, Dauber travelled throughout Central Europe with a salon String Quartet, however, ensembles of this kind were gradually replaced by modern jazz orchestras. Therefore, he refocused his energy toward modern rhythms and dance music, to the great disappointment of his teacher Ševčík. He founded a new orchestra (the line-up included saxophonist and banjo player) , and performed popular melodies in Vienna and Mariánské Lázně. The performances were noted particularly for inventive and modern arrangements of Classical repertoire, Operetta melodies and waltzes. At that time, Dauber met and befriended various notable musicians and artists : Emerich Kálmán, Oscar Straus, Robert Stolz and Fritz Grünbaum among others. His orchestra performed the Viennese premiere of George Gershwin's « Rhapsody in Blue » .

In 1923, Dauber permanently resided in Vienna. In the early 1920's, he began recording for the label « Homokord » . His Orchestra was offered a lucrative long-term contract by « The Gramophone Company Ltd. » He has recorded for the company hundreds of songs over the course of next 15 years. The basic cast of the orchestra included : 5 violins, 1 viola, 1 violoncello, 1 double bass, 1 flute, 2 trumpets, 1 trombone, 1 harp, piano and harmonium, however, the recordings marked as « jazz » , « jazz-symphonic » or « dance » usually used different instrumentation : 1 violin, 1 double bass, 1 banjo, 2 trumpets, 3 saxophones, 1 trombone, 1 accordion, 1 euphonium and drums. The repertoire of Dauber's Orchestra was remarkably wide-ranging, stretching from compositions of Karel Hašler, Jaroslav Ježek, Rudolf Antonín Dvorský or Kurt Weill to the arrangements of parts of Leoš Janáček's and Bedřich Smetana's Operas.

The mid-1930's were the most successful time in Dauber's career. He recorded, performed widely in Austria, Germany and Czechoslovakia, and created film music. Some of his recordings were distributed for the Czech diaspora in the United States by the label « Victor » . However, the changing political situation in Europe caused by the rise of the Nazi regime has negatively influenced his career. In 1936, Dauber and his Orchestra moved to Prague and continued recording for the Czech label « Ultraphon » .

In 1939, Dauber travelled to England to record with a dance orchestra. He was invited to work in the United States, but he refused and returned to his wife and son in Prague. His musical activities were banned due to his Jewish origin, but he was not imprisoned, allegedly because he was an « internationally renowned musician » . This, however, did not prevent the Nazis from deporting his son, Robert Dauber, to the « Theresienstadt » concentration camp.

The information about Dauber's life in the Protectorate of Bohemia and Moravia is not clear. According to the testimony of the Czech composer and journalist Jiří Voldán, he spent a part of the war hidden by « good people » . Allegedly, he had to pay for the shelter with his instrument, a Guarneri violin, a gift from the Queen Carmen Sylva. The information was, however, not confirmed by any reliable evidence. His son was sent in a transport to Auschwitz and later to Dachau, where he died shortly before the end of the War. Dol Dauber and his wife (who was a German from Brno) managed to survive, but the circumstances of his survival remain unclear.

After the World War II, Dauber briefly resumed his recording activities with the label « Ultraphon » . He made his last recording, a cycle of Jewish songs, in September 1948.

The documentation related to his life and music activities is preserved in the Austrian National Library in Vienna.

Adolf (Dol) Dauber (geboren 27. Juli 1894 in Wiznitz bei Czernowitz / Bukowina ; gestorben 15. September 1950 in Prag) war ein Violinist, Kapellmeister und Komponist.

In den 1920er Jahren nahm Adolf Dauber den Künstlernamen Dol Dauber an und gründete 1926 in Wien das « Jazz Symphonie- und Tanzorchester » , das bald zu den besten der Stadt gehörte und bis 1932 zahlreiche, zum Teil von Dauber selbst komponierte Stücke bei der britischen Gramophone Company aufnahm und veröffentlichte. Von seinen Kompositionen wurde der Schlager Leila mit Text von Fritz Löhner-Beda am bekanntesten.

1933 zog er mit seinen Musikern nach Prag, spielte nun dort Konzerte und machte weitere Aufnahmen, unter anderem mit Rudolf Antonín Dvorský. Während der deutschen Besetzung Prags und des Zweiten Weltkrieges, konnten er und seine Frau sich selbst einer Deportation entziehen, mussten aber erleben, daß 1943 ihr Sohn, der Cellist und Komponist Robert Dauber, in das KZ Theresienstadt inhaftiert wurde. Bei einem Pragbesuch bestand Hitler darauf, daß Dauber in seiner Anwesenheit spielen sollte. Daubers Erwiderung, er würde nur spielen, wenn sein Sohn freigelassen würde, wurde zurückgewiesen. Nach dem Krieg verfiel Dauber in Depressionen über den Tod seines Sohnes im KZ Dachau und starb 1950 in Prag.

He was well over 40 years old. The programme was what violinist Jascha Heifetz, many years later, described as poison to the box-office : Arnold Schönberg's orchestration of Bach's E-flat Prelude and Fugue, and Anton Bruckner's 8th Symphony.

Max Walter

Max Walter (geboren 1. April 1899 in Myslowitz, Oberschlesien ; gestorben 1946, verschollen) war ein deutscher Musiker und Komponist.

Max Walter wirkte 1914 zunächst als selbständiger Organist in seiner Heimatstadt und studierte am Konservatorium in Beuthen Orgel, Violine und Klavier. 1919 zog er für kurze Zeit nach Berlin, wo er von Carl Thiel Orgelunterricht erhielt. 1920 setzte er das Studium in Regensburg fort, das er 1923 abschloß. Vor seiner Rückkehr nach Berlin war er zuletzt Organist im oberbayerischen zur Bayerischen Benediktinerkongregation gehörenden Kloster Scheyern.

Am 1. Juni 1925 trat Max Walter die Stelle des Organisten in der katholischen Gemeinde Mater Dolorosa in Berlin-Lankwitz an. In Berlin betätigte er sich auch als Privatmusiklehrer. Von 1926 bis 1928 nahm ihn Arnold Schönberg als Schüler in seine Meisterklasse an der Preußischen Akademie der Künste auf. 1933 wurde Max Walter Mitglied der Reichsmusikkammer, trat aber bereits im darauffolgenden Jahr aus politischen Gründen wieder aus. Die Verleihung des Mozartpreises wurde zurückgenommen, da Max Walter als politisch unzuverlässig eingestuft wurde. Die Organistenstelle in Lankwitz hatte er bis zum 31. Dezember 1942 inne und wurde im Anschluß daran zum Kriegsdienst einberufen. Er geriet in Kriegsgefangenschaft, starb in einem Kriegsgefangenenlager und ist seit 1946 verschollen.

Leopold Reichwein

Leopold Reichwein (geboren 16. Mai 1878 in Breslau, Niederschlesien ; gestorben 8. April 1945 in Wien) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Komponist.

Reichwein war von 1909 bis 1913 Hofkapellmeister der Großherzoglich Badischen Hofkapelle Karlsruhe. 1913 wurde er als Nachfolger von Bruno Walter Dirigent der Wiener Hofoper. Mit Wilhelm Furtwängler war er von 1921 bis 1927 Konzertdirektor der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien. Von 1926 bis 1938 leitete er die Bochumer Symphoniker, Deutschland. Unter seiner Leitung traten die bis dahin von diesem Orchester gepflegte modernen Kompositionen von Paul Hindemith, Ernst Křenek, Erwin Schulhoff oder Anton Webern zugunsten klassisch-romantischer Musik in den Hintergrund des Repertoires. Als er 1932 in der Parteizeitung der NSDAP Völkischer Beobachter den Artikel Die Juden in der deutschen Musik veröffentlichte, in dem er sich an Richard Wagners antisemitisches Pamphlet Das Judentum in der Musik anlehnte, zog er sich den Zorn der noch widerstandsbereiten Bochumer zu.

Reichwein war ein überzeugter Nationalsozialist und gehörte bereits 1932 der NSDAP (Mitglieds-Nummer 1.009.765) und dem völkisch gesinnten, antisemitischen Kampfbund für deutsche Kultur an. Er veröffentlichte unter anderem im Völkischen Beobachter Hetztiraden gegen jüdische Komponisten wie Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, denen er primär finanzielle Interessen als Antrieb ihres künstlerischen Schaffens unterstellte. Nach der « Machtergreifung » der Nationalsozialisten war er Mitglied der Reichsmusikkammer. Am 20. April 1938 ernannte ihn Adolf Hitler zum Generalmusikdirektor. Nach dem Einmarsch und « Anschluß Österreichs » propagierte er den Aufruf zur « Volksabstimmung » mit folgenden Worten :

« Da Adolf Hitler uns deutschen Künstlern Österreichs die Freiheit zurückerobert hat, ist es uns allen tiefstes Bedürfnis, den Dank durch Bekenntnis und Tat zu beweisen. »

In der Folgezeit war er Dirigent an der Wiener Staatsoper und Leiter der Dirigentenkläbe an der Staatsakademie für Musik Wien. Reichwein gründete das NS. Wiener Tonkünstler-Orchester neu.

Gegen Ende des Zweiten Weltkriegs wählte Reichwein am 8. April 1945 in Wien den Freitod.

31 janvier 1929 : Le chef Bruno Walter dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 4e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 15e concert de la saison.

1er février 1929 : Dans le cadre d'un concert spécial, le chef Bruno Walter dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 4e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Reprise du 15e concert de la saison.

7 février 1929 : Le chef Hermann Abendroth dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Ce concert est rendu possible grâce à la Fondation Carl Bechstein.

17 février 1929 : La « Bruckner-Gesellschaft » de Leipzig est transférée à Vienne et prend le titre définitif d'« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (IBG) .

Approval and ratification of the necessary changes to the Bruckner Society's constitution.

The following individuals were elected to the governing body of the « International Bruckner Society » , which had its headquarters on I « Buckerstraße » , at the old Vienna University (editorial office of the « Wiener Zeitung ») and described itself in the 1st paragraph of its statutes as « non-political, non-denominational, international » :

The Honorary President :

« Generalmusikdirektor » Professor Franz Schalk, from Vienna (who died on 3 September 1931 and exerted no practical influence on the Society's affairs but, in fact, later adopted an extremely sceptical attitude towards it) .

The Presidents :

Professor Max Auer, from Vienna-Vöcklabruck : Colleague of the conductor August Göllerich, who was appointed by Bruckner as his biographer and whose unfinished multi-volume biography of the composer was completed by Auer after his death)

Professor Walter Braunfels : Director of the « Hochschule für Musik » , in Cologne.

University Professor Doctor Ernst Kurth, from Berne.

The Secretaries :

Government Councillor Professor Franz Moibl, from Vienna-Klosterneuburg.

Prelate Doctor Franz Xaver Münch, from Cologne.

The Treasurers :

Doctor Benno Filser, from Augsburg

Doctor Karl Krieser, from Leipzig : Manager of the Leipzig Office.

Engineer Robert Furreg : Manager of the Vienna Office.

When one surveys this list of functionaries, which included several eminent individuals, and when one reads the highly-respectable aims of the Society outlined in the statutes, it becomes clear that an organizational apparatus was set-up under the cloak of internationalism and of reverence for a great musical Master who lived and worked in Austria, whose funding was nevertheless supplied by Imperial German capital (from the Filser publishing-house, in Augsburg, working anonymously in the background) .

The « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » (International Bruckner Society) was founded in Leipzig, in 1927. As the parent organisation it embraced all the Bruckner associations in existence at the time :

« Its purpose is to surmount linguistic and political barriers and to propagate the essence of Bruckner throughout the whole world. »

Its goal was to « create understanding for Bruckner's life work everywhere, as well as establish its universal dissemination and recognition » . The IBG was constituted in Vienna, in 1929, and, in the same year, the 1st issue of the « Bruckner-Blätter » was also printed. Local groups were subsequently founded in Germany and Austria. In the years 1930 to 1955, a total of 13 International Bruckner Festivals took place in different German, Austrian and Swiss cities. The principal task of the IBG was and remains today the publication of Bruckner's works in conjunction with the Austrian National Library. The « IBG-Mitteilungsblatt » has appeared since 1971 (with the principal title « Studien & Berichte » , since 1993) .

20 mars 1929 : Le chef Felix Maria Gatz dirige l'Adagio de la Ire Symphonie et la Grande Messe en fa mineur (WAB 28) de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, accompagné d'un Chœur Bruckner « renforcé » pour l'occasion. Les solistes : Adelheide Schuett-Pickert, Julia-Lotte Stern, Karl Jøeken, Theodor Heß van der Wyk. À l'orgue : Arthur Böhme. Le concert est commandité par la Société Anton Bruckner.

29 mars 1929 : Le chef Bruno Kittel dirige 3 Motets de Bruckner avec le Chœur de l'Université académique de Musique de Berlin (« Hochschulchor-Konzert der Staatliche Akademischen Hochschule für Musik Berlin ») .

13 avril 1929 : Le chef Felix Maria Gatz dirige la 8e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Le concert est commandité par la Société Anton Bruckner.

17 juin 1929 : Lors d'un concert spécial, le chef Ferdinand Großmann dirige la Grande Messe en fa mineur (WAB 28) de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, accompagné du « Wiener Chorverein » . Les solistes : Anna Eder, Hermann Gallos, Hermann Wiedemann. À l'orgue : Bruno Dorfmeister.

3 juillet 1929 : Le chef Clemens Krauß dirige le Scherzo de la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version de 1888, éditée par Albert J. Gutmann (1889) , avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne (étiquette « HMV » , 78 rpm : C 1789 - CA 122-III & 123-I ; étiquette « Preiser Records » , CD : 90258) .

Clemens Krauß recorded only the Scherzo of the Symphony No. 4 for « The Gramophone Company » . He used the Gutmann Edition which incorporates a truncated A section. Because of this, the dacapo A section had to be recorded as well (unlike many 78 rpm discs which usually have the A section recorded once and the user would be required to play that 78 side twice) . Total time : 8 min 50 sec.

Side 1 : CA 122-3 32-629.

Side 2 : CA 123-I 32-620.

Clemens Krauß

Le chef d'orchestre autrichien Clemens Krauß est né le 31 mars 1893 à Vienne est et mort le 16 mai 1954 à Mexico. Il est particulièrement associé aux œuvres de Richard Strauß.

Il étudie au Conservatoire de la « Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde » (Société des amis de la musique) de Vienne avec Hermann Grädener et Richard Heuberger, et fait ses débuts à Brno, en 1913, avec l'Opéra-Comique en 3 Actes « Zar und Zimmermann » d'Albert Lortzing.

Il dirige alors à Riga (1913-1914) , Nuremberg (1915-1916) , Stettin (1916-1921) , puis devient assistant de Franz Schalk à Vienne (1922-1924) . Il est ensuite nommé intendant de l'Opéra de Francfort (1924-1929) , puis directeur musical de l'Opéra de Vienne (1929-1934) . Il occupe le même poste durant la période nazie à Berlin (1935-1936) , avant d'être nommé directeur général de l'Opéra d'État de Bavière à Munich (1937-1944) .

Le 31 décembre 1939, il dirige, dans la grande salle du « Musikverein » de Vienne, le 1er concert (Johann et Josef) Strauß exceptionnel de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Vienne. Le concert suivant aura lieu le 1er janvier 1941 et deviendra le 1er Concert du Nouvel An de Vienne. Krauß dirigera ce concert jusqu'au 1er janvier 1944 puis du 1er janvier 1947 au 1er janvier 1954.

Après la guerre, il ré-organise le « Mozarteum » de Salzbourg et enseigne à la « Musikhochschule » de Vienne à partir de 1947, puis revient à l'Opéra de Vienne (1950-1954) .

Ami intime de Richard Strauß, il dirige plusieurs de ses créations, notamment « Arabella » à Dresde en 1933 (en remplacement de Fritz Busch qui a choisi l'exil pour des raisons politiques) , « Friedenstag » à Munich en 1938, « Capriccio » à Munich en 1942 (il est le co-auteur du livret) , puis « Die Liebe der Danae » à Salzbourg en 1952.

Outre Richard Strauß, il dirige les Opéras de Mozart à Salzbourg, et de Wagner à Bayreuth, tout en défendant l'Opérette viennoise. Il parait comme chef-invité à Paris et Londres.

Chef d'orchestre au prodigieux instinct, sachant entraîner soliste, chœur et orchestre dans un élan irrésistible. Il était marié à la soprano Viorica Ursuleac, considérée comme la plus grande Maréchale de son temps.

...

The Austrian conductor and Opera impresario Clemens (Heinrich) Krauß was born on 31 March 1893 in Vienna, and died on 16 May 1954 in Mexico. He was particularly associated with the music of Richard Strauß.

Krauß was born out of wedlock to Clementine Krauß, then a 15 year old dancer in the Vienna Imperial Opera Ballet, later a leading actress and Operetta singer, niece of the prominent 19th Century Operatic soprano, Gabrielle Krauß. His natural father, Chevalier Hector Baltazzi (1851-1916) , came from a family of wealthy Phanariot bankers resident in Vienna. Baltazzi's older sister, Helene, was married to Baron Albin Vetsera and was the mother of Baroness Mary Vetsera, who was accordingly Clemens Krauß' 1st cousin.

Krauß sang in the « Hofkapelle » (Imperial Choir) as a Vienna Choir Boy. He graduated from the Vienna Conservatory in 1912, after studying composition with Hermann Grädener and theory with Richard Heuberger there. He was then appointed chorus Master in the Brno Theatre (1912-1913) , where he made his conducting debut in 1913. The famous Romanian soprano Viorica Ursuleac, who often sang under him, became his 2nd wife.

Krauß made the rounds of regional centers, conducting in Riga (1913-1914) , Nuremberg (1915) and Stettin (1916-1921) (formerly part of Pomerania in Germany ; now part of Poland) . The latter appointment gave him ample opportunity to travel to Berlin to hear Arthur Nikisch conduct the Berlin Philharmonic, a major influence. He then returned to Austria as director of the Opera and Symphony concerts in Graz. In 1922, he joined the conducting staff of the Vienna State Opera and teacher of the conducting class in the Vienna « Singakademie » . He conducted the Vienna « Tonkünstler » concerts, from 1923 to 1927, and was Intendant of the Opera in Frankfurt and director of the Museum concerts there, from 1924 to 1929.

He guest-conducted in the United States, in 1929, with the Philadelphia Orchestra and New York Philharmonic. Also, in 1929, he was appointed director of the Vienna State Opera. Its Orchestra, which was part of the independent concert entity known as the Vienna Philharmonic, appointed him its music-director in 1930. He was a regular conductor at the Salzburg Festival, from 1926 to 1934, where, in 1930, he conducted Alban Berg's avant-garde atonal Opera « Wozzeck » .

Krauß gave-up his Vienna positions in 1933-1934 to direct the Berlin State Opera, in 1935, after Erich Kleiber had resigned in protest against Nazi policies. In 1933, he took-over the preparations for the premieres of Richard Strauß's Opera « Arabella » after the departure of conductor Fritz Busch (another non-Jewish anti-Nazi) . Krauß's own position on Nazism was unclear, although he did enjoy a close relationship with Nazi official Alfred Frauenfeld and it has been claimed that he sought Nazi Party membership in 1933. In 1937, he was appointed Intendant of the National Theatre Munich following Hans Knappertsbusch's resignation. He became a close friend of Richard Strauß, and even wrote the libretto for his Opera « Capriccio » which he premiered in Munich, in 1942. He also conducted the premieres of Strauß's Operas « Friedenstag » and « Die Liebe der Danae » . During the early 1940's, he taught at the « Mozarteum » University of Salzburg where among his pupils was composer Roman Totenberg.

After the Munich Opera House had been destroyed by Allied bombing, Krauß returned to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic in 1944-1945 until it ceased activities shortly before the end of World War II. After the War, Allied officials investigated his career and forbade him from appearing in public until 1947, when it emerged that he had helped Jews escape from the 3rd « Reich » . Krauß then resumed conducting many of the Vienna Philharmonic's concerts, including its famous annual New Year's Day pops concerts featuring Johann and Josef Strauß waltzes, Overtures and polkas, many of which were recorded for the « Decca » label along with other studio recordings of mostly Johann, Josef and Richard Strauß.

He conducted Opera at Covent Garden in London, starting in 1951, and at the 1953 Bayreuth Festival (including an impressive Wagner « Ring » cycle now available on CD, starring Astrid Varnay as Brunnhilde) . He also recorded a highly-regarded « Parsifal » at Bayreuth, starring Martha Mödl as Kundry, in 1953, at the height of Mödl's brief prime.

He died in 1954 while on tour with the Vienna Philharmonic in Mexico City, and is buried alongside his wife, singer Viorica Ursuleac, who died in 1985, in Ehrwald, Austria.

He made relatively few recordings ; but his amiable, spirited 1950 « Decca » rendition of Johann Strauß II's « Die Fledermaus » , with the Vienna Philharmonic and State Opera star soloists (not including any of the dialogue ; only the 2nd complete recording after a pre- World War I acoustical 78 rpm set made in Berlin) , is still regarded by many as the best, most authentic and most « gemütlich » . His 1953 live performance of Richard Wagner's « Ring » cycle from Bayreuth is highly-regarded. A performance with the Vienna Symphony of Beethoven's « Choral Fantasy » , re-issued on more than one inexpensive label since its original appearance on a « Vox » LP, is also one of the few recordings featuring pianist Friedrich Wührer. All 3 have been re-issued on compact disc.

The eminent Austrian conductor, Clemens (Heinrich) Krauß, was born in Vienna, the out-of-wedlock child of Clementine Krauß, then a 15 year old dancer in the Vienna Imperial Opera Ballet, later a leading actress and Operetta singer, who was a niece of the prominent 19th Century Operatic soprano, (Marie) Gabrielle Krauß (1842-1904) . His natural father, the chevalier Hector Baltazzi (1851-1916) , belonged to a family of wealthy Phanariot bankers resident in Vienna. Baltazzi's older sister, Helene, was married to Baron Albin Vetsera and was the mother of Baroness Mary Vetsera, who was thus Clemens Krauß' 1st cousin. As a boy, Krauß was a chorister in the « Hofkapelle » (Imperial Choir) (« Wiener Sängerknaben ») . He attended the Vienna Conservatory, graduating in 1912. He studied piano with Hugo Reinhold, composition with Hermann Grädener and theory with Richard Heuberger.

After graduation, Clemens Krauß was a chorus Master at the Brunn Theatre (1912-1913) , making his conducting debut there with a performance of « Zar und Zimmermann » by Albert Lortzing (January 13, 1913) . Krauß made the rounds of regional centers, serving as 2nd conductor at Riga's German Theatre (1913-1914) and in Nuremberg (1915-1916) , and as 1st conductor in Stettin (now known as Szczecin) (1916-1921) . The latter appointment gave him ample opportunity to travel to Berlin to hear Arthur Nikisch conduct the « Berliner Philharmoniker » , a major influence. Krauß's next post was back in Austria, where he became director of the Opera and Symphony concerts in Graz (1921-1922) .

In 1922, Clemens Krauß became Franz Schalk's assistant at the « Wiener Staatsoper » ; he also taught conducting at the Vienna Academy of Music (1922-1924) and was conductor of the Vienna « Tonkünstlerkonzerte » (1923-1927) . He was director of the Frankfurt am Main Opera and its « Museumgesellschaft » concerts (1924-1929) . Then, he was director of the « Wiener Staatsoper » (1929-1934) . Its Orchestra, in its independent concert form as the « Wiener Philharmoniker » , appointed him its music-director in 1930. In 1926, he made his 1st appearance at the Salzburg Festivals, and returned there regularly (1929-1934) . In 1930, he conducted Alban Berg's « Wozzeck » . he also conducted in South America, in 1927 and in 1929, visited the United States, in 1929, as a guest-conductor with the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and Philadelphia Orchestra. He made his debut at London's Covent Garden in 1934.

In 1933 and 1934, Clemens Krauß gave-up his Vienna positions, becoming director of the Berlin State Opera (1934-1937) , after Erich Kleiber resigned in protest over Nazi rule. In 1933, he took-over the preparations for the premieres of Strauß' « Arabella » when the conductor Fritz Busch (another non-Jewish anti-Nazi) left. From 1939 to 1944, he also taught at the « Mozarteum » University of Salzburg where among his pupils was composer Roman Toti. After the Munich Opera House was bombed in 1944, shutting it down, Clemens Krauß returned to conduct the « Wiener Philharmoniker » until it closed shortly before the end of World War II (1944-1945) .

Having been a friend of Adolf Hitler and Hermann Göring, and a prominent figure in the musical life of the 3rd « Reich » , Clemens Krauß was held accountable for his actions by the Allied authorities after the end of World War II. There was a strain of humanity in Krauß, however, for he had assisted Jews to escape the clutches of the barbarous « Führer » 's fury. In 1947, he was permitted to resume his career with appearances at the « Wiener Staatsoper » ; he took it to London that same year. He was a conductor with the « Wiener Philharmoniker » from 1947, and also served as conductor of its famous New Year's Day Concerts. From 1951 to 1953, he conducted at London's Covent Garden, and, in 1953-1954, at the Bayreuth Festivals.

Clemens Krauß died during a visit to Mexico City. He was married to famous Romanian soprano Viorica Ursuleac (his 2nd wife) , who often appeared in Operas under his direction ; he also accompanied her in recitals. He is now buried along with his wife, who died in 1985, in Ehrwald, Austria. He was a close friend and collaborator of Richard Strauß, who considered him one of the finest interpreters of his works. He conducted the premieres of Strauß' Operas « Arabella » (« Staatsoper Dresden » , July 1, 1933) , « Friedenstag » (« Nationaltheater » , Munich, July 24, 1939) , « Capriccio » , for which he wrote the libretto (« Bayerische Staatsoper » , Munich, October 28, 1942) , and « Die Liebe der Danae » (« Festspielhaus » , Salzburg, August 16, 1944) . Krauß was also renowned as a conductor of works by Mozart, Wagner, and Verdi, as well as those by the Viennese waltz composers.

Clemens Krauß did not make many recordings ; but his 1950 performance of Johann Strauß II's « Die Fledermaus » , made in Vienna, is still regarded by some as the best one. His 1953 live performance of Richard Wagner's « Der Ring des Nibelungen » from Bayreuth is highly-regarded. A performance with the « Wiener Symphoniker » of Ludwig van Beethoven's « Choral Fantasy » , re-issued on more than one inexpensive label since its original appearance on « Vox Records » , is also one of the few recordings featuring pianist Friedrich Wührer available on CD.

Clemens Heinrich Krauß (geboren 31. März 1893 in Wien ; gestorben 16. Mai 1954 in Mexiko-Stadt) war ein österreichischer Dirigent und Theaterleiter. Krauß wurde vor allem als Interpret der Werke seines Freundes Richard Strauß bekannt ; er verfasste das Libretto zu dessen Oper Capriccio mit.

Der uneheliche Sohn der Hofoperntänzerin und späteren Sängerin Clementine Krauß und Hector Baltazzis (1851-1916) wurde 1902 Hof­sängerknabe an der Wiener Hofkapelle. Er studierte Klavier, Komposition und Chorleitung am Konservatorium der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde in Wien und wurde 1913 Chordirektor in Brünn. Nach Stationen am Deutschen Theater in Riga (1913-1914) , Nürnberg (1915-1916) , Stettin (1916-1921) und Graz (1921) war er von 1922 bis 1924 neben Franz Schalk Dirigent an der Wiener Staatsoper, wo er Richard Strauß kennenlernte. 1924 ging Krauß als Intendant an die Frankfurter Oper und leitete gleichzeitig die Museumskonzerte. 1929 wurde er als Musikdirektor an die Wiener Staatsoper berufen, wo er bis 1935 blieb.

Clemens Krauß war ein Intimus von Reichsminister Josef Gœbbels, der ihm 1941 die Leitung der Salzburger Festspiele übertrug. Krauß hatte im Dritten Reich zahlreiche künstlerische Tätigkeiten inne. Im Dezember 1934 wurde er zum musikalischen Leiter der Berliner Staatsoper ernannt. Seit 1936 wirkte er an der Bayerischen Staatsoper in München, wurde 1937 zum Generalmusikdirektor ernannt und hatte dort bis 1940 auch die Intendanz inne.

In der Endphase des Zweiten Weltkriegs, als zum 1. September 1944 die Theater geschlossen wurden, stand Krauß auf der Gottbegnadeten-Liste, einer vom Reichsministerium für Volksaufklärung und Propaganda und Adolf Hitler zusammengestellten Liste, in der die wichtigsten Künstler des NS-Regimes aufgeführt waren. Diese Nennung befreite ihn vom Kriegseinsatz.

Nach dem « An­schluß » Öster­reichs an das nationalsozialistische Deutschland am 10. April 1938 wollte Clemens Krauß erneut Direktor der Wiener Staatsoper werden. Bereits am 25. April 1938 schrieb er einen Brief an Adolf Hitler und machte Vorschläge für seinen Wiedereinzug in Wien. Clemens Krauß' Ansuchen wurde indirekt negativ beschieden. 1940 schrieb Krauß wieder einen Brief in dieser Sache. Krauß strebte die freigewordene Position des Direktors der Wiener Akademie für Musik und darstellende Kunst an. Er klärte seine Möglichkeiten mit Propagandaminister Goebbels ab. Es sei Krauß eine vertrauliche Mitteilung zugegangen, daß « Hitler im Zuge sehr intensiver Bemühungen maßgebender Kreise in Wien, die (Krauß) für eine leitende Position gewinnen wollten » , nun entschieden habe, der Münchner Intendant müsse sich voll auf München konzentrieren. Krauß schlug vor, auch in Wien eine dem Salzburger Mozarteum angenäherte Lösung anzustreben, dessen Leiter er bereits am 13. Juni 1939 geworden war. « Die Wiener Akademie solle von einer Persönlichkeit geleitet werden, die dem Wiener Boden entstammt » , schrieb Krauß an Ministerialrat Bade im Propagandaministerium. Am 23. Februar 1941 hatte Krauß eine Unterredung mit Wiens Gauleiter Baldur von Schirach, der Krauß gern in Wien gehabt hätte. Es wurde vereinbart, daß eine zukünftige Tätigkeit von Krauß in Wien, als « reine Gastspiele zu deklarieren sind, damit der “ Führer ” sich nicht ärgert » . Im Mai 1941 hatte Krauß nach sechs Jahren wieder eine Unterredung mit Hitler, in der es nur um Krauß' Wiener Ambitionen ging. Hitler lehnte es rundherum ab, Krauß nach Wien gehen zu lassen. Am 13. September erfolgte die Ernennung zum Leiter der Salzburger Festspiele.

Goebbels klärte am 17. November 1938 zusammen mit Krauß einige Fragen über die Zukunft des Mozarteums in Salzburg. Krauß erklärte sich dazu bereit, die Leitung zu übernehmen und eine fundierte Dirigenschule aufzubauen. Auf seine Initiative hin wurde das Mozarteum am 13. Juni 1939 zur Musikhochschule erklärt. Clemens Krauß wurde am selben Tag zum Oberleiter der Musikhochschule Mozarteum und Leiter der Stiftung Mozarteum ernannt. Während des feierlichen Eröffnungsakts der Musikhochschule Mozarteum waren der preußische Kultusminister und Reichsminister für Wissenschaft, Erziehung und Volksbildung, Bernhard Rust, Gauleiter Friedrich Rainer und hohe Vertreter der NSDAP im Großen Saal des Mozarteums anwesend. Clemens Krauß sprach während seiner Ansprache folgende Worte :

« Ich übernehme in diesem feierlichen Moment die künstlerische Oberleitung der Musikhochschule. Ich gelobe an dieser Stelle, das mir anvertraute Gut als eine hohe Schule der Kunst zu führen mit all der Ehrfurcht, die uns Künstler in dieser Stadt befällt, wo Mozart als Schüler gelernt, mit tiefer Demut vor dem Genius Mozart und vor dem vorwärts stürmenden erhabenen Meister und Künstler Adolf Hitler. »

Festspiel-Direktor Erwin Kerber wurde am 9. Dezember 1938 in das Propagandaministerium nach Berlin beordert und erfuhr das mit Hitler besprochene und von diesem fixierte Programm der Salzburger Festspiele 1939. Die Festspiele sollten vom 30. Juli bis zum 6. September dauern und neben Oper und Schauspiel auch Konzerte beinhalten. Auserwählte Dirigenten waren Leopold Stokowski, Victor de Sabata und Willem Mengelberg, jedoch kein Clemens Krauß. Weiter wurde Kerber mitgeteilt, daß « das Propaganda-Ministerium der eigentliche und verantwortliche Veranstalter der Festspiele ist » . Am 8. April 1939 kündigte die österreichische Volks-Zeitung das Salzburger Johann-Strauß-Konzert bei der Vorstellung des vom Reichspropagandaministerium endgültig festgelegten Spielplanes der Salzburger Festspiele 1939 an.

Josef Goebbels' Ansprache am 21. Mai 1939 auf der Kulturpolitischen Kundgebung im Rahmen der 2. Reichsmusiktage in Düsseldorf 1939 :

« Die Salzburger Festspiele und das Mozarteum in Salzburg können heute nicht mehr zu einer etwas verkümmerten

und sterilen Repräsentation des sogenannten österreichischen Menschen missbraucht werden. Sie sind Besitz der Kultur unseres nationalsozialistischen Reiches. Wir haben es uns angelegen sein lassen, durch große staatliche Zuschüsse eine absolute Sicherung der drei Wiener Orchester und der Sudetendeutschen Philharmoniker zu gewährleisten. Im Übrigen können wir nach der Ausmerzung der Juden aus der ehemaligen sogenannten österreichischen Musik einen ständig zunehmenden organischen Gesundheitsprozess auf diesen Sektor unseres musikalischen Schaffens und Nachschaffens feststellen. »

Exakt zwei Monate nach der Eröffnung der Musikhochschule Mozarteum gaben die Wiener Philharmoniker unter Leitung von Clemens Krauß am 13. August 1939 im Großen Saal des Mozarteums ihr « Drittes Orchesterkonzert » im Rahmen der Salzburger Festspiele 1939. Das Programm dieses Konzertes war identisch mit dem des « Außerordentliches Konzerts » der Wiener Philharmoniker unter der Leitung von Clemens Krauß am 31. Dezember 1939 im Goldenen Saal des Wiener Musikvereins, welches als Beginn der Neujahrskonzerte der Wiener Philharmoniker gilt. Auf Krauß geht daher das zur Tradition gewordene Neujahrskonzert der Wiener Philharmoniker zurück.

Im Jahr 1941 sah Krauß die Salzburger Festspiele 1942 in Gefahr, « dem Zugriff der Berliner kunstpolitischen Stellen zum Opfer zu fallen » . Die Festspiele sollten durch Reichsdramaturg Rainer Schlösser und die Musikstelle des Propagandaministeriums geleitet werden. « Es war geplant, den Wiener Philharmonikern ihr Vorrecht auf Salzburg zu entziehen, die Schauspielaufführungen mit Berliner Künstlern durchzuführen etc. » Auf Bitten der damaligen Salzburger Behörden stellte sich Krauß für die Leitung der Salzburger Festspiele zur Verfügung vor. Am 13. September 1941 erhielt Clemens Krauß von Hitler den Auftrag, die Salzburger Festspiele als künstlerischer Leiter zu übernehmen. Krauß wachte nach eigener Aussage « kraft (seiner) künstlerischen Autorität darüber, daß den Festspielen der österreichische Charakter gewahrt blieb » .

Beim Wiener Reichsleiter Baldur von Schirach betonte Krauß, daß er « nach wie vor Wert darauf lege, daß die Wiener Staatsoper bei diesen Festspielen maßgeblich vertreten sei, allerdings käme eine solche Einladung nur für jene Körperschaften in Betracht, die noch intakt und auf künstlerischer Höhe sind » . Reichsleiter von Schirach stimmte seiner Bitte zu und versicherte Krauß die Teilnahme der Wiener Philharmoniker an den Festspielen. Zu seiner Überraschung bekam Krauß kurz darauf eine Nachricht der Reichsstatthalterei, in der es hieß, eine Teilnahme der Wiener Philharmoniker und auch des Staatsoperchoros an den Salzburger Festspielen für dieses Jahr käme nicht in Frage. Die Staatsoper habe ab dem 15. August Wehrmachtsvorstellungen in Wien zu geben.

Diese Mitteilung reichte Krauß an Goebbels weiter und bat um eine neuerliche Entscheidung. Als Kompromiss stellte von Schirach Krauß die Bedingung, die gesamte Wiener Staatsoper mit Georg Friedrich Händels Rodelinde auftreten zu lassen. Diesen Vorschlag musste Krauß ablehnen, da der Wunsch des Führers und Goebbels war, die Einmaligkeit der Salzburger Festspiele zu erhalten. Um dies zu gewährleisten, müssten « bei den Festspielen in Salzburg nur Opern und Schauspiele in einer bisher nicht gekannten Besetzung, Auffassung, Inszenierung und bis ins kleinste sauberen Einstudierung herausgebracht werden und weder vor- noch nachher in irgendeiner Stadt Großdeutschlands in der in Salzburg herausbrachten Aufmachung zur Aufführung gelangen » . Der Reichsstatthalter blieb auf seinem ablehnenden Standpunkt. Daraufhin versuchte Krauß, die Sache an das Oberkommando der Wehrmacht in Berlin weiterzuleiten, um dadurch zu einer Einigung zu kommen.

Um aber die Salzburger Festspiele nicht zu gefährden, traf er mit Gœbbels die Vereinbarung, falls eine Einigung mit Wien nicht erreicht werden könne, für die Operaufführungen das Münchener Staatsorchester und den Opernchor, und für die Konzerte die Berliner Philharmoniker einzuladen. Zur weiteren Bekundung seiner freundschaftlichen Einstellung zu Wien lud Krauß das Wiener Burgtheater unter der Führung von Lothar Müthel ein. Das Burgtheater sollte neue Inszenierungen von Iphigenie auf Tauris und Johann Nestroys Einen Jux will er sich machen aufführen. So erfüllte er den langgehegten Wunsch des Burgtheaters, als geschlossenes Ensemble bei den Festspielen aufzutreten.

Zuletzt wurde dann doch eine Einigung erzielt, doch nur unter der Bedingung, daß die Wiener Philharmoniker die Opern nicht als Wiener Philharmonie spielen, sondern als Staatsopernorchester. Die Konzerte sollten lediglich als von den Wiener Philharmonikern aufgeführt gekennzeichnet werden dürfen.

Seit April 1933 hatten Clemens Krauß und die Wiener Philharmoniker im Streit gelegen. In der Hauptversammlung der Wiener Philharmoniker vom 24. April 1933 hatten 85 Mitglieder in einer geheimen Abstimmung « die offene Kampfansage an Direktor Krauß » befürwortet. « Damit war das Ende der Ära Krauß besiegelt. » Am Folgetag, dem 25. April, hatte Clemens Krauß in sein Datenbuch eingetragen :

« Wegen einer inferiören Handlungsweise eines neu gewählten Vorstandes der Wiener Philharmoniker lege ich mein Amt als ständiger Dirigent der philharmonischen Abonnementskonzerte nieder. »

Die « offizielle Versöhnung mit dem Orchester » erfolgte am 27. März 1943. Bezüglich dieser schrieb Philharmonikervorstand Clemens Hellsberg in Demokratie der Könige im Kapitel Volkssturmeinheit Wiener Philharmoniker :

« Während die Rote Armee schon vor den Toren Wiens stand, spielten die Philharmoniker unter der Leitung von Krauß Werke Debussys und Ravels ein ! »

Beides waren damals verbotene Kompositionen aus dem « Feindesland » .

« Der ehemalige Operndirektor war der einzige prominente Dirigent, der sich nicht abgesetzt hatte. Furtwängler und Karl Böhm waren " krank " gemeldet, aber Clemens Krauß blieb in Wien, bei den Philharmonikern und machte damit vieles wieder gut. Die offizielle Versöhnung mit dem Orchester war schon am 27. März 1943 erfolgt, als Krauß anlässlich seines 50. Geburtstags den Ehrenring der Wiener Philharmoniker erhalten und vor versammeltem Plenum betont hatte, für ihn als Leiter der Salzburger Festspiele kämen nur die Wiener Philharmoniker als Orchester des Festivals in Betracht. »

Der Vertreter der Wiener Philharmoniker, Leopold Kainz, schrieb am 1. August 1942 in seinem « Gedächtnisprotokoll » über seine Aussprache mit Clemens Krauß.

« Nach (den) Ausführungen des Herrn Gen. Int. Krauß erklärte ich, daß vom Orchester aus nie eine Salzburg gegnerische Stimmung bestand, obwohl leise Versuche von den vorgesetzten Behörden gemacht wurden, eine solche in uns aufkommen zu lassen. Besonders die Neueinstudierungen im Juni und die beabsichtigten vielen Doppelvorfstellungen im Juli, ließ die Meinung aufkommen, als ob darin Methode liege, um das Orchester so arbeitsmüde zu machen, daß es von sich aus die Mitwirkung bei den Salzburger Festspielen ablehnt, weil es physisch und psychisch nach einer so arbeitsreichen Saison und einer Erholungspause von 10 Tagen nicht in der Lage ist, sofort wieder mit einer erhöhten Arbeitskraft einzusetzen, wie dies die Salzburger Festspiele erfordern.

Ebenso unrichtig ist, wenn behauptet wird, daß die Wiener Philharmoniker General Intendant Krauß ablehnen. Im Gegenteil, wir arbeiten mit Herrn Gen. Intendant Krauß gerne zusammen, soweit die Proben keine ermüdenden Längen aufweisen, da wir gerade das von Zeit zu Zeit sehr wertvolle Durchkämmen, wie es der General Intendant Krauß vornimmt, als künstlerisch wichtig, wertvoll und notwendig empfinden. Am Ende der Aussprache dankte ich General Intendant Krauß für die Einladung an uns, nach Salzburg zu kommen und für sein wirklich großherziges Einsetzen für unser Orchester und bat ihn, uns auch weiterhin gewogen zu bleiben und die Versicherung entgegenzunehmen, daß wir immer gerne nach Salzburg kommen, da ja diese Stadt durch ihre weltberühmt gewordenen Festspiele Anteil am Ruhm und Ansehen der Wiener Philharmoniker hat. Zum Schluß sprach ich noch die Bitte aus, bei den vorgesetzten Behörden in Wien und Berlin dahingehend zu wirken, daß das Spielzeitende der Staatsoper und die beginnende Festspielarbeit so gelegt wird, daß dem Orchester ein geschlossener Urlaub von wenigstens vier Wochen gesichert wird, den das Orchester zur Aufrechterhaltung seiner künstlerischen Leistungsfähigkeit unbedingt benötigt.

Für die Wiener Philharmoniker gezeichnet Leopold Kainz. »

Clemens Krauß ist der Gründungsdirigent der Neujahrskonzerte der Wiener Philharmoniker im Jahre 1941 ; er leitete diese bis 1945 und wieder von 1948 bis zu seinem Todesjahr 1954. Das erste Konzert dieser Art hatte bereits am 31. Dezember 1939 ebenfalls unter Leitung von Krauß stattgefunden. Erst mit dem Jahr 1941 fand es dann am Neujahrstag statt. In den Jahren des Berufsverbotes Krauß' leitete der international renommierte österreichische Dirigent Josef Krips 1946 und 1947 das Neujahrskonzert.

In einem Brief an Oberregierungsrat Horner vom Amt für Sicherheitswesen der Stadt Salzburg nahm Clemens Krauß nach Kriegsende am 30. November 1945 Stellung zu den gegen ihn erhobenen Vorwürfen.

« Der dritte Vorwurf, daß ich mir nach dem nationalsozialistischen Umsturz aus Gewinnsucht die Leitung der Salzburger Festspiele angeeignet habe, ist eine völlige Entstellung der Tatsachen. Wenn dies meine Absicht gewesen wäre, hätte ich schon im Jahre 1938 in Salzburg dirigiert. Im Jahr 1939 bewog mich die Festspielleitung, eine recht alte verschlammte Vorstellung von " Don Giovanni " zu dirigieren. Ich gab auf Bitten von Doktor Kerber meine Zusage, was ich später bereute. Die Vorstellung war schlecht, da nur geringe Probemöglichkeiten waren und die Besetzung trotz guter Sänger nicht einheitliches Niveau, geschweige denn Festspielniveau hatte. Aufgrund dieser Erfahrung sagte ich die Leitung von Opernaufführungen für die nächsten Jahre ab. Im Jahre 1941 dirigierte ich daher nur zwei Orchesterkonzerte im Hinblick auf meine langjährige Verbundenheit mit den Wiener Philharmonikern. »

Die « recht alte verschlammte Vorstellung von " Don Giovanni " » war die Wiederaufnahme der Produktion der Salzburger Festspiele von 1938 unter Dirigent Karl Böhm. Clemens Krauß erwähnte in seinem langen Brief an das Amt für Sicherheitswesen in Salzburg das von ihm geleitete Johann-Strauß-Konzert der Salzburger Festspiele vom 13. August 1939 und die zwei weiteren von ihm geleiteten Strauß-Konzerte vom 23. August 1942 und 22. August 1943 nicht.

Im Jahr 1945 mit Berufsverbot belegt, dirigierte Clemens Krauß seit 1947 wieder regelmäßig an der Wiener Staatsoper, bei den Wiener Philharmonikern und bei den Bayreuther Festspielen.

Krauß war in zweiter Ehe mit der rumänischen Sopranistin Viorica Ursuleac verheiratet. Beigesetzt ist er in Ehrwald in Tirol.

Hans Weisbach

Symphonie n° 104 de Franz-Josef Haydn : 1er enregistrement intégral produit en 1938 par le chef Hans Weisbach à la tête du Philharmonique de Vienne. Hans Weisbach (1885-1961) fut un spécialiste de Anton Bruckner et cela s'entend dans un Haydn plus mystique que classique. La prise de son venue du fond des âges ne met guère en valeur le Philharmonique de Vienne réduit à une simple ligne mélodique (étiquette « VMS Musical Treasures ») .

...

The German conductor Hans (Edhar) Weisbach was born on July 19, 1885 in Glogau, Germany and died on April 23, 1961 in Wuppertal, Germany. He studied at the « Hochschule für Musik » in Berlin. There he was a pupil of Andreas Moser (1859-1925) , a colleague, close friend, and ultimately the biographer of Joseph Joachim. After initially working for a couple of years as a vocal coach under Felix Mottl at the Munich Court Opera, Hans Weisbach settled in Frankfurt am Main, where he became the conductor of the « Rühl'scher Gesangverein » , thus, starting-off as a choral conductor. Weisbach's career led him in the direction of Symphonic conducting. He held conductorships, successively, at Worms, Wiesbaden, Hagen, Barmen, and Düsseldorf (where Professor Herz, as a teenager, sang in the chorus in the « Matthäus-Passion » , BWV 244, under his baton) , before assuming the directorship of the « MDR Sinfonieorchester Leipzig » and Chorus in 1933, a job he held until 1939. From 1939 until the end of World War II, Weisbach was the conductor of the Municipal Orchestra in Vienna. In 1947, he became Music Director at Wuppertal, where he died in 1961. Hans Weisbach was internationally known as a Bach specialist, and, for instance, led the 1st performance in England of « Die Kunst der Fuge » , BWV 1080, in 1930 ; he repeated it, with the London Symphony Orchestra, in each of the ensuing 6 seasons. He was a fervent advocate of the music of Anton Bruckner as well as that of Bach. Gerhard Herz recalls the performances of the « Matthäus-Passion » (BWV 244) conducted by Hans Weisbach as being characteristic of the traditional mainstream of Bach performance practice in Germany during his youth in the 1920's and 1930's. Fortunately, a concert performance of Bach's « Matthäus-Passion » (BWV 244) , given under Weisbach's baton in the « Altes Gewandhaus » in Leipzig on April 19, 1935, has been preserved on CD (Preiser Records, Vienna) .

...

Almost slipping-off the « famous conductor » radar, Hans Weisbach was a Bach and Bruckner specialist at the Leipzig Radio before the War, and, based in Wuppertal in his later years, who made it to the United States via an « HMV / Victor » recording of Franz-Josef Haydn's « Oxford » Symphony with the London Symphony - it graced the catalogs for several years at least. A mellow stylistic cousin to Franz Schalk, Clemens Krauß, Günter Wand, the nearly invisible Weisbach knew everything there was to know about « gemuetlich » music-making, notably in an approach to string playing that favored soft attacks and bouncing bow, considerable vibrance, a mellow woody warmth. The truth is, all it took was the 2nd bar of Weisbach's interpretation of Franz-Josef Haydn Symphony No. 92 to convince that he belonged to the elite. How is it that when the cellos initiate their arpeggio rise it sounds as if a keyboard had been gently struck ? To borrow James Salter's description of the « Château » at Chenonceaux straddling its little river, the music « seems to be drifting in the meadows of a dream ». And the same could be said of much of Weisbach's 1939 Verdi « Falstaff » from Leipzig, so wise and witty, so light and sly, graced by a full plate of relaxed largamente phrasing. They don't make meadows like that every day.

Hans Edgar Weisbach (geboren 19. Juli 1885 in Glogau, Schlesien ; gestorben 23. April 1961 in Wuppertal) war ein deutscher Dirigent und Pianist.

Bereits ab dem siebten Lebensjahr erhielt er sowohl Klavier- als auch Geigenunterricht und trat schon als Schüler bei verschiedenen Kammerkonzerten in Erscheinung. Nach seinem Abitur studierte er an der Akademischen Hochschule für Musik in Berlin zunächst bei Joseph Joachim und Andreas Moser Geige, danach bei Ernst Rudorff und Georg von Petersenn Klavier und schließlich bei Robert Hausmann das Dirigieren. Zusätzlich belegte er noch Studiengänge in Philosophie und Musikwissenschaften. Im Jahr 1908 wechselte Weisbach nach München, wo er am dortigen Hoftheater, der heutigen Bayerischen Staatsoper unter Felix Mottl als Kapellmeistervolontär wirkte und zeitgleich weitere Vorlesungen an der Ludwig-Maximilians-Universität München besuchte. Drei Jahre später zog es ihn nach Frankfurt, wo er als Pianist und Kammermusiker bei eigenen Konzertveranstaltungen und für die Frankfurter Museumsgesellschaft tätig war und darüber hinaus als zweiter Dirigent den « Rühlschen Oratorienverein » leitete. Nach einer kurzen Episode in Worms, wo er 1913 die Leitung der Konzertgesellschaft übernahm, und in Wiesbaden sowie einer kriegsbedingten Unterbrechung, wurde er 1919 zum städtischen Musikdirektor des Philharmonischen Orchesters in Hagen / Westfalen gewählt, wo er 1926 die Uraufführung von Paul Graeners Konzert für Klavier und Orchester (Opus 72) mit Käthe Heinemann als Solistin leitete. In Hagen war Weisbach maßgeblich daran beteiligt, daß die erst halb fertige und beschädigte Stadthalle fertiggestellt wurde und im Jahr 1923 das erste Hagener Musikfest stattfinden konnte. Neben dieser Tätigkeit leitete er ab 1924 zusätzlich noch die Konzertgesellschaft Barmen. Schließlich wurde er 1926 nach einigen erfolgreichen Auftritten als Gastdirigent zum Nachfolger von Georg Schnéevoigt als städtischer Generalmusikdirektor nach Düsseldorf berufen. Sein erster großer Auftritt mit den Düsseldorfer Symphonikern und einem anspruchsvollen Programm im Rahmen der Eröffnungsfeier der Großen « Ausstellung für Gesundheitspflege, soziale Fürsorge und Leibesübungen » (GeSoLei) wurde zu einem viel beachteten Erfolg. In der Folgezeit leitete er neben dem saisonalen Programm zweimal das Niederrheinische Musikfest sowie zahlreiche Ur- und Erstaufführungen wie beispielsweise die « Missa Symphonica » für gemischten Chor, Soli, Orchester und Orgel Opus 36 und das « Requiem » von Lothar Windsperger, die « Marianische Antiphon » für Soli, Chor Orgel und Orchester von Wolfgang Fortner und « Die Weihe der Nacht » von ihm selbst als Uraufführungen sowie « König David » von Arthur Honegger, die « Stabat mater Opus 53 von Karol Szymanowski und « Hymnus » von Heinz Schubert als deutsche Erstaufführungen. Mit einer letzten Konzertveranstaltung am 8. und 9. Februar 1933 beendete Weismann seine Tätigkeit in Düsseldorf und zog nach Leipzig, wo er bis 1939 die Leitung des Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchesters Leipzig, dem heutigen MDR Sinfonieorchester übernahm. Anschließend wechselte er in schwierigen Kriegsjahren nach Wien. Hier leitete Weisbach bis 1944 die Wiener Symphoniker, ein Orchester in dem es seit der deutschen Machtübernahme einen überproportional großen Anteil an Parteimitgliedern und Anwärtern auf die Parteimitgliedschaft gab und er war verantwortlich und andere für die so genannten Kraft-durch-Freude-Konzerte, Auftritte im Reichsrundfunk und für die Aufführung der großen Wiener Konzertserien, ehe das Orchester (bereits personell durch Einberufungen zum Kriegsdienst erheblich reduziert) im August 1944 stillgelegt wurde. Nachdem er ein Entnazifizierungsverfahren durchlaufen hatte (er war seit 1937 Mitglied der NSDAP) berief man ihn schließlich im Jahr 1947 zum städtischen Musikdirektor nach Wuppertal, wo er auch seine Laufbahn beendete. Weisbach galt zeitlebens als ein international anerkannter Kenner und Interpret der Musik von Johann Sebastian Bach, welche er in zahlreichen Aufführungen (und andere mit dem London Symphony Orchestra) immer wieder zu Gehör brachte. Als Anerkennung für sein Lebenswerk und für seine musikalischen Aufbaujahre in Hagen und Wuppertal erhielt Hans Weisbach 1955 den von der Heydt-Kulturpreis sowie das Große Verdienstkreuz der Bundesrepublik Deutschland.

Sinfonieorchester Wuppertal

1862 als Elberfelder Kapelle gegründet, feierte das Sinfonieorchester Wuppertal in der vergangenen Spielzeit sein 150-jähriges Bestehen. Solisten und Dirigenten wie Clara Schumann, Joseph Joachim, Johannes Brahms und Max Bruch gaben dem jungen Orchester die Ehre. Viele Dirigenten begannen in Wuppertal ihre musikalische Laufbahn - darunter bis heute weltbekannte Namen wie Erich Kleiber, Otto Klemperer, Hermann von Schmeidel und Hans Weisbach, der besonders als Bruckner-Spezialist internationales Ansehen gewann.

« Decca » Records

The name « Decca » dates back to a portable gramophone called the « Decca Dulcephone » patented, in 1914, by musical instrument makers Barnett Samuel & Sons. That company was eventually renamed « The Decca Gramophone Co. Ltd. » and, then, sold to former stock-broker Edward Lewis, in 1929. Within years, « Decca Records Ltd. » was the 2nd largest record label in the world, calling itself « The Supreme Record Company » . The name « Decca » was coined by Wilfred S. Samuel by merging the word « Mecca » with the initial « D » of their logo « Dulcet » or their trademark « Dulcephone » .

Artists signed to « Decca » in the 1930's and 1940's.

« The Decca Record Company » stretches back to the late-1920's, and built a reputation at the forefront of audio reproduction. Today, « Decca » is a label of great diversity, home to many of the world's most distinguished artists, and with appeal to both specialist and mainstream audiences. The « Decca » Music Group also incorporates the «

Philips » label. These labels are the home of an array of the greatest musicians.

1er janvier 1930 : The live broadcast of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra's « New Year Concert » proves that the new « Mirag » (« Mitteldeutsche Rundfunk-AG ») outside broadcasting unit is fully functional. On that evening, for the 1st time, listeners sitting around radio sets all over central Germany hear the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra under its conductor, Bruno Walter, join « Thomaskirche » organist, Günther Ramín, at the Eberhard Friedrich Walcker organ of the « New Gewandhaus » , in Max Reger's « Organ Fantasia » , Opus 40, No. I, in a concert that also includes Mozart's Motet, « Exultate, jubilate » (K. 165) and Anton Bruckner's 5th Symphony in B-flat major.

L'Orchestre du « Gewandhaus » de Leipzig (1930-1940)

« Dear listener, just consider :

Radio disseminates literature and music evening for evening, day after day, preparing the way for all the arts. That is where the cultural value of broadcasting lies. It does not deny artists an income, it gives them one, not only in itself, but, by increasing the demand for art, which later needs to be satisfied in the concert halls and theatres. »

(Julius Witte, Artistic director of the « Mitteldeutsche Rundfunk-AG » - « Mirag » , 1930.)

« Attention - attention ! This is “ Mitteldeutscher Rundfunk ” ! »

A truck clatters over Leipzig's market square, in the summer heat of August 1928. It is carrying large chests and tall metal cupboards that have been stowed with deliberate care. That would be nothing out of the ordinary if it were not for the conspicuous « Mirag » in round letters adorning its side. The spoked-wheel vehicle does not have far to go, in fact it stops just a few metres further on in front of the impressive market frontage with the house number 8. A neon sign shows that this is where the « Mitteldeutsche Rundfunk » broadcasting company (« Mirag » , for short) is setting-up its equipment in its new broadcasting and business premises. It is high-time too, since the studios established in the building of the Leipzig Trade Fair authority (the « Alte Waage » at the market square) for the Spring Fair of 1924 have long been much too small for the expanding and forward-looking medium of radio. « Mitteldeutscher Rundfunk » can already boast having sold licences to 300,000 households, after all. Apart from the « gramophone record concerts » , all its broadcasting is live and local. Broadcasts of Operas from the « Dresden Semperoper » , the National Theatre in Weimar and the New Theatre in Leipzig are the favourites.

« Mirag » even has a Radio Orchestra of its own for concerts : the Leipzig Symphony Orchestra. It performs at the « Alte Handelsbörse » on the « Naschmarkt » , which has been converted into a studio.

And what about the Gewandhaus Orchestra ? Its 1928 concerts have yet to be heard on the radio !

That is not in any way an oversight on the part of « Mirag », since the concert repertoire is adequately covered by its own Orchestra. However, for the wide-ranging audiences in Saxony, Thuringia and the Prussian province corresponding roughly with today's Saxony-Anhalt, the programme policy is clearly too narrow and in the long run indefensible, especially because the « Mirag » broadcasting house, in Dresden, already broadcasts 2 Orchestras : the « Staatskapelle » and the Dresden Philharmonic !

The move into the new premises at the market square is intended to broaden the scope of the Leipzig programmes. In April 1929, the Leipzig Radio magazine « Die Mirag » wrote :

« Anyone who pays “ Mirag ” a visit at the moment and boldly explores the elegant old house's winding corridors that recall the tunnels of a mine will see many indications that the Leipzig radio station has expanded its programme. 2 huge floors are at the disposal of “ Mirag ”. »

As newsworthy as the expansion of the broadcasting centre itself are the planned technical installations - a necessary prerequisite for the intended integration of new broadcasting locations into the programme.

« We are going over now to the New Gewandhaus in Leipzig ! »

Now things moved fast. At the « Gewandhaus » (which still stood next to the « Reichsgericht », in the « Musicians' Quarter ») , « Mirag » hired several rooms between the main auditorium and the chamber music hall and fitted them out as a broadcasting studio.

The live broadcast of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra's « New Year Concert » , on January 1, 1930, proved that the new « Mirag » outside broadcasting unit was fully functional. On that evening, for the 1st time, listeners sitting around radio sets all over central Germany heard the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra under its conductor, Bruno Walter, join « Thomaskirche » organist, Günther Ramín, at the Eberhard Friedrich Walcker organ of the « New Gewandhaus » , in Max Reger's « Organ Fantasia » , Opus 40, No. 1, in a concert that also included Mozart's Motet, « Exultate, jubilate » (K. 165) and Anton Bruckner's 5th Symphony in B-flat major.

In that same year, the Great Depression would drive innumerable German companies into bankruptcy and push unemployment figures towards the 6 million Mark, threatening the existence of even such large cultural institutions as the « Gewandhaus » and the Conservatory, in Leipzig.

That made « Mirag » 's plan for regular broadcasts with the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra all the more welcome. In July 1931, after protracted negotiations, the director of « Mirag » and the Theatre and Music Department of the City of Leipzig (the body responsible for the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra) finally signed a contract stipulating that « Mirag » was to « record live and include in its programme 3 “ Gewandhaus ” concerts per year for 10,000 “ Reichsmark ” » .

Theoretically, therefore, the German Radio Archive actually ought to be well-stocked with recordings of live radio broadcasts of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, from the 1930's ! That is unfortunately not the case, since it was technically not easy at the time to capture evanescent live music events on recordings. As magnetic tape had not yet been invented, radio technicians had to use the « disc cutters » they had developed for broadcasting purposes.

In spite of its weight and difficult handling, the wax disc had stood the test of time for a decade in radio recording. Its main drawback was that it could be played only once ; for repeated use, a shellac copy was made and, at last, it was possible for radio stations to build-up record archives of their own productions.

Recording smaller pieces of from 3 to 4 minutes' duration was no big problem, but long Symphonies and Operas presented almost insuperable obstacles. Radio technicians feverishly sought solutions. How would machines have to function to enable smooth play-back in broadcasts ? Shellac discs and the recording waxes necessary for their production ran at 78 rpm, allowing at most 4 and a half minutes of playing time.

In order to eliminate interruptions, the recordings on the wax discs had to be made to coincide in some manner. The solution was to create an overlap area, meaning that the last 30 seconds of what would form 1 side of a disc also had to be recorded at the beginning of what would be the next side. That necessitated the simultaneous use of 2 disc cutters. The 2nd machine was started shortly before the 1st ran-out, so that both briefly recorded the same audio signal. The process was repeated until all the waxes required to record the work had been cut.

The broadcast play-back of the recording was then effected with the aid of 2 turntables. The broadcasting technician had to start turntable « B » at the point when the stylus of turntable « A » reached the overlap area and, then, to judge the most favourable moment within the overlap area to switch over to turntable « B » - a laborious and quite risky procedure. And any over-modulation, clumsy handling or slight fault on one of the warmed wax discs during recording was enough to render the whole exercise useless. The overlap area (not present on commercial recordings) meant that it was not possible to replace 1 side of a disc by recording a new one. That would have interrupted the flow of the music and broken its continuity, which would have been untenable for a serious concert recording !

This complicated and precarious process would be common practice in radio studios and broadcasting companies for a whole decade until the late 1930's. It also presented archivists with a major problem. The recording of a Symphony might take a dozen single-sided, very fragile shellac discs, a whole Wagner Opera more than 40 - representing an enormous weight (3 discs with a diameter of 30 centimeters - the diameter of the usual long-playing record later - weigh about a kilo !). Each disc was produced in very limited numbers for broadcasting, so that the loss of just 1 disc often made the whole set unusable. This makes it easy to understand the huge losses to record archives caused by War damage.

Miraculously, the recordings presented on CD have remained intact despite the turmoil of eventful decades and repeated moves from place to place. Their labels (one sometimes pasted over another) tell an impressive tale. The March 5, 1940 recording of Richard Strauß's « Festival Prelude » on 4 discs (with the groove beginning at the centre) is a real stroke of good fortune. This « echo of the past » is a unique documentation of the acoustics in the « Great Concert Hall » of the « New Gewandhaus », built in 1884.

Still more, it is the only recording of the Eberhard Friedrich Walcker organ in the « Gewandhaus ». That was the instrument on which Anton Bruckner gave an inaugural organ recital 1 day before the premiere of his 7th Symphony in December 1884, and on which the « Thomaskantors » Karl Straube and Günther Ramín often displayed their virtuosity.

On the propaganda front, it was now high-time for « Greater Germany Radio » to comply with its orders and distract the people from their everyday deprivations and losses, their sorrow over fallen loved ones and the horrors of the War. It sounds macabre, but never before had radio produced such huge volumes of music - and that in hitherto unknown audio quality. In terms of recording technique, the best conditions for new recordings now existed, the tape recorder having established itself and replaced disc cutting at radio studios.

Magnetic tape could reproduce sound far better than any shellac disc. At last, it was possible to tackle complete recordings of large Romantic Operas and extended concert works. What a quantum leap, both technically and artistically ! But how were they to be produced ? The station's own Symphony Orchestra and Radio Choir had been disbanded long ago !

Now, it was time for the « Staatskapelle » of Dresden and the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra to step into the breach ! One recording session after another was held in 1944 and 1945. The musicians will surely have altogether welcomed becoming a « Radio Orchestra », though the idea was still a little bizarre for them.

The new function was necessary for their survival - especially in the case of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, for it enabled Hermann Abendroth to prevent his musicians from being sent to the front. They literally played for their lives ! Especially since the « New Gewandhaus », their traditional performing venue, lay in ruins.

« Haus Drei Linden » in Lindenau and the « Kapitoll » Cinema on « Petersstraße », in the inner-city, had served as temporary venues for the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra up to the time when concert activity was officially discontinued at the end of September 1944 in the pursuit of « Total War ». Those provisional concert venues were, however, unsuitable for radio recordings. The former studio of the Radio Symphony Orchestra in the « Alte Handelsbörse » would probably have been chosen for the purpose, had not that small building on the « Naschmarkt » burnt-out in the same night of heavy bombing as the New Theatre on the « Augustusplatz » .

Only from the production plans of the « Reichsrundfunk » do we learn that the microphones for the recordings of the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra were set-up at the Concordia Halls in the Leipzig suburb of Gohlis. There, in a ball-room that was much too cramped for the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra and unheated because of the coal shortage, the musicians sat on creaking chairs, some of them playing borrowed instruments.

Microphone cables led to an outside broadcasting unit in the street, where tape machines recorded what was being played in the hall.

The recordings were broadcast on Fridays, between 5:15 and 6:30 pm, by the « Deutschlandsender Berlin » - in a programme created specially for the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra and ominously entitled : « Music for the twilight hour » .

The Cello Concerto by Eugène d'Albert, re-released on CD, and the « Moorish Rhapsody » by Engelbert Humperdinck were both featured on that evening programme, transmitted to people sitting behind black-out curtains - provided the broadcast was not interrupted or cancelled by the announcement of « Enemy bombers approaching ! » .

All that we have from that dark time are the tapes that have lain in archives for decades.

What was going on in the hearts and minds of the « Gewandhaus » musicians whilst recording the melancholy Humperdinck work, on March 12, 1945, is something that none of us born later can even begin to imagine.

During 1933 and early 1934, the « Kampfbund » sought to fortify its influence with the aid of local delegates who held key positions in municipal music circles. In Rhenish Krefeld, it was conductor Walther Meyer-Giesow who lording it over the Municipal Orchestra, a « Collegium Musicum » , and a madrigal choir, and who, throughout 1933, planned virtually all the musical activities in town.

The premiere of « Vier kleine stücke » (1929-1930) for large orchestra by Franz Schreker was given in Krefeld, on December 5, 1931, by conductor Walter Meyer-Giesow. (This work was recorded for use as film-music.)

In Munich, « Kampfbund » dictator Paul Ehlers so usurped the traditional « Bach-Verein » and its choir and orchestra that Carl Orff who, before the 3rd « Reich », had played a key role in it, withdrew in early 1934. And, in Marburg, the « Kfdk » chief used his power to organize as many musical events as possible, for the greatest number of Party faithful, at preferential ticket prices.

1930-1939

Le « Boléro » de Ravel est enregistré par la nouvelle filiale française de la firme « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft », la Société phonographique française « Polydor S.A. », en 1930, avec le compositeur lui-même à la tête de l'Orchestre Lamoureux.

La « grande dépression » mondiale fait décliner les ventes de disques ; en 1932, la firme « DGG » fusionne avec Polyphon et revient s'établir à Hanovre. En 1937, après de nouvelles années de production décroissante, la « Deutsche Grammophon AG » est contrainte à la liquidation ; la firme est cependant recrée la même année sous le nom « Deutsche Grammophon GmbH » et financée par la « Deutsche Bank » et la « Telefunken Gesellschaft » .

Malgré les restrictions croissantes du 3e « Reich », on continue de faire des enregistrements importants. En décembre 1938, paraît le 1er disque de Herbert von Karajan (l'Ouverture de « la Flûte enchantée » de Mozart avec la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin) .

Parmi les autres artistes de la « DGG » de l'époque, il faut citer les chefs d'orchestre Paul van Kempen, Carl Schuricht et Victor de Sabata ; la pianiste Elly Ney ; le violoniste Georg Kulenkampff ; et les chanteurs Erna Berger, Tiana Lemnitz, Walther Ludwig et Julius Patzak.

Since the 1920's, Germany had been the leading musical country in Europe and Berlin had been a musical metropolis ranking with London, Paris and Vienna. Its Academy of Music had Paul Hindemith and Arnold Schönberg as teachers of composition, Emanuel Feuerman teaching cello and Artur Schnabel piano. Also working in Berlin was the great violin teacher, Carl Flesch. The solo cellist of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra Orchestra was Gregor Piatigorsky. The State Opera had Erich Kleiber and Leo Blech as its conductors, the « Kroll Oper » had Otto Klemperer, and the « Städtische Oper » had Bruno Walter.

When Adolf Hitler came to power, in 1933, not only did such clearly Leftist figures as Bertolt Brecht, Kurt Weill and Hanns Eisler have to flee, but also all those mentioned above, as well as dozens of other distinguished artists. Wilhelm Furtwängler put-up some opposition, Hitler gave him an hour-long harangue on the Aryan race and placed him under « Gestapo » surveillance. The ranks of entertainers were thinned-out as well. The hugely popular singing group, the « Comedian Harmonists » , disbanded, since its Jewish members had to leave the country. Most galling of all, though, was that Marlene Dietrich, the daughter of a German officer, proved deaf to the entreaties of the 3rd « Reich » and refused to perform ever again in Germany.

The expansion of Greater Germany into Austria resulted in a wave of emigration by Operetta composers. Paul Abraham, the composer of « Viktoria and her Hussar » , fled to Cuba, where he had to make a living as a piano teacher. Oscar Straus, the author of the « Waltz Dream » , subsequently had a nervous breakdown in New York. The « Waltz King » , Robert Stolz, fared better, achieving moderate success in the United States as a light-music composer. It was no longer permissible to perform the works of exiles, and soon, the only living composer good enough for the German Operetta stage was Franz Lehár, approaching his 70's but prepared, if the need arose, to mould his works to fit the demands of the new ideology. Even he got into difficulties over his Jewish-born wife, but he was allowed to live in peace, because « The Merry Widow » was Hitler's favourite Operetta. Lehár's long-standing librettist, Fritz Löhner-Beda who's real name was Bedřich Löwy (the author of « Schön ist die Welt » and « Giuditta ») , was gassed at Auschwitz.

The purge of Jews not only affected artists, but reached record companies too : their international links aroused suspicions of « international Zionism » . The leading record companies, « Electrola » (German « HMV ») and « Lindstrom » (« Odeon » and « Columbia ») were subsidiaries of the English « EMI » , concerned until this link was severed on the outbreak of War. The most important German labels were « Deutsche Grammophon » (« Polydor ») and « Telefunken » ; both were controlled by the giant « Siemens » electrical corporation. The music censorship office set-up by the Nazis, the « Reichsmusik-Prufstelle » , made prior examinations of the record companies' publication plans, and the « Gestapo » went around the record companies' warehouses with their lists, removing the music of Jewish composers. The Aryanized record companies rushed to release Germanic music, and the highlight of these was « Telefunken » 's partial recording, at Bayreuth in 1936, of Richard Wagner's « Lohengrin » , « Siegfried » and « Die Walküre » .

Of those conductors who remained, one who now rose to prominence was Herbert von Karajan, a member of the Nazi Party and a favourite of Hermann Göring, who was interested in Opera. Succeeding Bruno Walter as conductor of the « Gewandhaus » , in Leipzig, was Hermann Abendrorh, who recorded Johannes Brahms. The aged composer Richard Strauß, to whom Adolf Hitler had given a place of honour as chairman of the « Reichsmusikkammer » , made recordings for « Deutsche Grammophon » 's « Polydor » label of his Symphonic-poems « Don Quixote » and « Ein Heldenleben » . Even such massive works as Anton Bruckner's 4th and 5th Symphonies were put on record ; the conductor on the « Electrola » recording was Karl Böhm. The most important of « Telefunken » 's foreign orchestral conductors was Willem Mengelberg who, partly in Berlin and partly in occupied Holland, conducted Beethoven's and Brahms's Symphonies, Franz Schubert and Franz Liszt. This conductor, called the « Napoleon of the Orchestra » , because of his virtuosity, had to flee to Switzerland after the War owing to his pro-German sympathies.

The most famous instrumental soloists in the « Deutsche Grammophon » stable, before the War, were the Beethoven pianists Wilhelm Kempff and Elly Ney, as well as the only great violinist to remain in Germany, Georg Kulenkampff, whose recording in 1936 of Beethoven's Violin Concerto ranks in its Classicism alongside Fritz Kreisler's interpretation, made in the same year. Kulenkampff can also be heard on a number of concert recordings from these years, including an outstanding interpretation of Jean Sibelius's Violin Concerto with Wilhelm Furtwängler. In those days, German radio had extremely highly-developed recording technology, and since the radio's archives were broken-up after the War into both official archives and the collections of music-loving Allied officers, there have been steady streams of re-issues of the historical recordings from this period. Many of them have had their origins in recordings taken to the Soviet Union, in 1945.

Of the great singers, those who remained in Germany were Gerhard Hirsch, Tiana Lemnitz, Helge Rosvænge and Heinrich Schlusnus, who was just beginning his career. In the « coloratura » field, there was competition between the celebrated star of the Berlin State Opera, Erna Berger, and Erna Sack of the Dresden State Opera, whose range extended over 4 octaves. Of the great vocal works, Beethoven's « Missa solemnis » had been recorded as early as 1928. The complete recording by Bruno Kittel, in 1941, for « Deutsche Grammophon Gesellschaft » of Johann Sebastian Bach's « Saint-Matthew Passion » aroused great attention not least because of its cost : 60,000 « Deutche Marks » . The matrices were taken by submarine to Japan, where 17,000 copies of this 18 record album were sold before the end of the War. Kittel also recorded Mozart's « Requiem » .

At the same time as the German recording of the « Missa solemnis » , Bach's B minor Mass had appeared in England, conducted by Albert Coates, with the solo-parts sung by Elisabeth Schumann and Friedrich Schorr. The War put an end to such grand ventures though, in German-occupied France, there were still complete recordings of Claude

Debussy's Opera « Pelléas et Mélisande » and Hector Berlioz's « la Damnation de Faust » , the former conducted by Roger Désormière, the latter by Jean Fournet. Fournet also made a 22 sided recording of Berlioz's « Requiem » , with the Paris Radio Orchestra and Choir, later referred to by the American critic David Hall as « the best recording made in the world during the War Years » .

The last years before the outbreak of World War II witnessed the triumphal progress of Fascism in Europe. Civil War was raging in Spain, ending with the victory of Franco, in 1939. In 1938, Germany annexed Austria ; the following year, it was Czechoslovakia's turn ; and, on 3 September 1939, War broke-out, following Germany's invasion of Poland. Soon, Sweden, Switzerland and Portugal were the only havens of peace in Europe. As the politicians and generals planned their advances, musicians were in retreat. Nevertheless, just before the deluge, in 1937-1938, some historic recordings were made in Europe.

In 1937, Fred Gaisberg, who had just turned 64, decided to record Antonín Dvořák's Cello Concerto in the composer's home-land with a Czech Orchestra. The natural choice was the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra, whose conductor was George Szell. The recording venue was the « Deutsche Haus » , in Prague, a concert-hall famous for its acoustics. Soloists of sufficient calibre were not to be found in Czechoslovakia, however, so Gaisberg's choice fell on Pablo Casals. Casals was, at the time, Minister of Culture in the democratic Catalan government, but he fled from Barcelona to Prague, where he gave 1st a public concert and, the next day, made a recording. After the recording, Casals was on the point of collapse, but there is not a trace of his exhaustion on the record ; the entry of the cello is like a lion's roar. Soon after the recording, George Szell moved to England and, thence, on to the United States. Casals returned to Barcelona, but soon had to flee his homeland, to which he never returned.

The following year saw Gaisberg in Vienna, recording Gustav Mahler with Bruno Walter. Walter was born in Berlin into a modest middle-class Jewish family. From 1901 to 1913, he worked in Vienna as a conductor in close collaboration with Gustav Mahler. Mahler even gave him permission to make necessary changes in the scores of his works and, after the composer's death, he conducted the 1st performance of his 9th Symphony. In the 1920's, Walter conducted Orchestras in various places in Europe and America with great success. After Adolf Hitler's rise to power, he no longer had a place in Germany, however, and settled in Vienna. On Sunday, 16 January 1938, at the « Musikvereinsaal » in Vienna, Gaisberg recorded a concert of Mahler's 9th Symphony with the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Walter. The concert was graced by the presence of Chancellor Kurt von Schuschnigg, whom the Nazis imprisoned a couple of months later. Recorded at the same time was Mahler's song-cycle, « Das Lied van der Erde » , with Kerstin Thorborg and Charles Kullman as soloists. Several of Mahler's Symphonies had not been recorded at all, and this was the 1st recording of the 9th Symphony.

After the « Anschluß » , Walter fled to France and, soon, he and Gaisberg met again in the studio, this time with the Orchestra of the Paris Conservatoire, recording Hector Berlioz's « Symphonie fantastique » . In 1939, Gaisberg retired. Walter was not able to continue working in France for long because, in 1940, he was obliged to continue his exile in the United States. There, he became one of the country's most highly-regarded conductors and, over the years, he recorded industriously with many American Orchestras, including most of Mahler's Symphonies. In 1952, Walter encountered the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra again, when he recorded the song-cycle, « Das Lied von der Erde » , for « Decca » . That, too, has become a famous record, not least because of Kathleen Ferrier, who sang the alto part on this occasion. The 1938 recording, however, is an invaluable historical document of the last days of the old Austria.

While the Nazis were consolidating their power in Germany and Fascism was advancing in Europe, on the other side of the ocean, people were recovering from the great blow of 1929. As economic life recovered, so too, musical life quickened. In the 1st part of 1936, « RCA Victor » was selling between 800,000 and 900,000 records a month. By Christmas, it had reached a million. Annual total record sales in the United States were now exceeding 20 million. In Germany, in the same year, not even a figure of 2 million records could be achieved. One result of Hitler's persecution of the Jews was a welcome addition to the ranks of recording artists in the United States. Apart from Wilhelm Furtwängler, all the great conductors were now working in America : Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter, Fritz Busch, as well as the Hungarian-born Fritz Reiner and Eugene Ormandy. Of the great living composers, apart from Richard Strauß and Jean Sibelius, a larger proportion were working in the great musical centres of the United States.

The Bruckner Society of America

4 janvier 1931 : Fondation de la Société Bruckner d'Amérique (« Bruckner Society of America ») .

The Society was an interesting time. Later that year, conductor Arturo Toscanini presented the Bruckner 7th Symphony with the New York Philharmonic, the 1st time the Orchestra had presented the work in 45 years. That year also saw Frederick Stock conducted the Chicago Symphony in the Bruckner 9th. The 1st honorary chairman was Harriet Bishop Lanier who used her influence to stage the New York premiere of Bruckner's F minor Mass under the direction of Artur Bodanzky.

The following year, the Society elected Martin G. Dumler of Cincinnati, Ohio, to succeed Mrs. Lanier who had passed away. During his tenure, the Society initiated publication of the music journal, « Chord and Discord » which offered news and scholarly essays on the music of Bruckner and Gustav Mahler. The Society also commissioned the artist Julio Kilenyi (1885-1959) to produce both a Bruckner and Mahler medal of honour to be given to individuals who helped promote the music of these 2 composers.

Recipients of the Bruckner Medal included Fritz Busch, Otto Klemperer, Serge Koussevitsky, Erich Leinsdorf, Eugene Ormandy, Frederick Stock, Arturo Toscanini, Bruno Walter, George Szell, William Steinberg, John Barbirolli and Paul Hindemith.

Society member, Gabriel Engel wrote essays on the life and an analysis of the Symphonies of Bruckner for publication by the Society.

With Mr. Dumler's death, in 1960, Charles Eble (1915-2009), founder and owner of Eble Music in Iowa City took-over as the President and Editor. Publications of « Chord and Discord » continued into the 1990's. With Mr. Eble's declining health, the Society became inactive.

Unfortunately, none of the Bruckner Society's files, prior to 1998, have been located. Correspondence pertaining to activities with the New York Philharmonic (1946-1965) are available.

In 2009, after reading about the death of Charles Eble, John F. Berky, Editor of abruckner.com initiated a plan to re-activate the Bruckner Society. Filings with the State of Iowa and the Internal Revenue Service allowed the Society to be re-activated while maintaining its non-profit status.

Thanks must be given to Charles Eble's friend, David Hempel, the present owner of Eble Music without whose help none of this could have been possible. David showed patience, enthusiasm and concern at a time when his own life was filled with serious distractions. He assumed the role of President and Treasurer of the Society from 2009 until 2011. He presently serves on the Board of Directors. Benjamin Korstvedt, Professor of Music at Clark University is the current President. John Berky is the Society's Secretary.

...

The Bruckner Society of America was founded in 1931, with the mission to increase the awareness of Bruckner's music in the United States. The Society published the journal « Chord and Discord » until 1998, as well as several books on Bruckner and Gustav Mahler. Those publications are now all available at www.abruckner.com.

The Society awards the Bruckner Society Medal of Honour, which was designed by the eminent sculptor and medallic artist Julio Kilenyi. Past recipients have included :

Frederick Charles Adler.

John Barbirolli.

Karl Böhm.

Fritz Busch.

Bernard Haitink.

Otto Klemperer.

Serge Koussevitsky.

Josef Krips.

Erich Leinsdorf.

Eugene Ormandy.

The Bruckner Society's Medal of Honour awarded to Eugene Ormandy

The Bruckner Society of America acquires a piece of its own history. When the Society resumed activity after its 10 year hiatus, one of the biggest losses noted was the disappearance of its files (dating back to the 1930's) . One of our primary activities of late has been to track down items from our history. Fortunately, we have all of the Society's publications and « Chord and Discord » continues to provide a wealth of information about our past.

Our most recent acquisition is a photograph of Eugene Ormandy receiving the Kilenyi Medal of Honour, back in 1936. From « Chord and Discord » , we gleaned the following information :

Anton Bruckner - 7th Symphony. Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor. January 17, 1936.

For this manifestation of zeal, as well as for the recorded performance of the work, Mister Ormandy was presented, on this occasion, with the medal of the Bruckner Society of America, bestowal being made in a brief and particularly happy speech by Elbert L. Carpenter, President of the Orchestral Association of Minneapolis, Inc. In responding, Mister Ormandy paid special tribute to his colleagues of the Orchestra.

The performance, on this occasion, deserved all that could be said in praise. At least, I listener felt that, if the composer had always been so appreciatively, clearly and dramatically dealt with by conductors, there might, perhaps, have been no need of organizations to promote his popularity.

(Frances Boardman, « The Saint-Paul Pioneer Press » .)

The Bruckner Society recovers another piece of its own history

Recently, the Bruckner Society came across a picture involving the presentation of a Bruckner Medal of Honour that the Society's Board of Directors was hard pressed to identify. The picture (located in the New York Philharmonic Archives) clearly shows that the Bruckner Medal is being presented, but except for conductor William Steinberg, and Philharmonic Society President, Amyas Ames (credited in the photo text) , we could not determine the identity of the gentleman on the left.

Thanks to the research of Gabryel Smith, Assistant Archivist at the New York Philharmonic, we were able to pin-down the details. The man on the left is Herman Neumann. He was a member of the Executive Committee of the Bruckner Society of America and the recipient of the Society's Mahler Medal, in 1959, for his work as Program Director of Radio Station WNYC - the municipally owned radio station. Mister Neumann was on hand to present the Bruckner Medal to the New York Philharmonic for their programming of the 1964-1965 Bruckner Series.

The series consisted of the following performances :

Symphony No. 3 conducted by Josef Krips (October, 1964) .

Symphony No. 4 conducted by Josef Krips (March, 1964) .

Symphony No. 5 conducted by William Steinberg (May, 1965) .

Symphony No. 6 conducted by William Steinberg (December, 1964) .

Symphony No. 7 conducted by George Szell (March, 1964) .

Symphony No. 8 conducted by William Steinberg (November, 1964) .

Symphony No. 9 conducted by Josef Krips (February, 1965) .

Mass No. 3 conducted by Josef Krips (March, 1965) .

Each of these conductors had already received the Kilenyi Medal :

William Steinberg (1950) .

George Szell (1952) .

Josef Krips (1956) .

The presentation to the New York Philharmonic took place in May of 1965 when William Steinberg was on hand to conclude the series with a performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 5.

2 Kilenyi Medal of Honour Awards given postumously (March, 2011)

The Board of Directors of the Bruckner Society of America has announced that 2 Kilenyi Medal of Honour Awards were recently given postumously. The recipients were :

Georg Tintner : presented to his widow, Tanya Tintner in Halifax, Nova Scotia, Canada.

Takashi Asahina : presented to his son, Chitaru Asahina in Osaka, Japan.

Both of these awards are being given to honour the life-long dedication and advocacy that these internationally renowned conductors provided by means of numerous concerts and recordings.

Conductor Stanisław Skrowaczewski Awarded the Kilenyi Medal of Honour

While it appears that the Bruckner Society is giving away medals at a feverish rate (2 in 2 weeks) , it should be noted that, while the votes took place far apart, the actual presentations to Stefan Sanderling and Stanisław Skrowaczewski took place within 1 week of each other.

On April 19th and 20th of 2012, Stanisław Skrowaczewski made a return visit as the laureate conductor of the Minnesota Orchestra and directed a wonderful performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 8. John Berky was there representing the Bruckner Society of America and presented Mæstro Skrowaczewski with the Kilenyi Medal of Honour before a full house at Orchestra Hall, in Minneapolis.

A Report on the Presentation

(By John F. Berky.)

When Charles Eble, the past president of the Bruckner Society of America passed away, 3 years ago, I came to the realization that there were still some important initiatives that the Society should continue to do. One was to provide a vehicle where additional research into Bruckner's life and music could be fostered. The other primary objective was to recognize the achievements of scholars and musicians who have been active during the years of the Society's dormancy.

One of those major goals was achieved on April 20th when I was able to walk on stage at Orchestra Hall, in Minneapolis, and present, before a capacity audience, the Bruckner Society of America's Kilenyi Medal of Honour to conductor and composer, Stanisław Skrowaczewski.

Stan, as he is known by his friends and close associates, will soon be celebrating his 89th birthday and while his body is gradually showing its age, the spirit within this gifted musician is truly amazing. Delineating his musical career goes beyond the scope of this report. Biographer, Frederick Harris, Junior has done that amazingly well with a 600 page biography that was just published under the title, « Seeking the Infinite » . It is a very readable account that I recommend highly.

As one digs into Mæstro Skrowaczewski's life, it becomes quickly apparent that the music of Bruckner is central to his existence. The 1st time he heard Bruckner's music emanating from an apartment window in his home-town of Lvov, Poland, he was so taken by it that he was physically overcome. As the years progressed, Skrowaczewski conducted Bruckner in concerts given throughout the world. With the Minnesota Orchestra, he performed a Bruckner cycle, he recorded an 11 Symphony cycle with the Saarbrücken Radio Symphony Orchestra (now, the « Deutsche Radio Philharmonie ») and has made additional recordings with Orchestras in the United States, Poland and, most recently, Japan.

It was indeed heartening to see how Stan's friends and the Minneapolis music community rallied around this performance of the Bruckner 8th with the Minnesota Orchestra. I was invited to a pre-concert dinner arranged by Judy Dayton, certainly one of Minnesota's most generous benefactors where it was possible to meet with Fred Harris, Skrowaczewski's biographer and advocate.

Arrangements were made for me to sit through the 1st 3 movements of the Symphony and I was then escorted backstage in preparation for the on-stage presentation. After a few solo curtain calls and my opportunity to 1st meet the Maestro, I followed him on-stage. As we walked to center stage, the low brass section presented a special gift - a « tusch » where a section of the 8th Symphony was played as a salutary fanfare.

It was gratifying to see and hear how supportive the audience was for the Maestro's recognition. Our presentation was punctuated several times by sustained applause.

After the presentation, Orchestra members filed by and congratulated Skrowaczewski and we, then, proceeded to a post-concert reception. A short video, prepared by Fred Harris was shown to the invited guests.

And, thus, a wonderful evening came to a close. I got to bed around 12:30 am and, then, my (not so) smartphone awakened me at 2:00 am (thinking it was 3:00 am, Eastern time) and I left the hotel at 3:30 for my return flight home.

My thanks go to Robert Neu of the Minnesota Orchestra, benefactress Judy Dayton, photographer Travis Anderson and biographer Frederick Harris, Junior for helping to make this such a memorable occasion.

Conductor Herbert Blomstedt receives the Bruckner Society Medal of Honour

On February 8th of 2012, at Davies Symphony Hall in San Francisco, Bruckner Society board member Neil Schore presented Herbert Blomstedt with the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour. Maestro Blomstedt was in San Francisco to conduct a series of concerts with the San Francisco Symphony including a performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 5.

After the presentation of the medal of honour, Blomstedt related to those present his 1st Bruckner experience. It was a performance of the 4th Symphony that he heard when he was a young violin student. He and his older brother, a cellist, came home humming the themes and then tried to write them down right away so that they wouldn't forget them. He mentioned the 1st Bruckner biography he read and a comment by the biographer that Bruckner's time would come not when the world decided it wanted Bruckner, but when it decided that it needed Bruckner - for his humanity and his humility.

Conductor Kurt Masur Receives the Bruckner Society Medal of Honour

After several delays, Mæstro Kurt Masur was presented with the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour from the Bruckner Society of America. The presentation took place at a reception given at the conductor's home in Westchester County, New York, on Monday, August 11, 2014.

Society Secretary John Berky made the presentation before an invited audience. Society vice-President, William Carragan was also on hand for the presentation.

Kurt Masur, born in 1927, has been the music-director of the « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » , the New York Philharmonic and « l'Orchestre national de France » . He recorded a complete Bruckner cycle in the 1970's for « Ariola Eurodisc » (with the « Gewandhaus ») ; Symphonies Nos. 4 and 7, in 1993 (with the New York Philharmonic) for « Teldec » ; and a 1995 performance with the Israel Philharmonic was recently released on the Orchestra's label « Helicon » .

Christoph von Dohnányi, the past music-director of the Cleveland Orchestra was presented with the Bruckner Society of America's Kilenyi Medal of Honour, immediately following a concert appearance as guest-conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The presentation was made in the « Green Room » at Symphony Hall Boston by John Berky, secretary of the Bruckner Society along with Michaël Cucka, the Society's treasurer. John Berky's wife, Marjory, was in attendance as well.

During the presentation, it was noted that Mæstro von Dohnányi championed Bruckner's music during his tenure in Cleveland where he performed and recorded Bruckner's Symphonies Nos. 3 to 9.

Recently, von Dohnányi has been presenting the Bruckner Symphony No. 4 as a guest-conductor and has made a new recording with the « Philharmonia » Orchestra of London.

Conductor Riccardo Chailly receives the Kilenyi Medal of Honour

Conductor, Riccardo Chailly was awarded the Bruckner Society of America's Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour at a ceremony held at Avery Fisher Hall, in New York City.

The ceremony took place on Sunday, November 9, 2014, in the « Green Room » just prior to a concert where Mæstro Chailly led the « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » in a performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 7.

In presenting the award, Society Executive Secretary John Berky noted Mr. Chailly's complete recorded cycle of Bruckner Symphonies and his willingness to incorporate some of the latest scholastic research into his choice of performing editions, including his recent adoption of the 1872 (1st version) of Bruckner's Symphony No. 2.

Additionally, it was fitting that the honour be bestowed when the Mæstro was touring the United States with the « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » which gave the premiere of the Bruckner 7th Symphony, in 1884.

Bruckner Society board members William Carragan and Michaël Cucka were also in attendance.

The Society wishes to thank Tim Fox of « Columbia » Artists Management and Eileen McMahon of Lincoln Center, for their help in making this presentation possible.

A Big Night for Bruckner Boosters

By Michaël Cooper from « The New York Times » (November 10, 2014) .

Fan clubs are not only for pop stars, or even for the living.

Many of the greatest composers in the Classical cannon have Societies dedicated to studying, promoting and enjoying their music. The Bruckner Society of America, which was founded in 1931, was well-represented Sunday evening, at Avery Fisher Hall, when Riccardo Chailly led the « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » in Bruckner's Symphony No. 7.

It was a big night for Bruckner aficionados. It was the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra, after all, that gave the Symphony its premiere in 1884, conducted by Arthur Nikisch. And Mr. Chailly is celebrated for his Bruckner, and recorded a complete Bruckner Symphony cycle for « Decca » .

So, members of the Society gathered in the « Green Room » of Avery Fisher Hall, just before the performance, and presented Mr. Chailly with its Kilenyi Medal of Honour - whose past recipients over the decades have included Arturo Toscanini, Otto Klemperer, Serge Koussevitzky, Eugene Ormandy, Bruno Walter, George Szell and Paul Hindemith.

« As you know, for a conductor, Bruckner is a life-long development. » , Mr. Chailly said, as he accepted the medal from John F. Berky, the Society's executive secretary :

« Tonight, I'm particularly proud to be here with the 7th, with the “ Gewandhaus ” Orchestra, because we bring something from our roots. »

Mr. Chailly told another member of the Society, William Carragan, a scholar who has worked on editions of Bruckner scores, that he would see some of his work reflected in the performance :

« I will be very faithful to your recommendations. » , he said.

Then, the members of the Society went down to the hall and took their seats, and Mr. Chailly took to the podium.

Conductor Franz Welser-Möst receives the Kilenyi Medal of Honour

On July 13th, members of the Bruckner Society of America's Board of Directors met at Avery Fisher Hall, in New York City, and, in a « Green Room » ceremony, presented the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour to conductor Franz Welser-Möst. The Board of Directors chose this occasion to present this special recognition to Franz Welser-Möst as he was opening his special series of concerts where 4 Bruckner Symphonies would be presented to New York City audiences in 5 days.

Franz Welser-Moest was singled-out for recognition due to his long-standing advocacy for the music of Bruckner. In 1996, Franz Welser-Möst began conducting Bruckner Symphonies with « The Cleveland Orchestra » and has released video recordings of Bruckner Symphonies Nos. 5, 7, 8, and 9 with the Orchestra, in 3 historic venues : the Abbey of Saint-Florian, in Linz ; the « Musikverein » , in Vienna ; and at Severance Hall, in Cleveland. During the 2010-2011 season, Mister Welser-Möst led the Vienna Philharmonic in Bruckner's Symphony No. 9 at Suntory Hall, in Japan. From August of 2010 through July of 2011, Mr. Welser-Möst. and « The Cleveland Orchestra » will have performed a total of 17 Bruckner Symphony performances in Ohio, Scotland, Switzerland, and Japan, as well as in New York City, at the Lincoln Center Festival.

Conductor Hans Graf Receives the Bruckner Society of America's Medal of Honour

Hans Graf, the Austrian conductor who is now completing his tenure as music-director of the Houston Symphony Orchestra was honoured on December 2nd of 2012 when the Bruckner Society of America presented him with the Kilenyi Medal of Honour. The presentation took place at Jones Hall, in Houston, just before a performance of Bruckner's Symphony No. 6. The Medal of Honour was presented to Mæstro Graf by John F. Berky, Secretary of the Bruckner Society and John Proffitt, a member of the Society's board of directors who resides in Houston. Also participating in the presentation was the Orchestra's Executive Director and CEO, Mark Hanson.

During his tenure in Houston, Graf conducted performances of the Symphonies Nos. 3-4 and 6 to 9, including the sketches to the Bruckner 9th Finale. He also performed the Motet, « Ave Maria » , the Mass No. 2 and the « Te Deum » .

It is for his advocacy of Bruckner's music and his willingness to share it with American audiences that Hans Graf was chosen to receive the Kilenyi Medal of Honour.

After the concert, friends and participants enjoyed a post-concert celebration at a local restaurant.

HOUSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTATION (December 2, 2012)

Introduction by Mark Hanson, Executive Director and CEO, of the Houston Symphony Orchestra.

(Comments by John F. Berky.)

The Bruckner Society of America was founded in 1931 and its purpose, then, as it is now, is to promote a better understanding and appreciation of the music of Anton Bruckner. In 1932, the Society commissioned a medal from the Hungarian sculptor, Julio Kilenyi and, since that time, the medal has been given-out 53 times to such distinguished conductors as Arturo Toscanini, Otto Klemperer and Bernard Haitink ; each of whom played significant roles in bringing the music of Bruckner to a wider concert audience. Tonight, that honour goes to the Music Director of the Houston Symphony Orchestra, Hans Graf.

It is interesting to note that the Houston Symphony Orchestra and the Bruckner Society of America have crossed paths in the past. Sir John Barbirolli received the Kilenyi Medal at the Swansea Festival in Wales, in 1959, just 3 years before he became the music-director of the Houston Symphony Orchestra. And, on December 13 of 1948, then Music Director, Efrem Kurtz received the Medal of Honour as he presented to Houston audiences the Bruckner Symphony No. 2. That presentation took place at Houston's City Auditorium, the site today of Jones Hall, so while that presentation did not take place on this stage, it took place somewhere right nearby.

So, in a way, history repeats itself as we make this presentation before a performance of Bruckner's Symphony No. 6.

John Proffit's Comments :

I have had the privilege of watching the growth, 1st hand, of the Houston Symphony in stature and prestige over several decades, noting, in particular, the development of its well-earned reputation as one of the finest Orchestras for Bruckner and Mahler in America ... and, I believe, the world.

In 2000, Hans Graf inherited a magnificent ensemble from Christoph Eschenbach and not only carried on that tradition but grew it from strength to strength over the past 12 years. Here, in Jones Hall, we've heard Bruckner's 3rd, 4th, 7th, 8th and 9th Symphonies, along with the Mass No. 2 in E minor and the « Te Deum » . Mæstro Graf also took Bruckner to the community with additional performances of the 7th and 9th Symphonies in Houston's Co-Cathedral of the Sacred Heart. And, this past June, Graf and the Houston Symphony took Bruckner's 9th Symphony all the way to Moscow as the 1st American Orchestra to perform at Russia's Festival of World Orchestras.

We of the Bruckner Society feel that this record of achievement on the part of Mæstro Graf and the Houston Symphony exemplifies the Society's goal of promoting a better (and wider) appreciation for the music of Anton Bruckner ... and are delighted to honour him, this afternoon.

Conductor Leon Botstein receives the Bruckner Society Medal of Honour

Leon Botstein, the President of Bard College and Music Director of the American Symphony Orchestra was presented with the Bruckner Society of America's Medal of Honour at a ceremony taking place on February 24th, at the Peter Norton Symphony Space, in New York City.

The presentation was made on-stage, immediately preceding a concert performance of the Bruckner Symphony No. 8. The concert, part of the American Symphony Orchestra's « Declassifying the Classics » series included a pre-concert talk, a performance of the Symphony No. 8 in the rarely performed 1st version of 1887 and a post-concert question and answer period.

The award is was given in recognition for Mister Botstein's exemplary work in furthering the understanding and appreciation of the life and work of Anton Bruckner.

Over the past several years, Mæstro Botstein has led the American Symphony Orchestra (and other ensembles) in performances of Bruckner's Symphonies Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5 and 7. He has also given performances of Bruckner's Mass No. 3 and Bruckner's settings of Psalms 146 and 150.

The directors also noted that Mister Botstein has shared with his audiences a rich and diverse mixture of editions and versions of Bruckner's Symphonies that are not often performed.

Making the presentation were Society vice-President, William Carragan, and Secretary John F. Berky.

Conductor Stefan Sanderling is Honored with the Kilenyi Medal of Honour

THE KILENYI MEDAL OF HONOR IS AWARDED TO CONDUCTOR, STEFAN SANDERLING

A Report by Society Secretary, John F. Berky.

Since 2004, Stefan Sanderling, the Music Director of the Toledo (Ohio) Symphony Orchestra has been gradually working his way through the canon of Bruckner's Symphonies at that city's acoustically resplendent Rosary Cathedral. As of 2012, he has conducted Symphonies Nos. 3 to 9. For personal and logistical reasons, plans for a performance of the Symphony No. 2, this year, were postponed and the Symphony No. 3 was given again. For his performance, Sanderling chose the 1889 Leopold Nowak edition with certain elements of the 1877 edition added. The concert was dedicated to Stefan's father, Kurt Sanderling, the world-famous conductor who passed away recently.

The Board of Directors of the Bruckner Society of America took note of this cycle and marveled that a city the size of Toledo would pursue such a project when the only American Orchestras to have done so earlier have been the Chicago Symphony (with both Georg Solti and Daniel Barenboim ; the Minnesota Orchestra (under Stanisław Skrowaczewski) ; and the New York Philharmonic (over 50 years ago with several conductors) .

The Board voted unanimously to award the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour to Stefan Sanderling and the presentation was scheduled with the Orchestra to take place on April 15th when the annual Bruckner / Rosary Cathedral concert was to be performed.

I travelled to Toledo by train to make the presentation. Train travel in the United States is not as popular since train service is not up to the standards available in other countries. Back in the 1930's through 1950's, the auto industry in the U.S. did a remarkable job in dismantling the American mass rail and light rail systems. An intricate inter-State highway system was built and Americans became highly-reliant on automobile travel. Only in recent years have some municipalities and State governments started on the re-design of intercity light rail and the Amtrak system will hopefully follow suit. Rail travel in the United States can be wonderful but there are areas where the service is spotty and infrequent connections slow passenger progress. In this case, the price was right and I was up for the overnight rides to and from Toledo.

Robert Bell, the Past President and CEO of the Toledo Symphony served as my host. He was good enough to pick me up at the train station at 6:00 am and take me to his home where I had time to refresh and catch-up on some sleep. We arrived at the Cathedral at 3:00 pm and made plans for the presentation with Orchestra President and CEO, Kathleen Carroll. The concert was wonderful. The long acoustic delay in the cathedral dictated a leisurely tempo. Immediately after the conclusion of the Symphony, I was ushered to the podium where I was introduced and the award was presented to Mæstro Sanderling before a very appreciative and supportive audience.

After a dinner reception at the home of an Orchestra benefactor, I was returned to the train station for the return overnight trip back to Connecticut via Washington, D.C.

My thanks go out to Bob Bell, the staff of the Toledo Symphony Orchestra and the Orchestra's patrons for making my visit so comfortable. And I offer my congratulations, once again, to Mæstro Sanderling for his advocacy, artistry and leadership.

Dean Dixon Posthumously Awarded the Kilenyi Medal of Honour

After several months of searching, the Bruckner Society successfully located Roswitha Dixon, the widow of the late American conductor, Dean Dixon. After receiving this information, the Society's Board of Directors lost no time in unanimously voting to posthumously present the Society's Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour to the American conductor, Dean Dixon (1915-1976) .

In a letter addressed to Mæstro Dixon's widow, Society President Benjamin Korstvedt wrote :

« Mæstro Dixon was a path-breaking musician in many ways. He built a successful international career as an orchestral conductor and in an era when racial obstacles were even more daunting than they are today. He conducted professionally in numerous American cities and held appointments in Germany, Sweden, Israel, and Australia. His musical legacy remains alive thanks to the recordings that he made for both commercial release and with the Radio Orchestras that he led.

We salute Mæstro Dixon particularly for his commitment to the music of Anton Bruckner which, at that time, was not always easily embraced by the concert-going public. Nevertheless, he presented numerous concerts featuring Bruckner's music, not only in Europe but during his guest appearances in the United States.

In looking back over his accomplishments, the Board of Directors feels it is most fitting that the Society's Medal of Honour be presented to Dean Dixon, albeit posthumously, in recognition of his work to promote the life and music of Anton Bruckner. »

Dean Dixon was born in the Upper-Manhattan neighborhood of Harlem, in New York City, to parents who had earlier migrated from the Caribbean. He studied conducting with Albert Stoessel at the Juilliard School and Columbia University. When early pursuits of conducting engagements were stifled because of racial bias (he was African American), he formed his own Orchestra and Choral Society in 1931. In 1941, he guest-conducted the NBC Symphony Orchestra, and the New York Philharmonic during its summer season. He later guest-conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra and Boston Symphony Orchestra. In 1948, he won the Ditson Conductor's Award.

In 1949, he left the United States for the Israel Philharmonic Orchestra, which he directed during its 1950 and 1951 seasons. He was principal conductor of the Gothenburg Symphony in Sweden, from 1953 to 1960 ; the Sydney Symphony Orchestra in Australia, from 1964 to 1967 ; and the « Hessian Radio Sinfonieorchester » in Frankfurt, from 1961 to 1974. During his time in Europe, Dixon guest-conducted with the « WDR Sinfonieorchester » in Cologne, and the « Symphonieorchester des Bayerischen Rundfunks » in Munich. He also made several recordings with the Prague Symphony Orchestra for « Bärenreiter », including works of Beethoven, Brahms, Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Weber. For « Westminster Records » in the 1950's, his recordings included Symphonies and incidental music for « Rosamunde » by Schubert ; Symphonic poems of Liszt (in London) ; and Symphonies of Schumann (in Vienna) . Dean Dixon introduced the works of many American composers, such as William Grant Still, to European audiences.

During the 1968 Olympic Games, Dixon conducted the Mexican National Symphony Orchestra.

Dixon returned to the United States for guest-conducting engagements with the New York Philharmonic, Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Philadelphia Orchestra, Detroit Symphony, Milwaukee Symphony, Pittsburgh Symphony, Saint-Louis Symphony, and San Francisco Symphony in the 1970's. He also served as the conductor of the Brooklyn Philharmonic, where he gained fame for his children's concerts. He also conducted most of the major Symphony Orchestras in Europe, Asia and Latin America.

Dixon was honoured by the American Society of Composers, Authors and Publishers (ASCAP) with the Award of Merit for encouraging the participation of American youth in music. In 1948, Dixon was awarded the Alice M. Ditson award for distinguished service to American music.

Since Mrs. Dixon lives in Europe (as does Dean Dixon's daughter, Nina) and given that the award coincides with the Centenary of the conductor's birth, it was decided to ship the medal and plaque directly to Mrs. Dixon in lieu of a presentation ceremony.

In responding to the news, Mrs. Dixon wrote :

« I wish to thank you and the Board of Directors most sincerely for this act of recognition of his achievements, albeit posthumously, as a conductor who was among the 1st advocates of Bruckner's work. This month, on January 10th, 2015, was the 100th anniversary of Dean's birth and, thus, it is a near-perfect occasion to honour him with presenting this prestigious medal. I feel proud to be able to receive it in his stead and submit my humble gratitude also in the name of his daughter, Nina Dixon. »

The Bruckner Society's Medal of Honour awarded to William Carragan and Benjamin Korstvedt

The Bruckner Society of America has awarded the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour to William Carragan and Benjamin Korstvedt, in recognition of their important achievements in promoting a better understanding and appreciation of the music of the Austrian composer Anton Bruckner (1824-1896) .

The awards were presented on September 11, 2010, by John F. Berky, Secretary of the Society and Editor of the website www.abruckner.com, at a yearly gathering of Bruckner enthusiasts in Connecticut. These medals were awarded in acknowledgment of the important contributions both Carragan and Korstvedt have made to the study and performance of Bruckner's Symphonies. Both of the recipients are contributing editors with the Anton Bruckner Collected Edition, which is published by the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » of the International Bruckner Society, in Vienna. In 2005, Carragan published 2 editions of Bruckner's Symphony No. 2, including the previously-unknown 1872 version, and, in 2004, Korstvedt published the 1st critical edition of the 1888 version of the Symphony No. 4, the « Romantic » . Both scholars have also published numerous essays and studies that have shed new light on the life and work of the composer, known primarily for his large-scale Symphonies.

William Carragan is a retired professor of physics who has written extensively on Bruckner's music, with publications in « The Bruckner Journal » and elsewhere. In addition to his double edition of the 2nd Symphony, he is known for his completion of the Finale to Bruckner's 9th Symphony which the composer left in sketches when he died in October 1896. His completion was 1st performed in Carnegie Hall by the American Symphony, in 1984, and most recently performed, in 2010, at the « Ebracher Musiksommer » in Germany by the « Philharmonie Festiva » conducted by Gerd Schaller. A CD of that performance is to be released soon.

Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt is a professor of music at Clark University in Worcester, Massachusetts. In addition to his critical edition of the Symphony No. 4, which was recently released in a recording by Osmo Vanska and the Minnesota Orchestra, Professor Korstvedt is known for his path-breaking research that has led to a re-evaluation of many of Bruckner's originally published scores and revealed the depth of the politicization of Bruckner's music in the 3rd « Reich » . He is the author of a monograph on Bruckner's 8th Symphony (Cambridge University Press, 2000) , as well as scholarly articles on Bruckner published in « 19th Century Music » ; « The Musical Quarterly » ; « The Cambridge Companion to Bruckner » ; and « Bruckner Studies » , among others.

In presenting the awards, John Berky noted the major contributions that both Carragan and Korstvedt have made over the years and made particular mention of the generosity with which they have shared their insights with enthusiasts as well as the scholarly community.

The Bruckner Society honours conductor and Bruckner scholar Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs

Doctor Benjamin-Gunnar Cohrs of Bremen, Germany, is one of the latest recipients of the Bruckner Society of America's Medal of Honour. The Kilenyi Medal of Honour is given to those people who have worked diligently to foster greater understanding and appreciation of the life and work of Anton Bruckner. In recent years Doctor Cohrs has worked on a completion to the Finale of the Bruckner Symphony No. 9 and has completed a new edition of the 1st 3 movements of the 9th for the Bruckner Edition, in Vienna. In addition, Doctor Cohrs has contributed many essays on Bruckner's music to several music publications and CD productions.

The ceremony was held on Monday, May 23, 2011. Paul Hawkshaw is Professor in the Practice of Musicology and Deputy Dean at the school.

« It was wonderful to be able to present this award to Paul for his outstanding work at a time when it could be shared with his students and fellow Faculty members. » , said John F. Berky, Secretary of the Society. Berky and fellow board member, William Carragan were on hand to make the presentation at services held at Sprague Memorial Hall, on the Yale University campus. Professor Hawkshaw was honoured for his many years of research which currently includes the preparation of a critical report for Bruckner's Symphony No. 8.

Crawford Howie receives the Bruckner Society Medal of Honour

Crawford Howie, the author of « Anton Bruckner, A Documentary Biography » , was presented with the Bruckner Society of America's Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour. The presentation was made by Society President, Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, during « The Bruckner Journal » Readers Conference in Oxford, England. President Korstvedt was joined in the presentation by the Society's vice-President, William Carragan, and Secretary, John F. Berky. Korstvedt not only mentioned Howie's 2 volume biography, but also the numerous essays that he has prepared and his long standing association with « The Bruckner Journal » .

Ken Ward honoured with Bruckner Society Medal

Ken Ward, the editor of « The Bruckner Journal » , was singled-out for recognition by the Bruckner Society of America at the 2011 « Bruckner Journal » Conference held in Oxford, England, in mid-April. Board member, William Carragan made a surprise presentation during the conference. In spite of his protestations, Ken was presented with a certificate and the Kilenyi Medal of Honour for his excellent work in promoting better appreciation and understanding of the life and music of Anton Bruckner.

Bruckner Specialist John F. Berky is Awarded the Kilenyi Medal of Honour

On September 6, 2013, Bruckner Society of America President, Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt presented the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour to John F. Berky, editor of www.abruckner.com and Secretary of the Bruckner Society. The medal was presented at the opening dinner of the 2013 East-Coast « Brucknerathon » in Windsor, Connecticut. In presenting the award, President Korstvedt said :

« It is my distinct pleasure to honour John Berky, on behalf of the Board of Directors of the Bruckner Society of America, for his truly singular achievements in furthering interest in and appreciation of the music of Anton Bruckner. Through his abruckner.com website, John has created a resource that reaches a world-wide audience of many thousands of people, and shares a great deal of relevant knowledge about Bruckner, both current and historical. As you all know, that site houses not only an exhaustive discography of every Bruckner recording known to man, diligently and lovingly curated by John, but also a truly remarkable archive of scores, essays, articles, reports, and documents related to Bruckner's music.

In addition to the founding and maintenance of the abruckner.com website, we also salute John for his leading role in the revival of the Bruckner Society of America, which would never have developed so quickly and effectively, if at all, without his enterprising spirit and his great effort. He has taken the lead in the awarding of the Kilenyi Medal of Honour, including having it recast from an original he found on eBay, and has traveled to many locations all over the United States and, in England and Germany, to make public awards of the medal.

When I think of John's accomplishment, the 2 words that spring to mind are " initiative " and " entrepreneurial ". The vigor with which John took-up the 1st online Bruckner discography, which was handed over to him by its originator Lani Spahr, in 1998, was remarkable. No one would have believed that that quite useful but still humble list of recordings would become the extraordinary on-line compendium John has created. In addition, his collection of scores, documents and other resources constitutes the Bruckner Archive, which he took over from its founder David Aldeborgh, in 2011. John's constant zeal in locating new documents, recordings, as well as artifacts and souvenirs related to Bruckner and making them available to his public through the Archive, is most impressive and greatly appreciated.

Accordingly, as President of the Society, and with the enthusiastic and unanimous consent of the vice-President, Treasurer, and Board of Directors (the Secretary not being informed !) , I have the great pleasure and privilege to present to John Frederick Berky the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour of the Bruckner Society of America. »

Bruckner Society honours Susana Acra-Brache and Massimiliano Wax

In awarding the Kilenyi Medal of Honour, the Bruckner Society of America Board of Directors noted the incredible feat of producing a concert of Bruckner's music in the small country of the Dominican Republic. Bruckner's music was never performed here so there was no performing tradition, no singers fully trained in Latin pronunciation nor instrumentalists familiar with Bruckner's scores. In addition, the funds necessary would have to be raised from companies and individuals with little knowledge of this music. All of this required a gifted impresario, a skillful marketing campaign and a music-director who could pull these divergent forces into a concert event that would present, the « Requiem », the « Ave Maria » and the « Te Deum ». The resulting concert (in one of the oldest churches in the Western Hemisphere) was an heroic and historical event where everyone in attendance felt that a small miracle had just occurred. The concert, now available on CD and DVD, was front page news in the Dominican Republic and all this is ample evidence of what 2 gifted and driven people can do. For their efforts and their results, the Board of Directors awards producer, Massimiliano Wax and conductor, Susana Acra-Brache with the Kilenyi Medal of Honour.

Mark Kluge receives the Bruckner Society's Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour

Music annotator and scholar, Mark Kluge has been awarded the Bruckner Society of America's highest honour : the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour. Mister Kluge is best known for his insightful and well-researched essays that have accompanied recordings released by « Music and Arts » and « Warner Classics ». Some of the best examples of his work can be found in the Hans Knappertsbusch box-set (M&A 1256) ; the Volkmar Andreæ Bruckner box-set (M&A 1227) ; the Bruno Walter / Bruckner 4th and 9th (M&A 1262) ; and the Frederick Charles Adler box-set (M&A 1283) .

In presenting the award, Bruckner Society President, Benjamin Marcus Korstvedt, stated :

« The Board is awarding the Kilenyi Medal to you in recognition of your important, indeed path-breaking, work as a historian of Bruckner recordings and performance styles. The many exemplary essays you have contributed to various periodicals and those that have enriched numerous important re-issues of Classic Bruckner recordings by Furtwängler, Knappertsbusch, Jochum, Walter, Adler, and Andreæ are models of lucidity in prose and thought. These writings, which are scrupulous in their accuracy and draw upon the latest scholarship, have done much to educate the music-loving public about the often complex issues that surround Bruckner editions and performance practices. For this, the Bruckner community owes you both admiration and gratitude. »

Martin G. Dumler (1868-1958)

Martin G. Dumler's long and distinguished life embraced the cultural community of Cincinnati and the nation. He combined success in business with the artistic pursuits of painting and composing.

He was born in Cincinnati on December 22, 1868. Music captured his interest early and, as a boy, he sang in the church choir. His 1st musical instruction came from Professor H. Steinfeld, the organist at Saint-Joseph's Church. This instruction included violin and piano.

In 1883, Dumler became a « $ 4 a week » office boy for Chatfield and Woods Sack Company. By 1929, he was president of the company. While making his way to the top of Chatfield and Woods, Dumler found time, in 1888, to visit the musical centers of Europe and, in 1890, to begin his studies at the Cincinnati College of Music. He studied voice with Tecla Vigna and Lino Mattioli and composition with Almon W. Vincent and Doctor Nicholas J. Elsenheimer. Dumler graduated in 1901. In 1924, the College presented him with its 1st honorary Master of Music degree. 10 years later, the College bestowed upon him with an honorary Doctor of Music.

Dumler's compositions were primarily settings of sacred texts. In 1927, the Society of Saint-Gregory of America recommended his « Missa Latreutica », Opus 10, as a model of Catholic liturgical music. That same year, Xavier University presented him with an honorary Doctor of Laws. In 1932, Dumler became President of the Bruckner Society of America. His orchestral work « 4 Ballet Scenes » received the 1944 Sachs Prize from the Institute of Fine-Arts, in Cincinnati.

Dumler's association with the University of Cincinnati was an active one. He served on UC's board of directors for 30 years ; 12 as chairman. He was also vice-President of the merged College-Conservatory of Music.

Dumler wrote orchestral and chamber music, but his sacred music brought him the most recognition. Several of his Masses and Motets have become part of the permanent repertoire of leading choirs in this country and in Europe. His devotion to sacred music went beyond the act of composition. He was a choir member of Saint-François de Sales Church for more than 40 years.

Dumler was also widely known for his oil paintings, which have been exhibited in many American art museums. He was an honorary life member of both the Cincinnati Art Club and the Cincinnati Art Museum. In 1946, he was named to the advisory board of the International Fine-Arts Council, in New York.

Dumler died in Cincinnati on October 19, 1958 at the age of 90.

When Mr. Dumler was elected « Chairman » of the Bruckner Society of America, the following was written in « Chord and Discord » :

« On January 31, 1932, Doctor Martin G. Dumler, M. M. , of Cincinnati, Ohio, was elected Honorary Chairman of the Bruckner Society of America. For many years a prominent American composer of sacred music and at present vice-President of the College of Music of Cincinnati, Doctor Dumler is deeply devoted to Bruckner's art. His regard for that Master's music dates back to 1889 when he 1st heard some of Bruckner's works performed in Vienna. Ever since that time, he has left no stone unturned in his efforts to bring about American performances of Bruckner. He not only did much to bring about the 1st American performance of Bruckner's F minor Mass, which took place in Saint-François de Sales Church, Cincinnati, on July 15, 1900, but actually took part as one of the singers. In 1907, he became personally acquainted with Gustav Mahler, in whose genius he has been a firm believer ever since. As a member of the Board of Directors of the Cincinnati May Festival Association, he made the suggestion last year which led to the inclusion of Mahler's " Symphony of a Thousand " on the Festival program. The Executive Committee of the Bruckner Society of America wishes to express to Doctor Dumler its appreciation of his acceptance of the Honorary Chairmanship left vacant by the late Mrs. Lanier. »

Another thread here led me to look-up something in « The Cæcilia » , where I discovered the name of Martin G. Dumler of Cincinnati on the list of (regular) contributors. I don't think I had seen or heard that name in over half a Century. But I immediately recalled that, at about age 11 or 12 (which is even more than half a Century past) , I sang, in the junior choir at the Bedford, Indiana, Methodist Church, in an anthem by Dumler, arranged (I think) for Adult, High-School, and Junior Choirs by the choir director, Donald D. Dawson (who was on the Indiana University Music School faculty) . The anthem had the text of the hymn « O God, our help in ages past » (but not the tune) - I even recall the opening melody after this long time has elapsed. As a child raised in the Methodist church, I had no idea that Dumler was actually a Roman Catholic whose main choral compositional output was for the Catholic church (he composed several Masses) . I found a list of his published compositions, but the anthem I sang, as a child, was not on the list, and I recall that we sang from some sort of manuscript copy, so I assume the work was never published.

Does anyone else have any other information about Dumler other than what is available in old issues of « The Cæcilia » or by Googling « Martin G. Dumler » ? ... if so, I would be interested to learn what else is known about him and his music.

...

I grew-up in the 1940's and 1950's at Saint-Francis de Sales Church, in Cincinnati (Ohio) , where Martin G. Dumler attended and many of his Catholic works (Masses and Motets) were performed. At the age of 13, I met him after a piano recital (he was in his upper 80's) , and my family lived across the street from him and his wife Pearl, for about a year, although we didn't socialize. I sang in the church choir under his direction for 2 Christmas Midnight Masses, performing a lot of his compositions, probably 1956 and 1957. Also, I have in my file a number of his Motets and Masses (« Missa Latreutica » , « Missa Coelestis » , etc.) , some of which I heard performed under his direction. Also, have a copy of his « Stabat Mater » which was once performed by the Cincinnati May Festival Chorus. His music was nicely constructed and tuneful, a lot of it composed for the Catholic liturgy. Parts of his « Christmas Prelude » for orchestra still ring in my memory, and his « Cradle Song » for strings was available in an organ arrangement which I have.

...

I wonder if he is related to Donald Dumler (perhaps, his grandfather or great-uncle ?) , who is one of the organists at Saint-Patrick's Cathedral, in NYC.

Charles L. Eble (1915-2009)

Charles L. Eble, the editor of « Chord and Discord », the music journal of the Bruckner Society of America, died in Iowa, on February 25, 2009, at the age of 93. He was a founding member of the Bruckner Society of America when it was established in 1931. He was the President of the Society and Editor of « Chord and Discord » when it published its last issue, in 1969.

The Society promoted the music of Anton Bruckner and Gustav Mahler. It also commissioned the striking of medals by the artist, Julio Kilenyi (1885-1959) to honour organizations and individuals who helped promote these 2 composers.

The following was taken from the obituary of the Iowa City « Press-Citizen » :

« Charlie, as he was known to his family and friends, earned a B.A. degree in music, in 1940, from the University of Iowa. While in school, he served as personal secretary to School of Music Director Philip Greeley Clapp. After World War II, Charlie did graduate work in English at the University of Iowa and taught briefly at Northwestern University. He returned to Iowa City, in 1950, to purchase the community's only sheet music store. During the next several years, he accompanied Professor Himie Voxman on trips to European libraries and music shops ; these visits enabled Charlie to make many valuable contacts with sheet music and book publishers. Charlie's remarkable knowledge of Classical music repertoire, his uncanny ability to locate hard-to-find editions, and his commitment to customer service were important ingredients in his entrepreneurial success. He built Eble Music Company into a thriving, internationally recognized business, which he owned for almost 40 years until his retirement in 1989. »

Charles L. Eble Memorial Concert given in Iowa

Bruckner in Iowa

A recollection of a memorable event by John F. Berky (Editor, abruckner.com) .

Bruckner performances are rare occurrences in the United States (although the trend is improving), and they have literally been unheard in the State of Iowa - until now.

For those of you unfamiliar with Iowa and its geographic location, it is located in the center of the continental United States and is on the Eastern edge of the region known as the Great Plains. The Great Plains is a vast area with wide horizons and some of the most fertile soil on the planet. It covers 11 of Mid-western States and parts of central Canada. The Mississippi River marks Iowa's Eastern boundary. During the summer, it is not uncommon to see fields of corn extending to the horizon in all directions. Farming is a big business, here.

This is not to say that Iowa is a cultural « backwater ». The State boasts some of the largest Universities in the country with strong music programs. The University of Iowa and Iowa State University both have 30,000 students and most of the elementary and secondary schools have music education programs in place as well.

But vast farms and rural settings are not conducive to the staging of large scale cultural events and it is a rare occurrence for the Orchestras in Iowa to program anything as ambitious as a Bruckner Symphony. So, it was with a great deal of pleasure that the Bruckner Society of America was able to sponsor a Bruckner concert in 2 different cities.

If you have read some of the information on abruckner.com , you will know that the Bruckner Society of America, originally founded in 1931, was recently re-activated after ceasing most activity in 1998. From 1960 until the cessation of activities, the Bruckner Society was head-quartered in Iowa City. The President of the Society was Charles L. Eble, the proprietor of Eble Music. Charles Eble passed away in 2009 but thanks to the help of David Hempel, the present owner of Eble Music and the executor of Mister Eble's Estate, the Bruckner Society was re-activated and existing funds were allocated into several categories :

The digitalization of all past Bruckner Society publications including the journal, « Chord and Discord » , and the writings of Gabriel Engel.

The re-casting of the Julio Kilenyi Medal of Honour to be given to those people who have furthered an appreciation of the life and music of Anton Bruckner.

The publication (upcoming) of a brochure that re-addresses the issue of Bruckner's Symphonies and the various performing versions - making use of information that has come to light since the publication of Robert Simpson's booklet, « The Bruckner Versions Simplified » .

The audio restoration of the 1924 Oskar Fried recording of the Bruckner Symphony No. 7 correcting pitch errors that have plagued earlier offerings. This CD is available for sale for $ 30.00 as a membership incentive and fundraiser for the Society.

A small budget to sustain the Society as it starts its operations.

The funding of a memorial concert in memory of Charles L. Eble.

It is this final project that took place over the weekend of February 10 and 11th of 2012.

The pair of performances were given by Orchestra Iowa and the presentations took place at Sinclair Auditorium, in Cedar Rapids, and at West High-School, in Iowa City. The concert consisted of a single work : Bruckner's Symphony No. 5. The conductor was the Orchestra's Music Director, Timothy Hankewich.

Back in June of 2008, Cedar Rapids was hit with a devastating flood where the Mississippi River rose over 31 feet above its normal water level. The 500 year flood plain was breached and the entire downtown commercial area was submerged. The Orchestra's home, the historic Paramount Theatre was completely flooded and is now under reconstruction. In spite of these enormous set-backs, the Orchestra and its music-director were ready and willing to take on their 1st encounter with the music of Anton Bruckner.

My air travel and airport arrival were uneventful. I was to be met by one of the Orchestra players and taken to his home. When I saw someone standing at the arrival area holding-up a sign that read « BRUCKNER », I knew I had found my man. I was like a moth attracted to a flame.

The Friday night concert took place in Cedar Rapids. After a brief pre-concert presentation, where I had an opportunity to explain the significance of this concert and the music to the audience, I settled into the audience for what was a remarkable performance. Timothy Hankewich repeatedly referred to himself as a « Bruckner Virgin ». It was his 1st time conducting Bruckner's music. But his fresh approach made for some fresh insights and he made excellent use of tempo variation to provide an ebb and flow to the music. There were times, most notably in the massive Finale, where the music slowed to focus on some of the minute orchestral inter-changes and, then, as the music gathered force, the tempos would accelerate rapidly.

The 5th Symphony is clearly a Symphony that tests the endurance of any Orchestra. The strings rarely rest for 80 minutes and the brass section is driven to exhaustion during the rousing Finale and pity the poor Orchestra where the brass section runs-out of steam in the final moments. If the Orchestra can't mount that final peak, it can undermine all that came before it. Happily, the corn-fed brass section was up for the challenge and they brought the Symphony to a rousing conclusion.

But, upon reflection, it may not have been corn that nourished these stoic players. It may have been hops. After the concert, many of us gathered at the Orchestra's lounge adjacent to their soon-to-be-renovated theatre. There, I discovered that an Orchestra trumpet player was also a local brewer. As I watched the player leave the lounge carrying an empty beer keg, I knew for sure that I wasn't in Connecticut and I thought that I might have stumbled upon the reason for the Orchestra's stamina.

The 2nd performance took place on Saturday night, in Iowa City. Consistency was evident in that there was not much variation in the presentation. Having a full performance under their belt, some of the playing was more assured, but due to the way that many musicians play in different Orchestras on different days, there were several new members to the brass section but they performed admirably.

This was a very enjoyable and successful venture. The great work of Charles L. Eble was recognized by 2 excellent Bruckner performances. In addition, I had an opportunity to finally meet David Hempel who was so instrumental in the initiative to revive the Bruckner Society of America. Finally, we used the opportunity to convene the annual meeting of the Bruckner Society and to set our sights on some goals for the year ahead.

Julio Kilenyi (1885-1959)

From « Chord and Discord » , Volume 1, Number 4 (October, 1933) :

« Recently, a distinguished member of the Bruckner Society, the American sculptor, Mister Julio Kilenyi of New York, wishing to give formal expression to his great love for the Master's music, designed an exclusive Medal of Honour displaying his own conception of Bruckner's features. A photograph of this design was immediately sent to Austria where leading members of the I.B.G. (International Bruckner Society) hailed it as the most impressive portrait of the Master that has as yet appeared. So delighted was Professor Max Auer with it that he at once requested permission to include it among the illustrations in the 4th Volume of the monumental Göllerich-Auer biography of Bruckner, then in the press.

The hearty European welcome accorded this initial American contribution to the iconography of the great Symphonist should be a source of deep gratification not only to our native Bruckner enthusiasts but also to all American lovers of the plastic arts. Mister Kilenyi's triumphant solution of a difficult problem in this by-path of music follows a long line of sculptural successes in more worldly, more glamorous walks. Among his many creations are the designs for exclusive medals officially awarded to Colonel Lindbergh, Admiral Byrd, Thomas A. Edison, General Pershing, President Coolidge, and many other outstanding figures in the cultural, industrial, and political life of this country. Perhaps, the most distinguished among his recent designs is the William Penn Anniversary Medal, replicas of which were presented to their Majesties, King George and Queen Mary of England, and Queen Wilhelmina of Holland.

This year (1933-1934) , for the 1st time, the Bruckner Society will be able to present its own Medal of Honour, the one designed by Mister Kilenyi for that exclusive purpose. It will be awarded during the current musical season to Arturo Toscanini and Bruno Walter of the New York Philharmonic ; Doctor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony ; Doctor Frederick Stock of the Chicago Symphony ; and Doctor Martin G. Dumler of Cincinnati, Honorary Chairman of the Society.

When asked for the source of his Bruckner inspiration, Mister Kilenyi made the following interesting reply :

“ Listening to Bruckner's music has always seemed to me like reading Dante's poetry. There is in the work of these 2 great geniuses the same grand spirit. It is this conception that I sought to portray on the Society's new, exclusive Medal of Honour. It only requires a single glance to discover the Dantesque expression of my Bruckner. ” »

From « Chord and Discord » , Volume 2, Number 9 (1960) - In Memoriam Julio Kilenyi :

« Julio Kilenyi (1886-1959) was born in Hungary. Before his departure for Argentina, at the age of 21, he had studied in Budapest, Paris, and Berlin. When he was 30 years old, he came to the United States and became a citizen 8 years later.

A sculptor of wide renown, he created among others the designs for the William Penn Anniversary Medal, for medals officially awarded to Colonel Lindbergh, Thomas A. Edison, President Coolidge, General Pershing, Admiral Byrd, and for medals commemorating the opening of the George Washington Bridge and the Lincoln Tunnel. Plaques and medals by Kilenyi are exhibited at the Metropolitan Museum of Art ; the Cleveland Museum of Art ; Boston Fine-Arts Museum ; Smithsonian Institute ; British Museum ; Oxford University ; The Franklin D. Roosevelt Library ; and the Vatican Museum. Prizes were awarded to him by the Allied Artists of America and the 10th Olympiad Committee of Los Angeles, among others.

Julio Kilenyi was active in “ The Bruckner Society of America ” for a quarter of a Century. At the time of his death, he was an Executive Member, Director and vice-President. In 1933, he designed the Bruckner Medal of Honour for the exclusive use of the Society. 2 years later, he designed the Mahler Medal of Honour to commemorate the 75th anniversary of Mahler's birth. This Medal was also made for the Society's exclusive use. The medals are awarded for outstanding effort to further interest in and appreciation of the music of Anton Bruckner. By creating these designs, Julio Kilenyi has made a contribution of lasting value to the Bruckner movement. »

David Aldeborgh, the founder of the U.S. Bruckner Archive and Bruckner record producer passed away on 15 January 2016. David was a strong advocate for the music of Anton Bruckner. During his career, he helped to fund the commercial releases of the Music of Saint Florian Period albums, a 1st recording of the « Volksfest » Finale to the Symphony No. 4, and the Finale completion of the Symphony No. 9 prepared by William Carragan.

He helped to prepare scores for several of Bruckner's lesser-known choral works in preparation for their 1st recordings.

Several of David's essays on Bruckner can be found in the « Articles and Essays » section of abruckner.com website.

David wrote an essay in January of 1995 providing an interesting perspective and also providing information from Charles Frederick Adler's widow. The essay exists in 2 versions.

For his tireless efforts, David received the Bruckner Society's Kilenyi Medal of Honor in 2011.

It is with deep love that we say good-bye to our dear David Aldeborgh, our friend, uncle, brother, mentor, advocate and purveyor of wisdom without judgment. David possessed remarkable gifts that all who knew him respected and revered. Thoughtful and articulate in his speech, heartfelt and lucid in his correspondence, he was given to reaching out to others with support, empathy or simple meaningful dialogue. He was a champion of the performing and visual arts as well as a tirelessly civic-minded participant in the Poughkeepsie community.

David was born in Poughkeepsie on July 8, 1928, the son of Erik and Signe Aldeborgh. He attended Choate and graduated from Trinity College with a BA in Art History. He served in the Coast Guard.

In 1973, after working along side his father for many years at the Standard Gage Company, David became Chairman of the Board. He designed and held patents for many of the company's gages and was an admired with affection by the employees.

David also served as Chairman on the City Planning Board for 16 years, devoting 18 years overall, from 1978 to 1996. He patiently prepared for and participated in over 500 meetings. One City Councilman « marveled at Aldeborgh's fairness and coolness under pressure. David was always a gentleman. »

As President of the Hudson Valley Philharmonic Society, David took pride in not only the high-caliber of the orchestra itself but also the people who put countless hours into the many administrative chores.

Chosen for his experience and interest in the arts, David was named a Trustee for the proposed Mid-Hudson Civic Center during its early development.

In 2011, The Bruckner Society of America (composer, Anton Bruckner) bestowed their highest-honour, the Joseph Kilenyi Medal of Honor, on David for his « exemplary work in furthering the understanding and appreciation of the life and work of Anton Bruckner. The board noted your strong advocacy, your recordings and the many essays that you have prepared during your illustrious career. » He shares this honour with such luminaries of music as Arturo Toscanini and Otto Klemperer. For many years, David maintained the Bruckner Archive.

David was a member of Saint-Joseph's Church and also attended Saint-Mary's Church.

He spent the last 4 years in Southampton close to his niece Dean Andrews.

The Hungarian born American sculptor and medallic artist, Julio Kilenyi, crafted both the Bruckner and Mahler medals for the Bruckner Society of America. He was born on 21 February 1885 in Arad, Romania ; and died on 29 January 1959. In 1909 he moved from Hungary to Buenos Aires. Later, he moved to New York.

...

Many Hungarian immigrants to the United States have made significant contributions to their adopted homeland in a variety of fields. Some of the best-known among them are scientists Leo Szilard and Edward Teller, publisher Joseph Pulitzer, musicians Eugene Ormandy, George Szell and Edouard Remenyi, a number of religious leaders, and a multitude of film directors, actors and sundry performers. Artists, however, with the possible exception of László Moholy-Nagy and André Kertesz, aren't well-known to the general public. Yet, in the 1st half of the 20th Century, more than 2 dozen sculptors, painters, illustrators, and photographers from Hungary not only enjoyed widespread recognition and commercial success but also played a conspicuous role in capturing and preserving famous American personages and historical events for posterity in oil, watercolor, marble, bronze, wood and other media. They created an incredible number of Masterpieces, garnered a vast host of awards and honours, and are represented in museums, galleries and private collections throughout the world.

Born in the city of Arad on February 21, 1885, Kilenyi was the son of a businessman. Following studies at the Royal Art School at Budapest, he went abroad to attend Art academies in Germany and France. Like Alexander Finta, Kilenyi emigrated to South America early in life but, in his case, the destination was Argentina. He arrived in 1907 and left for the United States, in 1916, becoming a naturalized citizen, in 1924. Upon coming to the United States, Kilenyi settled in New York City and remained a life-long resident.

Kilenyi was particularly renowned for commemorative plaques and medals.

In 1928, Kilenyi did a 4 feet high and 2 feet wide bronze tablet, in memory of John Campbell Greenway, one of Yale University's most famous football and baseball players, a Rough Rider and close friend of Theodore Roosevelt, and a general during World War I.

His 1930 medal commemorating the 50th anniversary of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers symbolizes the engineer and his past and present achievements.

Working around the clock, a year later, Kilenyi completed a bronze plaque commemorating the record flight around the world by Wiley Post and Harry Gatty. The plaque was presented to the fliers during a gala dinner at the Hotel Astor. With Gatty as navigator, Post circumnavigated the globe in a record time of 8 days. In 1933, he made the 1st solo flight around the world. Sadly, Post didn't live long to enjoy his triumphs. On August 15, 1935, his plane, with close friend Will Rogers, the humorist, on board, crashed on take-off, killing both of them.

Previously, Kilenyi designed medals to commemorate the flight of Charles A. Lindbergh aboard « The Spirit of Saint-Louis » and Rear Admiral Richard Byrd's polar flights of 1926 and 1930. Other famous Americans depicted on Kilenyi's creations include Thomas A. Edison, Calvin Coolidge, Herbert Hoover, Mark Twain, and General John A. Pershing.

The medal commemorating the 150th anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill was among his most noteworthy efforts. For his execution of the official poster and medal for the Olympic Games held in Los Angeles, in 1932, Kilenyi was presented with a medal from the 10th Olympiad Committee of the city.

4 of the 5 boroughs of New York City are on islands and are connected to each other as well as the New Jersey shoreline across the Hudson River by bridges and tunnels. Opened in 1931, as the longest suspension bridge in the world, the George Washington Bridge, the only bridge across the Hudson River in New York City, has been described by the great Le Corbusier as the most beautiful in the world. Also opened in 1931, the Bayonne Bridge, which spans the Kill van Kull between Staten Island and Bayonne, New Jersey, was the longest steel arch bridge in the world.

The Port Authority, the public agency formed by the States of New York and New Jersey, appointed Kilenyi to execute the commemorative medals for both bridges.

The designs drew praise from the numismatic world and the general public. Therefore, it wasn't much of a surprise that the design of the souvenir bronze medal in connection with the opening of another Port Authority project, in 1937, namely the Lincoln Tunnel under the Hudson River, was entrusted to Kilenyi. The medal bears the head of Abraham Lincoln on one side while the reverse depicts the westerly entrance to the tunnel.

The Port Authority was very pleased with all of his creations ; it ordered as many as 10,000 of his medals struck at one time.

When Kilenyi was retained to design a medal symbolizing the friendship between the United States and Poland, he put the likeness of Ignace Jan Paderewski, Poland most famous living personage on one side. Because Paderewski was unable to sit for him and photos and drawings of him were found wanting, Kilenyi watched « Moonlight Sonata » (a movie featuring the famous pianist) to capture as accurately as possible the features of his subject.

Paderewski, the foremost pianist of his age and an inspiration to Polish nationalism, was a leading figure in the restoration of Poland following World War I. When his country was invaded, at the beginning of World War II, he joined the Polish government, in exile in France, and came to the United States in late 1940. Already suffering from poor health, he spent his final days at the Buckingham Hotel in mid-Manhattan and died there on June 29, 1941. A plaque on the outside near the building's main entrance recalls the residency and death of the renowned piano virtuoso.

Julio was by no means the only famous Kilenyi in America at the time. Edward, his brother, also enjoyed widespread respect and fame in the United States, but in a different field, that being music. Educated in Hungary and later in Italy and Germany, he came to America in 1908. Settling in New York City and continuing his studies, he obtained a Master's degree in music from Columbia University, in 1915. He taught at Columbia and, at the same time, also gave private lessons. One of his star pupils was George Gershwin, already a recognized composer. Edward Kilenyi instructed Gershwin in instrumentation, composition and harmony, from 1919 to 1921. He also became deeply involved with music for Hollywood movies and, in that capacity, he supervised the musical scores of numerous films, including Abie's Irish Rose. Incidentally, his son Edward Junior, was also an outstanding musician. Early in his career, he was dubbed by some as a « young Paderewski » and, later, was on the faculty of Florida State University for many years.

Surrounded by a throng of some 200 people, Kermit Roosevelt 3rd, 10 year old great-grandson of President Theodore Roosevelt, unveiled Kilenyi's bronze portrait plaque of his illustrious ancestor at the entrance of the Theodore Roosevelt Memorial Park in Oyster Bay Harbor, on September 5, 1948.

From 1949 to 1955, Kilenyi was art director for the L. G. Balfour Co. , a jewelry manufacturing firm headquartered in Attleboro, Massachusetts. In 1951, he designed an impressive medallion in bronze commemorating the 100th anniversary of « Fruit of the Loom » textiles.

Kilenyi died on January 29, 1959. Among the professional organizations he held membership were the National Sculpture Society, the Architectural League of New York, Allied Artists of America, Audobon Artists, and the American Numismatic Society. His creations can be found in prestigious museums throughout the world.

Erich Leinsdorf

Le pianiste et chef d'orchestre autrichien Erich Leinsdorf (né Erich J. Landauer) est né d'une famille juive le 4 février 1912 et est mort le 11 septembre 1993 à Zürich, en Suisse.

Leinsdorf obtint son diplôme de chef d'orchestre en 1933 et fut l'assistant de Bruno Walter en 1934, puis d'Arturo Toscanini de 1935 à 1938 au Festival de Salzbourg, année de l' « Anschluß » , où il dut quitter sa patrie à cause de ses origines juives. Il fit une grande carrière aux États-Unis, notamment au « Metropolitan Opera » de New York, où est nommé responsable du répertoire allemand en 1939. Là, il se consacre notamment aux Opéras de Richard Wagner, en particulier « Tristan und Isolde » , « Die Walküre » , « Lohengrin » , avec des distributions historiques, réunissant les plus grands chanteurs wagnériens de l'époque : Lauritz Melchior, Lotte Lehmann, Friedrich Schorr, Kirsten Flagstad, Alexander Kipnis, Astrid Varnay, Emanuel List, Marjorie Lawrence, Kerstin Thorborg, Helen Traubel. En 1942, il adopte la nationalité américaine. Il dirigea aussi les Orchestres de Cleveland (1943-1945) et de Rochester (1947-1956) , avant de succéder, en 1962, à Charles Münch à la tête du prestigieux Orchestre symphonique de Boston. De 1978 à 1980, il fut à la tête de l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio de Berlin, poursuivant une carrière de chef-invité à travers les États-Unis et l'Europe.

Erich Leinsdorf était considéré comme un spécialiste de l'Opéra et sa discographie volumineuse contient nombre d'œuvres dramatiques de Giacomo Puccini (« La Bohème » , « Tosca » , « Madama Butterfly » , « Il Tabarro » , «

Turandot ») ; Richard Wagner (« Lohengrin » , « Die Walküre » , « Tristan und Isolde » , « Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg ») ; Richard Strauß (« Salome » , « Ariadne auf Naxos ») ; Giuseppe Verdi (« Un Bal masqué » , « Macbeth » , « Aïda ») ; et Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart (« Le nozze di Figaro » , « Così fan tutte » , « Don Giovanni ») , ainsi que des Opéras de Peter Cornelius (« Der Barbier von Bagdad ») et Erich Wolfgang Korngold (« Die tote Stadt ») . Mais il a également enregistré des Symphonies d'Anton Bruckner (, Sergueï Prokofiev, Franz Schmidt et Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. Ses enregistrements lyriques « en direct » gardent une flamme et une énergie vive qu'il n'eut pas toujours en studio.

The Austrian-born American pianist and conductor Erich Leinsdorf (born Erich J. Landauer) was born to a Jewish family on 4 February 1912 in Vienna, and died on 11 September 1993 in Zürich, Switzerland. He performed and recorded with leading Orchestras and Opera companies throughout the United States and Europe, earning a reputation for exacting standards as well as an acerbic personality. He also published books and essays on musical matters.

Leinsdorf was studying music at a local school in Vienna by the age of 5. He played the cello and studied composition. In his teens, Leinsdorf worked as a piano accompanist for singers. He studied conducting at the « Mozarteum » in Salzburg and, later, at the University of Vienna and the Vienna Academy of Music. From 1934 to 1937, he worked as an assistant to the noted conductors Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini at the Salzburg Festival.

In November 1937, Leinsdorf travelled to the United States to take-up a position as assistant conductor at the Metropolitan Opera in New York City. As it turned-out, his departure from Austria came a few short months ahead of the « Anschluß » of March 1938, when the country was taken-over by Nazi Germany. With the assistance of freshman Representative from Texas, Lyndon B. Johnson, he was able to stay in the United States, and became a naturalized American citizen in 1942.

While at the « Met » , Leinsdorf was particularly noted for his Wagner performances ; after the sudden death of Artur Bodanzky in 1939, he was named the « Met » 's « head of German repertoire » . From 1943, he had a brief 3 year post as Music Director of the Cleveland Orchestra, but was absent for much of this tenure because he was drafted into the United States Armed Forces for World War II ; the Orchestra did not renew Leinsdorf's contract. Many years later, in the transition in Cleveland from Lorin Maazel to Christoph von Dohnányi, between 1982 and 1984, Leinsdorf returned to lead several concerts ; Leinsdorf described his role as « the bridge between the regimes » .

Leinsdorf was the principal conductor of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra, from 1947 to 1955. He came to despair of what he saw as Rochester's insular musical culture, famously remarking that :

« Rochester is the best disguised dead-end in the world ! »

Subsequently, he was briefly head of the New York City Opera, before resuming his association with the « Met » . In 1962, he was named music-director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His time in Boston would produce many recordings for « RCA » , but was also marked by controversy, as he occasionally clashed with musicians and administrators.

On November 22, 1963, during a Boston Symphony concert, Leinsdorf had to announce the reports of President John F. Kennedy's assassination in Dallas, Texas, to a shocked audience. He and the Orchestra followed the news with a performance of the Funeral March from Beethoven's 3rd Symphony (« Eroica ») . In 1969, Leinsdorf left his Boston post. He would continue to guest-conduct Operas and Orchestras around the world for the next 2 decades, being particularly associated with the Metropolitan Opera and the New York Philharmonic. He also served, from 1978 to 1980, as principal conductor of the (West) Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra. He died of cancer in Zürich, Switzerland, at the age of 81.

His notable students include John Ferritto.

Leinsdorf is also known for his arrangement of a suite from Claude Debussy's Opera « Pelléas et Mélisande » .

Leinsdorf made numerous recordings throughout his career, including some 78rpm discs for « Columbia Records » with the Cleveland Orchestra. He made a number of recordings with the Los Angeles Philharmonic for « Capitol Records » . In the 1950's, he was conductor for a series of complete stereophonic Opera recordings made in Rome, beginning with Puccini's « Tosca » with Zinka Milanov, Jussi Björling, and Leonard Warren for « RCA Victor » . He continued to record for « RCA Victor » as music-director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Later, he again made additional Operatic recordings, including the 1st complete stereo recording of Erich Wolfgang Korngold's « Die tote Stadt » , with Carol Neblett and René Kollo. Leinsdorf conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra with pianist Arthur Rubinstein in pianist's 2nd complete recording of Beethoven's Piano Concertos, Brahms' 1st Piano Concerto, and Tchaïkovsky's 1st Piano Concerto.

Erich Leinsdorf with the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared regularly on local broadcasts from WGBH-TV. On August 17, 1967, Leinsdorf conducted the BSO in a 2 hour primetime special telecast in colour on NBC, a reflection of the days when a commercial network would periodically broadcast a full-length Classical concert. The program, entitled « An Evening at Tanglewood » , featured the young violinist Itzhak Perlman as guest-soloist.

Quotes

« Ladies and gentlemen, we have a press report over the wires (we hope that it is unconfirmed, but we have to doubt it) that the President of the United States has been the victim of an assassination. (Gasps from audience.) We will play the “ Funeral March ” from Beethoven's 3rd Symphony. »

(Erich Leinsdorf informing the audience at a BSO performance at Symphony Hall and over WGBH radio of the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, November 22, 1963.)

Erich Leinsdorf was one of the most respected (if not always well-liked) European-born conductors and music-directors to achieve prominence in America after World War II. He was an acclaimed Operatic conductor, whose recordings of « Turandot » and « Madama Butterfly » from the late-1950's remain among the most popular in the catalog ; his reputation as a conductor of orchestral music hasn't survived quite as well.

He was born Erich J. Landauer in Vienna and, by the age of 5, was enrolled in a local music school. He studied music at the University of Vienna and the Vienna Conservatory, making his conducting debut at the « Musikvereinsaal » upon graduation. Leinsdorf became the assistant conductor of the « Workers' Chorus » in Vienna, in 1933, and 1 year later, successfully auditioned before Bruno Walter and Arturo Toscanini at the Salzburg Festival, where he was appointed Toscanini's assistant.

Leinsdorf's American debut took place at the Metropolitan Opera when he conducted Richard Wagner's « Die Walküre » , on January 21, 1938. His success with Wagnerian Operas led to his appointment at the « Met » , in 1939, as head of the company's German repertoire. While at the « Met » , he began to develop a reputation as a strict task-Master, requiring increased rehearsal time from his singers and extremely precise fidelity to the written score from musicians ; although audiences generally appreciated the results, many of the performers he worked with resented his demands.

He took American citizenship in 1942. The following year, he was appointed music-director of the Cleveland Orchestra, but was soon inducted into the United States Army. Discharged in 1944, he returned to the « Met » . During 1945 and 1946, he also conducted the Cleveland Orchestra on several occasions, and returned to Europe where, as one of a group of major Austrian-born conductors who had no connections with the Nazis, he was engaged to conduct the Vienna Philharmonic. He found his reception in his home city, destitute in the immediate wake of World War II, to be less than entirely cordial.

By 1947, Leinsdorf was back in the United States as music-director of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra in up-State New York, a post he held until 1955. Leinsdorf served as music-director of the New York City Opera for part of 1956, before returning to the « Met » as a conductor and musical consultant. In 1962, Leinsdorf acceded to one of the most prestigious musical posts in America, succeeding Charles Münch as music-director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Leinsdorf's tenure at Boston was extremely productive, but stormy. He found the political considerations of a music directorship (juggling the demands of individual musicians, their Unions and existing work and rehearsal rules, and the Board of Directors) to be a distraction from his musical goals. Leinsdorf also became known for open criticism his musicians' educational short-comings, and of errors made by his fellow conductors and by editors of musical scores.

He resigned the Boston post with the 1968-1969 season, happy, in his own words, to have exited with his health intact. Leinsdorf conducted Opera and concert performances throughout the United States and Europe, for the next 2 decades. In 1978, he took-up his 1st permanent post in Europe, becoming principal conductor of the Berlin Radio Symphony Orchestra, a post he held until 1980. In 1976, he published « Cadenza : A Musical Career » , a memoir as notable for its candid, brutally honest assessments of himself and his fellow musicians as for its biographical contents.

Erich Leinsdorf was born Erich J. Landauer in Vienna, on February 4, 1912. Leinsdorf studied piano, cello and conducting at the « Universität Mozarteum Salzburg », followed by the University of Vienna and the Vienna Conservatory. At the Salzburg Festival, from 1934 to 1938, Leinsdorf was conducting assistant, 1st to Bruno Walter and, then, to Arturo Toscanini. Leinsdorf's ability to sight-read scores at the piano, his memory, and his Italian language skills were advantages at Salzburg, and Toscanini became something of a mentor to Leinsdorf. During these years, Leinsdorf also conducted Opera in Italy : Bologna, Trieste, Florence, and San Remo. In 1938, Leinsdorf left Vienna and Europe because of the rise of the Nazi influence and went to New York. At the recommendation of Lotte Lehmann to Artur Bodanzky, Leinsdorf joined the Metropolitan Opera, in the 1938-1939 season. Beginning in the 1939-1940 season, following the death of Artur Bodanzky, Erich Leinsdorf was named principal « MET » conductor of the German repertory, which gave Leinsdorf's career an immediate boost during the period 1939 to 1942. Leinsdorf found the Metropolitan Opera progressively more frustrating, with the few rehearsals and the negative atmosphere of Opera House politics. In 1942, in a controversial selection process in which candidates George Szell and Vladimir Golschmann were turned down, Erich Leinsdorf was named Music Director of the Cleveland Orchestra. Leinsdorf happily departed from the « MET », but he was unlucky in Cleveland. 1st, in the 1942-1943 season, with the United States entering World War II, Cleveland lost 22 musicians, whom Leinsdorf needed to replace. One of Leinsdorf's hires was George Goslee, Principal bassoon, who remained with the Orchestra for 44 seasons. Then, Leinsdorf himself was drafted into the U.S. Army from 1943 to 1945, and so was not able to make his mark in Cleveland. Leinsdorf received his Army discharge in September, 1944. Meanwhile, the 1944-1945 Cleveland Orchestra season had already been programmed with guest-conductors including George Szell who had very successful series of November 1944 concerts. The 1945-1946 Cleveland season became a horse-race between Leinsdorf, Szell, and Vladimir Golschmann as to who would become permanent Music Director. Szell made a strong impression on Cleveland that season, and Erich Leinsdorf gradually lost out to Szell. This may have seemed the destiny of George Szell, who continued with 24 seasons of greatness with the Cleveland Orchestra. Leinsdorf then went on to the Rochester Philharmonic, where he was Music Director for 8 seasons (1947-1955) . Then, after a brief period at the New York City Opera, Leinsdorf returned as a leading-conductor of the Metropolitan Opera, during the years 1957-1962.

Erich Leinsdorf was appointed Music Director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in the 1962-1963 season. During his 7 seasons with the BSO, until 1969, Leinsdorf and the Boston Symphony made many recordings for the « RCA Victor » label, including an excellent series of Prokofiev Symphonies and Concerti. From 1978 to 1980, Erich Leinsdorf was conductor of the Berlin Radio Orchestra. After the departure of Lorin Maazel from his stormy Cleveland tenure, in 1982, Erich Leinsdorf returned to Cleveland frequently to provide continuity prior to the arrival of Christoph von Dohnányi, for the 1984-1985 season. Erich Leinsdorf, in his last years, divided his residence among Sarasota, Florida, Zürich, Switzerland, and New York. Erich Leinsdorf died in a Zürich hospital, suffering from cancer on September 11, 1993. His musical erudition and generous personality gained respect, and during his most inspired performances, particularly in the opera house, he was often the equal of any of his contemporaries.

Following musical studies at the University of Vienna and the State Academy, Erich Leinsdorf served as rehearsal, and then solo, pianist for Anton von Webern's « Singverein der Sozialdemokratischen Kunststelle » (Choral Society of the Social-Democratic Arts Council) . Bruno Walter took him as his assistant at Salzburg, in 1934, and, that same year, Arturo Toscanini engaged him as pianist for a special performance in Vienna. In 1937, having already established a name in Italy as a conductor of Opera, Leinsdorf was invited to join the New York Metropolitan Opera as assistant conductor. He was later promoted to full conductor and, in 1939, was put in charge of the German repertory.

Leinsdorf succeeded Artur Rodzinsky at the Cleveland Orchestra, in 1943, but sacrificed the post when he was inducted into the U.S. Army. He returned from overseas in 1947 to a position with the Rochester Philharmonic. In 1956, he was musical director of the New York City Opera and, then, in 1957, resumed work with the Metropolitan as conductor and musical consultant. He succeeded Charles Münch at the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1962, remaining there until 1969. In 1978, he was named chief conductor of the Radio Symphony of West-Berlin, a post he retained until 1980.

He made guest-appearances with virtually every major Orchestra in Europe and the United States, and he recorded extensively. The autobiographical « Cadenza : A Musical Career » was published in 1976, and a book on conducting, « The Composer's Advocate » , in 1981.

Erich Leinsdorf, 81, a Conductor of Intelligence and Utility, Is Dead

Erich Leinsdorf, a conductor whose abrasive intelligence and deep musical learning served as a conscience for 2 generations of conductors, died yesterday at a hospital in Zürich. He was 81 years old and lived in Zürich and Sarasota, Florida, and, until recently, also had a home in Manhattan.

The cause was cancer, his family said.

Mister Leinsdorf's utilitarian stage manner and his disdain of dramatic effects for their own sake stood-out as a not-so-silent rebuke to his colleagues in this most glamorous of all musical jobs.

In addition, Mister Leinsdorf (in rehearsal, in the press and in his valuable book on conducting, « The Composer's Advocate ») never tired of pointing-out gaps in culture among musicians, faulty editing among music-publishers and errors in judgment or acts of ignorance among his fellow conductors. He rarely named his victims, but his messages and their targets were often clear. Moreover, he usually had the solid grasp of facts to support his contentions.

His long career continued until early this year, when his health deteriorated. After conducting the New York Philharmonic, in January, he was forced to cancel performances the next month.

Mr. Leinsdorf moved to this country from Vienna, in 1937. Helped by the recommendation of Arturo Toscanini, whom he had been assisting at the Salzburg Festival, Mister Leinsdorf made his conducting debut at the Metropolitan Opera, a year later, with « Die Walküre » . He was 25 years old, at the time. A year later, he was made overseer of the « Met » 's German repertory, and his contentious style (in particular, an insistence on textual accuracy and more rehearsal) won him no friends among singers, like Lauritz Melchior and Kirsten Flagstad. Backed by management, he remained at the « Met » until 1943.

At the New York City Opera, where he became music-director in 1956, Mister Leinsdorf's demanding policies, in matters of repertory and preparation, made him further enemies, and he left a year later.

His searches for permanent employment turned mostly to Orchestras. After the briefest of tenures at the Cleveland Orchestra during World War II, Mister Leinsdorf took-over the Rochester Philharmonic and stayed for 9 years. During that period, he and the Orchestra made a series of admired low-budget recordings that brought Rochester to the music world's attention.

Mister Leinsdorf's last and most prestigious music directorship was at the Boston Symphony Orchestra, where he replaced Charles Münch, in 1962. No contrast in style could have been sharper : Münch had viewed conducting mystically, as a kind of priesthood ; Mister Leinsdorf's policy was to make performances work in the clearest and most rational way. Cool Objectivity !

Observers, both in and out of the Orchestra, could not deny the benefits of Mister Leinsdorf's discipline, but there were some who were hostile to what they perceived as an objectivity that could hardly be called heart-warming. Perhaps, his principal achievements with the Boston Symphony Orchestra were not in Boston but at the Tanglewood Music Festival, where he presided over the Orchestra's summer season, in the Berkshires.

There, Mister Leinsdorf introduced 32 works, including Benjamin Britten's « War Requiem » , and began a Prokofiev cycle. He also worked closely with Tanglewood's conducting students.

The administrative and social burdens of the music-director's job became increasingly onerous to him, however, and not enjoying total enthusiasm from the press, he stepped down after the 1968-1969 season. He remarked at the time :

« Only 6 years earlier, I had been overjoyed at being asked to a position considered one of the most prestigious in my profession, and now, I could only hope to get-out with my health intact. »

Subsequently, Mister Leinsdorf found happiness as a guest-conductor, touring the world's major Orchestras, working with them for several weeks at a time and avoiding the burdens of a permanent position. Although his performances were rarely dramatic or even rousing, he brought to music a kind of rectitude that at its best provided an antidote for Orchestra musicians and listeners used to flamboyant and often empty conductorial salesmanship.

One American Orchestra manager, a few years ago, responded to musicians' grumbings over Mister Leinsdorf's rehearsal manner by saying that he was « good for my Orchestra » . And so he probably was.

Erich Leinsdorf was born in Vienna on February 4, 1912, to Ludwig Julius and Charlotte Lœbl Leinsdorf. His father, an amateur pianist, died when Mister Leinsdorf was 3 years old. Mister Leinsdorf was already a good pianist by age 7. As a teenager, he studied the cello, musical theory and composition at the University of Vienna and at the city's Music Academy. He was a rehearsal pianist for Anton Webern when that most ascetic of composers was conductor of a chorus known as the « Singverein der Sozialdemokratischen Kunststelle » ; there, he made his professional piano debut in a performance of « Les Noces » by Igor Stravinsky.

Aside from the early Rochester recordings, Mister Leinsdorf recorded extensively for the « RCA Victor » label, including full Operas, all the Mozart Symphonies, other items from the standard repertory, and modern works by Elliott Carter, Alberto Ginastera and others.

Mister Leinsdorf's 1st marriage, to Anne Frohnknecht, ended in divorce. He is survived by his wife of 25 years, the former Vera Graf, and 5 children from his 1st marriage : David I. of Crested Butte, Colorado ; Gregor J. of Manhattan ; Joshua F. of Atlantic Highlands, New Jersey ; Deborah Hester Reik of Hartford ; Jennifer G. Belok of Belmont, Massachusetts ; and 10 grandchildren.

Erich Leinsdorf, geboren Erich Landauer (geboren 4. Februar 1912 in Wien ; gestorben 11. September 1993 in Zürich) war ein österreichischer Dirigent, der 1937 als Assistent an die « Metropolitan Opera » ging und dann 1938 nach dem Anschluß Österreichs an das nationalsozialistische Deutsche Reich in den USA bleiben konnte, wo er 1942 die Staatsbürgerschaft erhielt.

Er studierte in seiner Heimatstadt und schloß 1933 mit Diplom ab. Im darauffolgenden Jahr wurde er Assistent Bruno Walters und Arturo Toscaninis bei den Salzburger Festspielen. 1937 dirigierte er zum ersten Mal an der « Metropolitan Opera » , wo er sich im folgenden Jahr als Europa-Flüchtling dauerhaft etablierte. Nach Kriegsende dirigierte er gelegentlich auch wieder in Europa, war aber hauptsächlich in Amerika tätig, wo er besonders als Wagner-Dirigent geschätzt wurde, aber auch zum Beispiel eine Turandot von Giacomo Puccini einspielte (mit Birgit Nilsson, Jussi Björling und Renata Tebaldi) . Allgemein galt Leinsdorf, zum Teil aufgrund seiner Ausbildung, als typischer Operndirigent.

1956 war Leinsdorf für eine Saison der Direktor der « New York City Opera » , 1962 wurde er Nachfolger von Charles Münch als Chefdirigent des « Boston Symphony Orchestra » . 1978 bis 1981 arbeitete er intensiv mit dem Radio-Symphonie-Orchester Berlin, dem heutigen Deutschen Symphonie-Orchester Berlin, zusammen, mit dem er im Juni 1980 eine vielbeachtete Ostasien-Tournee unternahm.

Au même programme : la création de la Suite Symphonique tirée de l'Opéra « Kommissar Rondart », une collaboration des compositeurs Edmund von Borck (1906-1944) et Werner Seelig-Bass (1908-1988) .

Edmund von Borck made his debut as an orchestral composer conducting the Berlin Philharmonic with the premiere of the Symphonic Suite from the Opera « Kommissar Rondart » he had composed together with his friend Werner Seelig-Bass (1908-1988 ; it appears he later went by the name Warner S. Bass whilst in American exile) . The programme closed with Bruckner's 9th Symphony.

Edmund von Borck

Edmund von Borck (1906-1944) : German teacher, conductor and composer primarily of orchestral music. Early in his career, von Borck became a professor of theory and composition at the Berlin Conservatory. He was killed in action in Italy, during WWII.

...

The composer and conductor Edmund von Borck was born on 22 February 1906 in Breslau (Wrocław, Poland) ; and died on 4 February 1944 near Nettuno, Italy.

Edmund von Borck's premature death as a soldier at the battle for the Nettuno beachhead, in Italy, counts as one of the greatest losses for German music, comparable to the suicide of Hugo Distler, in 1942, and the uncertain fate of Heinz Schubert in Mecklenburg, shortly before War's end in 1945. According to the testimony of Hans Greßer (in the only biography on the composer : Hans Greßer. « Edmund von Borck. Ein Fragment » , Laumann-Verlag, Dülmen 1989) , von Borck stated during their 1st meeting, in summer of 1942, in Wrocław :

« I stand somewhere between Hindemith and Alban Berg. »

It is fair to say that, as a composer, Edmund von Borck was a maverick who never belonged to the lineage of a great teacher. In Wrocław, he studied composition with the music scholar and « schlager » composer Ernst Kirsch (1891-1964) , and piano with Bronisław von Poźniak (1887-1953) . Then, he underwent training as a conductor in Berlin under Julius Prüwer (1874-1943) . In 1930, he accepted an engagement as conductor with the Frankfurt Opera, and there, quickly followed stints as guest-conductor with leading Orchestras such as the Berlin Philharmonic, the « Concertgebouw Orkest » in Amsterdam, and the « Augusteum » Orchestra in Rome. Nevertheless, he soon largely withdrew from conducting and devoted himself almost exclusively to composition, where he was able to celebrate his breakthrough with the very successful premiere of « Fünf Orchesterstücke » (5 Orchestral Pieces) , Opus 8, at the music Festival of the International Society for New Music (ISCM) , on 13 July 1933, in Amsterdam. This is all the more astounding given that he only took-up composing seriously in the early 1930's. On 28 November 1931, he made his debut as an orchestral composer conducting the Berlin Philharmonic with the premiere of the Symphonic Suite from the Opera « Kommissar Rondart » he had composed together with his friend Werner Seelig-Bass (1908-1988 ; it appears he later went by the name Warner S. Bass whilst in American exile) . The programme closed with Anton Bruckner's 9th Symphony. In 1932, there appeared the Concerto for Alto Saxophone and Orchestra, Opus 6, written for Sigurd Raschèr (1907-2001) , which was 1st performed in the same year by Raschèr at the music Festival in Hanover, under the direction of the chief-conductor Rudolf Krasselt (1879-1954) . Apart from chamber music, von Borck subsequently composed mainly orchestral works.

In « Neue Musik in der Entscheidung » (« New Music at the Crossroads » , Mainz, 1954) , Karl H. Wörner sketched the development of the orchestral composer Edmund von Borck in the following manner :

« The “ Fünf Orchesterstücke ”, Opus 8, belong to the realm of “ vital expressionism ” (Siegfried Borries) . The taming of contrasts 1st took place in the wake of the “ neo-Baroque ” style of German provenance. In Opus 10, “ Präludium und Fuge ” (Prelude and Fugue, 1934) , von Borck allies himself with a renewal of the established form. The “ Konzert für Orchester ”, Opus 14 (Concerto for Orchestra of 1935, 1st performed on 4 February 1936, at “ Kurzwellensender Berlin ”, appearing in that same year as his 1st publication from Universal-Edition and, soon, internationally successful) transforms the linear, dissonant style into something playful and minstrelesque. 2 part polyphony predominates, the linear interplay of parts moves rhythmically and fluidly. Opus 16, “ Thema, Variationen und Finale ” (Theme, Variations and Finale of 1935-1936, premiered on 21 April 1936 at the Dresden Music Festival by the Dresden Philharmonic Orchestra under Paul van Kempen) , attempts to modify the blending of the recent stylistic achievements on the basis of the variation form of the 19th Century. (There followed - aside from the unpublished Concertino for Flute and String Orchestra, Opus 15a - “ Zwei Fantasiestücke ”, Opus 17, of 1937-1938 (2 Fantasy Pieces, both 1st performed under Eugen Jochum) and the Symphonic Prelude to the Opera “ Napoleon ”, Opus 18, of 1940, which was 1st performed under Herbert von Karajan, on 12 October 1940, in Aachen.) From the Concerto for Piano and Orchestra, Opus 20 (1st performed in Berlin, in May of 1941, with the soloist Conrad Hansen, who also continued to commit himself to the work after the War) , a work in 3 movements which is effective as a solo concerto but is designed symphonically throughout, the way led to “ Orphika ”, Opus 21. This “ Apollinische Transformation für Orchester nach Zeichnungen von Hans Wildermann ” (Apollonian Transformation for Orchestra on Drawings by Hans Wildermann) is a Symphonic poem. The mystical-philosophical dimension of the drawings shows the path of humanity from lowly beginnings to divine order and spiritualization. Its musical realization succeeds through purely musical means in free Sonata form. The Mastery of the architecture is achieved. »

In 1943-1944, Edmund von Borck was busy with a « Tragic Overture » , from which only a sketch for the 2nd theme is still extant. Concerning the Opera « Napoleon » , Opus 18, which was 1st performed in Gera, on 19 September 1942, Wörner writes :

« A contemporary picture full of dramatic tension, with grand scenes of the masses, gripping from the revolutionary tone of the beginning until the loneliness of the battlefield of “ Belle-Alliance ”. Judged as a whole, the work is the most important contribution to Opera of the younger generation in Germany following Paul Hindemith. The inspiration from the passacaglia to the folk-song, from the aria to the hymn, from the love-scene to the death-scene, is convincing. »

In the standard German encyclopedia, « Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart » , edited by « Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart » Verlag, Kassel (1952) , Herbert Hübner writes :

« Stylistically, von Borck builds upon the achievements of the preceding generation (German Early Expressionism : the Hindemith of the early- and middle-periods) . It is a music emerging from a very austere essential attitude, without making any concessions in its harsh world of sound and in its ruthless voice-leading, built upon an originally massive vitality which prefers a rhapsodically free, often self-precipitating rhythm, passionately inflamed surges and agglomerations of forces in emotive accumulation. The instinct for the great dramatic unity of design is revealed already at an early stage in the orchestral compositions which are the main body of his output. »

Hans Greßer relates how, as a young man, he met Edmund von Borck for the 1st time in Wrocław (Breslau) , on a summer evening in 1942, at the home of Doctor Gotthard Agath (1881-1958) :

« Just having arrived from Italy, he surprised us with news from the music scene there. Amongst other things, we heard that there were absolutely no tendencies to reduce unpleasant modernism (i.e. , “ entartete Kunst ” or “ entartete Musik ”. »

Concerning the following day (« if I do not err ») , Greßer reports :

« We (Doctor Agath, Edmund and I) were visiting Professor Hans Wildermann (1884-1954) in the afternoon and, on this day, the idea for Edmund von Borck’s last and most-played orchestral work “ Orphika ” was born. By the 2nd decade of our Century, Wildermann had already made a name for himself as a painter and draughtsman. Deliberations concerning a secure income may have played a role in his acceptance of the post as chief set-designer at the Breslau Opera. Here, he had a ground-breaking effect and made an important contribution to the development of a modern stage-set style, leaving behind purely naturalistic decoration. "Vision - Angel - Light" : This evocation from the beyond was a theme closer to Wildermann's heart than almost any other, as he was a convinced (or, perhaps, one should better say "devout") Anthroposopher. And, at this place, Edmund became acquainted with the 10 drawings which Wildermann called "Orphika - an Apollonian Transformation". Although, at our meeting, there was hardly any reason to suspect that Edmund stood close to this world of ideas, he was truly fascinated by the picture sequence and said on the very same evening that he wanted "to do something" with (or about) it. »

Further on Greßer writes :

« If the library lending records of the Universal-Edition so kindly made available to me are complete, then, the "Gewandhaus" Orchestra premiered the work ("Orphika") in Leipzig, on 21 February 1949, soon followed by several radio broadcasts. »

Here, he is in error, as is so often the case with the data in his book : the premiere had already taken place somewhat earlier, and the « Gewandhaus » Orchestra has never played « Orphika » .

If one follows Hans Greßer's statements, the « Orphika » were begun in 1942 and completed, either in the same year or more probably 1943. Greßer writes :

« The work is inspired by Hans Wildermann's cycle of pictures of the same name, which was released in 1927 by the Regensburg publisher Gustav Bosse. 10 drawings in the manner of woodcuts reflect, in a certain way, the progression of a private mythology. »

Greßer quotes Wildermann :

« In fact, they (the pictures) should not be understood in the slightest intellectually, but rather be felt and still more heard. »

In his quite extensive analysis, Greßer demonstrates that the form of the « Orphika » in regards to the sequence of the tempi constitutes a 7 part symmetry, with the « Killing of Orpheus » as the centrepiece. He defines the initial sequence of 2 seconds and a following 5th as the thematic kernel of the whole work. Concerning the final section of the work, Greßer writes :

« Von Borck dispenses with any obvious hint of Bach himself - there is no choral-like setting reminiscent of his style, no citation of B-A-C-H and no fugue (the technique of which he had employed several times in this work) . The name of Bach stands here as a symbol for the sacred in all music, whatever Wildermann himself may have understood by this. »

Edmund von Borck : A Study of His Life and Music with an Emphasis on His Works for the Saxophone

(Wildy Lewis Zumwalt - Florida State University.)

Edmund von Borck (1906-1944) was admired in Germany during the 1930's as one of the leading young composers of his generation. During World War II, he was inducted into the military and eventually killed on the Italian front. The complex political ramifications associated with Nazi Germany obscured Borck's creative output and relegated him to the realm of anonymity.

In accord with recent scholarly interest in composers from the Nazi era, this study explores the life and music of Borck with special attention given to his works for the saxophone. The 1932 premiere of his « Konzert für Alt Saxophon und Orchester » , Opus 6, established Borck as an important 20th Century composer while simultaneously inaugurating the solo career of pioneering saxophonist Sigurd M. Raschèr.

The 1st Chapter sets the cultural and political stage within the context of Nazi Germany, examining the status of the saxophone and the careers of 2 important saxophonists : Gustav Bumcke and Sigurd Raschèr. The 2nd Chapter assembles the fragmentary biographical material available on the life of Edmund von Borck. Drawing on numerous primary sources in German, this Chapter is the 1st substantive biographical document about the composer available in the English language. The narrative is supplemented by the recollections and writings of family members, friends and critics. The 3rd Chapter includes a summary of Borck's compositional style together with a brief overview of his 2 existing orchestral works that include the saxophone, the « Fünf Orchesterstück » , Opus 8, and the Opera « Napoleon » . The 4th and 5th Chapters examine respectively Borck's 2 original compositions for the saxophone : the « Konzert für Alt Saxophon und Orchester » , Opus 6 ; and the « Introdution und Capriccio » , Opus 11. (Historical background and stylistic overview are provided for both works.)

Included in the appendix are recorded excerpts from Sigurd Raschèr's 1955 American premiere of the « Konzert » , as well as additional sound clips recorded by the author. In addition, an assortment of photographs gathered from various sources, many from the Borck family private collection, are reproduced here for the 1st time.

« Orphika » for Orchestra, Opus 21 (1942-1943)

« Orphika » , the final climax in Edmund von Borck's distinctive orchestral « œuvre » , was posthumously premiered on the occasion of the Days of New Music, on Tuesday, 16 November 1948, in the Leipzig « Kongresshalle » (in the 4th subscription concert of the Sender Leipzig) by the Symphony Orchestra of the Sender Leipzig conducted by Gerhard Pflüger (1907-1991) , framed by works of Heinrich Sutermeister, Béla Bartók and Paul Hindemith. Score and parts appeared in print, in 1953, through the Viennese publisher Universal-Edition. Duration : 15 minutes.

Edmund von Borck : geboren Breslau, 22. Februar 1906 ; gestorben bei Nettuno, 4. Februar 1944.

Edmund von Borcks allzu früher Tod als Soldat bei den Gefechten um den Landekopf Nettuno in Italien bedeutete (ähnlich dem Freitod Hugo Distlers 1942 und dem ungeklärten Schicksal Heinz Schuberts kurz vor Kriegsende 1945 in Mecklenburg) einen der eminentesten Verluste für die deutsche Musik. Nach dem Zeugnis Hans Gressers (in der einzigen Monographie über den Komponisten : Hans Greßer, Edmund von Borck. Ein Fragment, Laumann-Verlag Dülmen 1989) , sagte von Borck bei der ersten Begegnung der beiden im Sommer 1942 in Breslau :

« Ich stehe irgendwo zwischen Hindemith und Alban Berg. »

Als Komponist war Edmund von Borck freilich ein Einzelgänger, der sich auf keine überragende Lehrerfigur berufen sollte. In Breslau hatte er mit dem Musikwissenschaftler und Schlager-komponisten Ernst Kirsch (1891-1964) Komposition und bei Bronisław von Poźniak (1887-1953) Klavier studiert. Dann ging er in Berlin bei Julius Prüwer (1874-1943) als Dirigent in die Lehre. 1930 nahm er ein Engagement als Dirigent an der Frankfurter Oper an, und schnell folgten Verpflichtungen als Gastdirigent bei führenden Orchestern wie den Berliner Philharmonikern, dem Concertgebouw Orkest in Amsterdam oder dem Augusteum-Orchester in Rom. Doch zog er sich bald weitgehend vom Dirigieren zurück und wendete sich fast ausschließlich der Komposition zu, wo er seinen Durchbruch mit der sehr erfolgreichen Uraufführung der Fünf Orchesterstücke Opus 8 auf dem Musikfest der Internationalen Gesellschaft für Neue Musik (IGNM) am 13. Juni 1933 in Amsterdam feiern konnte. Dies ist umso erstaunlicher, als er erst zu Beginn der dreißiger Jahre ernsthaft mit dem Komponieren begonnen hatte. Am 28. November 1931 hatte er mit der Uraufführung der Symphonischen Suite aus der gemeinsam mit dem 1908 geborenen Freund Werner Seelig-Bass (der später im amerikanischen Exil, wo er 1988 verstarb, den Namen Warner S. Bass führen sollte) komponierten Oper Kommissar Rondart am Pult der Berliner Philharmoniker sein Debüt als Orchesterkomponist gegeben (gefolgt von Bruckners Neunter Symphonie). 1932 war für Sigurd Raschèr (1907-2001) das Konzert für Altsaxophon und Orchester Opus 6 (uraufgeführt im selben Jahr beim Musikfest in Hannover durch Raschèr unter Leitung des dortigen Chefdirigenten Rudolf Krasselt, 1879-1954) entstanden. Außer Kammermusik schuf von Borck in der Folge vor allem Orchesterwerke.

Karl H. Wörner hat in Neue Musik in der Entscheidung (Mainz 1954) die Entwicklung des Orchesterkomponisten Edmund von Borck folgendermaßen skizziert :

« Die „ Fünf Orchesterstücke „ Opus 8 gehören der Sphäre des „ vitalen Expressionismus „ (Siegfried Borries) an. Die Bändigung der Kontraste erfolgt zunächst im Anschluß an den „ Neu-Barock „ deutscher Ausprägung. In Opus 10, Präludium und Fuge (1934) , bindet sich von Borck an die historisch geprägte Form. Das Konzert für Orchester Opus 14 (1935, uraufgeführt am 4. Februar 1936 im Kurzwellensender Berlin, noch im selben Jahr als erstes Werk bei der Universal-Edition verlegt und bald international erfolgreich) wendet den linearen, dissonanten Stil ins Musikantische und Spielerische. Polyphone Zweistimmigkeit herrscht vor, das lineare Stimmgefüge ist rhythmisch fließend bewegt. Werk 16, „ Thema, Variationen und Finale „ (1935-1936, uraufgeführt am 21. April 1936 beim Dresdner Musikfest durch die Dresdner Philharmonie unter Paul van Kempen) will die Verschmelzung des bisher Erreichten an der Variationenform des 19. Jahrhunderts abwandeln. [Es folgen (außer dem ungedruckten „ Concertino für Flöte und Streichorchester „ Opus 15a) bis 1940 „ Zwei Fantasiestücke „ Opus 17 (beide unter Eugen Jochum uraufgeführt) sowie das Symphonische Vorspiel zur Oper „ Napoleon „ Opus 18, welches Herbert von Karajan am 12. Oktober 1940 in Aachen aus der Taufe hebt.] Über das „ Konzert für Klavier und Orchester „ Opus 20 [uraufgeführt im Mai 1941 in Berlin mit dem Solisten Conrad Hansen, der sich auch nach dem Kriege noch für das Werk einsetzte] , ein als Solokonzert effektvolles, aber durchaus sinfonisch angelegtes dreisätziges Werk, führt der Weg zu den „ Orphika „ Opus 21. Die „ Apollinische Transformation „ für Orchester nach Zeichnungen von Hans Wildermann ist eine sinfonische Dichtung. Der mystisch-philosophische „ Vorwurf „ zeigt den Weg der Menschheit von niederen Anfängen zur göttlichen Ordnung und Vergeistigung. Die Umsetzung in Musik erfolgt nur mit musikalischen Mitteln in der Form eines freien Sonatenhauptsatzes. Die Meisterschaft der Disposition ist erreicht. »

1943-1944 war von Borck mit einer « Tragischen Ouvertüre » beschäftigt, von welcher nur eine Skizze zum zweiten Thema erhalten geblieben ist. Über die Oper « Napoleon » Opus 18, die am 19. September 1942 in Gera zur Uraufführung kam, schreibt Wörner :

« Ein zeitgeschichtliches Bild voll dramatischer Spannung, mit großen Volksszenen, packend von dem revolutionären Ton des Anfangs bis zur Einsamkeit des Schlachtfeldes von „ Belle-Alliance „. Als Ganzes beurteilt, ist das Werk der wichtigste Beitrag der jüngeren Generation in Deutschland zur Oper, der an Paul Hindemith anschließt. Die Inspiration von der Passacaglia bis zum Volkslied, der Arie bis zum Hymnus, von der Liebes- bis zur Sterbeszene ist überzeugend. » , in « Die Musik in Geschichte und Gegenwart » (MGG Verlag, Kassel 1952) schreibt Herbert Hübner :

« Stilistisch knüpft von Borck an die Errungenschaften der vorangegangenen Generation an (deutscher Frühexpressionismus, Hindemith der frühen und mittleren Periode) . Es ist eine Musik von sehr ernster Grundhaltung, konzessionslos in ihrer klanglichen Schroffheit und in ihrer rücksichtslosen Stimmführung, getragen von einer eigentümlich massiven Vitalität, die eine rhapsodisch freie, oft sich überstürzende Rhythmik, leidenschaftlich erregte Steigerungen und Kräfteballungen von pathetischer Massigkeit bevorzugt. Der Sinn für den großen dramatischen Linienwurf offenbart sich früh schon in den zahlenmäßig überwiegenden Orchester-Kompositionen. »

Hans Greßer erzählt, wie er als junger Mann in Breslau an einem Sommerabend im Jahr 1942 bei Doktor Gotthard Agath (1881-1958) erstmals Edmund von Borck begegnete :

« Frisch aus Italien gekommen, überraschte er uns mit Mitteilungen aus dem italienischen Musikleben. So erfuhren wir zum Beispiel, daß es in Italien keinerlei Tendenzen zur Drosselung unliebsamer Modernität (" entartete Kunst " beziehungsweise " entartete Musik ") gab. »

Über den folgenden Tag (« wenn ich mich nicht irre ») berichtet Greßer :

« Wir, Doktor Agath, Edmund und ich, waren nachmittags bei Professor Hans Wildermann, und an diesem Tage wurde die Idee zu Edmund von Borcks letztem und meistgespieltem Orchesterwerk " Orphika " geboren. Wildermann hatte sich als Maler und Zeichner bereits im zweiten Jahrzehnt unseres Jahrhunderts einen Namen gemacht. Es mag die Rücksichtnahme auf einen sicheren Broterwerb ihre Rolle mitgespielt haben, daß er den Posten eines Chef Bühnenbildners am Breslauer Opernhaus angenommen hatte. Hier hatte er bahnbrechend gewirkt und einen gewichtigen Beitrag zur Entwicklung eines modernen Bühnenbildstils in Abkehr von der bloßen naturalistischen Dekoration geleistet. " Vision - Engel - Licht " : Dieser Anruf aus dem Jenseits war ein Thema für Wildermann gewesen, wie ihm kaum eines hätte näherstehen können. Denn er war ein überzeugter (oder sagt man vielleicht besser : gläubiger ?) Anthroposoph. Und hier also lernte Edmund die zehn Zeichnungen kennen, die Wildermann " Orphika ") eine " apollinische Transformation " nennt. Obwohl sich bei unserem Zusammentreffen kaum ein Anhaltspunkt für die Vermutung bot, daß Edmund dieser Ideenwelt nahestand, war er von der Bildfolge wahrhaft fasziniert und sagte noch am gleichen Abend, daß er damit (oder darüber) " etwas machen " wolle. »

Später schreibt Greßer :

« Wenn die mir freundlicherweise zugänglich gemachten Ausleih-Belege der Universal-Edition vollständig sind, dann fand die Uraufführung der " Orphika ", der bald Rundfunksendungen folgten, am 21. Februar 1949 durch das Gewandhaus-Orchester in Leipzig statt. »

Hier täuscht er sich, wie so oft mit den Daten in seinem Buch : Die Uraufführung fand schon etwas früher statt, und das Gewandhaus-Orchester hat « Orphika » nie gespielt.

Folgt man Hans Gressers Angaben, so sind die « Orphika » 1942 begonnen und entweder noch im selben Jahr oder (wahrscheinlich) 1943 vollendet worden. Greßer schreibt :

« Das Werk ist angeregt durch den so bezeichneten Bilderzyklus von Hans Wildermann (1884-1954) , der 1927 im Gustav-Bosse-Verlag Regensburg erschienen ist. Zehn in einer holzschnittartigen Manier gezeichnete Bilder geben gewissermaßen den Ablauf einer privaten Mythologie wieder. »

Greßer zitiert Wildermann :

« Verstanden werden sollen sie die Bilder ja eigentlich überhaupt nicht, erfühlt und noch mehr erhört. »

In seiner recht ausführlichen Analyse legt Greßer dar, daß es sich bei der Form der « Orphika » , was die Gruppierung der Zeitmaße anlangt, um eine siebeniteilig symmetrische Anlage handelt, mit der Tötung des Orpheus im Zentrum. Als Themenkern des ganzen Werks definiert er die anfängliche Abfolge von zwei Sekundschritten und einem darauffolgenden Quintschritt. Über den Schlußabschnitt des Werkes schreibt Greßer :

« Von Borck verzichtet also auf jeden handgreiflichen Hinweis auf Bach selbst - kein seinem Stil angenäherter Choralsatz, kein Zitieren von B-A-C-H, keine Fuge, deren Technik er in dem Werk ja mehrmals genutzt hatte. Der Name Bach steht hier für das (wie auch immer von Wildermann aufgefaßte) Sakrale in der Musik überhaupt. »

Edmund Konstantin Wilhelm von Borck (geboren 22. Februar 1906 in Breslau ; gestorben 16. Februar 1944 bei Nettuno, Italien) war ein deutscher Komponist und Dirigent.

Edmund von Borck entstammt einer 1794 geadelten Großpächter- und Gutsbesitzerfamilie. Sein Vater Eduard von Borck (1864-1938) war Rittmeister beim Leib-Kürassier-Regiment « Großer Kurfürst » (Schlesisches) Nr. 1, über seine Mutter Erika, « née » von Lübbecke (1880-1945) , war er mit Johann Friedrich Reichardt verwandt.

Borck war in den Jahren 1920 bis 1926 Klavierschüler von Bronisław von Poźniak und erhielt Kompositionsunterricht bei Ernst Kirsch. Nach seinem Abitur begann er in Breslau ein Musikwissenschaftsstudium, welches er 1928 in Berlin fortsetzte. Aber schon bald darauf wechselte er zu einem Dirigierstudium und absolvierte unter der Leitung von Julius Prüwer die Kapellmeisterklasse der Berliner Musikhochschule.

1930 wurde er Kapellmeister an der Frankfurter Oper und war als Gastdirigent und andere bei den Berliner Philharmonikern, beim Concertgebouw-Orchester in Amsterdam und dem Orchestra dell'Accademia Nazionale di Santa Cecilia in Rom tätig. 1931 ging er zurück nach Berlin, zog sich weitgehend vom Dirigieren zurück und widmete sich seinem kompositorischen Schaffen. 1932 erschienen seine ersten Werke im Druck. 1933 gelang ihm mit der Uraufführung der Fünf Orchesterstücke Opus 8 beim Weltmusiktag der Internationalen Gesellschaft für Neue Musik in Amsterdam der entscheidende Durchbruch und er wurde als einer der hoffnungsvollsten Komponisten seiner Generation in Europa angesehen. Ab 1936 erschienen seine Werke bei der Universal-Edition in Wien.

Borck wurde 1940 zum Heeresdienst einberufen, er fiel im Zuge der alliierten Invasion während der « Operation Shingle » bei Nettuno. Sein Grab befindet sich auf der Kriegsgräberstätte in Pomezia.

Edmund Konstantin Wilhelm von Borck, Komponist (evangelisch) : geboren 22. Februar 1906 in Breslau ; gefallen 16. Februar 1944 bei Nettuno (südlich von Rom) .

Borck war es vorbestimmt, Musiker zu werden. Sein schon frühzeitig in Breslau begonnene Studium der praktischen Musik (1920-1926, Klavier und Komposition) ergänzte er dann bis 1928 durch das Hören musikwissenschaftlicher Vorlesungen an den Universitäten Breslau und Berlin. Unter Julius Prüwers Leitung absolvierte er anschließend mit Erfolg die Kapellmeisterklasse der Berliner Musikhochschule, doch vermochte die Theaterpraxis ihn auf die Dauer nicht zu fesseln. Er wollte für das eigene Schaffen frei sein und nahm seinen Wohnsitz in Berlin ; am Kittenischen Konservatorium, das ihm einen Lehrauftrag für Theorie und Komposition erteilte, wirkte er bis zu seiner Einberufung zum Heeresdienst (1940) . Sein früher Tod muß ein Verlust für die neuere Musik genannt werden : weil sich hier immer stärker eine ganz eigentümliche Begabung von strenger und elementarer Grundhaltung durchsetzte, die doch an den Stil des deutschen Frühexpressionismus anzuknüpfen wußte. Borcks kompositorische Entwicklung versprach noch viel ; und gerade in den letzten Werken hat seine Kunst einen deutlichen Höhepunkt erreicht.

Heinrich Laber

The German conductor, « Hofkapellmeister », violinist and composer Heinrich Laber was born on 11 December 1880 in Ellingen, Bavaria ; and died on 2 March 1950 in Gera, Thuringia. He was buried at the « Südfriedhof ». In 1914, with the support of Prince Heinrich XXVII, he was appointed « Kapellmeister » of Gera. He conducted the concerts of the Court Orchestra and of the Music Society, there.

Hofkapellmeister Professor Heinrich Laber. Am 11. Dezember 1880 wurde Heinrich Laber geboren. Er war Dirigent und ab 1914 Hofkapellmeister in Gera. Als dieser wurde er von Fürst Heinrich XXVII. in die Stadt berufen. In Gera dirigierte er die Konzerte der Fürstlichen Hofkapelle und des Musikalischen Vereins Gera. Laber verstarb am 2. März 1950 in Gera. Seine letzte Ruhestätte fand er auf dem Geraer Südfriedhof.

Professor Doktor Heinrich Laber, deutschen Dirigent, Hofkapellmeister und Regisseur : geboren 11. Dezember 1880 in Ellingen, Bayern ; gestorben 1950 in Gera, Thüringen.

Die nur knapp 2.500 Einwohner zählende Gemeinde hatte allein am 23. Februar 1945 durch einen sinnlosen Bombenangriff 106 Tote zu beklagen. Labers Geburtshaus war wie durch ein Wunder verschont geblieben. Es wurde jedoch in den 60er Jahren abgerissen und durch einen Neubau im alten Stil ersetzt.

Seine Eltern waren der Schuhmachermeister Heinrich Laber (senior) und dessen Gattin Anna, geborene Forster. Der kleine Heinrich hatte noch acht Geschwister. Es ist aus seiner Schulzeit überliefert :

« Bereits mit neun Jahren drängte es ihn, das Opfer des täglichen Übens in den Instrumentalfächern Violine und Klarinette geduldig auf sich zu nehmen. »

Seine Kindheit und Jugend verbrachte Heinrich Laber in Ellingen. 1905 zog die Familie in die Landeshauptstadt München um, vorher hatte Heinrich Laber seine Studien in München begonnen. Er studierte an der bekannten « Akademie der Tonkunst » in München. Der begabte Student Laber beendete seine Studien mit den Noten « Eins » und mit « Auszeichnung ». Seine Lehrer waren bekannte Musikexperten wie Felix Mottl, Felix Berber-Credner, Victor Gluth, Berthold Kellermann und Anna Langenhan-Hirzel (Klavier) . Bei Felix Berber erhielt Laber Ausbildung im Fach « Violine » . Berber war vor seiner Münchner Lehrtätigkeit Konzertmeister des Leipziger Gewandhausorchesters gewesen und gleichzeitig war er der Leiter eines damals sehr bekannten Streichquartetts.

Laber wurde einer der Meisterschüler des berühmten Dirigenten Felix Mottl, der nach einer erfolgreichen Opernkapellmeisterlaufbahn auch Direktor der Münchner Akademie der Tonkunst war, später auch musikalischer Leiter der Münchner Oper.

Mottl galt als genialer Dirigent. Laber hat mit Sicherheit viel von seinem Lehrer und Vorbild profitiert. Später rühmten die Kritiker fast einmütig, daß Laber als Dirigent « sich in vollkommener Einheit von Führen und Nachgeben bewege, einer sich bewährenden Kunst der Solistenbegleitung » . Labers Geraer Konzertmeister Hanns Keyl, der unter Arturo Toscanini in Bayreuth spielte, sagte 1956, sechs Jahre nach Labers Tod :

« Ja, unser Heinrich, das war ein Dirigent, mitreißend, ohne eitle Anwandlung und Pose. »

Ein spontanes Kompliment, von einem Musiker, der Laber durch viele Jahre gemeinsamen Musizierens genau kannte.

Auch Berthold Kellermann, der von 1873-1878 Schüler Franz Liszts in Weimar gewesen war, gab seine Erfahrungen und Kenntnisse an den jungen, talentierten Laber weiter.

Erste Erfolge, zum Teil während seiner Ausbildung, hatte sich Laber als I. Geiger im Münchner « Kaim-Orchester » , bekannt für die « Volkssinfonie-Konzerte » , errungen. Ein vorangegangenes Probespiel hatte sofort von Labers außergewöhnlichen musikalischer Begabung überzeugt.

Anschließend war Heinrich Laber Konzertmeister in den Orchestern der Stadttheater in Bern, Augsburg und Baden-Baden tätig. In Baden-Baden machte er die Bekanntschaft Max von Schillings, dieser war auf Labers außergewöhnliche Begabung aufmerksam geworden. Er riet ihm, sich doch ganz der Dirigentenlaufbahn zu widmen. Max Reger selbst machte mit Laber längere Konzertreisen.

Außergewöhnlich erfolgreich waren dann Labers Konzerte im Jahre 1912 in München, Leipzig und Berlin.

Man prophezeite dem jungen Dirigenten eine erfolgversprechende Zukunft. Er beschloß nun, von Schillings fachmännischen Rat zu befolgen.

Er wird Kapellmeistervolontär am Stuttgarter Hoftheater. 1913 übernimmt er als erster Dirigent den sehr bekannten und leistungsstarken « Nürnberger Lehrergesangsverein » . Dieser traditionsreiche Gesangsverein besteht auch heute noch. Durch sein Mitwirken bei großen musikalischen Aufführungen ist er bis in unsere Tage ein bedeutender Bestandteil des Nürnberger Musiklebens.

Seine umfangreichen Erfahrungen waren durch die Tätigkeiten in Stuttgart und Nürnberg gefestigt. Laber hatte sich auch hier mit sprichwörtlichem Engagement und mit sicherem musikalischen Intellekt allseitige Anerkennung erworben.

Am 1. Januar 1914 wurde er von Fürst Heinrich XXVII. Reuß als Hofkapellmeister für die Geraer « Fürstliche Hofkapelle » berufen. Der Klangkörper hatte einen guten Ruf.

Die kunstsinnige Fürstenfamilie Reuß j.L. (1572-1635) Gera hatte maßgeblichen Anteil am Bau des nach der Jahrhundertwende im Jugendstil erbauten Hoftheaters am Küchengarten. Der im Gebäude integrierte Konzertsaal zählt zu den schönsten Deutschlands. Der schöne Theaterbau wurde von einem der bekanntesten Theaterbaumeister der damaligen Zeit, von dem in Zeulenroda/Thüringen geborenen und in Berlin wirkenden Architekten Professor Seeling entworfen.

Laber prägte bald das Orchester nach seinen Vorstellungen. Die Einführung der Oper am « Reußischen Theater » gab ihm die Möglichkeit, den Klangkörper zu verstärken und auch zu verjüngen. Dadurch vergrößerten sich ebenfalls die Aufführungsmöglichkeiten der Orchesterliteratur erheblich. Die Konzerte der Geraer « Musikalischen Gesellschaft » fanden ebenfalls unter seiner Leitung statt. Sprunghaft stieg die Anzahl der Konzerte von jährlich 10 auf 16 und schließlich auf 22, eine stattliche Anzahl für eine Stadt der Größe Geras. Thomaskantor Karl Straube wurde als Solist für ein Konzert Labers in Gera gewonnen. Straube war einer der ersten, der Regers Orgelwerke bevorzugt in sein Repertoire aufgenommen hatte. Der gute Ruf des ausgezeichneten Instrumentalensembles drang nach außerhalb. Ein Konzert, 1916 in der Berliner Philharmonie gegeben, wurde ein außerordentlicher Erfolg für das Geraer Ensemble und seinen Dirigenten.

Es folgten die ersten Auslandstourneen zu Musikfesten in Sofia und Konstantinopel. Die Presse feierte den deutschen Klangkörper überaus wohlwollend. In Konstantinopel folgte ein Konzert im Freien, 30.000 Zuhörer schätzte man. Der regierende Sultan war so begeistert von den musikalischen Darbietungen, daß er ein Sonderkonzert für seine Haremsdamen veranstalten ließ. Ein Kritiker bemerkte zu diesem etwas ungewöhnlichen Publikum, daß die Damen auch während des Konzertes streng bewacht wurden, also selbst bei dem ihnen gebotenen Kunstgenuß sich nicht frei bewegen konnten. Ob zu diesem « Sonderkonzert » eine abweichende Programmfolge geboten wurde, ist uns leider nicht überliefert.

Eines seiner ersten großen Konzerte war ein « Festkonzert », von 128 Musikern bestritten. Von Laber wurden alle Sinfonien der « Drei großen B », also Ludwig van Beethoven, Johannes Brahms und Anton Bruckner, zum Teil mehrmals, in Gera zu Gehör gebracht. Zwei Beethoven-Feste wurden 1920 und 1927 in Gera veranstaltet.

Bruckners 6. Sinfonie hatte Laber anlässlich eines Musikfestes in Paris zur Erstaufführung gebracht. Ein 1919 in Gera veranstaltetes « Modernes Musikfest » wurde in Deutschland bekannt. Auch dem in Gera seit 1852 wirkenden Kapellmeister und Komponisten Tschirch wurde ein « Festkonzert » gewidmet. Tschirch war aus Schlesien nach Gera gekommen und hatte in 38-jährigem, verdienstvollem Wirken großen Anteil an dem guten Ruf Geras als Musikstadt.

Auch Labers Vorgänger, Professor Karl Kleemann, ein gebürtiger Rudolstädter, wurde von Laber als Solist verpflichtet. Kleemann galt als exzellenter Pianist und war über die Theater Recklinghausen und Dessau als musikalischer Leiter an das damalige « Reußische Theater » nach Gera gekommen.

Doch auch die Kammermusik wurde von Laber gefördert. Durch seine Leipziger Konzerte hatte er das « Leipziger Gewandhausquartett, das Berliner Havemann-Quartett, das Rosen-Streichquartett und 1924 das Frankfurter Amar-Quartett » nach Gera eingeladen.

Am 29. November 1916 fand ein Gedenkkonzert für Max Reger in Gera statt. Solist war der bekannte Thomaskantor Karl Straube. In dem « Modernen Musikfest » 1919 wurde Max Regers « Suite im alten Stil » in Gera dem Konzertpublikum bekanntgemacht. Dieses Konzert fand Beachtung und Anerkennung in der gesamten deutschen Musikwelt. 1920 erfolgte Labers Ernennung zum Professor. Auch wurde er in die Musikverständigenkammer Thüringens berufen, arbeitete als Bundeschormeister des Sängerbundes und als Städtischer Musikbeauftragter der Stadt Gera und in anderen Fachgremien aktiv mit. Seine Tätigkeiten und später auch seine Auslandsgastspiele wurden mit zahlreichen Orden und Auszeichnungen honoriert.

Als Operndirigent hatte Laber bald einen herausragenden Ruf. So war er während seiner Geraer Anstellung zusätzlich für je zwei Jahre Operndirigent am Stadttheater Plauen, das sich bald eines guten Rufes erfreute, und viele damals bekannte Sänger gehörten zum Ensemble.

Auch am Landestheater Coburg war er für zwei Spielzeiten ein gern gesehener Operndirigent.

Die Gastspiele der Dresdner Semperoper in Gera und Eisenach wurden ebenfalls unter Labers Dirigtat erfolgreich. Zu dieser Zeit gastierten in Gera zu Gastspielen herausragende Sängerpersönlichkeiten wie Elisabeth Rethberg, Siegrid Onegin, Carl Erb, Rudolf Bockelmann und andere.

Als Pianisten und Liedbegleiter waren es Josef Pembaur, Elly Ney, Mitja Nikisch, Claudio Arrau, Lubka Kolessa und Georg Kulenkampf (Violine) welche die Herzen der Zuhörer im Sturm eroberten.

Doch auch die modernen und zeitgenössischen Komponisten wurden in Labers Konzerten außerordentlich berücksichtigt. War es in Leipzig Hermann Zilcher, dessen Komposition « Nacht und Morgen » (für zwei Klaviere, Streichorchester und Pauken) am 25. November 1919 unter Laber zum ersten Mal aufgeführt wurde, war es in Gera Albert Zabel (geboren 1835, wirkte in Sankt Petersburg), dessen « Legende für Harfe » zum ersten Mal in Gera am 7. Februar 1919 aufgeführt wurde. Zu diesem Konzert wurde auch Hans Pfitzners Vorspiel I zu « Das Fest auf Solhaug », sowie Johannes Brahms 4. Sinfonie und die Tondichtung « Tod und Verklärung » von Richard Strauß dem Geraer Publikum dargeboten.

Labers eigene Komposition, das Chorwerk « Lied des Lichtes » wurde ebenfalls in Gera aus der Taufe gehoben. Geplant hatte er noch eine Oper und ein Oratorium, die wahrscheinlich nicht vollendet wurden.

Ein außerordentlicher Erfolg wurden die schon erwähnten Konzerte in der Leipziger Alberthalle. Dieses heute nicht mehr vorhandene Bauwerk soll 5.000 Plätze gehabt haben. Labers Konzerte waren mit durchschnittlich 3.000 Konzertbesuchern sehr gut besucht. Der Gewandhauskapellmeister Arthur Nikisch hat die Konzerte Labers öfter als Zuhörer besucht und soll auch mit Laber schriftlich in Verbindung gestanden haben. Dies ist nicht ausgeschlossen, da ja Laber auch mit Richard Strauß korrespondiert hatte, wie später aufgefundene Briefe belegten.

Die Konzerte für die « Musikalische Gesellschaft » in Leipzig beliefen sich allein auf 65, im Zeitraum von 1917 bis zum 20. März 1922. An diesem Tag fand das triumphale Abschiedskonzert in Leipzig statt, stürmische Ovationen und « Auf Wiederseh'n » -Rufe verabschiedeten das Orchester aus der « Provinz » und seinen verdienstvollen Leiter. Über fünf Jahre lang hatten sie regelmäßig und mit hohem Niveau das Konzertleben der Kunst- und Messestadt bereichert. Die Leipziger Konzertbesucher und auch die Pressestimmen bedauerten das Ende dieser Konzertreihe. Am 23. Januar 1922 war Arthur Nikisch verstorben, so daß das Jahr 1922 für das Leipziger Konzertleben kein sehr günstiges gewesen ist.

Insgesamt hat Laber in Leipzig circa 95 Konzerte gegeben. Er war öfters noch als Gastdirigent in der Stadt, zu der er zeitlebens eine große Verbundenheit bewahrte.

Auch eine große Anzahl von Rundfunkkonzerten fanden unter seiner Leitung statt. Die zeitgenössischen Komponisten förderte er hier zielstrebig, ebenso weniger bekannte junge Musiker und Komponisten.

Von Walter Braunfels wurden am 11. November 1919 in der Alberthalle "Drei chinesische Gesänge" für Sopran und Orchester und am 9.1.1922 im Geraer Konzertsaal « Phantastische Erscheinungen eines Themas von Hector Berlioz » für großes Orchester aus der Taufe gehoben.

Unter den vielen Erst- und Uraufführungen sei noch Paul Græner erwähnt, dessen Symphonie in D-Moll Opus 30 unter Labers Leitung geboten wurde.

Beethovens « Neunte » wurde von Laber während seiner Dirigentenlaufbahn 25 Mal gebracht. Denkwürdig blieb auch die erwähnte Leipziger Darbietung mit den Gesangssolisten Else Pfeifer- Siegel, Frieda Schreiber, Emil Pinks und Hjalmar Arlberg. Wie bereits angedeutet, war Laber als Operndirigent gefragt. Sein sängerführendes Dirigat, welches als « selten erreichte Einheit von Führen und Nachgeben » von der Kritik bewundert wurde, bewährte sich stets aufs neue.

Je zwei Jahre leitete Laber neben seiner Geraer Konzerttätigkeit nach Beendigung der Leipziger Konzertreihe 1922 die Opernaufführungen am Stadttheater Plauen und am Landestheater Coburg, wie schon erwähnt wurde.

In einer kurzen Auswahl sollen einige Höhepunkte in seinem umfangreichen Schaffen aufgeführt werden, die bei der damaligen Presse als mustergültig oder sehr gelungen herausgehoben wurden :

Giuseppe Verdis « Requiem » ; Georg Friedrich Händels « Belsazar » (« übermächtige Erlebnisstärke durch dramatisch-plastische Herausarbeitung ») ; Anton Bruckners Chorwerke, Große Messe, « Te Deum » und Bearbeitung des 150. Psalms ; Wolfgang Amadeus Mozarts « Große Messe in C-Moll » ; Franz Liszts « Heilige Elisabeth » ; Franz-Josef Haydns « Schöpfung » und « Die vier Jahreszeiten » ; Robert Schumanns « Paradies und Peri » ; Franz Schuberts « A-Dur Messe » ; Max Regers « Requiem » und Bearbeitung des 100. Psalms ; Johannes Brahms « Deutsches Requiem » ; Hans Pfitzners « Das dunkle Reich » und « Kantate von der Deutschen Seele » ; Artur Honneggers « König David » ; Joseph Haas « Volksoratorium von der " Heiligen Elisabeth " » .

Ausländische Städte, in welchen Laber als Dirigent große Erfolge verzeichnete :

Wien ; Paris (Erstaufführung von Bruckners 6. Sinfonie für Frankreich) ; Warschau ; Budapest ; Lausanne ; Madrid, Barcelona ; Bilbao ; Brünn ; und Haarlem.

Erfolgreiche Dirigate, zum Teil mehrmalig, in :

Leipzig ; Berlin ; Dresden ; München ; Frankfurt-am-Main ; und Düsseldorf.

Weitere Stationen als Gastdirigent in weiteren deutschen Städten :

Duisburg ; Schwerin ; Rostock ; Hannover ; Erfurt ; Kassel ; Marburg ; Darmstadt ; Mannheim ; Würzburg ; Chemnitz ; Bamberg ; Magdeburg ; und Nürnberg.

Laber war als Gastdirigent zu Rundfunkkonzerten eingeladen, zumeist in Leipzig, jedoch auch bei anderen deutschen Rundfunkanstalten.

Bei einer Orchesterprobe zu Hans Pfitzners « Kantate von der deutschen Seele » wurde er von einem Nervenzusammenbruch befallen. In immer kürzeren Abständen wiederholten sich die Anfälle. Krankheitsbedingt mußte er 1942 nach längerer Krankheit von seinem geliebten Beruf Abschied nehmen.

Am 2. März 1950 erlag er einem Herzversagen. Gera und die ganze Musikwelt hatten einen außergewöhnlichen Musiker verloren. Er wurde auf dem Geraer Südfriedhof zu Grabe getragen.

In Gera erinnert eine Straße in Theaternähe an ihn, von dem die Presse schrieb, daß hohe menschliche Qualitäten in selten glücklicher Verbindung ihn mit hoher Musikalität befähigten, Außerordentliches zu leisten. Heinrich Laber hatte auch das große Glück gehabt, daß seine Musikalität, gepaart mit Fleiß, durch hervorragende Lehrer gefördert wurde.

Im Geraer Musikleben wurde Georg C. Winkler sein Nachfolger. Als dieser nach Sondershausen ging, wurde der Grazer Dirigent Karl Fischer nach Gera berufen. Im Spätsommer 1944 wurden die Theater- und Konzertveranstaltungen ganz eingestellt. Josef Gøebels hatte großspurig verkündet :

« Wenn der Krieg rast, haben die Musen zu schweigen. »

Laber blieb als Mensch und Künstler unvergessen. Er setzte künstlerische Maßstäbe. Bedingt durch den Krieg und die Nachkriegswirren mit der deutschen Teilung geriet dessen außerordentliche Musikerpersönlichkeit etwas in Vergessenheit.

Da er sich in ganz Deutschland und im Ausland bleibende Verdienste erwarb, sollten wir uns heute an diesen außerordentlichen Künstler in Dankbarkeit erinnern.

Diese Darstellung erfolgt durch fast vollständige Übernahme eines Skriptes von Herrn Hetzer, Mitglied des Geraer Kulturkreises.

...

Im Zuge der deutschen Niederlage im Ersten Weltkrieg und der sich anschließenden Novemberrevolution trat am 10. November 1918 der Reußische Fürst Heinrich XXVII. zurück. Auch der Geraer Oberbürgermeister hatte sich zu diesem Schritt entschlossen. Die Begründung der « Reußischen Anstalt für Kunst und Volkswohlfahrt » am 22. Dezember 1919 sicherte nunmehr den Fortbestand des Theaters und des Orchesters in Gera. Das Hoftheater wurde in « Reußisches Theater », die Fürstliche Hofkapelle in « Reußische Kapelle » umbenannt. Und der bekannte Geraer Dirigent Heinrich Laber konnte sich, obwohl es nun keinen Fürstenhof mehr gab, weiterhin « Hofkapellmeister » nennen.

Das MDR-Sinfonieorchester (ehemals Leipziger Sinfonie-Orchester und Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Leipzig) ist eines der ältesten Rundfunkorchester weltweit und gleichzeitig das älteste Deutschlands. Ohne eine Beteiligung des Rundfunks wurde es neun Monate früher als das Rundfunk-Sinfonieorchester Berlin am 6. Januar 1923 in Leipzig gegründet.

Das erste musikalische Rundfunkprogramm, unter anderem mit dem Geiger Walther Davisson, wurde am 23. November übertragen. Sinfonische Unterhaltungsmusik fand ab 1924 Eingang in den Leipziger Rundfunk. 1925 konnte Mozarts Zauberflöte als erste Oper ausgestrahlt werden. Ein Jahr später wurde Leipziger Musik in das Programm des Deutschlandsenders übernommen. Das große Interesse am Leipziger Sinfonie-Orchester führte zum ganzjährigen Engagement der Musiker. Regelmäßig traten sie in der Alberthalle des Krystallpalastes und im Central-Theater auf. Die Dirigenten Hermann Scherchen, Heinrich Laber, Max Ludwig und Günther Ramin standen Szendrei zur Seite.

9e de Bruckner par Siegmund von Hausegger

2 avril 1932 : Création par le chef Siegmund von Hausegger, à la tête de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich, de la 9e Symphonie de Bruckner dans la version dite authentique (non retouchée) du Maître (préparée par le musicologue Alfred Orel) . Elle est confrontée à la version retouchée de 1903, préparée par le disciple Ferdinand Löwe. Ce double concert (à caractère semi-privé) se tient à la « Tonhalle » de Munich et, est commandité par Robert Haas et la Société internationale Bruckner (« Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » , ou IBG) . Hausegger présente d'abord la version de Löwe, puis la version originale de Bruckner. (Il fera de même avec la 5e Symphonie, en 1935.)

Immediately after the concert, a consensus was clear. The Executive Committee of the « Internationale Bruckner-Gesellschaft » issued the following statement :

« With all due respect to the services rendered by Ferdinand Löwe, who actuated by a spirit of sincere loyalty, made such changes in the work that he deemed absolutely prerequisite to its public performance, the Committee resolves that, because of the new conception of the true individuality of Bruckner's tonal language that has come into existence during the 30 years interim, and the overwhelming impression made by the original version at its 1st performance, the 9th Symphony, in the exact form in which it was left by the Master, should no longer be kept from the musical world. »

Dans ce concert spectaculaire, bouleversant le monde musical, Siegmund von Hausegger interprète (muni du bon matériau musical) la 9e Symphonie 2 fois de suite : tout d'abord dans la version connue jusqu'ici de la partition publiée en 1903 par Ferdinand Löwe puis dans la version originale suivant l'autographe de Bruckner. La différence était éclatante et les auditeurs remarquèrent que cette œuvre (et, par la suite les autres Symphonies de Bruckner) n'avait encore jamais été jouée telle que le compositeur l'avait écrite.

Les modifications de Ferdinand Löwe, Franz Schalk et autres réviseurs des Symphonies de Bruckner, supprimées par Robert Haas et ses collaborateurs scientifiques, s'exercent sur la forme, la dynamique et la sonorité.

Des coupes moindres ou importantes, apparemment pour faciliter la compréhension, détruisirent la forme originelle, les proportions, symétries et correspondances essentielles à l'intérieur de la vaste architecture brucknérienne.

Les arrangeurs pleins de bonnes intentions remplacèrent d'autorité sa dynamique en terrasses fortement contrastée, dérivée de la registration de l'orgue, par des crescendi et decrescendi. Ils supprimèrent aussi à plusieurs reprises les pauses générales si importantes pour la compréhension formelle, ajoutèrent des modifications de tempo personnelles, des accelerandi et ritardandi ainsi que d'autres « améliorations » mélodiques, harmoniques et rythmiques et ce, avec les meilleures intentions voire même, à plusieurs reprises, avec l'accord plus ou moins « volontaire » du Maître.

Les interventions les plus massives se portèrent sur les sonorités. De même qu'avec sa dynamique en terrasses apparentée à l'orgue, Bruckner a procédé selon le principe de l'architecture en groupes sonores : il structure en groupes des blocs sonores différents qui reposent sur une séparation claire des couleurs (cordes / bois / cuivres) ainsi que sur leur réunion selon des principes formels rigoureux. Il crée ainsi une tectonique sonore extrêmement originale qui est un élément structurel de la composition. Sans ces principes formels clairs, l'architecture musicale des mouvements symphoniques de vastes dimensions est incompréhensible.

Orchestre philharmonique de Munich

L'Orchestre philharmonique de Munich (« Münchner Philharmoniker ») est l'un des principaux Orchestres de la ville de

Munich, avec l'Orchestre symphonique de la Radio-diffusion bavaroise et l'Orchestre de l'Opéra d'État de Bavière. Fondé en 1893 par Franz Kaim sous le nom d'Orchestre Kaim (« Kaim-Orchester »), l'Orchestre attire très vite les plus grands chefs, tel Gustav Mahler qui le dirige dès 1897, puis y crée ses 4^e et 8^e Symphonies. De même, Bruno Walter assure la création du « Chant de la terre » en 1911. Felix Weingartner est le 1^{er} chef de renom à assurer la direction musicale, de 1898 à 1905, alors que le jeune Wilhelm Fürtwängler y fait ses débuts le 19 février 1906. À partir de 1910, l'Orchestre se nomme Orchestre de la Société de concerts de Munich (« Orchester des Münchener Konzertvereins »). La formation doit cesser ses activités pendant la Première Guerre mondiale, en raison du manque de financement (elle ne recevait que des capitaux privés) et de la mobilisation de certains de ses membres. L'Orchestre les reprend après la Guerre avec le soutien de la ville de Munich, sous la direction du compositeur Hans Pfitzner, puis du grand brucknérien Siegmund von Hausegger. En 1928, l'Orchestre prend son nom actuel de « Münchner Philharmoniker ». Après la victoire politique des Nazis en 1933, le talentueux Oswald Kabasta se fourvoie dans le soutien au régime d'Adolf Hitler. Après la guerre, des questions matérielles se posent avec la reconstruction de la salle de concert détruite. Hans Rosbaud puis Rudolf Kempe redonnent tout son prestige à la formation munichoise. En 1979, l'emblématique Sergiù Celibidache façonne l'Orchestre à sa manière, comme en témoignent les nombreux enregistrements de concerts publiés à sa mort.

The Munich Philharmonic (« Münchner Philharmoniker ») is one of 3 principal city's Orchestras, along with the Bavarian Radio Symphony Orchestra and the Bavarian State Orchestra. The Orchestra was founded in Munich, in 1893, by Franz Kaim, son of a piano manufacturer, as the Kaim Orchestra. In 1895, it took-up residence in the city's « Tonhalle » (concert-hall) . It soon attracted distinguished conductors : Gustav Mahler 1st directed the group in 1897 and premiered his Symphony No. 4 and Symphony No. 8 with the Orchestra, while Bruno Walter directed the Orchestra for the posthumous premiere of Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » . Felix Weingartner was music-director from 1898 to 1905, and the young Wilhelm Fürtwängler made his auspicious conducting debut there in 1906. Meanwhile, Anton Bruckner pupil, Ferdinand Löwe, established an enduring tradition of Bruckner performance which continues to this day.

Throughout this time, the Orchestra, which by 1910 was known as the Munich « Konzertverein » Orchestra, was privately funded, but during World War I finances became tight and players were called for military service, forcing the Orchestra to cease operation.

After the War, the Orchestra was taken-over by the city of Munich and restarted under the leadership of composer Hans Pfitzner, soon replaced by Bruckner pioneer, Siegmund von Hausegger. In 1928, the Orchestra acquired its current name. After the rise of the Nazi Party, in 1933, the Orchestra stamped its scores with Swastikas and the words : « The Orchestra of the Fascist Movement » . (The Swastikas weren't removed until the early 1990's.) In 1938, the pro-Nazi conductor Oswald Kabasta became chief conductor, raising its musical standards even as World War II began. During the War, the « Tonhalle » was destroyed and the Orchestra, homeless, was again shut-down for a period.

After the War, fortunes recovered under the music directors Hans Rosbaud and Rudolf Kempe and, in 1979, Sergiu Celibidache took-over, raising the Orchestra to the highest world-class standards. Notoriously demanding of his players, the Romanian created a unique sound for the Orchestra. In a well published case, he tried to remove principal trombonist Abbie Conant from her position because she was a woman. Conant sued the City of Munich and, after a lengthy legal procedure, in 1993, won pay equal to that of her male colleagues along with being reinstated as full Ist soloist status as the Court found that the Orchestra and the City of Munich broke the law concerning equal treatment of men and women. Reportedly, Conant's audition was the last to be held using blind audition.

After Celibidache's sudden death, in 1996, James Levine took-over as chief conductor of the Orchestra, serving until 2004. Christian Thielemann became the Orchestra's music-director in 2004, joined by Wouter Hoekstra as Intendant. However, in 2007, Hoekstra was dismissed from his post after reported disputes with Thielemann. In 2009, the Orchestra announced the scheduled conclusion of Thielemann's tenure in 2011. Thielemann's demand to have a say over the choice of guest-conductors was not approved. In March 2010, Lorin Maazel was named the Orchestra's next chief conductor, effective with the 2012-2013 season. Although the Orchestra did not officially designate the length of the initial contract, one preliminary report in February 2010 indicated an initial contract of 3 years. On 23 January 2013, it was announced that Valery Gergiev will succeed Maazel as the principal conductor from 2015. The initial contract will run through 2020.

Over the course of its history, the Munich Philharmonic has performed premieres of Günter Bialas, Anton Bruckner, Harald Genzmer, Luigi Nono, Gustav Mahler and others.

...

The Munich Philharmonic was founded in 1893 through the private initiative of Franz Kaim, the son of a piano manufacturer. Since then, the Orchestra has left an indelible imprint on Munich's cultural life under the leadership of renowned conductors.

In the Orchestra's earliest years (initially under the name : « Kaim Orchester ») conductors like Hans Winderstein, Hermann Zumpe and the Bruckner pupil Ferdinand Löwe guaranteed both a high-technical standard of performance and enthusiastic support of contemporary artistry. Right from the outset, their artistic concept included the effort to structure programs and prices to allow access to the concerts by all levels of society. Felix Weingartner, who directed the Orchestra, from 1898 to 1905, enhanced its international reputation with several tours to other countries.

Gustav Mahler directed the Orchestra, in 1901 and 1910, at the respective world premieres of his 4th and 8th Symphonies. In November of 1911, the Orchestra, then called the « Konzertverein Orchester » performed the world-premiere of Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » (The Song of the Earth) under Bruno Walter's direction - only 6 months after the composer's death, in Vienna.

From 1908 to 1914, Ferdinand Löwe again took-over the Orchestra. In the wake of a triumphant guest appearance in Vienna, on March 1, 1898, featuring Anton Bruckner's 5th Symphony, he conducted the 1st large-scale Bruckner concerts and, thereby, founded the Orchestra's Bruckner tradition, which has continued unbroken to the present-day. During the administration of Siegmund von Hausegger, who guided the Orchestra as its General Music Director, from 1920 to 1938, the world-premieres of 2 Bruckner Symphonies, in their original versions, took place as well as the final, definitive change of the Orchestra's name to « Münchner Philharmoniker » .

From 1938 to the summer of 1944, Austrian conductor Oswald Kabasta led the Orchestra, advancing the Munich Philharmonic's Bruckner tradition and also demonstrating the already established high standards of the Orchestra on a number of tours, at home and abroad.

The 1st concert after the Second World War was opened by Eugen Jochum with the Overture to Shakespeare's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, whose music had been ostracized during the Nazi era. With Hans Rosbaud, the Philharmonic gained an outstanding leader in the autumn of 1945, a man who passionately advocated modern music. Rosbaud's successor (from 1949 to 1966) was Fritz Rieger. During the era of Rudolf Kempe, who headed the Orchestra from 1967 until his untimely death in 1976, the Philharmonic undertook its 1st tours to Japan and the former Soviet Union.

In February of 1979, Sergiu Celibidache conducted his 1st concert series with the Munich Philharmonic and, in June of the same year, he was appointed General Music Director. Concert tours took him and the Orchestra through many European countries as well as to South America and Asia. The legendary Bruckner concerts made a major contribution to the Orchestra's international standing, and during the Celibidache era the Orchestra was repeatedly invited to accompany the Federal Government or the Federal President as musical ambassadors.

Following the War-time destruction of its old home, the so-called « Tonhalle » on the Türkenstraße, the Orchestras spent over 40 years in Munich's « Herkulesaal » . In 1985, the Philharmonic once again acquired its own concert-hall with the « Philharmonie » in the « Gasteig » , Munich's municipal cultural center.

The Munich Philharmonic Orchestra was founded in 1893 on the private initiative of Franz Kaim, the son of a piano manufacturer, and has since then left an indelible imprint on Munich's musical life under the direction of renowned conductors. In the earliest years of the Orchestra (initially under the name : « Kaim Orchestra ») conductors like Hans Winderstein, Hermann Zumpe and Anton Bruckner pupil, Ferdinand Löwe, guaranteed the high-technical performance level and dedicated considerable attention to the contemporary music of the time.

From the outset, it was part of the artistic concept to establish programs and admission charges geared toward welcoming all levels of the population to the concerts. When Felix Weingartner took-over the Orchestra, from 1889 to 1905, the number of foreign tours increased, enhancing the ensemble's international reputation.

Gustav Mahler conducted the Orchestra, in the years 1901 and 1910, at the world-premieres of his 4th and 8th Symphonies. In November of 1911, the ensemble, meanwhile renamed the « Concert Association Orchestra » , presented the world-premiere of Mahler's « Das Lied von der Erde » under the direction of Bruno Walter - only a half year after the composer's death, in Vienna.

From 1908 to 1914, Ferdinand Löwe re-assumed the helm of the Orchestra. Following a triumphant guest-performance in Vienna, on March 1, 1898, featuring Bruckner's 5th Symphony, he led the 1st Bruckner concerts and, thus, established the Orchestra's Bruckner tradition, which continues to this day.

During the administration of Siegmund von Hausegger, who presided over the Orchestra as General Music Director, from 1920 to 1936, the world-premieres of 2 Bruckner Symphonies, in their original versions, among other compositions took place as well as the renaming of the Orchestra as « Munich Philharmonic » (« Münchner Philharmoniker ») , thus, giving it its final name.

From 1938 until the summer of 1944, the Austrian conductor Oswald Kabasta headed the Orchestra, gloriously continuing the Munich Philharmonic's Bruckner tradition as well as proving its quality in a number of guest-appearances, at home and abroad.

The 1st concert after World War II was opened by Eugen Jochum with the Overture to Shakespeare's « A Midsummer Night's Dream » by Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy, whose music had been banned during the Nazi dictatorship.

In the autumn of 1945, the Philharmonic acquired the services of Hans-Rosbaud, an outstanding orchestral director, who also took-up the cudgels for the cause of new music.

Rosbaud's successor, from 1949 to 1966, was Fritz Rieger, during whose administration the foundation was laid for the Philharmonic's successful work with young people. During the era of Rudolf Kempe, who guided the Orchestra, from 1961 until his untimely death in 1976, the Philharmonic made its 1st tour to what was then the U.S.S.R. and climbed to a position as an international top Orchestra.

In February 1979, Sergiu Celibidache led his 1st concerts with the Munich Philharmonic, and was appointed the Orchestra's General Music Director, in July of the same year. There, followed concert tours taking the Orchestra to several countries in Europe, to South America and to Asia.

Meanwhile, the legendary Bruckner concerts made a major contribution to the international status of the Orchestra. After long, intensive years in Munich's « Herkulesaal der Residenz », the Philharmonic finally had its own concert-hall, in 1985, with the opening of the « Philharmonie » in the municipal culture center on the « Gasteig », after 40 homeless years - its old home base, the so-called « Tonhalle » on « Türkenstraße 5 » had been completely destroyed in 1944.

From September 1999 until 2004, James Levine was the Chief-Conductor of the Munich Philharmonic. He joined the Munich Philharmonic on a number of extensive concert tours. After a long European tour, in the winter of 2000, they gave a guest-performance with James Levine in New York's « Carnegie Hall ». In the summer of 2002, they made their joint « début » at the BBC « Proms », in London.

The German Music Publishers' Association singled-out the Munich Philharmonic in the spring of 2003, awarding it the prize for the « Best Concert Programs of the 2003-2004 Season ». In May of 2003, Christian Thielemann signed his contract as new General Music Director. On October 29, 2004, he conducted his inaugural concert featuring the 5th Symphony by Anton Bruckner.

On October 20, 2005, the Munich Philharmonic under the direction of Christian Thielemann had the honour of giving a concert in the presence of Pope Benedict XVI, at the Vatican, with 7,000 invited guests in the audience.

In November 2001, the Orchestra traveled with Christian Thielemann to Asia and played concerts in Japan, Korea and China. These totally successful performances were followed by a 2nd invitation for the Orchestras to come to Japan for 5 concerts in March of 2010.

A series of concert performances of « Der Rosenkavalier » by Richard Strauß, conducted by Christian Thielemann in January of 2009, ushered in a long-standing collaboration with the Festival Theatre, in Baden-Baden. 1 year later, Richard Strauß's « Elektra » followed. In January of 2011, the Munich Philharmonic presented the 4 Symphonies by Johannes Brahms.

A totally successful tour brought the Orchestra, in September 2010, to South America for concerts conducted by Conductor Laureate Zubin Mehta.

To commemorate the 100th anniversary of the Munich world-premiere, Christian Thielemann led 2 performances of Gustav Mahler's Symphony No. 8, in October of 2010.

Lorin Maazel assumed the position of Chief Conductor of the Munich Philharmonic in 2012. In his 2 year tenure, Maazel expanded the Orchestra's repertoire and worked on flexible sounds.

Die Münchner Philharmoniker sind eines der international renommiertesten deutschen Spitzenorchester. Sie sind in der Trägerschaft der Landeshauptstadt München.

Das 1893 von dem Klavierfabrikantensohn Hofrat Franz Kaim zusammen mit dem Philharmonischen Chor München gegründete Orchester hieß zunächst Kaim-Orchester und anschließend Orchester des Münchener Konzertvereins, bevor es 1928 seinen heutigen Namen erhielt.

International bekannt wurde das Orchester erstmals unter der Leitung von Felix Weingartner von 1898 bis 1905. Das Orchester wirkte 1901 und 1910 bei Uraufführungen von Werken von Gustav Mahler (4. und 8. Sinfonie) unter Leitung des Komponisten mit. Wilhelm Fürtwängler gab 1906 mit den Münchner Philharmonikern sein Debüt als Dirigent. Die Tradition des Orchesters, Werke von Anton Bruckner aufzuführen, geht auf den von 1908 bis 1914 erneut das Orchester leitenden Ferdinand Löwe zurück. So dirigierte etwa der 1920 bis 1938 als Generalmusikdirektor fungierende Siegmund von Hausegger zwei Brucknersinfonien bei deren Uraufführung mit den Münchner Philharmonikern, die zur selben Zeit den heute gültigen Namen annahm. Des Weiteren hatten mit dem Das Lied von der Erde unter Bruno Walter sowie Werken von Günter Bialas, Harald Genzmer und Luigi Nono weitere Werke ihre Uraufführung bei den Münchner Philharmonikern.

Nach dem Zweiten Weltkrieg wurde das Orchester mit der Aufführung der Ouvertüre zu Shakespeares Sommernachtstraum von Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy unter der Leitung von Eugen Jochum fortgeführt. 1967 wurde Rudolf Kempe Chefdirigent, unter seiner Leitung besuchte das Orchester die UdSSR und erzielte erstmals weltweit besondere Aufmerksamkeit. Von 1979 bis zu seinem Tod am 14. August 1996 prägte insbesondere Sergiu Celibidache das Bild des Orchesters entscheidend. Ihm folgte von 1999 bis 2004 James Levine als Chefdirigent. Im Mai 2003 unterzeichnete Christian Thielemann einen 7 Jahres-Vertrag als neuer Generalmusikdirektor. Seine Amtszeit begann am 1. September 2004. Der Vertrag wurde nicht verlängert. Er wechselte 2012 nach Dresden zur Sächsischen Staatskapelle. Seit der Saison 2012 ist Lorin Maazel Chefdirigent. Ab Herbst 2015 soll Valery Gergiev neuer Chefdirigent des Orchesters werden.

Um 1900 hatte die Zunft 800 Mitglieder. Man gab regelmäßig im Kill's Kolloseum oder im Odeon, die großen Säle in München, Konzerte. Es wurden aber nicht nur Lieder in Konzerten gesungen, sondern auch Feste, vor allem Faschingsveranstaltungen, von der Zunft organisiert. Innerhalb der Zunft gab es immer wieder verschiedene Untergruppierungen. Ein paar Sänger, welche auch ein Instrument spielen konnten, taten sich zusammen. Daraus entstand schließlich um 1870 ein eigenes Symphonieorchester. Während sich normalerweise Chöre oder Orchester nur zu gelegentlichen Projekten zusammenfinden, gibt die Zunft in jedem Konzert Chor- und Orchestermusik zu hören. Für die Unterhaltungsmusik taten sich Zünftler zu einer Blaskapelle zusammen. Und auch diverse Kammermusikensembles gab und gibt es in der Zunft. Einige dieser Untergruppierungen machten sich selbstständig. So gab es die Tanzbären, die Singbären oder die Turmfalken. Die gesellige Vereinigung « Die Turmfalken eingetragener Verein » existiert noch heute und der Kontakt zwischen den Vereinen wird immer noch gut gepflegt. Die Zunft wurde sogar öfters von den Münchner Philharmonikern eingeladen bei großen Chorwerken mitzuwirken. Die Münchner Philharmoniker entstanden 1893 aus einer Privatinitiative Franz Kaim und hießen Kaim-Orchester. Es war von Julio Mirón dirigiert die Bürger-Sänger-Zunft Beginn an ein Profiorchester. Öfters gaben das Orchester und die Zunft gemeinsam Konzerte. So sang die Zunft den Schlusschor von Liszt Faustsymphonie erstmals 1911 bei einem Konzert der Münchner Philharmoniker. 1926 wirkten Mitglieder der Zunft bei einer Aufführung Beethovens 9. Symphonie unter Hans Knappertsbusch mit. 1947 gab es eine Rundfunkübertragung des Oratoriums Legende von der heilige Elisabeth von Franz Liszt bei dem die Zunft mit anderen Münchner Chören unter den Zunftdirigenten Doktor Ritt.

« Kaim-Saal oder Tonhalle »

Der Jugendstil-Architekt Martin Dülfer schuf 1895 einen Konzertsaal für das « Kaim'sche Philharmonische Orchester », den « Kaim-Saal » in München, Türkenstraße 5, der im Oktober 1905 in « Tonhalle » umbenannt wurde. Am 25. April 1944 wurde er durch Bomben zerstört und nicht wieder aufgebaut.

Der Kaim-Saal war eine Konzerthalle in München-Maxvorstadt. Das Gebäude im Louis-Seize-Stil wurde 1895 vom Architekten Martin Dülfer errichtet, im Oktober 1905 in Tonhalle umbenannt und 1944 durch Fliegerbomben zerstört. Die Halle war eine der ersten Spielstätten der heutigen Münchner Philharmoniker, die von Franz Kaim 1893 unter dem Namen Kaim-Orchester gegründet worden waren.

Am 25. Juni 1903 fand im Saal eine Teil-Uraufführung von Arthur Schnitzlers « Reigen » statt : Der Akademisch-dramatische Verein ließ die Szenen IV bis VI in einer geschlossenen Mitgliederveranstaltung aufführen und wurde nachfolgend vom Senat der Universität aufgelöst.

Pfingsten 1907 war der Kaim-Saal der Veranstaltungsort des « Münchner Kongress » der Theosophischen Gesellschaft, durch den die Trennung Rudolf Steiners von dieser Vereinigung eingeleitet wurde.

Thomas Mann nahm im Mai 1904 in einem Brief an seine spätere Ehefrau Katia Pringsheim Bezug auf den Konzertsaal und schrieb :

« Merkwürdigerweise ist es fast immer der Kaimsaal, wo ich Sie sehe - was daher kommt, daß ich Sie früher oft dort durch das Opernglas beobachtete, bevor wir uns kannten. »

An der Stelle des Gebäudes in der Türkenstraße 5 befindet sich heute ein Bürohaus mit dem Sitz des Bayerischen Hotel- und Gaststättenverbands.

Die Firma Eberhard Friedrich Walcker erbaute 1895 als Opus 733 eine Orgel mit 50 Registern. Max Regers Choralfantasie Opus 52 Nr. 3 fand hier unter Karl Straube am 9. November 1901 ihre Uraufführung.

Kaim-Saal oder Tonhalle, Türkenstraße (1895, nicht erhalten) . Dülfer errichtete (« Kaim'scher Konzertsaal ») in der Türkenstraße 5 im Louis-Seize-Stil. Die Halle war eine der ersten Spielstätten des Kaim-Orchester des schwäbischen Dirigenden Franz Kaim. Das Orchester war Vorgänger der heutigen Münchner Philharmoniker. Der Schriftsteller Thomas Mann war ein häufiger Besucher des Konzertsaals. Dort wurde er erstmals auf Katja Pringsheim aufmerksam, die später seine Frau wurde. 1905 wurde der Kaim-Saal in Tonhalle umbenannt. Im Zweiten Weltkrieg wurde Dülfers Konzertsaal allerdings durch Fliegerbomben zerstört und ist heute nicht mehr erhalten. Stattdessen befindet sich dort heute ein Bürohaus mit dem Sitz des Bayerischen Hotel- und Gaststättenverbands.

Nicht allzu weit von dieser Hochburg künstlerischer Freiheit entfernt, an der Ecke Türkenstraße und Prinz-Ludwig-Straße, fand sich ein weiterer Anlaufpunkt für den kunstinteressierten Münchner. Die 1895 erbaute Tonhalle beherbergte die Vorgänger der heutigen Münchner Philharmoniker, das 1893 von Franz Kaim gegründete Kaim-Orchester, und galt neben dem Odeon als eine der wichtigsten Konzerthallen Münchens. Im Gegensatz zum Lokal Simplicissimus, das heute « Alter Simpl » heißt und dem man immer noch einen Besuch abstatten kann, erinnert an die im Zweiten Weltkrieg zerstörte Tonhalle nur noch eine Gedenktafel.

Anton Bruckner, Richard Strauß et Siegmund von Hausegger

These were 2 composers with whom Hausegger had an especially close connection, the former as a historical ideal, the latter as an esteemed contemporary. His acquaintance with Anton Bruckner began in 1886, when he was 14, at a performance under Karl Muck of the 7th Symphony. After the performance, he heard Bruckner improvise on the organ before a select audience after which his father toasted Bruckner, Muck and the evening's performance.

That summer, on the way to the Bayreuth Festival with his father, he renewed the acquaintance when he and his father sat with Bruckner during lunch at the Regensburg train station. Hausegger was at the world-premiere of Bruckner's 5th Symphony in Graz, under Franz Schalk, on April 8th, 1894.

When he led his 1st concert in Germany, with the Kaim Orchestra, in 1899, in addition to Beethoven's « Coriolan » Overture and his own « Dionysian Fantasia », the lion's share of the evening went to the Bruckner 7th. On December 17, 1900, he led the Munich premiere of Bruckner's mighty 8th, at one of his Modern Evenings' concerts with the Kaim Orchestra, as well as leading Bruckner performances in Berlin, Frankfurt and Hamburg. In 1929, in Munich, he helped found the local chapter of the Bruckner Society, gave lectures to the group and there, in 1931, conducted a complete Bruckner cycle.

The pinnacle of his relationship with Bruckner came on April 2nd, 1932, when, before an invited audience in Munich, he conducted 1st the Ferdinand Löwe, then the original version, of Bruckner's 9th Symphony. His most well-known performance, it was an internationally acclaimed triumph. Bruckner's original thoughts were, of course, a revelation, adding impetus to the cause of hearing his Symphonies as he'd really intended. During these times, he worked with Robert Haas and Elsa Krüger, editing the original versions of Bruckner's scores.

His devotion included participation in international Bruckner Festivals in Munich, in 1933, and in the 1934 Bruckner Festivals, in Linz and Mannheim. On October 28th, 1935, he continued his pioneering efforts with the world-premiere in Munich of Bruckner's 5th Symphony. Less fortunate, in its political context, was his directing the Finale of Bruckner's 5th at the cultural congress within the 1937 Nürnberg Party rally and, in the same year, at the dedication of Bruckner's bust in the « Walhalla », in Regensburg. Additionally, he conducted the 1938 « Bruckner-Fest » in Mannheim and, in 1939, the Greater German « Brucknerfest » , in Linz and Vienna.

In 1938, he came-out of retirement to record the original version of the Bruckner 9th with his beloved Munich Philharmonic. In addition to being an Honorary member of the International Bruckner Society, he was president of Munich local chapter and the recipient of the Bruckner Medal from the city of Linz.

« Of all modern German artists, Richard Strauß was the 1st who actively interested himself in me and my work, and ever since, he has done his utmost to forward me in my career by his active friendship. » ...

Even as an adolescent, Hausegger heard performances in Graz of Strauß' early tone poems. Given his household's zeal for Franz Liszt and Richard Wagner, a friendly reception to Strauß was guaranteed. In January 1895, when Hausegger finished his Opera « Zinnober » , he and his father went to Berlin and played it for some powers that were, including Oscar Bie, Karl Muck, Richard Strauß and Felix von Weingartner.

Strauß, favorably impressed, recommended he submit it to the Munich theatre for performance. There, in 1898, Strauß himself conducted the premiere. The performance was all an artist could wish for and Hausegger had hopes of the work entering the repertoire. Sadly, Strauß left for a position in Berlin and, without his patronage, the score became a resident of the library. When Hausegger wrote the « Dionysian Fantasia » , his 1st published Symphonic work, one of its prime influences was the sense of artistic liberation he got from hearing the early tone poems of Strauß.

The 2 were also active in the « Allgemeine Deutsche Musikverein » and the « Genöbenschaft Deutschen Tonsetzer » . The 1st organization promoted performances of modern German music ; the latter fought for composers' performing rights and royalties.

Both men had summer homes nearby one another in the Alps : Strauß, in Garmisch Partenkirchen ; and Hausegger, at Obergrainau. Thus, in the off-season, they'd visit. In 1941, Strauß gave Hausegger 2 Opera fragments : from « Semiramide » after Calderón ; and « Beloved Nausicaa » , to a Josef Gregor text, saying :

« I'm too old for these, and worn-out by 15 Operas, but you still have time. Courage and faith ! »

At that time, of course, Strauß was 77 ; Hausegger 69. One warms to the picture of these 2 veteran post-Romantic warriors, recollecting in tranquility, both no doubt dismayed at some of the paths music (and their world generally) had taken.

On one of Hausegger's last visits, the conversation turned to a discussion of the important factors in the artistic life. Beaming, Richard Strauß turned to Hella von Hausegger, to lighten the subject and asked :

« Do you know the difference between Siegi and me ? Siegi wants the stars and I want 20 marks ! »

While some of Strauß' ribbing has a touch of patronization, his statement upon hearing of Hausegger's death reflects a more enduring belief :

« With Siegmund von Hausegger departed, one of the last and best true Germans from this wretched earth. The cultural world has lost a great artist of high-caliber, with a character of rare honesty, idealistic conviction and the noblest of aspirations. I only regret that I myself am no longer able to lay on his coffin the laurel crown of which he was so worthy. »

6 avril 1932 : Le chef Felix Maria Gatz dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Le concert est commandité par la Société Anton Bruckner.

9 et 10 avril 1932 : Lors d'un concert donné à Vienne, le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Au même programme : l'Ouverture « Tannhäuser » de Wagner ; et le poème symphonique « Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche » de Strauß.

14 et 15 avril 1932 : (1er Concert de gala entourant les célébrations du 50e anniversaire de l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin) Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner. Au même programme : la Suite n° 2 de Bach, avec le flûtiste Albert Harzer ; et la première mondiale du « Philharmonisches Konzert » de Hindemith.

Lors d'une cérémonie spéciale, Furtwängler reçoit, de la part du Président Hindenburg, la Médaille d'Or « Gœthe » .

15 septembre 1932 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la 6e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Le concert est retransmis par la radio du « Reich » .

No less an interpreter of Bruckner than Günter Wand once called the 5th Symphony « the most perplexing work in the composer's canon » .

Octobre 1932 : Le chef Otto Klemperer, alors directeur musical de la « Staatskapelle » de Berlin, dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner.

Klemperer ignored a request from Wilhelm Furtwängler to substitute another Symphony to avoid duplication with the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, later in the season.

Enthusiastic reviews preferred Klemperer's « sharper outlines and clear, cooler light » to Furtwängler's « essentially Romantic » approach.

The « Berliner Börsen Courier » found that :

« Klemperer gave the enormous Symphony all the splendour of colour, the pathos, the hymn-like fervour it calls for. The structure was entirely clear, never before has one experienced the intellectual unity of the Finale so strongly, precisely because Klemperer never exaggerated. Everything was contained by a calm that comes with complete maturity. »

It was Furtwängler who had to change his programme that season.

Under Otto Klemperer, performances of the 5th Symphony (which he had substantially to re-learn when the new Robert Haas edition restored a 122 bar cut in the Finale) were always something of an event, even if audiences outside Austria and Germany (especially, American ones in the late-1930's, and Walter Legge in the 1950's) at 1st found the work something of a trial.

26 octobre 1932 : Le chef Felix Maria Gatz dirige la 5e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin. Le concert est commandité par la Société Anton Bruckner.

24 novembre 1932 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec la Philharmonie, à Berlin. Au même programme, de Mozart : l'Ouverture « die Zauberflöte » et la Symphonie n° 38. Le concert est commandité par la ville de Berlin.

27 et 28 novembre 1932 : Le chef Wilhelm Fürtwängler dirige la 4e Symphonie de Bruckner avec la Philharmonie, à Berlin. Au même programme : la Symphonie n° 38 de Mozart ; le baryton allemand Heinrich Schlusnus interprète des airs de Durante, Gluck, Giordani et Carissimi (série : « Philharmonisches Konzert ») .

1er décembre 1932 : Le chef Bruno Walter dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la première de la version originale de la 9e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 6e concert de la saison.

7 décembre 1932 : Le chef Eugen Jochum dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

9 décembre 1932 : Le chef Otto Siebert dirige la 7e Symphonie de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin.

1933

1933 : (Photo) Adolf Hitler listens to radio broadcast of the results of German parliamentary elections. The Nazi Party wins 43.9 % , the Nationalists (DNVP) 8 % , for a majority between them ; after the Communist deputies are arrested or forced underground the Nazis themselves have a majority.

1er janvier 1933 : Le chef Otto Klemperer dirige à la « Großer Saal » le « Leipzig Gewandhaus Orchester » dans la 5e Symphonie d'Anton Bruckner. Il s'agit du 9e concert de la saison.

30 janvier 1933 : Arrivée de Adolf Hitler au pouvoir.

Adolf Hitler est appelé à la Chancellerie (un poste équivalent à celui de Premier ministre) .

Le président de la République, le vieux maréchal Paul von Hindenburg (86 ans) , demande à Hitler (43 ans) , chef ou « Führer » du Parti national-socialiste allemand (le « NSDAP » , en abrégé nazi) de former le nouveau gouvernement allemand. C'est l'aboutissement inattendu d'un parcours cahotique marqué par de nombreux revers.

Tractations indignes

La nomination surprenante de Hitler fait suite à des tractations menées par le docteur Hjalmar Schacht. Ce dernier est un financier réputé. Ancien président de la « Reichsbank » , il est à l'origine du redressement spectaculaire de l'économie allemande après la crise monétaire de 1923, « l'année inhumaine » .

Avec quelques autres sommités du monde économique, il demande par lettre à Hindenburg de nommer à la chancellerie le « chef du groupe national le plus nombreux » , autrement dit Hitler. Il y voit le moyen de détourner les masses populaires des communistes et de les rallier à la République de Weimar ! Il est vrai qu'en 1932, l'horreur absolue est représentée par le communisme. À défaut d'être informés des méfaits de Joseph Staline, les Démocrates gardent un souvenir horrifié de la République des Conseils à Munich comme de la dictature de Bela Kun, en Hongrie, et de la guerre civile en Russie, une dizaine d'années plus tôt.

Les dirigeants allemands, qui ont perdu la confiance des citoyens à cause de leur politique de « déflation » , espèrent que Hitler saura s'opposer à la menace d'une prise de pouvoir bolchévique, rétablir l'autorité de l'État et agir en personne responsable.

Hjalmar Schacht organise une rencontre entre le chancelier Franz von Papen et Adolf Hitler, le 4 janvier 1933, dans une villa mise à disposition par le banquier Kurt von Schröder.

À la suite de celle-ci, von Papen soutient la nomination de Hitler comme chancelier sous réserve que lui-même soit vice-chancelier et qu'il n'y ait que 2 autres Nazis au gouvernement. Ce seront Wilhelm Frick, ministre de l'Intérieur du « Reich » , et Hermann Göring, ministre sans portefeuille, par ailleurs ministre de l'Intérieur du « Land » de Prusse.

Von Papen et les Conservateurs espèrent se servir du « Führer » nazi pour enrayer la menace communiste. Pleins d'illusions, ils croient pouvoir le garder en main. Son Parti est, en effet, en perte de vitesse depuis les élections législatives du 6 novembre 1932 qui lui ont valu 33,1 % des suffrages, au lieu de 37,3 % en juillet. Il a perdu 2 millions de voix sur un total de 17 millions, en 4 mois.

Le nouveau chancelier constitue de la façon la plus légale un gouvernement largement ouvert aux représentants de la droite classique. Il ne compte que 3 Nazis, Hitler compris. Von Papen est lui-même vice-chancelier. Faute de majorité absolue au Parlement, Hitler paraît loin de pouvoir gouverner à son aise. Personne ne prend au sérieux ses discours racistes. Beaucoup d'Allemands pensent, par contre, qu'il peut redresser le pays en proie à la crise économique.

Course à la dictature

Avec une rapidité foudroyante et par des moyens tout à fait illégaux, Hitler va asseoir sa dictature en dépit de la faible représentation de son Parti au gouvernement et au « Reichstag » .

Dès le lendemain de son investiture à la Chancellerie, Hitler dissout le « Reichstag » et prépare de nouvelles élections pour le 5 mars 1933. Dans le même temps, il trace ce que son chef de la propagande, Josef Goebbels, appelle « les grandes lignes de la lutte armée contre la terreur rouge » .

Hitler salue Hindenburg à Postdam, le 21 mars 1933. Les miliciens de son Parti, les Sections d'Assaut (SA) , terrorisent l'opposition en guise de campagne électorale (ils commettent pour le moins 51 assassinats) .

Ils bénéficient de la position-clé de l'un des principaux acolytes de Hitler, à savoir Hermann Göring.

Celui-ci est ministre de l'Intérieur du principal État allemand, la Prusse, et il en profite pour manipuler la police, révoquer les fonctionnaires hostiles, placer des Nazis aux postes essentiels.

Hitler fait planer le spectre de la « révolution bolchevique » mais celle-ci tardant à éclater, il décide de l'inventer. Le 24 février, une descente de police au siège du Parti communiste allemand permet à Göring d'annoncer la saisie de documents annonçant ladite révolution. Mais ces documents ne seront jamais publiés.

Comme toute cette agitation ne semble pas suffire à rallier une majorité de suffrages aux Nazis, ces derniers décident, en conséquence, de brûler l'édifice du « Reichstag » .

Les 9es élections fédérales allemandes de la République de Weimar eurent lieu le 5 mars 1933. Elles auront été la dernière consultation électorale libre en Allemagne avant la Seconde Guerre mondiale. En raison du succès du Parti nazi, son dirigeant et chancelier de l'Allemagne, Adolf Hitler, a été en mesure de recourir à l'Acte générateur, qui lui a donné des pouvoirs équivalents à ceux d'un dictateur.

L'élection a eu lieu peu de temps après l'incendie du « Reichstag » , le parlement allemand, apparemment par un communiste conseiller hollandais, Marinus van der Lubbe. Cependant, certains historiens ont affirmé que cet incendie avait été commandité par Hitler afin de discréditer les militants communistes du KPD, l'accident ayant été perpétré par des hommes appartenant à un groupe de SA. Cet événement a eu l'effet conjoint d'un abaissement de la popularité du Parti communiste (KPD), tout en permettant à Hitler de persuader le Président Paul von Hindenburg (1847-1934) de signer le décret dit « Incendie du Reichstag ». Cette loi d'urgence a supprimé bien des libertés civiles et a permis l'arrestation arbitraire des dirigeants du KPD peu avant l'élection, la répression du vote communiste et la consolidation du Régime nazi. Cet événement a eu pour nombre d'historiens, un impact majeur sur le résultat des élections.

Dans les zones à l'est de l'Elbe, les Nazis obtiennent plus de 50 % des voix. À Berlin et Hambourg, ils en obtiennent moins de 35 %.

En dépit de la forte progression des Nazis par rapport aux élections de novembre 1932, ces derniers, avec 43,9 % des suffrages, n'ont pas atteint les 50 % comme Hitler l'avait espéré. Par conséquent, celui-ci a été contraint de maintenir sa coalition avec le Parti national du peuple allemand pour contrôler la majorité au parlement. En outre, Hitler a besoin d'une majorité des 2/3 pour obtenir le vote de l'Acte générateur (une loi qui lui permettrait d'en promulguer d'autres sans consulter le « Reichstag »), qu'il a acquise après avoir persuadé le Parti du centre de voter en sa faveur. Le projet de loi a été voté le 23 mars. Seuls les Sociaux-Démocrates se sont opposés à la mesure, qui est entrée en vigueur le 27 mars, en tenant compte du fait que certains députés Sociaux-Démocrates ont été empêchés de siéger par les SA. Les députés communistes, représentant 17 % des effectifs du « Reichstag », ont été arrêtés avant le vote pour leur rôle suspect dans l'incendie du « Reichstag ». Bien que l'Acte générateur ne fût censé être effectif que pendant 4 ans, il a été officiellement prolongé à 2 reprises. Le SPD et le KPD ont rapidement été déclarés hors-la-loi, et l'Allemagne s'est fermement établie comme une dictature.

Juif et membre d'un courant artistique que le régime nazi considérait comme « dégénéré », Arnold Schönberg est contraint de fuir son pays. En 1933, après un court séjour en France (où il se reconvertisse au judaïsme à la synagogue de la rue Copernic, à Paris), il est à New York et Boston où il enseigne au « Malkin Conservatory ».

Aux États-Unis, Schönberg esquissera même un projet de sauvetage des juifs d'Europe et pour le réaliser, évoquera même la possibilité d'abandonner la musique ; mais ce projet ne se réalisera pas. Au cours de la dernière décennie de sa vie, il tentera de proposer un nouveau type de liturgie juive, et même une reformulation complète de certaines prières (le « Kol Nidre », prière qui ouvre le « Yom Kippour »).

The coming to power of Adolf Hitler and the Nazis causes the emigration of many Jewish musicians from Europe, including Arnold Schönberg and Erich Wolfgang Korngold, who settle in Los Angeles, and Bruno Walter, who goes to New York. Schönberg converts back to Judaism, in 1933, and vehemently re-affirms his Jewish ancestry ; he also changes the spelling of his name to « Schönberg » because of the lack of umlauts on American typewriters.

Erich Wolfgang Korngold's chief occupation in America is composing film-scores for such 1930's Warner Brothers

Classics as « The Sea Hawk » and « Captain Blood » - his style sets the tone for the sound of Hollywood soundtracks into the 1950's, and enjoys a big revival again, after 1977, with John Williams's « Star Wars » , whose main theme is almost a carbon-copy of Korngold's « King's Row » .

...

Arnold Schönberg continued in his post until the Nazis came to power under Adolf Hitler, in 1933. While vacationing in France, he was warned that returning to Germany would be dangerous. Schönberg formally reclaimed membership in the Jewish religion at a Paris synagogue, then traveled with his family to the United States. However, this happened only after his attempts to move to Britain came to nothing. He enlisted the aid of his former student and great champion Edward Clark, now a senior producer with the BBC, in helping him gain a British teaching post or even a British publisher, but to no avail.

His 1st teaching position in the United States was at the Malkin Conservatory, in Boston. He moved to Los Angeles, where he taught at the University of Southern California and the University of California, Los Angeles, both of which later named a music building on their respective campuses Schönberg Hall (UCLA Department of Music, 2008 ; University of Southern California Thornton School of Music, 2008) . He was appointed visiting professor at UCLA, in 1935, on the recommendation of Otto Klemperer, music-director and conductor of the Los Angeles Philharmonic Orchestra ; and, the next year, was promoted to professor at a salary of $ 5,100.00 per year, which enabled him, in either May 1936 or 1937, to buy a Spanish Revival house at number 116 North Rockingham in Brentwood Park, near the UCLA campus, for $ 18,000.00 . This address was directly across the street from Shirley Temple's house and, there, he befriended fellow composer (and tennis partner) George Gershwin. The Schönbergs were able to employ domestic help and began holding Sunday afternoon gatherings that were known for excellent coffee and Viennese pastries. Frequent guests included Otto Klemperer (who studied composition privately with Schönberg, beginning in April 1936) , Edgard Varèse, Joseph Achron, Louis Gruenberg, Ernst Toch and, on occasion, well-known actors such as Harpo Marx and Peter Lorre. Composers Leonard Rosenman and George Tremblay studied with Schönberg, at this time.

After his move to the United States, in 1934, the composer used the alternative spelling of his surname « Schönberg » , rather than « Schœnberg » , in what he called « deference to American practice » , though according to one writer, he 1st made the change a year earlier.

He lived there the rest of his life but, at 1st, he was not settled. In around 1934, he applied for a position of teacher of harmony and theory at the New South Wales State Conservatorium, in Sydney. The Director, Edgar Bainton, rejected him for being Jewish and for having « modernist ideas and dangerous tendencies » . Schönberg also, at one time, explored the idea of emigrating to New Zealand. His secretary and student (and nephew of Schönberg's mother-in-law Henriette Kolisch) , was Richard (Dick) Hoffmann Junior, Viennese-born but who lived in New Zealand from 1935 to 1947, and Schönberg had, since childhood, been fascinated with islands, and with New Zealand in particular, possibly because of the beauty of the postage stamps issued by that country.

During this final period, he composed several notable works, including the difficult Violin Concerto, Opus 36 (1934-1936) ; the « Kol Nidre » , Opus 39, for chorus and orchestra (1938) ; the « Ode to Napoleon Buonaparte » , Opus 41 (1942) ; the haunting Piano Concerto, Opus 42 (1942) ; and his memorial to the victims of the Holocaust, « A Survivor from Warsaw » , Opus 46 (1947) . He was unable to complete his Opera, « Moses und Aron » (1932-1933) , which was one of the 1st works of its genre written completely using dodecaphonic composition. Along with 12 tone music, Schœnberg also returned to tonality with works during his last period, like the Suite for Strings in G major (1935) ; the « Chamber Symphony » No. 2 in E-flat minor, Opus 38 (begun in 1906, completed in 1939) ; the « Variations on a Recitative » in D minor, Opus 40 (1941) . During this period, his notable students included John Cage and Lou Harrison.

23 juin 1933 : Le chef Alfred Sittard dirige la Grande Messe en fa mineur (WAB 28) de Bruckner avec l'Orchestre philharmonique de Berlin, accompagné du Chœur de l'Académie de Musique. Les solistes : Thea Consbruch, Elisabeth Höngen, Julius Katona, Carl Schlottmann.

Alfred Sittard

Alfred Sittard was born in Stuttgart, in 1878.

The German « Kantor » and composer of church music Alfred Sittard was born on 4 November 1878 in Stuttgart and died on 31 March 1942 in Berlin. He was one of the greatest organists of his time.

Sittard studied in Cologne under F. W. Franke and became organist at the « Dresden Kreuzkirche » in 1903, then, in 1912, organist at the « Sankt Michaelis-Kirche », in Hamburg. In 1925, he became professor of organ studies at the « Universität der Künste » in Berlin, where he died in 1942. In his lifetime, he was considered one of the foremost organ virtuosos in Germany. Due to his influence through his teaching post in Berlin, he is a direct connection to the Berlin Organ School of the late-19th Century and early-20th Century among others like Max Reger and Karl Straube.

The solo recordings of Alfred Sittard were recorded from 1928 to 1932. The 1st 6 tracks were recorded in « Alten Garnisonkirche », in Berlin, and the others were recorded at the Eberhard Friedrich Walcker organ of the « Sankt Michaelis-Kirche », in Hamburg. Alfred Sittard was involved in the construction of this 163 stop organ, in 1912. The organ was heavily damaged during the Second World War and, in 1962, the G. F. Steinmeyer & Co. build a completely new organ. These recordings are, in that way also, historical documents preserving the sound of this instrument.

The Händel organ concert was recorded with the Berlin Philharmonic under the young conductor Leopold Ludwig (1908-1979) , in 1938, probably somewhere in Berlin, but I haven't been able to find the location.

These recordings show a great musicianship, excellent sense for drama and a virtuoso technical ability. All the recordings are of the highest-musical quality, but worth mentioning is his Johann Sebastian Bach Toccata and fugue in D minor, which really shows his dramatic skills, and his Franz Liszt « Ad nos » where modern listeners will notice the extreme liberties he takes all over the performance !

Technical note : There are some slight pitch problems in some of the recordings. For example, in the Liszt « Ad nos » , the 2 sides of the performance were not played back at the exact same speed, but Claus Byrith is working on the problem.

These recordings have, as far as I know, never been issued on another medium than the original « Polydor » 78rpms, so, this is an unique chance to hear the almost forgotten art of the great German virtuoso organist Alfred Sittard.

Great thanks to Michæl Gartz for providing these recordings and to Claus Byrith for post-transfer editing, cutting and cleaning using the CEDAR-technology.

Alfred Sittard (geboren 4. November 1878 in Stuttgart ; gestorben 31. März 1942 in Berlin) war ein deutscher Kantor, Komponist für Kirchenmusik und einer der bedeutendsten Organisten seiner Zeit.

Sittard war Schüler seines Vaters, des Musikpädagogen und Musikwissenschaftlers Josef Sittard (1846-1903) , sowie des Hamburger Petri-Kantors Wilhelm Köhler-Wümbach (1858-1926) und des Petri-Organisten Carl Armbrust (1849-1896) .

1896, nach dem frühen Tod Armbrusts, übernahm er noch als Primaner des Johanneums dessen Amt. Von 1897 bis 1901 studierte Sittard am Konservatorium Köln bei Friedrich Wilhelm Franke. 1902 wurde er mit dem Mendelssohn-Preis ausgezeichnet. 1903 wurde er Organist der Kreuzkirche in Dresden, 1912 dann Organist an der gerade wiederaufgebauten Kirche Sankt Michælis in Hamburg mit der damals größten Kirchenorgel von Eberhard Friedrich Walcker. Er gründete den Chor an der Michælis-Kirche. 1925 erfolgte die Berufung als Professor an die Berliner Musikakademie. Ab 1933 war er zudem der Direktor des Staats- und Domchors Berlin.

Zum 1. April 1942 wollte er in den Ruhestand wechseln, verstarb aber überraschend an seinem letzten Arbeitstag.

Es gibt von Sittard zahlreiche Einspielungen auf Schellackplatten und auf Notenrollen für die Philharmonieorgeln der Firma M. Welte & Söhne. Sein Name wird mit der 1974 gegründeten Sittard-Stiftung, die auch Stipendien an minderbemittelte Orgelstudierende vergibt, an der Universität der Künste Berlin in Erinnerung gehalten. Sein Grab (Familiengrab) ist auf dem Hamburger Friedhof Ohlsdorf.

Seine weiteren Stationen : Operndirektor in Mönchengladbach, Opernchef am Opernhaus Zürich, bis 1939 Generalmusikdirektor der Kölner Oper und Leiter des Städtischen Orchesters Berlin. In Berlin prägte er gemeinsam mit Wilhelm Fürtwängler das dortige Musikleben. Das Kriegsende erlebte er in Zagreb, wo er als Opernchef und Chefdirigent der Zagreber Philharmonie tätig war. Danach war er am Wiederaufbau der Grazer Oper beteiligt. Gastspiele führten Zaun durch ganz Europa und nach Südamerika. Seine Lieblingskomponisten waren Richard Wagner, Richard Strauß, Hans Pfitzner und Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, deren Werke er immer wieder aufführte, vor allem an der Rheinoper, für deren künstlerisches Niveau er (gemeinsam mit Alberto Erede, Hermann Juch und Grischa Barfuss) in den 1960er und 1970er Jahren mitverantwortlich war. Sein letztes Dirigat war eine Aufführung des Fliegenden Holländers in Düsseldorf.

The « Bruckner Gesamtausgabe »

During the 1930's and 1940's scholar Alfred Orel had been an original member of the editorial staff of the Bruckner « Gesamtausgabe » (Complete Edition) . (12) In 1936, he criticized the new edition for what he saw as its unjustified rejection of previous editions, particularly those that had been published with Bruckner's apparent consent and approval. (13) Orel was joined by 2 European expatriates writing for English-language publications, Egon Wellesz and Werner Wolff. (14) Wellesz, in particular, questioned the credibility of the notion that the printed editions did not represent Bruckner's intentions. He suggested (quite rightly, I believe) that, far from being falsifications, the early editions embody a different, later phase of the creative process, one that was more responsive to practical considerations. Both Wellesz and Orel struck upon the central issue : there is no conclusive evidence that Bruckner considered the early printed scores inauthentic.

The editors of the « Gesamtausgabe » also realized that the dismissal of the 1st editions was not defensible purely on the basis of textual evidence. To justify their position, they combined biographical and psychological interpretation in support of an idealist theory of textuality. (15) All professions of objectivity notwithstanding, ideology as much as scholarship shaped the preparation, reception, and legitimization of the new edition. By the late-1930's, the « Gesamtausgabe » had been overtly politicized by the Nazi Government and had come to hold an esteemed place in the official culture industry. (16) The process crystallized with Josef Gœbbels' speech at the 1937 Regensburg Bruckner Festival, when he declared that, since Bruckner's Symphonies were a precious national legacy, the Bruckner Society would, henceforth, receive an annual contribution to support the editing of the « original versions » . Gœbbels not only offered financial support to the « Gesamtausgabe » , he granted it Adolf Hitler's « imprimatur » .

The « Führer » and his government consider it a cultural debt of honour to do all that is within their power to permit the whole German people to share (Bruckner's) blessed heritage and, by means of a large-scale promotion of Bruckner-cultivation, assist its effects to penetrate not only deeply, but broadly. On these grounds, they have decided to make a substantial annual contribution to the International Bruckner Society for the editing of the original versions of his Symphonies until the complete works of the Master are produced in the form he envisioned. (17)

This frank politicizing played a formative role in developing the crucial notion that all earlier editions of Bruckner's Symphonies were « inauthentic » and needed to be replaced by « original » texts. The editorial policies of the new edition, often riddled with historiographic contradictions, cannot be understood without reference to the ideological context of Austro-German musicology and Bruckner reception of the 1930's and 1940's.

The Ideological Context

It is no secret that the 1930's witnessed the darkest chapter in the history of Bruckner reception. The persona of Anton Bruckner and his music figured importantly in the cultural pantheon of National-Socialism. (18) Many of the facts are familiar. Bruckner's music was routinely featured at mass rallies and in radio broadcasts. The Nazi government supported Bruckner Festivals, including the notorious 1937 Regensburg Festival at which Adolf Hitler received the medal of honour of the International Bruckner Society. Propagandizing about Bruckner was prevalent : Josef Gœbbels described Bruckner as a symbol of « the spiritual and psychic community of destiny, insoluble even to this day, that unites the entire German people » . (19) The Nazi appropriation of Bruckner was thorough even by the standards of its time and place. As Mathias Hansen wrote :

« No other musician, not even Richard Wagner or Richard Strauß, indeed, no other great artist of the past became so unconditionally and totally occupied by fascist ideology as did Bruckner. » (20)

The glorification of Bruckner was reflected in both, musical and critical practice. His music was widely performed and scholarly activity devoted to the composer increased markedly, particularly in 1935 and 1936, with the outbreak of the « Bruckner-Streit » (debate) , as the debate over the « Gesamtausgabe » became public. (21) Scores of articles on Bruckner and his music also appeared in the non-specialist press. During this era, critical writing about Bruckner resonated loudly with many of the cultural tendencies that underlay National-Socialism. 2 paradigmatic manifestations were the prevalence of blatantly ideological representations of Bruckner as an Aryan hero and the identification of Bruckner's music with a mythical, lost spirituality. These critical themes were often allied with the highly-charged metaphor of cultural rebirth. In 1936, for example, Max Auer argued that Bruckner's music offered a remedy to the modern corruptions that threatened German culture. He suggested that, as « the guide to a beautiful, spiritual world » and a « return to the pure sources » , Bruckner's music offered potential salvation from the pressing dangers of « crass materialism » and « artistic Bolshevism » . (22) An even more overtly political view can be seen in Fritz Skorzeny's article, « Anton Bruckner im Lichte deutscher Auferstehung » . (23) Skorzeny allied the increased popularity of Bruckner's music with the imagined « resurrection » of the German spirit effected by National-Socialism. He claimed these phenomena were 2 sides of 1 coin : the source of the new « understanding » and « love » of Bruckner's music was the rebirth of the German « Volksgeist » :

« It was reserved for our age, to experience for the 1st time, with the deepest emotion, the break of dawn light, the great “ Awake, the day is nigh ”. In this light, the miracle of Anton Bruckner is fulfilled. » (24)

« Völkisch » critical strategies were not confined to the margins of the critical discourse about Bruckner. A broad spectrum of the musicological discussion of Bruckner was infused with rhetoric of this sort. Consider, for example, the « Einleitung » of Robert Haas' influential biography :

« Anton Bruckner's artistic appearance presents a tightly bound essential unity of life and work of such keenly marked and extraordinary mental attitude, that its significance reaches far beyond purely musical concerns. In the age of machines and materialism, it contains the full primordial power of German mysticism and allows its soulful fervor and ardor (“ ihre seelentiefe Inbrunst and Glut ”) to shine forth ... » (25)

Following comments on Bruckner's profoundly German nature and comparisons with such icons of the German anti-modernist right as Meister Eckhardt, Jacob Böhm, and Rainer Maria Rilke. Haas closed his essay :

« This (Bruckner's) “ Weltanschauung ” is fully and thoroughly grounded in the German essence, its musical setting allows the German soul to stream forth unclouded ; every cosmopolitan refinement and every admixture of foreign blood (“ jeder weltbürgerliche Schliff und jede fremde Blutmischun ”) is absent, as by a law of nature. Even the formative experience of Catholicism left no traces. Hence, the Germans' impetuous, drunken love for this Master is as understandable as is the reserve of other nations. » (26)

In hindsight, the ideological biases of such critical positions are so clearly bound-up with the culture of Nazism that, today, no responsible person would lend them any real credence. (27)

The Origins

The roots of the controversy over the authenticity of the early printed editions extend back to the 1920's, when scholars began to suspect that the available editions might be unreliable. The issue was raised for the 1st time, in 1919, in an article entitled, « Wichtige Aufgaben der Musikwissenschaft gegenüber Anton Bruckner » by Georg Göhler, a German conductor and scholar. (28) He argued that the published scores of Bruckner's Symphonies were so poorly prepared that they made performance unnecessarily difficult ; a new critical edition was needed. (29) His perspective was that of a performer, rather than a scholar or philologist ; his call for an edition that reflected « what Bruckner himself had originally written » was not based on evidence drawn from Bruckner's manuscripts. Rather, Göhler argued that inconsistencies in certain published editions (such as prevalent errors in the orchestral parts of the 6th Symphony and discrepancies between the published orchestral score and piano score of the same Symphony) were indicative of sloppy work by Bruckner's publishers (« Verlagsschlamperei ») . He felt that an edition based on Bruckner's manuscript texts would allow conductors discretion about what to alter in performance. (30)

...

Despite appeals to the authority of Bruckner's will, the fact that most of these editions appeared in Bruckner's lifetime, and that he attended several performances of them, posed a difficult problem for supporters of the new edition. It was downplayed by situating it in largely fictitious biographical narrative. The story is familiar : Bruckner was a naive and simple soul, ill-suited to worldly affairs and, as such, was manipulated, duped, and even coerced by his young associates, especially Franz and Josef Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe. They adapted and arranged Bruckner's Symphonies to suit both contemporary fashion and practical expedience and then, so the story goes, imposed these revisions on the composer. (42)

Often, the plot was given a psychological twist : Bruckner's self-confidence was so deeply shaken by his lack of public success and, particularly, by Hermann Levi's rejection of the 8th Symphony, in October 1887, that he was rendered even more vulnerable to manipulation by opportunistic schemers. Editions of 6 of Bruckner's Symphonies appeared between the crisis of October 1887 and the composer's death, in 1896. (43) These publications were particularly suspect, since they were prepared at a time when Bruckner was supposedly unusually susceptible to untoward influence. (44)

The motivations of Bruckner's young associates were variously interpreted. Often, they were considered well-meaning, if misguided, attempts to promote Bruckner's music by making it more palatable to popular taste. Other interpretations were less charitable : in a lecture, Robert Haas went so far as to claim, without demonstrable evidence, that Bruckner was under the sway of « sanctions » threatened by the Schalks and Löwe. (45) And, although, he later claimed to have been misunderstood, several who attended the lecture heard Haas suggest that the shock Bruckner experienced upon the 1st printed edition of his 5th Symphony (1895) contributed to his death, in the following year. (46)

Whatever their specific details, such psycho-biographical explanations served 2 purposes. They distanced the 1st editions from Bruckner's « real intentions » and provided the new editors with a moral imperative. The 1st prints were not the product of « inner, artistic reasoning » , but the result of the influence of men who were unsympathetic to Bruckner's « robust, austere and organ-like instrumentation » . (47) Publication of the « original » versions of Bruckner's Symphonies was, thus, seen as more than the rectification of textual mistakes or sloppy editing : it was the correction of an injustice that had been visited upon one of the greatest and noblest of all « German » artists.

Ideology and Legitimation

Historical and biographical arguments were only part of the discourse that legitimized the « Gesamtausgabe » . A large body of secondary criticism grew-up in support of its editorial claims. This literature depended on a complex set of ideological and æsthetic assumptions. Some of the notions are, although questionable by present critical standards, morally unobjectionable : an idealist view that artworks transcend the material facts of their production ; a notion of authorship as the free play of genius ; and a belief that the basic goal of editing should be to produce a hypothetical « Urtext » . One set of premises was not so innocent : the pursuit of imagined textual purity was often couched in terms of one of the main cultural psychoses of National-Socialism, the obsession with racial purity.

The Nazi preoccupation with race affected the editing of Bruckner's music in 2 ways. On one level, by representing (literally re-presenting) the untainted « German » texts, the « Gesamtausgabe » manifested a desire to free Bruckner's works from the specter of an imagined history of Jewish influence. (48) In his post-War critique of the « Gesamtausgabe » , Emil Armbruster pointed-out that anti-Semitism was a formative premise of the edition :

« The defamation of Löwe and Schalk as “ Jews and allies of Jews ” (“ Juden and Judengenossen ”) had a determining influence on the position of the government of the “ Reich ” : Bruckner in Jewish hands, sultry eroticism dragged into nordic, “ Übermensch heroism ” (“ nordisch-übermenschlichen Heroismus ”) - this musical miscegenation must be put to an end, once and for all ! » (49)

The involvement of Löwe and the Schalk brothers was, at times, discussed and dismissed - in racial terms. (50) Max Auer, for instance, cast aspersions on the 1st prints as reflecting the unacceptable influence of « overly refined city-dwellers » (« überkultivierte Städter ») , a coded term for Jews. Between the lines of Auer's argument lay the claim that such individuals were incapable of understanding the essence of Bruckner, who was « deeply rooted in the healthy earth of his Upper-Austrian home » . (51)

One function of the « Gesamtausgabe » was to remove Bruckner's scores from the purview of the Viennese publishing house Universal-Edition. In the decade after its founding, in 1900, this firm had acquired the copyrights to all of Bruckner's Symphonies and most of his large choral works. (52) Since Universal-Edition had long been a target for reactionary critics who identified it with such taboos as modernism, atonality, Bolshevism, and Judaism, it is not surprising that the Nazis would have been eager to dissociate Bruckner from the firm. (53) Nor should it be forgotten that, with the « Anschluß » and subsequent relocation of the « Musikwissenschaftlicher Verlag » , from Vienna to Leipzig in 1938, the 3rd « Reich » was able to claim the royalties that accrued from the performance of Bruckner's music.

At a deeper ideological level (one that is, perhaps, part of the cultural unconscious, but no less important) the desire to remove all « foreign » traces from the texts of Bruckner's compositions and to present pure, metaphysically authentic versions resonated with the myth of racial purity. This notion echoes disturbingly in an essay, from 1937, by Rolf Pergler on the relative merits of the early printed editions and the « Gesamtausgabe » . (54) Here, the metaphor of purity is transposed from a sociological to a textual plane. Pergler claimed that Bruckner's works were governed by the truth of the « Brucknerian formal principle » (« das Brucknersche Gestaltungsprinzip ») ; accordingly, textual contaminations or, as he called them, « foreign bodies » (« Fremdkörper ») could be identified by their lack of harmony with the overall form and eliminated. (55) In Pergler's formulation, textual accretions were analogous to the threat to the German people by the presence of non-Aryan blood. (56) Today, Pergler's desire to « eliminate » « foreign bodies » cannot fail to invoke chilling images.

Another tactic was to explain the intrinsic « authenticity » of the newly available « original versions » on the basis of stylistic criteria. (57) Although such studies were not overtly politicized, they were not free of ideological bias. The ideals of objective research were anathema to the principles of National-Socialism. (58) Like much of the scholarship produced in the 3rd « Reich » , they were marred by circular logic : premises were based on conclusions and vice-versa. Such scholarship was often couched in what Theodor Adorno later called, « the jargon of authenticity » . (59) This rhetorical approach, which was allied with reactionary anti-modernism, appealed to the mythology of the sacredness of the genuine, the rooted or, in Martin Heidegger's words, « the splendor of the simple » . (60) Adorno wrote :

« Its language is a trademark of societalized chosenness, noble and homey, at once. » (61)

Rhetoric replaced critical argument. Dense tangles of prose substituted for intellectual depth.

Fritz Öser, for example, opens his book, « Die Klangstruktur der Bruckner Symphonie » , with 2 opaque sections, « On the Situation of Bruckner Interpretation » and « On the Concept of Structure » . He argued that the investigation of the originality and authenticity of Bruckner's works needed to be reframed by moving away from objective empiricism and historiography toward a sort of existential phenomenology :

« All questions concerning the human nature of (the works') creator, his fate in time and surroundings and his historical position must remain “ bracketed ” for the purposes of analysis and the “ Werkgestalt ” must be regarded as a (provisionally) unique case offering information about Bruckner's personal style. » (62)

Öser's odd alliance between phenomenological and historical comprehension betrays a vicious hermeneutic circularity. He argued that the « simply “ given ” of the musical work » is « perceptible to the senses » , but, « it receives its fullness of sense and meaning from the spiritual “ background ” , which is, in turn, secreted in the manifest sounding object (“ im klingenden Realgebilde ”) and is accessible only through this manifest object » . (63) Since Öser's concept of structure encompassed not only formal criteria but also the « spiritual basis » of the artwork, he was able to posit that engagement with the phenomenal reality of a composition could lead to understanding of its historical dimensions. « Art observation » alone (without recourse to the compositional history of the piece or its « Wirkungsgeschichte ») could ascertain the « content » of an artwork. (64)

Friedrich Herzfeld wondered if it was already considered « blasphemy » to raise reasonable arguments against the text-critical claims of the « Gesamtausgabe » . (75) Friedrich Klose wrote that, even « at the danger of excommunication » , he preferred the 1st edition of the 9th Symphony to the new one. (76)

Perhaps, the most important victim of this doctrinaire climate was Alfred Orel. At just the time, he must have been formulating the dissent he articulated in « Original und Bearbeitung bei Anton Bruckner » , his name ceased to appear in publications associated with the « Gesamtausgabe » , and his direct involvement with the project ended. As Franz Grasberger has suggested, Orel may well have been removed from his editorial position precisely because of his refusal to take a position against the 1st editions. (77) By stifling the « sine qua non » of rigorous scholarship (open debate about evidence and its interpretation) , orthodoxy compromised the entire project. (78)

Conclusion

Despite many advances in text criticism of Bruckner's music in the post-War era (including, above all, those of Leopold Nowak) , one shadow from the 1930's remains. As a rule, scholars and performers continue to accept as fact the central premise of the « Gesamtausgabe » that autograph manuscripts alone represent the « real » Bruckner and that these are the only texts that matter. As we have seen, the historical justification for this position is tenuous. In the case of some works, the notion that Bruckner was not involved in the publication process is incorrect. (79) For example, although the « Stichvorlage » of the 4th Symphony was not an autograph manuscript, the composer played a major role in its preparation. (80)

Almost every page contains his hand-writing. Bruckner's personal calendar refers to his work on this score and, in at least 2 letters, he accepted responsibility for the new version. (81) On 15 May 1888, he signed a contract with Albert J. Gutmann, authorizing its publication. (82)

In the past decade, the theoretical basis for editing texts has been subject to considerable re-examination. (83) In particular, idealist models of authorship and textuality and the pursuit of a metaphysically pure and authentic « Urtext » have been criticized as conceptually naive and historically inappropriate. More recent (and, I believe, more theoretically cogent) critical models of textuality compel us to regard the authorship and production of texts in their historical and cultural complexity. From this perspective, « Urtext » editing is unacceptably compromised by its premises : its final textual product hides as much as it reveals. As Jerome McGann observed :

« The chief difficulties emerge when textual criticism has the effect of desocializing our historical view of the literary work. When we make decisions about the condition and significance of various texts on the simple criterion of the author's (final) intention, we foster serious misconceptions about the nature of literary production. Too many relevant aspects of the literary work are de-emphasized, or even abstracted from the critical view altogether, when we operate on such a principle. » (84)

Accepting the creation and production of published musical texts as social phenomena renders untenable any categorical assertion that Bruckner's intentions can be represented only by private, manuscript sources. Bruckner did collaborate with other people (copyists, engravers, editors, proof-readers, friends, advisors) when he published his scores, but simply to reject these texts in search of a « pure, original » text is to go too far, too quickly. That scholars have, for more than half a Century, been willing to do so reflects the continued influence of the text-critical ideology of the 1st Bruckner « Gesamtausgabe ». The dismissal of the 1st editions has, in effect, become an inherited dogma ; in the process, it has assumed an undeserved mantle of truth and thus escaped critical skepticism.

It is not the objective of this study to advocate a wholesale abandonment of modern critical editions of Bruckner's music. Rather, it is to remind scholars and performers that the composer's autograph manuscripts are not the only valid or historically important sources. (85) The early printed editions deserve to be studied. Their merits as authentic Bruckner must be re-assessed, and their potential as evidence about areas that are only imperfectly understood, including Bruckner's role in the publication of his Symphonies and his evolving approach to revision and contemporary performance practice needs to be considered. We cannot hope to understand Bruckner's music in all of its historical and æsthetic complexity, until we have studied these texts.

The « Stichvorlage » of the 2nd edition of the 3rd Symphony, Theodor Rättig, Vienna (1890) , consisted of a mixture of pages from the 1st printed edition (which had been published by Rättig, in 1878) and pages newly copied by Franz Schalk. The entire document, now Wn Mus. Hs. 6081, was thoroughly revised by the composer. The « Stichvorlagen » of the 1st editions of the 4th Symphony, Albert J. Gutmann, Vienna (1889) , and String Quintet, Albert J. Gutmann, Vienna (1884) , are copy scores with Bruckner's hand. (13) Alfred Orel agreed with the position of the « Gesamtausgabe » that « for the posthumously published editions, (i.e., the 1st editions of the 6th and 9th Symphonies) Bruckner's manuscripts are doubtless the only correct textual basis ». « Original und Bearbeitung bei Anton Bruckner », page 221. Contrary to Robert Haas, Orel did not admit any such blanket conclusion about the editions published during the composer's lifetime. Such decisions, he wrote, « can only be addressed case-by-case, rather than on a general basis ». Ibid., page 222.
